not as high as the moon? was his next question to himself; therefore the moon may be influenced by this power of gravity, and retained in her orbit, and the whole planetary system moving round the sun as their common centre may obey this great principle, which, however, as he calculated, must decrease in strength in the duplicate proportion of the increase of distance. The further examination of this important subject was deferred, as he returned to Cambridge; and in 1667, being elected fellow of his college, he devoted all his attention to the construction of a reflecting telescope. In 1669 he succeeded to the mathematical chair at Cambridge, on the resignation of his friend Dr. Barrow, and for three years he delivered lectures on the discoveries which he had made in optics, and communicated his theory of light and colours, which he had brought to a great degree of perfection, to the Royal Society, of which he was elected member in 1672. Some time after he presented to the same learned society his telescope, with a description of its properties. While labouring on the problems of his great system, his attention was attracted to the comet of 1680, and by repeated experiments he proved the truth of Kepler's supposition about the motion of the primary planets, and after establishing his conclusions on the most infallible proofs, he in 1687 published, at the request of the Royal Society, the result of his astronomical pursuits, under the title of Philosophiæ Naturalis Principia Mathematica. This excellent performance, which set his name above the philosophers of ancient and modern times, met, however, with opposition; but though its truths were delivered with conciseness and precision, and required study and labour to be comprehended, even by the most learned of mathematicians, it gained by slow but sure degrees universal praise and admiration. At this time the attacks of James II. on the privileges of the university were resisted with great spirit, and Newton was appointed as one of the delegates to complain of the illegal encroachment. His eloquence on this occasion was so strong and powerful, that the king abandoned his claims. He was member of the convention parliament in 1688, and when his friend, the earl of Halifax, planned the recoinage of the money of the kingdom, he called to his assistance the abilities of Newton, and made him, in 1696, warden of the mint. In 1699 he was made master of the mint, with an ample salary, and enjoyed the office till his death. In consequence of these appointments in London, he resigned the emoluments of his professorship to Mr. Whiston, of Clare hall, his deputy, for whom he generously procured the appointment in 1703. In 1703 he was elected president of the Royal Society.

and for 25 years he adorned the chair of that learned body till his death. He also was made honorary member of the academy of sciences at Paris, and received every mark of distinction from the learned of the continent. When he published, in 1704, his theory of light, after establishing its truth by repeated experiments, during the space of 30 years; he also made mention of his discovery of the nature of fluxions, which, since 1672, had engaged his attention, but had not been communicated to the public; yet by mean suggestions Leibnitz laid claim to the merit of discovering them. While the Acta Eruditorum of Leipsic attributed the honour to the German philosopher, Keill of Oxford undertook the defence of his friend, and proved by the clearest evidence, and from extracts from the papers of the Royal Society, that this system, so important in mathematics, originated first in the genius of Newton. In 1715 Leibnitz proposed to the English philosopher his famous problem of the trajectories, which, while it might have puzzled other mathematicians, was resolved by Newton in a few hours, after the labours and the fatigues of the day. This great man, who had been in 1705 knighted by queen Anne, became a great favourite at the court of George I. and the princess of Wales, afterwards queen Caroline, took infinite pleasure in the conversation of the philosopher. As she had an uncommon genius for mathematics and astronomy, she often said, she considered herself happy in being born in an age when she could enjoy the conversation and the instruction of so illustrious a philosopher. At the request of the princess he drew up his abstract of chronology, but a copy of it was imprudently communicated to signor Conti, a Venetian, who with illiberal effrontery had it printed at Paris, and at the same time engaged some of the French literati to attack and abuse it. This drew a defence from Newton, inserted in the philosophical transactions, and soon after he published the work himself. Having now nearly reached the age of 80, Sir Isaac, after enjoying, from his regular and temperate habits, all the blessings of health, found himself seized by an incontinence of urine, which was attended with the excruciating pains of a stone in the bladder. For a few weeks before his death, the agonies which he suffered were very great, yet his meekness and patience subdued them, and though from the severe paroxysms which he endured, large drops of sweat ran down his cheeks, he preserved his usual smile of cheerfulness and serenity. On the night of the 11th March, 1726-7, his intellects were visibly affected, and he continued insensible till he expired nine days after, aged 85. His body lay in state in the Jerusalem chamber, and on the 28th March, was conveyed in becoming funeral pomp to Westminster-abbey, while the lord chancellor, the dukes of Montrose and Roxburgh, the earls of Pembroke, Sussex, and Macclesfield, supported the pall. He was interred near the entrance of the choir on the left hand, and a stately monument with a proper inscription has been erected to his honour. Sir Isaac had the happiness of enjoying during his life the fame, the honours, and the rewards which seldom attend the learned and the great, but which often are lavished with insulting profusion on their remains or their posterity. In his person this great man was of a middle stature, his countenance was pleasing and venerable, though it did not display that deep and penetrating sagacity which are every where perceptible in his writings. He never made use of spectacles, and it is said he lost only one tooth during the whole of his life. In his temper he was meek and unassuming, and so great a lover of peace and harmony, that he kept some of his publications from the eye of the public, that he might not excite the envy and the malice of opponents or rivals. With great powers of mind, and with a comprehension which embraced at one view the meaning of every subject to which he directed his attention, and overleaped as trifling all the difficulties which had arrested the progress of other philosophers, he was thus enabled to shed lustre on the age in which he lived, and the country which gave him birth, and to introduce such astonishing improvements, and make such stupendous discoveries in science, in mathematics, and in astronomy, as would each of them individually have bestowed immortality. To his other great qualities he added the virtues of piety, and religious infidelity he marked with abhorrence; no remark of levity or indifference on the powers of the Deity, or on revelation, ever was made in his presence without drawing from him the severest censure; and while he made the Bible his favourite study, he employed some portion of his time in proving the great truths of the prophetic writers of Scripture. Ardently attached to the tenets and the discipline of the church of England, he bore with patience the errors and the failings of others, and was at all times an enemy to intolerant persecution. He was never married, and it is probable that as his time was devoted so assiduously to study, he felt little of the concerns of domestic life, and never was sensible of the want of a companion at home. In his conduct he was charitable, and as his income increased he was proportionably more affected by the wants of his indigent neighbours. He left 32,000*l.* at his death, but made no will. His most valuable works have been collected and published, together with an excellent commentary, 1784, in 5 vols. 4to. by bishop Horsley.

NEWTON, Richard, a learned divine, born in Northamptonshire, and educated at Westminster, and Christ-church, Oxford. He distinguished himself as an able tutor, and in 1710, was inducted principal of Harthall, when he took the degree of D.D. By the friendship of bishop Compton, he obtained the rectory of Sudbury, Northamptonshire, and in 1753 he was preferred to a canonry of Christ-church by the interest of the duke of Newcastle, to whom he had been tutor. In 1740 he obtained a charter to erect Harthall into a college, and to separate it from the superintendence of Exeter college, to which it belonged, and this he effected at great expense, and was himself the first principal. He died at Lavendon Grange, deservedly respected, 21st April, 1753. He wrote a book against Pluralities and Non-residence—on University Education—and also edited Theophrastus, with notes in English, which work is said to have brought him 1000*l.* which he nobly applied in endowments on his college.

NEWTON, Thomas, an English bishop, born at Lichfield, 1st Dec. 1703. From Lichfield school he entered at Westminster, and in 1723, was elected to Trinity college, Cambridge. When in orders he removed to London, and became curate, afterwards assistant preacher at St. George's, Hanover square, and next, afternoon preacher to Grosvenor chapel. He was afterwards tutor to lord Tyrconnel, and in 1744 he obtained St. Mary-le-Bow rectory, Cheap-side, by the friendship of the earl of Bath. In 1747 he was chosen lecturer of St. George's, Hanover square, and that year married the daughter of Mr. Trebeck the rector. He published in 1749 his edition of Milton's Paradise Lost, with useful notes, and a well-written life. In 1756 he was made king's chaplain, and then prebendary of Westminster, and precentor of York, and 1761 he was nominated bishop of Bristol with the residentiaryship of St. Paul's, which he exchanged in 1768 for the deanery. Satisfied with his ecclesiastical honours he determined to solicit no more, and kept his word. He died at the deanery, 14th Feb. 1782, aged 79. He lost his wife in 1754, and in 1761 married a second, a daughter of John lord Lisburne, widow of Mr. Hand, whom he describes as an amiable and excellent woman. His dissertations on the prophecies in 3 vols. 8vo. is a work of great merit. He also preached Boyle's lectures. After his death, his miscellaneous works, with memoirs of his life by himself, were published.

NEWTON, Thomas, an English divine, born at Presbury, Cheshire. He studied at Oxford, and afterwards at Cambridge, and then obtained the grammar-school at Macclesfield. Besides divinity, he paid attention to medicine, and practised with credit. He died at his living of Ilford, Essex, 1607. He was author of the History of the Saracens, 4to.; Approved Medicines, and Cordial Receipts, 8vo.; Illustrium Aliquot Anglorum Encomia, 4to.; Directions for the Health of Magistrates and Students; Herbal of the Bible, 8vo. &c.

NEWTON, John, an exemplary divine, was born in London in 1725. He was bred to the sea under his father, who was master of a merchant-vessel. Afterwards he sailed in the Guinea trade, and led a very irregular life for some years; but at last he grew both serious and studious. By indefatigable diligence he attained a knowledge of the Latin and Greek languages; and in 1764 was ordained on the curacy of Olney in Buckinghamshire, where he became acquainted with Cowper, the poet, and Mr. Thornton, the banker; the latter of whom presented him, in 1779, to the living of St. Mary Woolnoth, Lombard-street. He died in 1807. His works are—1. A Narrative of his own life, 12mo. 2. A Review of Ecclesiastical History, 8vo. 3. Olney Hymns, in which are some by his friend Cowper. 4. Omicron's letters on religious subjects. 5. Cardiphonia, or the Utterance of the Heart, 2 vols. 6. The Messiah, a series of sermons, 2 vols.—W. B.

NICAISE, Claude, a French antiquary, born at Dijon. He resided for some time at Rome, and had a most extensive correspondence with the learned men of his times in every country. He published a treatise de Nummo Pantheo; a Discourse on the Form and Figure of the Sirens; a Dissertation on two of Raphael's Pictures, and on the schools of Athens and Parnassus. He died at Velley, Oct. 1701, aged 78.

NICANDER, a native of Colophon, eminent as a physician, a grammarian, and a poet, B.C. 140. His two poems, called Theriaca and Alexipharmaca, are still extant.

NICAUSIS, or BALKIS, according to the Arabians, is the name of the famous queen of Sheba, whose visit to Solomon is mentioned in Scripture. She reigned in Arabia Felix, or according to Josephus, in Egypt and Ethiopia.

NICEPHORUS, Gregoras, a Greek historian, author of a History of the Eastern empire, from 1204 to 1341, printed in 1702, Paris, 2 vols. folio, and also other works. He was a great favourite of the emperor Andronicus.

NICEPHORUS, Callistus, a Greek historian who flourished in the same age as the preceding. His ecclesiastical history extends from the birth of Christ to 610, the best edition of which is that of Paris, 1630.

NICEPHORUS, Blemmidas, a monk of mount Athos in the 13th century, who, as attached to the Romish church, refused to accept the dignity of patriarch of Constantinople. His two treatises concerning the procession of the Holy Ghost, were printed at Rome, 1659.

NICEPHORUS I. chancellor of the Eastern empire, seized the throne 802, and banished the empress Irene to Mitylene. Though attacked by his seditious subjects who raised Bardanes one of his generals to the throne, he overcame all opposition, till the Bulgarians appeared against him. He fell in battle 811.

NICEPHORUS II. Phocas, a nobleman of Constantinople, so popular that his virtues elevated him to the throne, 963, on the death of Romanus the younger, whose widow he married. He attacked the Saracens with spirit and success, but at last was assassinated by John Zimisces, 969.

NICEPHORUS III. a Roman general raised to the throne of Constantinople by his army. He was three years after, 1081, deposed by Alexis Comnenus his general, and soon after died of grief in a monastery.

NICERON, John Francis, an eminent mathematician, born at Paris, 1613. He took the habit of the Minims, but though regularly employed in their ecclesiastical affairs, either as visitor or professor, he devoted much of his time to his favourite study of optics. He died at Aix in Provence, 22d Sept. 1646, but though only 33 years of age, he was author of some valuable works, especially l'Interpretation des Chiffres, &c.; Thaumaturgus Opticus, sive Admiranda Optices, Catoptrices, et Dioptrices.

NICERON, John Peter, the celebrated author of "Memoirs of Men Illustrious in the Republic of Letters," was born at Paris, March 11th, 1685, of an ancient family. He early determined to forsake the world, and therefore took the habit of a Barnabite Jesuit 1703, and then studied at Montargès, Loches, and Poitiers. He became a very popular preacher, and to a great fondness for laborious studies, he brought an extensive knowledge of ancient and modern languages. He died after a short illness, 8th July, 1738. Besides his Memoirs, a valuable work, of which the first volume appeared in 1727, and the 39th in 1738, to which three more have been added, he wrote a translation of Hancock's book on the Virtues of Common Water, 2 vols. 12mo.; the Conversion of England to Christianity; Ovington's Voyages, &c.

1604, was a Paphlagonian, and lived in the ninth century.

NICETAS, surnamed SERRON, author of Panegyrics on Gregory Nazianzen—of Commentaries on Scripture, and other works, was a deacon of Constantinople, and afterwards bishop of Heraclea in the 11th century.

NICETAS, Arhominates, a Greek historian, born at Chone, or Colossus in Phrygia. He fled from Constantinople when taken by the French, 1204, and settled at Nice in Bithynia, where he died 1206. He wrote a History or Annals from 1118 to the death of Baldwin, 1205, of which a translation appeared at Basil, by Wolsius, 1557, and Geneva, 1593.

NICHOLAS, Abraham, an English penman, born in Bread-street, London. He is author of Examples of Penmanship—the Penman's Assistant, 1719—Complete Writing-master, in 31 folio plates. He kept a school at Clapham, and died abroad about 1744, aged 52.

NICHOLS, William, an English divine, born at Donington, Bucks, 1664. He was of Magdalen hall, Oxford, afterwards of Wadham, and in 1684 was elected fellow of Merton, where he took the degree of D. D. 1695. He was chaplain to lord Montague, and became rector of Selsey, near Chichester; but it appears from a letter of his to Robert, earl of Oxford, that he was disappointed in his expectations of a promised prebend in the church of Westminster. His life was usefully devoted to study, and to acts of piety. He died about 1712. His works were numerous and valuable; the best known are, Conference with a Theist, 2 vols. 8vo.—Defensio Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ, 1707, 12mo. afterwards published in 8vo. and in English—a Commentary on the Liturgy of England, in 8vo. and folio, a very useful book—Religion of a Prince, &c.

NICHOLS, Richard, governor of New-York, and New-Jersey, was one of the four commissioners appointed in 1664, to inquire into the state of the colonies, to determine complaints in the various departments of the governments of New-England, and to subdue the Dutch at Mahadoes. They reached Boston in July, and soon proceeded against the Dutch, and governor Stuyvesant surrendered the government in August. After an administration in New-York, in which he conducted with great prudence, integrity, and moderation, Nichols returned to England, and was succeeded by colonel Lovelace, in 1667. The government of New-Jersey he resigned to Carteret, in 1666.  L.

NICHOLLS, Frank, a physician, born in London, 1699. He was educated at Westminster and Christ-church, Oxford, where he took his degree of M. D. 1729, and became reader of anatomy. His lectures were popular, but it has been observed that his remarks on subjects of anatomy, tended to inculcate infidelity in his pupils. He married in 1743, Dr. Mead's daughter, by whom he had five children. He was physician to George II. and published an account of his death in the philosophical transactions. He wrote besides, a tract de Animâ Medicâ—de Motu Cordis et Sanguinis in Homine, and died in 1779, aged 80.

NICHOLSON, Sir Francis, governor of Virginia, was by profession a soldier, and was lieutenant-governor of New-York, under Andross, and at the head of the administration from 1687 to 1689. He entered on the government of Virginia in 1690, and continued till 1692, highly popular. From 1694 to 1699, he was governor of Maryland. He was then again appointed to the government of Virginia, but was greatly disliked by the people. He was superseded in 1705. He was appointed commander of the forces sent, in 1710, against Canada, where he captured Port Royal, and also of the unsuccessful expedition of the next year. In 1713, he became governor of Nova Scotia, and in 1720, of Carolina, where he exercised a useful administration. He returned to England in June, 1725, and died in London, March 5, 1728. ¶ L.

NICHOLSON, James, captain in the American navy, was born in Chestertown, Maryland, in 1734. His ancestors, who were highly respectable, were among the first settlers of that state, and held many important offices in it, both while it remained a province and afterwards. He became a sailor in early life, and spent several years in the occupation. On the commencement of hostilities between the colonies and Great Britain, he was appointed by the legislature of Maryland to the command of the state ship, the Defence, and not long after, by congress, to that of the frigate Trumbull, of 32 guns, in which, in March 1780, he fought a severe battle with the British ship Wyatt, and subsequently with a frigate and ship, to which the Trumbull was surrendered. ¶ L.

NICIAS, an Athenian, who distinguished himself in the Peloponnesian war, and was sent by his countrymen with Demosthenes and Eurymedon, to the conquest of Sicily. The expedition was unfortunate, and after two years' siege, the Syracusans attacked and defeated their invaders, and Nicias was cruelly put to death, B. C. 413.

NICODEMUS, a learned Jew, who visited our Saviour privately, and became his disciple. On the death of Jesus, he assisted Joseph of Arimathea in preparing to pay honours to the remains of his master; but though the Jews marked him for destruction for his attachment to the new doctrines, it is said that he was saved by the interference of his relation Gamaliel. The gospel ascribed to him is a forgery of the Manicheans.

NICOLAÏ, John, a native of Monza, near Verdun, who took the habit of the Dominicans, and was for 20 years professor of theology at Paris, where he died 1673, aged 79. Besides an edition of the works of Thomas Aquinas, in 19 vols. folio, he published some Dissertations on Ecclesiastical Discipline—a tract against Arnould, and other theological works.

NICOLAS, a proselyte of Antioch, who became, on being converted, one of the seven first deacons of the church of Jerusalem. He is accused by some authors as the founder of the Nicolastes, a sect which admitted a community of wives, and practised all the impious rites of paganism. It is, however, more probable that this sect owed its origin to another person.

NICOLAS, St. bishop of Myra in Lycia, is supposed to have lived in the age of Constantine the Great, and to have assisted at the general council of Nice.

NICOLAS I. surnamed the Great, was elected pope after Benedict III. 858. He sent ambassadors to Constantinople, and pronounced an anathema against Photius, the patriarch, which proved the cause of the schism which separated the Greek and the Latin churches. He died 867, much respected for his zeal, firmness, and charity. His letters were published at Rome, 1542, in folio.

NICOLAS II. Gerard, of Burgundy, became archbishop of Florence, and in 1058, was elected pope. He is the first whose coronation is mentioned in history. He was opposed by John, bishop of Valettri, under the name of Benedict X. but he soon destroyed the power of his rival. He extended the papal authority over some of the Norman princes in Lombardy and Naples, and died 1061.

NICOLAS III. John Gaetan, was elected pope after John XXI. 1277. He sent missionaries into Tartary, but with little effect; and he was guilty of some oppressive actions to enrich his family. He died of an apoplexy, 22d August, 1280.

NICOLAS IV. N. de Rubeis, was a native of Ascoli, and was raised to the popedom 1288, an honour which he accepted with much reluctance. He published a crusade against the infidels for the recovery of Jerusalem, but died before the plan was brought to maturity, 4th April, 1292. He was a man of learning, and wrote some Commentaries on Scripture, &c.

NICOLAS V. Thomas de Sarzanne, bishop of Bologna, was a native of Luni, and was elected pope 1447, on the death of Eugenius IV. He succeeded in restoring peace to the church, which had been torn to pieces by the interests and the intrigues of rival popes, and he gained universal respect by his great wisdom and moderation. He celebrated this happy era by a jubilee in 1450, which drew to Rome an immense multitude of people. The conspiracy which was formed against him by Stephen Porcario, and the taking of Constantinople by the Turks, and the consequent calamities of the Christians, are said to have afflicted him so heavily, that he died of grief, 24th March, 1455, aged 57.

NICOLAS of Damascus, a philosopher and historian in the age of Augustus, some fragments of whose works remain.

NICOLAS of Cusa, son of a fisherman, rose by his merit, and assisted at the council of Basil, 1431, and showed such eloquence that Eugenius IV. employed him as his ambassador at Constantinople, in Germany, and France. He was patronised by succeeding popes, and made bishop of Brixen. He died at Todi, 11th Aug. 1454, aged 53. He wrote several works on theological subjects.

NICOLAS of Lyra, so called from the place of his birth, near Evreux in Normandy, was a Jew, but was converted to Christianity 1291, and took the habit of the Minors. He taught divinity with great reputation at Paris, and obtained the confidence of Jane, queen of Philip V. and was one of the executors of her will. He died at Paris, 23d Oct. 1340. He wrote Commentaries on the Bible, edited at Antwerp, 1634, in 6 vols. folio—a Disputation against the Jews, folio—Treatise against a Jewish Rabbi.

NICOLAS of Munster, founder of a sect called the Family, or House of Love, about 1540, pretended to be inspired by the Holy Spirit, and therefore declared himself greater than Jesus Christ. He had many followers, and supported his doctrines by various publications, such as the Land of Peace—the Gospel of the Kingdom, &c. Some of the followers of this sect appeared in England, 1604, and they presented to James I. a profession of their faith.

NICOLAS of Pisa, an architect and sculptor of eminence, who built a church and convent at Bologna, for the fraternity of the preachers, and a marble tomb for the body of St. Dominic. He flourished in the 13th century.

NICOLAS EYMERICK, a Dominican of Girronne, inquisitor against the Vaudois, under Innocent VI. was author of the Directory of Inquisitors, printed in folio, 1687, and died in his native county, 1399.

NICOLAS, Augustine, an advocate of Besançon, counsellor to the duke of Lorraine. He died at Besançon, 1695. He wrote several things in verse and prose, of no great merit.

NICOLE, John, a French lawyer, born at Chartres, 1600. He acquired some reputation as a bold haranguer, but he was a bad advocate. He died 1678, at Chartres. Nothing of his compositions were preserved, though his friend Marolles saw his translation of Quintilian.

NICOLE, Claude, related to the above, was born at Chartres, 1611, and became king's counsel, and president in the elections of Chartres. He died there, 22d Nov. 1685. He was a good linguist, and wrote poetry, though his compositions were rather licentious. His works were printed at Paris, 1660, in 2 vols. 4to. and again, 1693, 2 vols. 12mo.

NICOLE, Peter, an eminent French divine, son of John, above mentioned, was born at Chartres, 10th Oct. 1625. He studied at Paris with great assiduity, and was for some time engaged in instructing youth under the society of Port-royal. He assisted his friend Arnauld in the composition of some of his pieces; but his letter to Innocent XI. in the defence of the bishops of St. Pont and Arras, exposed him to persecution, and he withdrew from Paris. He afterwards returned, but soon quitted it for a residence in Flanders. He returned afterwards under a feigned name to Chartres, and died there of an apoplectic fit, 16th Nov. 1695. He was a man of great abilities; his erudition was extensive, his judgment solid, but he was little acquainted with the world; and his defence of the Jansenists, and latterly his support of Bossuet against the Quietists, raised him enemies in France, and caused an unpopularity which his private virtues did not deserve. His works are not less than 100 in number, but chiefly on controversial subjects. His Moral Essays, and his Treatise on Preserving Peace in Society, are much admired.

NICOLE, Francis, a native of Paris, distinguished for his extensive knowledge of mathematics. His Essay sur la Theorie des Roulettes—his Traité du Calcul des Differences Finies—and his Traité des Lignes du Troisième Ordre, are most convincing proofs of the accuracy of his researches, and of the depth of his genius. He was member of the academy of sciences, and died 10th Jan. 1758, aged 75.

NICOLO DEL ABBATE, a painter, born at Modena, and called Abbate, because brought up by Primatic, abbot of St. Martin. He went with his patron to France, 1552, and his pencil was employed in adorning Fontainebleau, and the noblest edifices of Paris. His style is said to resemble strongly that of Julio Romano, and that of Parmesan.

NICOLSON, William, a learned bishop, born at Orton, Cumberland, 1655. He was educated at Queen's college, Oxford, where he became fellow, 1679. He was patronised by the bishop of Carlisle, who gave him a prebend and the archdeaconry of that church, and in 1702, he succeeded his patron in that sec. He was translated in 1718, to Londonderry in Ireland, and in Jan. 1726-7, he was raised to the see of Cashell, but died the 13th Feb. following, before he took possession of his new dignity. He was a learned man, well skilled in antiquities. He published several things, the best known of which are, his descriptions of Poland, Denmark, &c.—the English Historical Library—Tracts on the Bangorian Controversy, &c.

NICOMEDES, a mathematician of the second century, known as the discoverer of the conchoid curve.

NICON, patriarch of the Russian empire, was born of mean parentage about 1613. He had a strong prejudice in favour of a monastic life, and the loss of his children determined him to assume the habit of a monk, and to send his wife to a convent. His austerities, as well as his learning, by degrees raised him to public consequence; he was patronised by his sovereign, and at last made archbishop of Novogorod, and patriarch of Russia. Some innovations which he introduced into the church, and the publication of the Bible in the Russian language, raised him enemies among the clergy, and at last by intrigue and violence he was obliged to abdicate his high office, 1658, and to be imprisoned; but the emperor Feodor permitted him to retire to the privacy of his original cell. He died 1679, after enduring much undeserved persecution. He is the author of a chronicle of Russian affairs, to the reign of Alexiowitz, printed at Petersburg, 2 vols. 4to. 1767.

NICOT, John, master of requests to the French king, was born at Nismes. He was ambassador from France to Portugal, from whence he brought tobacco, which in compliment to him was called by the French Nicotiana. He wrote a French and Latin Dictionary, folio—a treatise on Navigation—the Treasure of French Language, &c. and died 1600 at Paris.

NIDHARD, John Everard, a Jesuit, born at Falkenstein in Austria. He accompanied the archdutchess Mary, when she married Philip IV. of Spain, and in this new situation he became a great favourite with the Spanish monarch. After the death of Philip, he was made by the queen's mother inquisitor general, and minister; but his abilities were not adequate to the administration of the political affairs of a kingdom. Flushed with the pride of power, he treated the nobles with insolence. You ought to respect me, said he one day to his rival, the duke of Lerma, for I daily have your God in my hands and your queen at my feet. The weakness and incapacity of his government appeared by the successes of Lewis XIV. in the Netherlands, and in Franche Comté, and the favourite at last gave way to the intrigues of his enemies, and retired to Rome as ambassador from Spain. He was made a cardinal by Clement X. and bishop of Edessa. He died 1st February, 1681, aged 73. He wrote a discourse on the immaculate conception of the Virgin, &c.

NIEUHOFF, John de, a Dutchman who went as ambassador from the Dutch East India company to the emperor of China, in the middle of the 17th century, of which he wrote an interesting account translated into French by Le Carpentier. It is also to be found in Churchill's collection.

NIEUWENTYT, Bernard, a learned Dutchman, born at Westgraafdyk, North Holland, 10th Aug. 1654. He studied with unusual assiduity, and became a great philosopher and mathematician, and obtained high reputation as a physician, and as the upright and respected chief magistrate of Purmerende. He died 1730, having been twice married. He wrote in Latin, Considerations on the Analysis of Quantities infinitely small—Analysis of Curves by the Doctrine of Infinites—on the Principles of the Differential Calculus—Contemplations on the Universe; translated into English, in 3 vols. 8vo. called the Religious Philosopher.

NIGER, C. Pescennius Justus, governor of Syria, proclaimed emperor of Rome by his army 193. He was defeated and slain by his rival Severus two years after.

NIGIDIUS FIGULUS, Publius, a Roman who assisted Cicero in the extirpation of Catiline's conspiracy. He sided with Pompey, and died in exile, B. C. 45.

NIGRISOLI, Jerome, an Italian physician, author of Progymnasmata Medica, printed at Guastala, 1655. He died at Ferrara 1689, aged 69. His son Francis was also an able physician, author of some useful works, and also de Veterum Chartâ, ejusque Usu, &c. He died 1727, aged 79.

NINUS, founder of the Assyrian empire, was son of Belus, and husband of Semiramis, to whom he left his kingdom, B. C. 2164.

NIPHUS, Augustin, a famous philosopher, born at Jopoli in Calabria. His works became so popular, that Leo X. created him count palatine, and permitted him to blazon his arms with those of the Medicis. He died about 1550. His works are in Latin, and various, and contain commentaries on Aristotle and Averroes, 14 vols. folio—Treatises de Amore—de Falsa Diluvii Prognosticatione, 4to.

NISBET, Sir John, lord advocate of Scotland in the reign of Charles II. became popular by pleading against the standing militia, and was one of the commissioners appointed about the union of the two kingdoms.

NISBET, Charles, D.D. first president of Dickinson college, Pennsylvania, was born in Haddington, Scotland, in 1736, and educated at Edinburgh. He was for several years minister of Montrose, and on the institution of the college at Carlisle in 1783, was chosen its president, and in 1785, arrived there, and entered on the duties of the office, for which he was happily fitted by fine endowments, uncommonly extensive learning, and interesting manners and conversation. He continued there an ornament to the college, to the church, and to society, till his death on the 17th of January, 1804, in the 68th year of his age.

NIVELLE DE LA CHAUSSEE, Peter Claude, a French poet, born of an opulent family at Paris, 1692. Though favoured by fortune he preferred the honours of literature to all other distinctions, and acquired some celebrity by his epistle to Clio, and his dramatic pieces. He was member of the French academy, and died at Paris, 14th March, 1754. His pieces possess great merit, and are much esteemed in France. The best are the School of Mothers—Melanides le Gouvernante, comedies—Maximian—Prejugé à-la-mode—George Barnwell, tragedies. These works have appeared in 5 vols. 12mo. 1763.

NIVERNOIS, Lewis Julius Mancini duke of, minister of state, member of the French academy, and of belles lettres, and well known as a poet and a writer, was born at Paris 16th Dec. 1716. He left the military profession to serve his country as ambassador, and he represented his sovereign at Rome, at Berlin; and afterwards in London, where he negotiated the peace of 1763. Distinction at the court, however, had less charms for him than literary fame, and on his return to Paris, he withdrew from political life, and devoted himself to the muses. His poetical imitations of Virgil, Horace, Ovid, Tibullus, Ariosto, and Milton, possess great merit and singular beauty, and his songs and fables were popular productions in France. During the revolution he was dragged to prison, but he had the good fortune to be liberated, and he died at Paris 1798, at the great age of 82. His other works are Dialogues of the Dead—Letters on the Use of the Mind—Reflections on the Genius of Horace, of Boileau, of J. B. Rousseau—the Life of Abbe Barthelimi—Reflections on Alexander the Great, and Charles XII.—Translation of Tacitus's Life of Agricola—Pope's Essay on Man, translated—Portrait of Frederick the Great of Prussia—Adonis and Richardet, from the Italian, &c.

NIZOLIUS, Marius, an Italian grammarian, who published Thesaurus Ciceronianus, or a dictionary of the words and expressions of Cicero, &c. folio—de Veris Principiis, et Verâ Ratione philosophandi, &c. 1553, much admired by Leibnitz. The time of his death is not mentioned.

NOAH, son of Lamech, was born 2978 B. C. and was saved from the destruction of the deluge by building an ark, in obedience to the directions of the Almighty. With him were saved his wife, his three sons, and their three wives, and by them the earth was afterwards peopled. The place where the ark first rested after the sinking of the waters of the flood, was mount Ararat in Armenia. Noah died 2029 B. C.

NOAILLES, Lewis Antony de, cardinal and archbishop of Paris, was born of an illustrious family, 27th May, 1651. Though by birth duke of St. Cloud, and a peer of France, and the possessor of large domains, he preferred the ecclesiastical state to political distinction, and became D.D. of the Sorbonne, 1676. In 1679, he was made bishop of Cahors, and the next year translated to Chalons, and in 1695, to the archbishopric of Paris. In this high dignity, he framed excellent regulations for the government of his clergy, and zealously opposed the prevailing doctrines of Quietism, and of Jansenism. In 1700, he was raised to the rank of cardinal, at the request of Lewis XIV. who observed to him that he felt more pleasure in obtaining for him the hat, than he would in receiving it. The manner in which he sanctioned "the Moral Reflections" of Pasquin Quesnel on the New Testament, brought him unwarily into trouble. Some of the Jesuits accused the author of heresy and sedition, and the archbishop shared in the censure, and after appeals to pope Clement XI. there was issued from Rome 1713, the famous bull called "Unigenitus" which condemned the Moral Reflections as improper and dangerous. The clamour of the Jesuits, increased by the intrigues of father Tellier, prevailed, the cardinal was exiled, but afterwards restored to favour, and his persecutor Tellier disgraced. The cardinal died at Paris, 4th May, 1729, and his remains were entombed in the cathedral. His brother Gaston succeeded him at Chalons, and died 1720.

NOAILLES, Adrian Maurice, duke de, son of Anne Julius duke of Noailles, was born 1678. He early devoted himself to the military service, and attended his father in the campaigns of Catalonia in 1693 and 1694. He was afterwards employed under Vendome, and then served in Flanders in 1696, and in 1700 he accompanied the young king of Spain to Madrid, and in the war of the Spanish succession maintained the honour of his nation and the prowess of his family. His intimacy and alliance with Madame de Maintenon secured his favour with the monarch, and in 1703 he was named general of the French armies in Roussillon, where he obtained some important advantages. He took the strong town of Gironne in 1710, and contributed to the submission of all Arragon, and for his services he was made a Spanish grandee by Philip V. and also raised to the honour of duke and peer of France. After the death of Lewis XIV. he was made by the regent president of the council of the finances, and admitted into the council of the regency, but the elevation of cardinal du Bois to the ministry proved his disgrace. He was recalled on the death of du Bois by the regent, and restored with increased honours to the ministry, and in the campaign of 1733, he was invited to serve in the army. He distinguished himself at the siege of Philipsburg, and was rewarded with the rank of marshal, and the year after he drove the Germans from Worms. He was in 1735, placed at the head of the French army in Italy, where he gathered fresh laurels, but in the war of 1741, he was less successful. He afterwards abandoned the military profession, and served his country in assisting as a minister at her counsels, and died universally respected 24th June, 1766, aged 88. By his wife, who was niece to Madame Maintenon, he had two sons, both of whom rose to the rank of marshals of France.

NOBLE, Eustache de, a native of Troyes, who rose by his abilities to the appointment of procureur general of the parliament of Metz. An accusation of being guilty of malpractices all at once robbed him of his reputation and office, and after being imprisoned in the Chatelet, he was banished for nine years. He appealed against this sentence, and was in consequence removed to the prison of the Conciergerie, where he became acquainted with Gabrielle Perreau, generally called la Belle Epicure, a woman of great beauty, and many mental accomplishments. He escaped from his confinement, and was followed by his frail but faithful mistress, by whom he had three children, and at last he finished a life of adventures, wretchedness, and poverty, 31st January, 1711, aged 68, and was buried by public charity. He wrote several things divided into serious pieces, poetry, and romances, collected together in 19 vols. 12mo. The best known of these are the History of the Dutch Republic, 2 vols.—Account of Genoa—Dissertation on the Year of Christ's Nativity—Secret History of the Conspiracy of the Piazzi against the Medicis—L'École du Monde—History of the dethroning of Mahomet IV.—Tales and Fables, &c.

NOGAROLA, Isotta, a learned lady of Verona. She was well acquainted with philosophy, theology, and the learned languages, and her reputation was so universally known, that cardinal Bessarion went to Verona to converse with her. In a dialogue on the question whether Adam was a greater sinner than Eve in eating the forbidden fruit, she ably defended the cause of the mother of mankind, against Louis Foscaro, who maintained a different opinion. She died 1468, aged 38, universally respected. Not less than 566 of her letters were preserved in De Thou's library. Her sisters Genevieve and Laura were equally eminent for their learning and piety. One of the same family, called Antoinetta, was also distinguished for her learning and beauty. She married Salvatico Bonacolti, a nobleman of Mantua; and her daughter Angela inherited her virtues and learning, and acquired celebrity by her explanation of the prophecies and difficult passages of Scripture.

NOGAROLA, Lewis, a noble Venetian, well skilled in the Greek language. He translated into Latin, various Greek authors, in a style elegant and correct. He was at the council of Trent, and served his country in several important offices. He died at Verona 1559, aged 50.

NOINVILLE, James Bernard de, member of the academy of inscriptions, was a man of great information, and author of the History of the Opera, 2 vols. 8vo.—Dissertation on Dictionaries, &c. He died 19th July, 1768.

NOIR, John le, an ecclesiastic of Sees, who was persecuted for his heretical opinions, and at last condemned to perpetual imprisonment. He died at Nantes 22d April, 1692. His works are numerous, and all on subjects of divinity and ecclesiastical discipline, and possess great merit, notwithstanding the charge of heresy, produced against them.

NOLDIUS, Christian, a Danish divine, rector of Landscreon college, and divinity professor at Copenhagen, was born at Hoyboyen in Scania, 22d June, 1626. He travelled over Germany, Holland, and England, and was universally respected for his learning and virtues. He wrote Concordantia Particularum Hebræo-Chaldeicarum Veteris Testamenti, Jena 1734, 4to.—Historia Idumæa—Sacrarum Historiarum et Antiquitatum Synopsis—Logica—Leges distinguendi, &c. and died at Copenhagen 1673.

NOLIN, Denys, advocate of the parliament of Paris, quitted his profession for the study of divinity. He wrote Letters of N. Indes, on the Septuagint Version, &c. dissertations on the French Bibles, &c. He died 1710.

NOLIN, John Baptist, a geographer of Paris, who died 1st July, 1762, aged 76. He bestowed great attention in the execution of his maps, which are still held in high estimation in France.

NOLLET, Dominic, an historical painter, born at Bruges. His battles and landscapes were much admired. He died 1736, aged 96.

NOLLET, John Anthony, a learned man, born at Pitobre, in the diocese of Noyon, 17th Nov. 1700. He studied at Clermont, Beauvais, and Paris, and with such success, that he soon became known to men of science and celebrity. Though an ecclesiastic, he devoted himself assiduously to philosophical pursuits. He visited England with Dufay, Duhamel, and Jussieu, in 1734, and was admitted into the London Royal Society, and in a subsequent excursion to Holland, he was honoured with the friendship of Desaguliers, Gravesande, and Musschembroeck. On his return to Paris he gave lectures on experimental philosophy, with illustrations of chymistry, anatomy, and natural history, and with such effect, that in 1738, the ministry, at the request of Maurepas, established a professorial chair of experimental philosophy purposely for him. He was, in 1739, admitted member of the academy of sciences, and a few months after he was invited by the king of Sardinia to fill the philosophical chair in the university of Turin. He was, in 1744, recalled from Turin by the court to instruct the young dauphin in experimental philosophy, and in reward for his services he was appointed in 1753, first professor of experimental philosophy in the college of Navarre, and in 1757, philosophical instructor to the Royal family. This able philosopher, who by his experiments and discoveries contributed so much to the advancement of science, died at Paris 25th April, 1770, aged 70. Besides lectures in six vols. 12mo. he published valuable treatises on Electricity, 5 vols.—on the Art of making Experiments, 3 vols. 12mo. and contributed ingenious papers to the memoirs of the academy.

NOLLIKINS, Joseph Francis, a painter, born at Antwerp. He copied Watteau, and his pieces of landscapes, children's amusements, &c. were in high repute. He settled at London, and was patronised by lords Tilney and Cobham. He died 21st Jan. 1748.

NONIUS, Mareellus, a learned grammarian and peripatetic philosopher, whose treatise "de Proprietate Sermonum" is highly esteemed. It was printed 1471, and in 8vo. 1614, with J. Mercier's notes.

NONNIUS, Lewis, a learned physician of Antwerp, in the 17th century, author of a curious treatise, called "Dieteticon, sive de Re Cibariâ," with useful remarks to explain some passages in Horace, Juvenal, &c. He wrote also a commentary on Greek Medals—Hispania—Ichthyophagia—Epicedimn Lipsie, &c.

NONNIUS, Peter, or NUNES, a mathematician, born in 1497, at Alcazar in Portugal. He taught mathematics at Coimbra, and was preceptor to Henry, son of king Emanuel. He was author of Latin treatises, de Arte Navigandi—de Crepusculis—Annotations in Aristotelem—and a work on Algebra, written in Portuguese and in Spanish, and much esteemed. He died 1577, aged 80.

NONNUS, a Greek poet of Panopolis in Egypt. He wrote in the fifth century, an Account of his Embassy in Ethiopia, &c.—a Paraphrase on St. John's Gospel—Dionysiaea, &c.

NORDT, Gerard, an eminent civilian, born 1647, at Nimeguen. He studied in his native town with great reputation, and after visiting the other universities of Holland, Leyden, Utrecht, and Franeker, where he was created LL.D. he returned to practise the law. He distinguished himself so much as a pleader, that he was honourably elected to the law professorship of Nimeguen, and in 1679 to that of Franeker. He afterwards accepted the invitations of the magistrates of Utrecht, and in 1686 those of the curators of Leyden university, of which he was chosen rector in 1698. He died of an apoplexy at Leyden, 15th Aug. 1725. He was highly respected for his knowledge of the law, and that philosophical ease with which he discussed subjects of right and jurisprudence. His works are all on law subjects, and have been collected in one vol. 4to. 1713.

NORADIN, son of Sanguin, or Emadeddin, sultan of Aleppo and Nineveh, inherited with Sesseddin, his brother, his father's dominions, when that monarch was slain by his eunuchs at the siege of Calgembar, 1145. He enlarged by his valour the kingdom of Aleppo, which he had obtained to his share, and he bravely attacked the crusaders, who invaded his territories, and defeated Josselin, count of Edessa, and after seizing his dominions, he killed Raymond, prince of Antioch, in a dreadful battle. He next turned his arms against Iconium, and then subdued Egypt under his power, and caused himself to be acknowledged sultan of the country. He died 1174, universally respected as a man of generosity, prudence, and virtue.

NORDBERG, I. A. was the chaplain and the companion of Charles XII. in his military adventures. He wrote an account of his master's life in Swedish, little regarded by Voltaire. He died 1745.

NORDEN, Frederick Lewis, a learned Dane, born at Gluckstadt in Holstein, 22d Oct. 1708. He was like his father bred to the military service, and displayed in the profession great assiduity, and excelled in mathematics, and particularly in correct drawing. He was employed by the king of Denmark in travelling, and in examining the construction of ships, especially the galleys and vessels which navigate the Mediterranean. He visited with the curiosity and the judgment of a philosopher and of a man of science, Holland, Marseilles, Leghorn, Florence, and Rome, and every where was received with marks of high distinction. From Italy he passed to Egypt, and on his return to Denmark, he published an account of his "Travels in Egypt and Nubia," which is interesting, correct, and valuable. In the war between England and Spain, Norden came to London, where he was treated with great kindness, and he went on board the fleet of Sir John Norris as a volunteer, and afterwards, in 1740, went with Sir Chaloner Ogle in the fleet to reinforce admiral Vernon. When he found his health declining, he passed over to France, but died at Paris 1742, much lamented. When in London he was elected a member of the Royal Society, and in return for the honour, he presented the public with drawings of some ruins and colossal statues at Thebes in Egypt, 1744. His travels, with plates and drawings, are published in 2 vols. folio.

NORDEN, John, an able topographer, surveyor to the king's lands in the reign of James I. He wrote various works, and was the first author of a pocket-companion. Some of his books had curious titles, as the Sinful Man's Solace—Contrariety between the Wicked and the Godly set forth in a Pair of Gloves fit for every Man to wear, 1517. He wrote also, Labyrinth of Human Life, a poem—a survey of Middlesex and of Hertfordshire, &c. He was, according to Wood, born in Wiltshire, and studied at Oxford. He died about 1625.

NORDEN FLEICHT, Chederig Charlotte de, a native of Stockholm, celebrated among the Swedes for her elegant poems. Besides an ingenious Apology for Women, a poem, she wrote the Passage of the Belts, two straits in the Baltic, over which, when frozen, king Charles Gustavus marched his army 1658. She died 29th June 1793, aged 44.

NORDENSCHOLD, a Swede, governor of Finland, and knight of the order of the sword, is known for his extensive knowledge of political economy, which he evinced in the many valuable communications made to the academy of Stockholm. This learned and intelligent man died 1764.

NORES, Jason de, a native of Nicosia in Cyprus. He left his country when it was ravaged by the Turks, and came to Padua, where he taught moral philosophy. He wrote various works in Latin, and in Italian. His "Interpretatio" on Horace's

Art of Poetry, was much esteemed. He died 1590.

NORGATE, Edward, an ingenious artist. There is still preserved in the Stirling family, a grant of the government of Nova Scotia to lord Stirling, by Charles I. in the initial letter of which the king is represented sitting on his throne, delivering the patent to the earl; while around the border appears a miniature of the customs, mode of fishing, hunting, &c. of the country. This very able illuminator died 1649.

NORRIS, Henry, an Augustine monk, born at Verona, 1631. He was carefully educated by his father, who was a native of Ireland, and after studying with great success at Rimini, he came to Rome, where he continued his improvement, and by a constant and regular application of 14 hours every day, he acquired extensive knowledge and equal celebrity. He was liberally appointed ecclesiastical professor at Pisa, by the duke of Tuscany, and he obtained great reputation by his History of Pelagianism. This work, however, was not without its enemies; he was attacked and even denounced before the pope as a heretic; but Innocent XII. sensible of the merit of the author, appointed him sub-librarian of the Vatican, and at last, in 1695, gave him a cardinal's hat. His abilities were afterwards engaged in all ecclesiastical affairs of moment, and in 1702 he was named among others to reform the calendar. He died at Rome of a dropsy, 1704. His works, which are elegantly written, and abound with erudition, have appeared together in 5 vols. fol. Verona, 1729 and 1730.

NORMANT, Alexis, advocate of the parliament of Paris, acquired deserved celebrity in his profession by his love of justice, his wisdom, and his integrity. This universally respected and most amiable man, died 4th June, 1745, aged 58.

NORRIS, John, an English divine and Platonic philosopher, born 1657, at Collingborne-Kington, Wilts, where his father was minister, and educated at Winchester school, and Exeter college, Oxford. In 1680 he was chosen fellow of All-Souls, and in 1689 he succeeded to the rectory of Newton St. Loe, Somersetshire, where he married. In 1691 he was made rector of Bemerton, near Sarum, where he died a martyr to intense study, 1711, aged 54. Mild, humble, and amiable in his manners, he was an enthusiast as a man, a mystic in theology, and in philosophy an idealist. He attacked Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding, and wrote against Dodwell on the Immortality of the Soul. His works are chiefly on moral and theological subjects, and against the Quakers, Calvinists, and other seceders of the day, and his sermons are written in a clear, pleasing, and pathetic style. He wrote also some poems.

NORRIS, John, a native of Norfolk, educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge. He showed himself a grateful benefactor to his university, by the grant of an estate of 190*l.* a year for a theological professorship, and for annual prizes on divinity subjects among the students of Cambridge. He was twice married, and left only one daughter. He died 1777, aged 43.

NORRIS, John, one of the founders of the Theological seminary at Andover, was a respectable merchant of Salem, Massachusetts, and accumulated a large property, which he appropriated with exemplary liberality to useful objects. He gave, in 1808, 10,000 dollars towards founding the institution at Andover. His death took place in December of that year.  L.

NORRIS, Mary, wife of the preceding, after a life of distinguished beneficence, gave, at her decease, the sum of 30,000 dollars to the same seminary, and the same amount also to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions.

NORTH, Francis, lord keeper of the great seal under Charles II. and James II. was the third son of the second Dudley lord North. He was educated at Bury school, and St. John's college, Cambridge, and afterwards entered at the Middle Temple, and soon rendered himself eminent not only as a good lawyer, but as a great proficient in mathematics, history, music, and philosophy. He attended as counsel the Norfolk circuit, and soon distinguished himself as an able, acute, and discerning lawyer, and gradually rose through the offices of solicitor and attorney-general to the place of chief justice of the Common Pleas. On the death of lord Nottingham he succeeded to the seals, and in 1683 was raised to the peerage by the title of lord Guilford. He died at his house. Wroxton, 1685. He wrote an Index of Verbs Neuter, finished while at school, and printed with Lily's Grammar—a paper on the Gravitation of Fluids, considered in the Bladders of Fishes, printed in Lowthorp's Philosophical Transactions abridged—an Answer about Sir S. Moreland's Statu Barometer, an Essay on Music—Concertos—Political Papers, &c.

NORTH, Dr. John, next younger brother to the preceding, was born Sept. 1645. He was educated at Bury school, and Jesus college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. In 1672 he was made Greek professor of the university, prebendary of Westminster, 1673, and in 1677 he succeeded Dr. Barrow as master of Trinity college. In this office he met with some opposition from his fellows, but his integrity remained unshaken. He completed the college library begun by his predecessor, and died 1683, after being for some time unhappily robbed of his understanding by a dreadful palsy. He edited Plato's Socratis Apologia—Crito Phædo, &c. 1673.

NORTH, George, a native of London, educated at St. Paul's, and at Bennet college, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree. He was made vicar of Codicote, Herts, by the bishop of Ely, and some time after, for an able treatise in defence of the Antiquarian Society, he was admitted fellow of that learned body. He died on his living, 27th June, 1772, and was buried there. He wrote a table of English Silver Coins from the conquest to the Commonwealth—Remarks on the Money of Henry III.—and he began a History of the Antiquarian Society, which, however, he destroyed in his last illness.

NORTH, Frederick, earl of Guilford, better known as lord North, the minister under whose administration England lost her American colonies. He succeeded Charles Townsend as chancellor of the exchequer; and in 1770 the duke of Grafton, as first lord of the treasury, and continued in that high but laborious office till the conclusion of the war. As a public character, lord North was a flowing and persuasive orator, well skilled in argumentation, and master of great presence and coolness of mind, and in private life he was very amiable, cheerful and jocose in conversation, the friend of learned men, and correct in his conduct. The last years of his life were afflicted with blindness. He died July, 1792, aged 60, much and universally lamented.

NORTON, Thomas, an English writer, born at Sharpenhoe, Bedfordshire. He was a barrister, and in his principles a strong Calvinist. He assisted Sternhold and Hopkins in their version of the Psalms; and to the 27 which he turned to metre; appear the initials of his name. He also translated into English some Latin poems—Calvin's Institutes—and Nowell's large Catechism, and assisted Thomas Sackville in his play called Ferrex and Porrex. He wrote besides, an Epistle to the Queen's poor deluded subjects of the North, 1569—a Warning against the Practices of the Papists—and other pieces against popery. He died about 1600.

NORTON, John, author of "the Scholar's Vade Mecum," in which he attempted to alter the orthography and structure of the English language in the most capricious manner, flourished in the age of Charles II.

NORTON, lady Frances, was descended from the Frekes of Dorsetshire, and married sir George Norton, of Somersetshire, by whom she had three children. On the death of her daughter, who had married sir Richard Gethin, she wrote the Applause of Virtue, 4to. 1705—and Memento Mori, or Meditations on Death. She took for her second husband colonel Ambrose Norton, and for her third Mr. Jones, and died 1720, aged about 70.

NORTON, John, minister in Boston, Massachusetts, was born in 1606, at Starford, England, and educated at the university of Cambridge. He studied theology, and soon gained notoriety by a superiority of talents and learning. He came to Massachusetts in 1635, and not long after settled at Ipswich, and obtained a high reputation both as a preacher and as an author, by several books which he published. He assisted in forming the "Cambridge platform of church government." He removed to Boston about the year 1652, and was eminently useful in his ministry there. In 1662 he, with another, was appointed agent to address king Charles on his restoration, but not being successful in endeavouring to procure the king's favour to the colony, he became unpopular on his return, and died in 1663. He possessed a mind of superior vigour and acuteness, and had enriched it with extensive knowledge. Besides his theological writings, he published several political tracts, which were useful and popular.

NOSTRODAMUS, Michael, a celebrated French physician and astrologer, born at St. Remy in Avignon, Dec. 14th, 1503. He studied at Avignon and Montpellier, and took his doctor's degree in the last city, 1529. He practised for four years at Agen, where he married and lost his wife, and afterwards went to Marseilles, and then to Aix, where his abilities were displayed in a very successful manner in checking the progress of the plague, by a powder of his own invention. These friendly services were acknowledged by the gratitude of the town, and during some years he received a liberal pension. After some time he quitted physic for the more captivating reputation of a prophet and astrologer, and in 1555 he published his prophecies in verse. He was, in consequence, noticed by the public as an extraordinary man; but while some regarded him as a foolish visionary, and others as an impious associate of the devil, he was sent for to the court of Henry II. and of Catherine of Medicis, and was dismissed loaded with presents. Upon this he increased his work from 300 quatrains to a complete milliade; and when it was discovered that on the king's death he had foretold it in some enigmatical way, his fame was spread over Europe, and he was now consulted not only by the vulgar, but by great men and by princes. He chiefly lived at Salon, where Charles IX. visited him, and declared himself particularly his patron. He died, however, soon after this mark of royal favour, at Salon, July 2d, 1566. By a second marriage he left three sons and three daughters.

NOTT, Edward, governor of Virginia, succeeded Nicholson in 1705. He was dignified with the commission of chief governor, although he was, in some degree, subordinate to the earl of Orkney, who at that time was the nominal governor. He arrived in August, 1705, and died in August, 1706, when the administration devolved on Edmund Jennings. During this short period he enjoyed the esteem and affection of the people.

NOVARINI, Lewis, an ecclesiastic of Verona, of the order of the Theatins. He wrote Commentaries on the Four Gospels, and the Acts of the Apostles, 4 vols. fol.—Electa Sacra, 6 vols. fol.—Adagia Sancti Patrum, 2 vols. 8c. He died 1650, aged 56.

NOUE, Francis de la, a native of Brittany, born of an ancient family in 1531. He served in Italy with distinction, and on his return embraced the party of the Calvinists. He took Orleans in 1567, contributed to the victory of Jarnac two years after, and then took Fontenai, Oleron, Marennes, Soubisse, and Bronages. At the siege of Rochelle he lost his left arm, and had one made of iron, in consequence of which he was called Iron Arm. In 1571 he served in the Low Countries, where he took Valenciennes, and afterwards he was employed at Rochelle. He entered into the service of the States General in 1573, and took count Egmont prisoner, but was himself taken in battle two years after, and remained in confinement five years. He afterwards served against the league, and at last perished at the siege of Lamballe by a musket ball, 1591, universally and deservedly lamented. He wrote Discourses, Military and Politic, 4to. His son Odet served with distinction under Henry IV. and died 1618. He is author of Christian Poems, &c.

NOUE, Stanislaus Louis de la, of the same family as the preceding, was count of Vair, and was born at Nazelles, near Chinon, 1729. He served with great reputation in the French army, in the campaigns of 1741 and 1756, and at last fell in the affair of Saxenhausen, 1760. When Louis XV. heard of his death he exclaimed, "then we have lost the Loudon of France." This brave warrior wrote New Military Constitutions, &c. printed at Frankfort, 8vo. 1760, with plates. His life was written by Toustain.

NOUE, John Sauve de la, a native of Meaux, who acquired some celebrity as an actor. After playing at Rouen and Lisle, he came to Paris, and exhibited his powers at Fontainebleau, 1752. He was patronised by the duke of Orleans and by the court, and obtained a pension. Voltaire wrote the Princess of Navarre on his account, that he might act the chief character of the piece. He died 15th Nov. 1761, aged 60. He wrote Mahomet II. a tragedy—Zelisca, a Comedy—the Return of May—the Corrected Coquette, &c. His works were collected together at Paris, 1765, in 12mo.

NOVE, Denis de la, a printer of great eminence at Paris. He published a Concordance of the Bible, &c. and died 1650.

NOVE, N. la, a famous financier in France in the 17th century. Though of obscure origin, he raised himself to consequence, and by the immense riches which he possessed, he constructed superb mansions for his residence, which excited the envy of the nobility, and procured his downfall. He was accused of mismanagement and rapacity, 1705, and condemned for nine years to the galleys, and to be pilloried.

NOVATIAN, a pagan philosopher in the third century, who was converted to Christianity, and privately ordained a bishop. He attempted to seize the see of Rome, but when opposed by Cornelius he declared himself the head of a new heresy, which considered it as sinful to admit to the Eucharist persons who had once fallen into idolatry. The followers of this new doctrine were called Novatians, or Catharites, i. e. pure. Some of Novatian's works are extant, published by Jackson, London, 1728, in 4to.

NOVATUS, a priest of Carthage, who supported the propriety of admitting to the communion, even without penitence, persons who had fallen into idolatry. He afterwards rejected the doctrine, and adopted that of Novatian, which was directly opposite to his former opinion. This great inconsistency caused a violent schism in the church in the third century.

NOWEL, Alexander, an English divine, born at Read, in Lancashire, and educated at Brazen-nose, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He was made master of Westminster school, prebendary of Westminster, and dean of St. Paul's, and in the reign of Elizabeth he was elected member of parliament, but did not sit in the house, as being a clergyman. His Catechism in Latin, printed 1572 and 1578, was of universal use, and much admired, so that it was translated not only into English but into Greek. He died 1602. His brother Lawrence died dean of Lichfield, 1576, and left in MS. a Saxon-English Dictionary, now in the Bodleian library.

NOY, William, a lawyer, born at St. Burian, in Cornwall, and educated at Exeter college, from whence he entered at Lincoln's Inn. He was member for Helston, in James's reign, and afterwards for St. Ives, and was a violent opponent of the measures of the court. In 1631 his opposition ceased; he was made by Charles I. attorney general, and then all his abilities were exerted to support the king's attempts to levy money without the parliament. To his advice the project for ship money, so fatal to the royal prerogative, is attributed. Though abused for his attachment to the king, and his dereliction of former principles, Noy is universally acknowledged to have been a good lawyer, a tolerable orator, and a man of sound and strong judgment. He died Aug. 1634, at Tunbridge-wells, where he had retired for the benefit of the waters, and was buried at New Brentford. He wrote a Treatise on the Grounds and Maxims of the Laws of England, 4to.—Perfect Conveyancer, &c.

NUCK, Anthony, a Dutch physician. He practised at the Hague, and was professor of anatomy at Leyden, and wrote Adenographia—Sedlographia, et Operationes, et Experimenta Chirurgica, 3 vols. Lugd. 1722.

NUGENT, Robert, earl, a native of Westmeath, Ireland, who abjured the Roman catholic tenets for the protestant, and obtained a seat in parliament in 1741, with the office of comptroller of the household of the prince of Wales. As the favourite of the court he continued to hold offices of trust and great emolument, and in 1766 was created a peer of Ireland, and some time after advanced to an earldom. He wrote an Ode to Mankind in 1741—Verses addressed to the queen, with a new year's gift of Irish manufacture—Verses on the Memory of Lady Townsend, besides odes, epistles, &c. which possess considerable merit. He died 1788.

NUGENT, Thomas, LL.D. an Irishman, who acquired some celebrity by his useful publications, especially his Vocabulary of the Greek Primitives, 8vo.—a Pocket Dictionary of the French Language, &c. He also translated the Port Royal Greek and Latin Grammars, 4 vols. 8vo. and published a Tour in Europe, 4 vols. 8vo. His daughter married the celebrated Edmund Burke.

NUMA POMPILIUS, second king of Rome, is known for the laws which he established, and the respect for religion and religious ceremonies which he introduced among his subjects. He died B.C. 672.

NUMENIUS, a Greek philosopher in the second century. He was a follower of the doctrines of Pythagoras and Plato; but called Plato, Moses speaking Greek, as he considered him as having borrowed much from the Jewish legislator.

NUMERIANUS, Marcus Aurel, son of the emperor Carus, succeeded, with his brother Carinus, 284, but was soon after assassinated by his father-in-law, Arius Aper.

NUNEZ, Ferdinand, a Spanish critic, born at Pincia, near Valladolid. He was professor of belles lettres at Alcalá and Salamanca, and died very old, 1552. He wrote Commentaries on Pliny, Pomponius Mela, Seneca, &c.

NYE, Philip, a nonconformist, born in Sussex, about 1596. He entered at Brazen-nose college, Oxford, and removed to Magdalen hall, where he was admitted to his master's degrees, 1622, about which time he took orders. He was for some time curate of St. Michael's church, Cornhill, but rejecting the doctrines of the church of England, he retired to Holland, and resided at Arnheim, in Guelderland. On the decline of the royal power he returned to England, and was made minister of Kimbolton, Huntingdonshire, and afterwards was one of the assembly of divines, and became a great champion of the presbyterians, and an asserter of the solemn league and covenant. His services were rewarded with the living of Acton, near London; but he now deserted to the independents, and was confidentially consulted and flattered by them, while he converted his influence and popularity to his own aggrandizement, and the emolument of his family. At the restoration he was forbidden to hold any offices whatever. He died in the parish of St. Michael's, Cornhill, 27th Feb. 1672. He wrote several sermons and political tracts, and his seditious views and hypocritical conduct are humorously alluded to by Butler, who mentions, in his Hudibras, Philip Nye's thanksgiving beard.

NYE, Nathaniel, a mathematician under Charles II. master gunner to the city of Worcester, and author of "Art of Gunnery," 1670, and a treatise on Artificial Fire Works.

NYMANNUS, Gregory, author of a treatise on Apoplexy, 4to.—a Dissertation on the Life of the Fœtus, 12mo. &c. was professor of botany and anatomy at Wittenberg, and died 1638, aged 43.

OAT

OAKES, Urian, president of Harvard college, was a native of England, and born about the year 1631. He was brought to New-England three years after, and educated at the college at Cambridge, where he was graduated in 1649. He returned to England and settled in the ministry at Fichfield, but was ejected in 1662. He remained several years in England, but at length, at the invitation of the church in Cambridge, returned and settled there in 1671. In 1675 he was elected president of Harvard college, and held the office till his death in 1681. He was distinguished by great excellence of character, learning, and usefulness.

OATES, Titus, known for his infamies and plots under Charles II. was son of an anabaptist, and born about 1619. He was at first a conformist, then a papist, and again a conformist, but in his conduct, though a clergyman, very vicious. He was chaplain to a man of war, but dismissed for unnatural practices; and when honest resources failed he contrived, with Dr. Tongue, to disclose a pretended plot against the king, in consequence of which several respectable persons were not only accused, but upon his evidence condemned and executed. This succeeded so well that he was rewarded for the discovery with a pension of 1200*l.* a year, and an honourable residence at Whitehall. Under James II. his infamous conduct was reviewed, and he was, upon the testimony of 60 witnesses, convicted of perjury, and sentenced to be whipped and pilloried. He bore the punishment with great fortitude, and when released from imprisonment, at the revolution, he sunk into contempt, and died 1705.

OBADIAH, the fourth of the lesser prophets, was the servant of Ahab, according to Jerome, and the protector of Elijah, though some authors place him in a more recent age, as the contemporary of Hosea.

OBRECHT, Ulric, a learned German, born July 23d, 1646, at Strasburg. He studied at Strasburg, Montbeillard, and Altorf, and made the most astonishing progress in the sciences as well as in the languages, ancient and modern. After finishing his travels he settled at Strasburg, where he married the daughter of professor Boecler, whom he succeeded in the chairs of eloquence and history. Upon the conquest of Strasburg by Lewis XIV. Obrecht changed his religion from protestant to Roman catholic, and was in consequence made by the victorious monarch, in 1685, president of the senate of his native town, with the title of prætor royal. In the midst of his numerous employments as a lawyer and president, he devoted much of his time to literary pursuits. He died of a fever, 6th Aug. 1701. He wrote, among other things, Prodromus Rerum Alsaticarum, 4to.—Excerpta Historica, de Naturâ Successionis in Monarch. Hispan. 3 vols. 4to.—Quintilian, edited with notes, 2 vols. 4to.—the Life of Pythagoras, from Iamblicus—De Vexillo Imperii—an edition of Diety Cretensis.

OBSEPIUS, John, a German physician, born at Bretin, 1556. He was made professor of physic at Heidelberg, and died there, 1596. He published some pieces of Hippocrates, with remarks, &c. His brother Simon was also professor at Heidelberg, and died 1619, aged 44.

OCCAM, or OCCHAM, William, a scholastic divine of the fourteenth century; the disciple of Duns Scotus, and so renowned as to acquire the name of the Invincible Doctor. As he belonged to the Cordeliers, he was engaged by Michael de Cesena, the general of his order, to attack the church of Rome, and pope John XXII. and in consequence of this dispute, which gave rise to the question about the bread of the Cordeliers, both Occam and his friend were excommunicated by the pontiff. Occam was afterwards reconciled to the see of Rome, and died 1374. His works, which display both wit and subtlety, were published, 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1476, are now little regarded.

OCCUM, Sampson, an Indian of the Mohegan tribe, Connecticut, who embraced Christianity in early life, and was educated by the reverend Dr. Wheelock for the ministry. He was ordained in 1759. He went on several missions to the western tribes, and about 1765 to London with Mr. Whitaker, to solicit benefactions to Dr. Wheelock's school for the education of Indians. He died in 1792. He wrote an account of the Montawk Indians, which is preserved in the Historical Collections.

OCELLUS, a Greek Pythagorean philosopher, born in Lucania, and hence called Lucanus. His work on the universe is extant, edited at Amsterdam, 8vo. 1688.

OCHINUS, Bernardin, an Italian, born in Seine, 1487. He was at first a Cordelier, but afterwards studied physic, and again, in a moment of inconsistency, returned to the church, and in 1534 became a strict Capuchin, and rose to be the vicar general of the order. His eloquence as a preacher recommended him to the notice of pope Paul III. who made him his confessor; but still inconsistent, he became a convert to the tenets of Luther, and preached openly in favour of them. Thus an enemy to Rome he made his escape from Italy, and after visiting Geneva, Lucca, and Augsburg, he came to England with his friend, Peter Martyr, 1547, and was by Cranmer made prebendary of Canterbury. On the death of Edward VI. he retired from England to Strasburg, to avoid persecution, and then went to Basil; and at last settled at Zurich. After presiding eight years over the Italian church in that city, he was banished by the magistrates of the town, 1563, for publishing some dialogues in favour of polygamy. He fled to Moravia and Poland, where he joined the Socinians. He died of the plague at Slacow, 1564, aged 77. He was author of some controversial works, and of some sermons in Italian, in 5 vols. 8vo. some of which have been translated into English.

OCKLEY, Simon, an able divine and orientalist, descended from a respectable Norfolk family, but accidentally born at Exeter, 1678. He was educated at Queen's college, Cambridge, where he took the degree of B.D. and in 1705 was made vicar of Swavesey, Cambridgeshire, and in 1711 Arabic professor to the university. He died at his living, 9th Aug. 1720, much respected, but leaving his family in distressed circumstances. He was a very learned man and well skilled in oriental literature. He published, 1706, Introductio ad Linguas Orientales—the History of the present Jews throughout the World, 1707—the Life of Hai Ebn Yokhdan, from the Arabic of Abu Jaafar Ebn Tophail, 8vo. 1708—the History of the Saracens, 2 vols. 8vo. a most valuable work—some single sermons, &c.

OCTAVIA, sister of Augustus, married Marcellus, and after his death was given to Antony to reconcile him and her brother. The death of her son Marcellus is pathetically described by Virgil. She was a woman possessed of great virtues, and died B.C. 11.

OCTAVIA, daughter of Claudius and Messalina, married Nero, by whom she was divorced, and afterwards put to death at the age of 20.

ODAZRI, John, a painter and engraver, born at Rome. He was member of the academy of St. Luke, and deserved by his services to be knighted by the pope. He died 1731, aged 68.

ODELL, Thomas, a gentleman of Buckinghamshire. He ruined his estates by supporting the cause of the court, and afterwards obtained the permission to erect a theatre in Goodman's-fields, 1729; but when his theatrical efforts promised to be successful, the city magistrates opposed him and he disposed of his property to Mr. Giffard. He was in 1738 made deputy master of the revels, and died May, 1749. He wrote four dramatic pieces, which were for a little while favourably received.

mitted as the associate of Gallienus on the imperial throne, for his services against Sapor, king of Persia. He was assassinated by a favourite, 267, and his wife Zenobia assumed the reins of government at his death.

ODIN, a northern hero, who united in his person the characters of priest, king, and poet, and died about 70 B.C. He was worshipped as a god after his death.

ODO, Saint, second abbot of Clugni, was born at Tours, 879. The sanctity of his life greatly contributed to the reputation and increase of his abbey, and even kings and popes referred their disputes to his unbiassed judgment. He was a man also of great learning, and wrote some religious books. He died 943.

ODO, of Kent, was a Benedictine monk and prior, and abbot of his order in the 12th century. He was the friend of Thomas a Becket, of whose miracles he wrote an account, besides Commentaries on the Pentateuch, &c.

ORDORAN, a monk of St. Peter-le-Vif at Sens, author of "Chronica Rerum in Orbe Gestarum" till 1302. He died some time after.

OECOLAMPADIUS, John, a German divine, born at Reinsperg, Franconia, 1482. He studied at Heidelberg, Bologna, and Tubingen, and was for some time preceptor to the son of the elector Palatine. He was honoured with the degree of D.D. at Basil, and soon, upon embracing the principles of Luther, was made divinity professor, and preached in that city. He married in 1528, in consequence of which his friend Erasmus jocosely speaks of his change of situation. He died Dec. 1531, leaving a son and two daughters. He engaged against Luther in support of Zuiniglius concerning the Eucharist, and his book on the occasion is mentioned by Erasmus with credit. He translated Chrysostom's commentaries on Genesis, and some of the works of Nazianzen and other fathers, and wrote besides some Notes on Scriptures, &c.

ECUMENIUS, a Greek writer in the 10th century. He is called by some an able interpreter of Scripture, while others speak with indifference of him. His works appear with those of Aretas at Paris, 2 vols. folio.

OFFA, king of Mercia, on the death of Ethelbald 755, was successful against the kings of Kent and Wessex, and perfidiously murdered Ethelbert, king of the East Angles, and seized his kingdom. His crimes, which were great, induced him to pay his court to the clergy for their support and forgiveness. He not only made a pilgrimage to Rome, but was the first who gave the tenth of his goods to the church, and established the Peter-pence tribute. He founded the monastery of St. Alban's, which he endowed most liberally. He reigned 39 years, and died 794.

OGDEN, Samuel, an English divine, born at Manchester 1716, and educated at the grammar-school there, and at King's college, Cambridge, from which he removed to St. Johns, where he became fellow, 1739. In 1744 he was elected master of Halifax school, which he resigned 1753, to reside at Cambridge. He took his degree of D.D. and in 1764 was made Woodwardian professor, and 1766 presented to the rectory of Lawford, Essex, and a month after to Stansfield, Suffolk. He died 23d March, 1778. It is said that his manners were rustic, and his features occasionally disagreeable and ferocious, but his heart was most amiable and humane. His sermons have been published, 2 vols. 8vo. and defended by bishop Halifax against the attacks of Mainwaring. They are popular discourses, elegant, striking, and pathetic.

OGDEN, Matthias, brigadier general in the service of the United States, entered the army at Cambridge at the commencement of the war of the revolution. He accompanied Arnold in the expedition to Canada, and was severely wounded at the attack on Quebec. On his return from that campaign he was appointed to a colonelcy, and held the office till the close of the war. Soon after the peace he was appointed brigadier general. He died in 1791, at Elizabethtown, New-Jersey.

OGILBY, John, a Scotch writer, born near Edinburgh, Nov. 1600. Though of a respectable family, he was obliged for his maintenance to pursue the profession of dancing-master, and in this capacity he recommended himself to the duke of Buckingham and other noblemen. In 1633 he was in the family of lord Stafford, and was by that nobleman appointed deputy master of the revels in Ireland. He in consequence built a theatre in Dublin, and met with great encouragement; but at the breaking out of the Irish rebellion, 1641, he lost his property, and returned to England poor. He then went to Cambridge on foot, and applying himself with great industry to the learned languages, he was enabled to translate the works of Virgil, which appeared 1649-50, and produced both money and reputation. He continued to exert his abilities as a writer, and gave the world poetical translations of Homer's Iliad and Odyssey, and in 1660 published a fine edition of the English Bible, with plates, which he presented to the king, and also to the House of Lords, by whom he was handsomely rewarded. In 1661 he was employed to conduct the poetical part of the king's coronation, and all the speeches, mottos, &c. were thus submitted to his inspection, and of this he drew a striking relation in ten sheets folio, and afterwards published it in a magnificent style as a pattern for future similar solemnities. He obtained in 1692 the patent place of master of the revels in Ireland, against the application of Sir W. Davenant, and afterwards, though ruined by the fire of London, he erected another fortune as cosmographer and geographic printer to the king. He died after a life of great labour and chequered fortunes, 4th Sept. 1676, and was buried in St. Bride's church, Fleet-street. He published besides, an Account of Japan, folio—an Atlas, folio—Fables of Æsop, in verse, 2 vols. 8vo.—a Book of Roads, 8vo. afterwards improved by Bowen, and latterly by Patter-son, and Cary, &c.

OGILVIE, John, a divine of the church of Scotland, was born in 1733. He became minister of Midmar in the county of Aberdeen, and received from the university there, the degree of doctor of divinity. He was also a fellow of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, and greatly distinguished for his learning, genius, and piety. He died in 1814. His works are—1. Poems on several Subjects, 2 vols. 8vo. 2. Sermons, 8vo. 3. Paradise, a Poem, 4to. 4. Philosophical and Critical Observations on Composition, 2 vols. 8vo. 5. Rona, a Poem. 6. Inquiry into the Causes of Infidelity and Scepticism, 8vo. 7. The Theology of Plato, compared with the Principles of Oriental and Grecian Philosophers, 8vo. 8. Britannia; an Epic poem, 4to. 9. Examination of the Evidence of Prophecy, in behalf of the Christian Religion—W. B.

OGLE, Samuel, governor of Maryland, arrived in the colony in December, 1731. He had previously had a military command in the Irish establishment. He continued governor until 1742, and was again appointed in the room of Bladen in 1747. He died in 1751. L.

OGLE, Benjamin, a member of the council of Maryland before the revolution, and afterwards governor of the state. He died at Annapolis July, 1809. L.

OGLETHORPE, James, an English general. He was born at Westminster and early entered the army, and was aid-de-camp to prince Eugene. In 1732, he settled the colony in Georgia, and laid the foundations of the town of Savannah; but his attack on Augustine in Florida proved unsuccessful, and his conduct was submitted to the examination of a court martial, which acquitted him. He was engaged against the rebels in 1745, and was again tried by a court martial as if guilty of cowardice in the adoption of dilatory meaasures, but he was honourably acquitted. He died 1785, at the great age of 97.

OISEL, James, professor of civil law at Groningen, was born at Dantzic 1631. He wrote corrections and notes on various authors—Thesaurus Selector. Numismatum Antiquor. Ære expressorum, 4to.—catalogue of his valuable library. He died 1686.

OKOLSKI, Simon, a Polander, author of Orbis Polonus, or History of Poland, 3 vols. folio, Cracow, 1641, a valuable work. He was provincial of the jacobins in Poland, 1649.

OKSKI, Stanislaus, a Pole, who studied divinity under Luther and Melancthon, and preached with such zeal the tenets of the reformation among his countrymen, that he was called the Polish Demosthenes. He afterwards turned catholic and published his profession of faith at Warsaw, 1561. He wrote besides controversial tracts, Latin Annals of the Reign of Sigismund Augustus, 12mo.

OLAF, a king of Norway in the 10th century, who sent missionaries to Greenland to convert the barbarous natives to Christianity.

OLAHUS, Nicolas, made by Ferdinand king of Hungary, bishop of Zagrab, chancellor of the kingdom, and afterwards archbishop of Stregonia, was born at Hermanstadt, and died at Tyrnau, 1568, aged 75. He wrote a Chronicle of his Time—a History of Attila—a Description of Hungary.

OLAVIDES, N. count de, a native of Spanish America, educated at Madrid, where his abilities soon began to display themselves. He accompanied, as secretary, count de Aranda, the Spanish ambassador to France, and at his return was made a count by Charles III. and appointed superintendent of Seville. In this new office he directed his attention to fertilize the hitherto barren and unprofitable spot called the Black Mountain, or Sierra Morena, and by his perseverance, and by offering liberal invitations to German colonists, he converted a desert region into a populous district. The success of his labours, however, was too great to escape envy, he was accused by his enemies, and for three years mourned the cruelty of his treatment in a dungeon. He escaped at last to Venice, where he died aged 65. The Triumph of the Gospel, in 4 vols. 4to. in Spanish, a work of merit, is attributed to him.

OLDCASTLE, Sir John, the good lord Cobham, was the first nobleman who suffered martyrdom for his religion. He was born in the reign of Edward III. and distinguished himself as the friend of public liberty. He was a general in the French campaigns, and obliged the duke of Orleans to raise the siege of Paris; but as he was a follower of Wickliffe's doctrines, and maintained itinerant preachers for their greater dispersion, he incurred the hatred of the Romish clergy, and was accused of heresy and disaffection to Henry V. Henry endeavoured to reason with him, but when Cobham declared the pope anti-christ, the monarch, shocked at his impiety, delivered him up to the archbishop, who sent him to the tower. He had the art to escape from confinement, but so violent and watchful were his persecutors, that after four years' concealment in Wales, he was seized and dragged to London. As a heretic and traitor, he was hung up on a gallows alive, and a fire lighted under him, so that he was thus cruelly roasted alive, in St. Giles' fields, 1417. He wrote 12 conclusions addressed to the parliament of England.

OLDENBURG, Henry, a German, born in the dutchy of Bremen. He was consul for his countrymen at London, under Cromwell's usurpation, and was afterwards tutor to the lords Obryan and Cavendish, and during his residence at Oxford, he was acquainted with the founders of the Royal Society, of which he was elected fellow, and assistant secretary with Dr. Wilkins. He published in this capacity the 36 numbers of the philosophical transactions, and had a most extensive correspondence with various learned men. He wrote besides translations, &c. and died at Charleton near Greenwich, Aug. 1678, and was buried there.

OLDENBURGEN, Philip Andrew, author of "Thesaurus Rerum Publicarum totius Orbis," 4 vols. 8vo. and other works, was professor of history and law at Geneva, where he died 1678.

OLDERMAN, John, a German writer, Greek professor at Helmstadt, where he died of a dropsy 1723, aged 37. He was author of some ingenious and valuable dissertations, de Imperfectione Sermones Humani; de Phraate Fluvio, de Ophir; de Mari Algoro, &c.

OLDFIELD, Anne, a celebrated actress, born in Pall-Mall, 1683. Her father, who was an officer, left her in dependent circumstances, but her fondness for plays and the sweetness of her voice, accidentally heard and commended by Farquhar, introduced her to Sir John Vanburgh, and to Mr. Rich, the patentee of the king's theatre, where she first exhibited herself. She soon shone in the characters of Leonora, in Sir C. Nice, and of lady Betty Moodish, in the Careless Husband; but as virtue and continence are seldom the inmates of a theatre, she yielded her reputation to the solicitations of Mr. A. Maynwaring, and after his death was the mistress of general Churchill. By each of these she had a son, and it is to be observed, that, whilst devoted to them she was remarkable for her constancy, exemplary conduct, and fidelity, and in her private character she was humane and benevolent in the highest degree, as the patroness of indigent merit in Savage. She died Oct. 23d, 1730, and her body, after lying in state in the Jerusalem chamber, was buried in Westminster abbey with great pomp. Her wit and vivacity were said to be very engaging, her figure delicate and pleasing, and her manners fascinating in the extreme. The becoming neatness of her dress, as well as the acquired graces of her person, and of her understanding, have been elegantly noticed by the Tatler.

OLDHAM, John, an English poet, born Aug. 9th, 1653, at Shipton, Gloucestershire. He was educated at Tetbury school, and removed to Edmund hall, Oxford, where he took his degree of B.A. and began to cultivate the muse. He was afterwards usher of the grammar-school at Croydon, but the excellence of his poetry was noticed by lords Rochester and Dorset, and other wits of the age, and he was removed from the laborious drudgery of a school in 1678, and placed as tutor to the grandsons of sir Ed. Thurland. He afterwards was tutor to the son of sir William Hickee, and then settled in London as a wit and poet. Lord Kingston afterwards patronised him, and wished to make him his chaplain; but though the poet refused to submit to the dependence of the ecclesiastic, he continued in his house till his death, occasioned by the smallpox, 9th Dec. 1683. He was buried in the church of Holme Pierrepont. His writings were chiefly satirical, and though a man of temperance and virtue, he is frequently licentious in his poetry. The whole consists of 50 pieces, the most valuable of which are the four satires on the Jesuits, written 1679. His works were printed by captain Thomson, 3 vols. 12mo.

OLDISWORTH, William, joint writer in the Examiner, a periodical paper, and author of a Vindication of the bishop of Exeter, of state tracts, of state and miscellaneous poems, &c. of the odes and epodes of Horace translated, &c. died 15th Sept. 1734.

OLDMIXON, John, a political writer, born near Bridgewater, Somersetshire. As a party writer he was violent and severe in the extreme, he opposed with unusual virulence the Stuart family, and attacked the great writers of the time with envy and ill nature. His conduct exposed him to the resentment of Pope, who has given him a conspicuous place among the sons of dulness in his Dunciad. He obtained by his party zeal a post in the revenue at Bridgewater, where he died 9th July, 1742, at an advanced age. He wrote History of the Stuarts, fol.—a volume of Poems—the Life of A. Maynwaring, Esq.—the Life of Queen Anne—a tragedy—an opera, and other things.

OLDYS, William, an eminent English writer, natural son of commissary Oldys, the chancellor of Lincoln, born about 1687. Few particulars of his life are known, though it is too apparent that he was intemperate, prodigate, and licentious. He was for some time librarian to lord Oxford, and made a catalogue of that celebrated collection, which Osborne the bookseller purchased for 13,000*l.* He was also Norroy king at arms, as being well acquainted with heraldry. He died at the Herald's office, 15th April, 1761, aged 74, and was buried in St. Benet's church, Paul's wharf. His chief works were a Life of sir Walter Raleigh—various articles in the General Historical Dictionary—those Lives marked G. in the Biographia Britannica—Introduction to Hayward's British Muse—Observations on the Catalogue of English Lives—Poetical Characteristics—Health's Improvement, &c.

OLEARIUS, Godfrey, a learned German, born at Hall, in Saxony, 1639. He became professor of Greek and of divinity at Leipsic, and in consequence of his great abilities was ten times rector of that university. He married professor Muller's daughter, by whom he had six sons and six daughters, and died Aug. 1713. He was a great contributor to the "Leipsic Acts," and wrote various works on theology, philosophy, &c.

OLEARIUS, Godfrey, son of the preceding, was born at Leipsic, 23d July, 1672. He possessed great abilities, and after visiting Holland for some time, studied at Oxford, and became professor of Greek and Latin, and afterwards professor of divinity at Leipsic. He died in the flower of life, 10th Nov. 1715. He published a Dissertation on the Worship of God, by J. C.—a History of Rome and Germany—besides a Latin translation of Stanley's History of Philosophers, 4to.—and an edition of Philostratus, folio.

OLEARIUS, Adam, a German writer, secretary to the embassy from the duke of Holstein to the duke of Muscovy, and the king of Persia. He was six years in this employment, and at his return he published an account of his journey, with maps and figures, folio, translated into French by Wicquefort. He also published an abridgment of the Chronicles of Holstein, from 1448 to 1663, 8vo. and 4to. He was afterwards librarian to the duke, and died 1671, aged 68.

O'LEARY, Arthur, a native of Cork, educated at St. Omer's, after which he entered into the order of the Franciscans, and became chaplain to a French regiment. As he refused to engage against his country, he was dismissed from his employment in the regiment, and permitted to return to Cork, where some time after his zeal in rousing up the catholics to take up arms during the American war procured him the notice of the government and a pension. He afterwards came to London, and displayed great abilities as a pulpit orator. He died 1801, author of some valuable political tracts, 8vo. 1783—some sermons, &c.

OLEASTER, Jerom, a Portuguese Dominican, chaplain to John III. king of Portugal. He was at the council of Trent, and for his services was offered a bishopric, which he declined for the office of grand inquisitor. He wrote commentaries on the Pentateuch, folio—Commentary on Isaiah, fol. 1628, Paris, and died 1563.

OLEN, an ancient Greek poet, author of hymns, &c. no longer extant. His age is fabulous.

OLEJNIKI, Ibigneus, a noble Pole, who, from being secretary to king Ladislaus, entered into orders, and was made bishop of Cracovia and a cardinal. He was also engaged in the service of his country as an ambassador. He died 1455, aged 66.

OLIMPO, Balthasar, an Italian poet in the 16th century. His Pegasea in Stanse Amoroze, 1525, and his Gloria del Amore, 8vo. 1530, &c. have appeared in 2 vols. 8vo. 1559.

OLIVA, Alexander, general of the Augustine monks, was born at Saxoferato, 1403. He studied at Rimini, Bologna, and Perugia, and when at Rome, as general of his order, his great learning was much admired, and his eloquence in the pulpit so applauded, that at last the pope Pius II. created him a cardinal, 1460, and made him bishop of Camerino. He died at Tivoli, 1463, and was buried in the Augustine church at Rome. His works are de Christi Ortu Sermones Centum—de Cœnâ cum Apostolis Facta—de Peccato in Spiritum Sanctum.

OLIVA, John, a learned ecclesiastic, born at Rovigo, in the Venetian territory, 1689. He was librarian to cardinal Rohan, and secretary to the conclave. He wrote dissertations on subjects of antiquity, and edited Poggio's works, and Silvestri's book on Pollux and Castor. He died at Paris, 1757.

OLIVARES, Gaspar de Guzman, count de, an illustrious Spaniard under Philip IV. He succeeded the duke of Uzeda as prime minister, and gained popularity by his wise and salutary regulations, and improvements in the state. His pride, however, created him many enemies, and not only occasioned the revolt of the Catalonians, but the total separation of the Portuguese from the Spanish dominions. Olivares was dismissed from office with disgrace, and died of a broken heart at Toro, in 1643.

OLIVER, Isaac, an English painter and designer. His historical pieces, and also his miniatures were much admired as patterns of superior excellence. He died 1617, aged nearly 60 years, and was buried in Blackfriars. His pictures are marked  $\phi$ .

OLIVER, Peter, eldest son of the preceding, was also eminent as a miniature painter, and died 1661, aged 59. Some of his pictures were afterwards sold by his widow to Charles II.

OLIVER, of Malmsbury, a Benedictine monk. He was an able mechanic, but in attempting to fly from a tower with wings which he had made, he fell down and fractured his legs. He died 1660.

OLIVER, William, an able physician of Bath, author of treatises on the Bath Waters, and on Tar Water. He pretended to be an atheist, but in his last moments he saw his error, and died very penitent, 1764.

OLIVER, Claude Matthew, a native of Marseilles, advocate in the parliament of Aix. He contributed much to the establishment of the academy of Marseilles, and he was one of its first members. He possessed great powers of mind, and a most retentive memory, so that with little premeditation he supported the most intricate causes at the bar with the most captivating eloquence, and the most convincing arguments. He died 1736, aged 35. He wrote the History of Philip of Macedonia, the father of Alexander, 2 vols. 12mo. a work of merit, though negligently written—Memoir on the assistance given to the Romans by the people of Marseilles, during the second Punic war, and the war of Gaul, &c.

OLIVER, Andrew, lieutenant-governor of Massachusetts, was graduated at Harvard college in 1724. He was appointed secretary of the colony in 1757, and held the office till 1771, when he was elected lieutenant-governor, and retained that place till his death in 1774. When the stamp act was passed he was appointed a distributor of the paper, and incurred the displeasure of the people by desiring to exercise the office; and letters written by him to the British ministers, in which he betrayed the interests of the colonies, and encouraged the ministry in their oppressive measures, being obtained by Dr. Franklin, and sent to Boston, he totally lost his reputation, and became an object of detestation. Apart from those acts he was highly esteemed for his talents, and the friendliness to the interests of religion and learning which he had always shown.

OLIVER, Peter, LL.D. chief justice of Massachusetts, and brother of the preceding, was graduated at Harvard in 1730. After filling several offices in the county of Plymouth with ability and faithfulness, he was appointed to a seat on the bench of the supreme court, and at length made chief justice, in which situation he rendered himself highly odious to the people, by refusing to receive his salary from the legislature, instead of the king. He was impeached of treason against the colony, and retired to England, where he resided during the remainder of his life. He there received from Oxford a diploma of doctor of laws. He was a respectable writer, and intimately acquainted with the history of the colony. He died in 1791.

OLIVER, Thomas, a gentleman of fortune and literature, of great amiableness and suavity, who was graduated at Harvard college in 1753, and afterwards resided at Cambridge, was the last lieutenant-governor of Massachusetts under the crown. He left America at the opening of the war, and lived in retirement in Europe till his death, at an advanced age.

OLIVET, Joseph, a learned Jesuit, born at Salins, 1682. He is chiefly known for his learned and valuable editions of Cicero's works printed at Paris, and then at Geneva, 9 vols. 4to. He published besides, translations of some of the orations of Demosthenes, and Cicero, and of Cicero's treatise de Nat. D. and various other works. He was member of the French academy, of which he wrote the history, and died 1768, much and universally respected.

OLIVETAN, Robert, a relation of the great Calvin, who printed at Neufchatel, 1535, fol. a French translation of the Bible, the first executed from the Hebrew and Greek texts. It is said that Calvin contributed much to the work. It was called the Bible of the Sword, because the printer assumed a sword as his emblem. The work is now very scarce. Olivetan died the year after at Rome, where it is said he was poisoned by the catholics on account of his publications.

OLIVEIRA, Chevalier Francis de, a noble Portuguese. He was employed in various embassies and negotiations, but his enlightened mind was disgusted with the religion and politics of a bigoted court, and therefore abandoning the popish tenets, he retired to Holland, and afterwards to England, where he lived in learned ease and security. He published in French "a Pathetic Discourse, addressed to his countrymen," in consequence of the earthquake which overwhelmed Lisbon. He died 18th

Oct. 1783, aged 83, much and deservedly respected.

OLONNOIS, John David, a native of Olonne, near Poitou, famous for his bold adventures in the 17th century. He passed early into America, and afterwards joined the Buccaneers on the coast of St. Domingo. After spreading devastation and terror on the coasts of the Spanish settlements, he was at last attacked by the native Indians, who cut his body in pieces, and devoured it.

OLYBRIUS, Flavius Anicius, husband of Placidia, the sister of Valentinian III. was sent into Italy with an army against Ricimer, who had rebelled against Anthemius. Instead of fighting him, however, Ricimer proclaimed him emperor, and deposed his master Anthemius, and Olybrius thus raised to the throne of the West, gave hopes of a vigorous and peaceful reign, but died a few months after, 23d Oct. 472. He left one daughter, Juliana, married to the patrician Arcobindus, who refused the purple of the Eastern empire.

OLZOFFSKI, Andrew, a learned Polish divine. He travelled to France and Italy, and afterwards was in the service of the king of Poland, where he served as an able secretary, and as ambassador to Vienna. He was made bishop of Culm, and afterwards high chancellor, and primate of the kingdom, and while his wisdom, prudence, and patriotism, influenced and regulated the affairs of the kingdom, he showed himself satisfied with the honours of his country, and refused the dignity of a cardinal offered by the court of Rome. He died in 1678, after an illness of three days, aged 60. He published in Latin some political tracts esteemed in his time.

OMAR I. successor of Aboukerque, and second caliph after Mahomet, began to reign 634. After defeating Ali, whom Mahomet had appointed his successor, he spread his conquests over Syria and Phœnicia, and took the city of Jerusalem after an obstinate siege. While successes attended him in Judea, his generals extended his conquests over Persia and Egypt, and increased the worshippers of Mahomet by the terror of fire and sword. The fall of Alexandria under his power, was marked by the destruction of its celebrated library, which the Ptolemies had enriched with so many valuable works; but if Egypt mourned the loss of the monuments of human learning, she saw the canal of communication between the Nile and the Red Sea, restored to its ancient useful form by the persevering labour of her conquerors. While he promised himself more extensive conquests, Omar was stabbed at Jerusalem, by Firouz, a Persian slave, 644, in his 63d year. During his reign the Mahometans conquered 36,000 towns or villages, destroyed 4000 Christian temples, and built 1400 mosques. Omar was, in his character, a great warrior, in his manners austere and virtuous; and regarding merit as the only title to superiority, he declared the crown elective, and placed his son in an inferior situation. He laid the foundations of Grand Cairo.

OMAR II. 13th caliph of the race of the Omniades, succeeded his relation Solyman, 717. He laid siege to Constantinople, but his attempts to take it, supported by all the arts of military warfare, and the courage of a brave army, failed; and the destruction of his fleet by a terrible tempest, obliged him to retire from the walls. His conduct towards the Christians was very cruel and vindictive. He was assassinated at Edessa, 720, by his own family, who dreaded lest his partiality for the house of Ali should deprive them of the throne. He had reigned two years and five months.

OMELIS, Magnus Daniel, author of Ethica Pythagorica—Ethica Platonica—Theatrum Virtutum et Vitiolorum ab Aristotele Omisor.—Juvenci Historia Evangelica cum Notis, &c. was professor of belles lettres at Altorf, and died there 1708, aged 63.

ONESICRITUS, a cynic philosopher among the attendants of Alexander the Great in Asia. He wrote a history of his royal patron.

ONESIMUS, a Phrygian slave, converted to Christianity by St. Paul, and according to some, made bishop of Berea, where he suffered martyrdom.

ONKELOS, a Jewish Rabbi, in the age of Christ, was author of the Chaldee Targum on the Pentateuch.

ONOMACRITUS, a Greek poet about 516 B.C. The poems which bear the name of Orpheus and Musæus are ascribed to him.

ONGPHRIUS, Panvinius, an Augustine monk born 1529 at Verona. He continued the Lives of the Popes, begun by Platina, and dedicated them to Pius V. 1566. He published also other works, and was so skilled in historical knowledge, that he was called the Father of History. He died at Palermo in Sicily, 1568, aged 39.

OORT, Adam Van, an eminent painter of perspective and architecture. He was born at Antwerp 1557, and had among his pupils Rubens, and also Jordaens, who married his daughter.

OOST, James Van, a painter, born at Bruges 1600. He studied the manner of Annibal Caracci with great success, and his historical pieces, landscapes, &c. were much admired. His best piece is a descent from the cross, in the Jesuits' church, Bruges. He died 1671. His son James distinguished himself also as an artist, and died 1713, aged 76.

OPITIUS, Henry, a Lutheran divine, born 1642, at Altemberg, Misnia. He was professor of oriental languages and theology at Kiel, where he died 1712. In his fondness for Hebrew literature, he wished to reconcile the grammar of the Greek to the rules of the Hebrew, and wrote some fanciful treatises on the subject. He edited also the Bible in Hebrew, 2 vols. 4to.

OPITIUS, Martin, a poet, born at Bunt-slow in Silesia, 1597. He died of the plague at Dantzic 1639. His poems in Latin and in German, are much admired for their elegance and spirit. The best edition is that of Amsterdam, 1638.

OPORINUS, John, a German printer, born at Basil, 1507. He studied physic for some time, but afterwards applied himself to Greek and Latin, and then began the business of printer. Though careful, yet he was involved in debt, and died hardly solvent, 1568. He published no book which he did not himself correct. Besides the classical books which he printed, he wrote Notes on Plutarch—on Cicero's Tusculan Quæst. and other authors.

OPPEDE, John Meyner, baron d', president of the parliament of Aix, rendered himself odious by the atrocities which he committed against some heretics called Vaudois. Not only the 19 who had been condemned by the parliament to the stake, were destroyed, but 22 villages were devoted to the flames, and above 4000 persons perished by the sword or by fire, during that horrible persecution. In other respects Oppede was an upright magistrate, but religious zeal tarnished his character. He was acquitted when brought to trial, by asserting that he executed the orders of his sovereign Francis I. and that God had commanded Saul to destroy those princes the Amalekites. He died 1558.

OPPIAN, a Cilician, known as a Greek poet and grammarian in the second century. His poem on fishing is still extant, &c.

OPSPÆUS, John, a German critic. From a corrector of the press he became a physician of eminence, and was elected professor of medicine at Heidelberg. He edited some of the works of Hippocrates, with learned notes; but his best known work is an edition of the Sibylline Oracles, published at Paris, 1607. He died 1596, aged 40. His brother Simon was also a physician, and died 1619, aged 44. Vincent, a poet of the same age, wrote a Latin poem on the Art of Drinking, 1579, 8vo.

OPTATUS, an African bishop, author of an able treatise on the Schism of the Donatists. He died 384.

ORELLANA, Francis, a Spaniard, who accompanied Pizarro in his conquest of Peru. From the love of adventure he deserted his companions, and penetrated into the country, and was the first European who saw the great river Amazon, the best part of whose course he observed, till he reached the Spanish settlements of Cubagna, from which he departed for Europe. In the relation of what he had seen, he united the marvellous and the true, and by reporting that he had passed through a country peopled by Amazons, he gave that name to the great river which he had discovered. He afterwards endeavoured again to discover the mouth of that river, and perished in the attempt about 1550.

ORGANA, Andrew, an Italian painter, born at Florence 1329. He was also distinguished as a sculptor and architect, and as a poet. His works are preserved at Pisa. In his picture of the last judgment, he represented all his friends in Paradise, and placed his enemies in hell. He died 1389, aged 60.

ORIBASIUS, of Pergamus, was physician to the apostate Julian, and wrote a medical collection from Galen's works, edited in 4to. Leyden, 1745.

ORIGEN, a father of the church, born at Alexandria 185. He was a man of austere manners, but of great virtue, and his abilities as a preacher were displayed with success at Alexandria, Rome, and Cæsarea. He suffered persecution under Decius, and died 254. His works, in 4 vols. folio, are valuable.

ORIGEN, a Platonic philosopher, the friend of Porphyry.—An Egyptian philosopher of that name, regarded marriage as an invention of the devil.

ORIGNY, Peter Adam, author of a history of Ancient Egypt—and of a System of Egyptian Chronology, was also distinguished in military life, and died at Rheims, his native place, 1774.

ORKAN, son of Othoman, made himself emperor of Turkey 1326, by the destruction of his elder brothers, and extended his dominions by the conquest of Gallipoli, and other provinces. He married the daughter of the emperor John Cantacuzenus, and died 1360.

ORLANDI, Pelcgrini Anthony, author of the Origin and Progress of Printing from 1457 to 1500—a history of Bolognese writers, 4to. in Italian—and Abecedario Pittorico, 4to. &c. was an eminent Italian bookseller, who died 1730.

ORLAY, Bernard Van, a native of Brussels, eminent as a painter, and as the disciple of Raphael. His pieces, which possess merit, adorn the churches and public edifices of the Netherlands. He died 1560, aged 70.

ORLEANS, Louis of France, duke of, son of Charles V. was born 1371, and he had a great share in the affairs of the kingdom during the reign of his brother Charles VI.

He was basely murdered by his uncle John, duke of Burgundy, 1407, and this foul deed became the source of long and fatal disputes between the houses of Orleans and Burgundy.

ORLEANS, Charles, duke of, son of Louis of France, was called duke of Angouleme in his father's life time. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Agincourt, and after a captivity of 25 years in England, he returned to France, and undertook the conquest of Milan, which he claimed in right of his mother. He was, however, able to conquer only the county of Ast. He died at Amboise 1465, leaving one son Charles, who married Louisa of Savoy, the mother of Francis I. He was a liberal patron of letters, and wrote some poetical pieces.

ORLEANS, Louis, duke of, prince of the blood, son of Philip the Regent, was born at Versailles, 4th Aug. 1703. The first part of his life was spent in idle dissipation; but after the death of his father, and that of his wife, better thoughts succeeded, and he abandoned the world and its follies to devote himself to a life of penitence, austerity, religion, and literature. He settled at the abbey of St. Genevieve, and employed himself in works of charity and benevolence till the time of his death, which happened 4th Feb. 1752. He was an accomplished scholar, and was not only well skilled in the Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, and Greek languages, but a perfect master of botany, chymistry, and painting, besides history, geography, and divinity. He wrote translations, paraphrases, and commentaries on Scripture—a Literal translation of the Psalms—Dissertations against the Jews—a liberal translation of St. Paul's Epistles—treatise against Plays, &c. His son Philip, who was born 12th May, 1725, is said to have inherited the virtuous qualities of his father. He died 18th Nov. 1785.

ORLEANS, Philip Louis Joseph, duke of, was born at St. Cloud, 13th April, 1747, and had the title of duke de Chartres during his father's life. From his earliest years he devoted himself to low pleasures, but with the desire to acquire consideration in the fleet, he entered in the navy, and he obtained the command of the St. Esprit, of 84 guns, in 1778, under the orders of Admiral Orvilliers. The sight of the English fleet, it is said, terrified the cowardly prince, and during the action, which was fought off Ushant with admiral Keppel, it is reported that he concealed himself in the hold of the ship till the danger was over. This conduct was ridiculed not only by the wits of Paris, but by the court, and the duke felt the severity of the satire so deeply that he determined on revenge. His immense fortune gave him every opportunity to raise disturbances and create dissatisfaction, and he followed the iniquitous propensities of his heart. In 1787 he succeeded to his father's title, and soon after, the revolution afforded him occasions to gratify his revenge against the court. Though exiled and threatened, he maintained his rancorous opposition; he became one of the members of the national assembly, and as if ashamed of his family and of his birth, he took the name of Egalité. While the factious and the vile used his great opulence, and his powerful influence for their own vicious and diabolical purposes, he was satisfied if every measure tended to dishonour the monarch, and to overturn the throne, on which he hoped to seat himself. At the trial of Lewis XVI. he gave his vote with the greatest indifference for the death of the king, a conduct which shocked even the most abandoned jacobins; but soon his own fate was determined by those who had squandered his riches, and abused his confidence. He was accused, and though he escaped to Marseilles, he was seized and brought back to Paris, and led ignominiously to the scaffold, 6th Nov. 1793. He suffered death with more courage than could be expected from a man whose character and morals were so infamous.

ORLEANS, Louis, an advocate of Paris, who boldly defended the cause of the league against Henry IV. The virulence of his writings at last caused his apprehension; but the mild monarch ordered him to be liberated from prison. This compassionate conduct of the monarch made a convert of the advocate, who became loud in the praises of his benefactor. He died at Paris, 1627, aged 87. He wrote a Defence of the United Catholics against the Protestants, 8vo.—Address to the English Catholics—Commentaries on Tacitus and Seneca—besides other political pieces now deservedly forgotten.

ORLEANS, Peter Joseph, a Jesuit, born at Bourges, 1641. He professed belles lettres, and afterwards became preacher to his society, and died at Paris, 31st March, 1698. He is author of a History of the Revolutions of England, 3 vols. 4to. and 4 in 12mo.—History of the Revolutions of Portugal, 5 vols. 12mo.—History of the two Tartar Conquerors, Chunchi and Canbi, 8vo.—the Life of Father Cotton, 12mo.—Lives of Lewis de Gonzaga, and other Jesuits—two volumes of Sermons—Life of Constance, Minister of the King of Siam, 12mo.

ORLEANS DE LA MOTTE, Louis Francis Gabriel d', a native of Carpentras, who became bishop of Amiens 1733. He was a most pious and charitable prelate, and died 10th July, 1774, aged 91. His Spiritual Letters appeared at Paris, 1777, in 12mo.—and his Life by Proyart, in 1783, in 12mo.

ORME, Robert, an English writer, born

at Bombay, where his father was a surgeon. From Harrow school he went as writer to India; and to the friendship of Lord Clive he was indebted for his consequence in the East. He was in 1755 fourth member of the Madras council, and commissary-general, but returned to Europe in 1759, and was some time after honourably appointed by the East India Company their historiographer, with a salary of 300*l.* per annum. He was author of the Military Transactions of the British in India, 3 vols. of which the first volume appeared in 1763, and the second in 1775. He wrote besides Historical Fragments of the Mogul Power, during the reign of Aurengzebe. He died in 1801, not in very opulent circumstances, aged 73.

OROBIO, Balthasar, a Spanish Jew, born at Seville. Though educated secretly as a Jew, he outwardly professed the Roman Catholic faith, and became professor of metaphysics at Salamanca. He afterwards studied physic, and practised it at Seville; but as he was suspected of Judaism, he was seized by the inquisition, and treated with the greatest cruelty to oblige him to confess. His obstinacy in denying his religion at last procured his liberation, after three years' confinement, and he escaped from the Spanish dominions to Toulouse, where he was made professor of physic. He afterwards went to Amsterdam, and there openly professed himself a Jew, was circumcised, and took the name of Isaac. He here practised medicine with great success, and died 1687. He wrote against Spinoza in his "Certamen Philosophicum," and his interview with Limborch on the subject of the Christian religion, occasioned his writing a book in support of Judaism, in which he displayed much ingenuity, and great metaphysical subtlety. His antagonist afterwards published an account of the controversy in a pamphlet called Amica Collatio cum Judæo Erudito, 4to.

OROSIUS, Paul, a Spaniard, the disciple of St. Augustin, by whose advice he wrote a History of the World to the year of Christ 316,—a treatise on Free Will, &c. He flourished in the fifth century.

ORPHEUS, a Thracian poet, before the age of Homer. His history is fabulous, and the works ascribed to him are by more modern hands.

ORSATO, Sertorio, an Italian writer, well skilled in antiquities and in ancient inscriptions. He was born at Padua, and became professor of philosophy there. He died of a suppression of urine, 1673, aged 61. He wrote besides lyric poems in Italian, "the History of Padua,"—Commentaries de Notis Romanorum, and other works.

de Strenis Veterum—de Patera Antiquorum, &c. were much esteemed. He died 1720.

ORSI, John Joseph, an ingenious philosopher and poet, born at Bologna 1652, of a noble family. He studied every branch of polite literature, in which he distinguished himself. He died 1733. He wrote sonatas, pastorals, and other poems in Italian—a Defence of Italian poets, and of Tasso—Letters—the Life of Lewis de Sales, &c.

ORSI, Francis Joseph Augustin, an able writer, born in Tuscany, 1692, and raised to the purple by Clement XIII. He is author of an "Ecclesiastical History" in Italian, 20 vols. 4to.—Infallibilitas Act. Rom. Pontificis, 3 vols. 4to. He died 1761.

ORTE, N. viscount d', governor of Bayonne, distinguished himself by his humanity, and refused to put the protestants to death on the fatal massacre of St. Bartholomew. He wrote back in answer to the sanguinary orders of Charles IX. that he had only good soldiers, and good citizens in his garrison, and no executioners.

ORTELIUS, Abraham, a famous geographer, born at Antwerp, April, 1527. He travelled with the eyes of a philosopher over England, Ireland, France, Italy, and Germany, and was so respectable for his knowledge of geography, that he was honourably called the Ptolemy of his age. His "Theatrum Orbis Terræ," in folio, procured for him the place of geographer to Philip II. of Spain. He died at Antwerp, June 1598. He published besides, Synonyma Geographia—Aurei Seculi Imago—Syntagma Herbarum Encomiasticum—Itinerarium per Gallia et Belgic. Partes, &c.

ORTON, Job, a native of Shrewsbury. He was educated in his native town, and afterwards under Dr. Doddridge, at Northampton. When of the proper age he took care of a dissenting congregation at Kidderminster, and then removed to Shrewsbury, where he died 1783, aged 66. He had for some years retired from the pastoral duties to private life. He is author of an excellent Life of Dr. Doddridge—Sermons to the aged, 12mo.—Sacramental Meditations, 12mo.—Discourses on Christian Worship, 12mo.—Discourses on Practical Subjects, 8vo.—Practical Exposition of the Old Testament, published after his death, 6 vols. 8vo. He was a frequent correspondent with his friend Mr. Stedman, a clergyman of Shrewsbury, who has lately published some of his letters, which prove him to have been a man of the most liberal sentiments, and an active supporter of piety, virtue, and devotion.

ORVILLE, James Philip de, a Dutch eritic, of French parentage, born at Amsterdam, 1696. He improved himself by travelling over England, France, and Germany; and on his return was elected professor of eloquence, history, and Greek, at Amsterdam, which he held 12 years, and resigned 1742. He died 1751. He continued with Burman, Observationes Miscellanæ, 10 vols. to which four more were added after his death. These contain a Dissertation on Delos, and Remarks on the Greek Romance of Chariton. He wrote besides a satire against de Pauw, called Critica Vannus—Observations on Sicily.

OSBORNE, Francis, an eminent English writer, born at Chicksand, Bedfordshire, 1588. He became master of the horse to William lord Pembroke, but in the civil wars he sided with the parliament, and obtained some offices under them, and under Cromwell. He wrote, while resident at Oxford, near his son, Advice to a Son, which was very popular, and was therefore inveighed against by the puritans of the time, besides other things in prose and verse. His works were published, 8vo. 1689, and again 1722, 2 vols. 12mo.

OSBORN, Sir D'Anvers, governor of New-York. He was of Chicksands, Bedfordshire, and was appointed governor in the place of Clinton in 1753. He arrived in New-York on the 6th of October, and was received with the usual demonstrations of respect, but died on the 12th of that month by his own hand from despair of exercising a popular administration over the colony which was agitated by violent parties. He married a sister of the earl of Halifax, and derived his name from the marriage of Sir Peter Osborn, one of his ancestors, to the daughter of John d'Anvers, Esq. of Wiltshire.

OSBORN, John, a poet, was born at Sandwich, Massachusetts, in 1713, and graduated at Harvard in 1735. He devoted himself first to the study of theology, and afterwards of medicine. He died at Middletown, Connecticut, where he had resided for some time, about the year 1753. He was the author of several poetical pieces of a highly respectable character, particularly, a whaling song, and an elegy on the death of a sister.

OSGOOD, Samuel, postmaster-general of the United States, was born at Andover, Massachusetts, in February 1748, and educated at Harvard college, where he was graduated in 1770. He studied theology, but losing his health became a merchant. His talents, learning, and piety made him the object of public esteem, and he was, while young, repeatedly chosen a member of the state legislature. He served as a captain at Lexington and Cambridge on the memorable 19th of April, 1775, and was soon after appointed aid to general Ward. He left the army in 1776. He was chosen member of the senate after the adoption of the state constitution in 1780, and the next year elected to a seat in congress. In 1785 he was appointed by congress the first commissioner of the treasury, in which office he continued till the adoption of the federal constitution. He was also for a number of years postmaster-general. He was afterwards supervisor of the state of New-York. He became in 1803 naval officer for the port of New-York, and held the place till near the close of his life in 1812. He was extensively acquainted with science, literature, and theology; published several respectable volumes on religious subjects, and was distinguished for integrity, public spirit, and piety.

OSIANDER, Andrew, a native of Bavaria, who studied at Wittemberg and Nuremberg, and was one of Luther's first disciples. He was appointed minister and professor in the university of Königsberg, and he distinguished himself by a new opinion on justification, which he asserted to arise not from the imputation of Christ's justice, but the union of God's justice with our souls. He defended these sentiments with great vehemence, even against Luther, and chiefly rested on the words of Isaiah, the Lord is our Righteousness. His learning was so respectable, that his tenets were tolerated, that no schism might be kindled among the protestants. He died 17th Oct. 1552, aged 54. He was so violent in his temper, that he treated all his opponents in the grossest language of satire and illiberality. His works are Harmonia Evangelica, fol.; Epistola ad Zwinglium de Eucharistia; Dissertationes duæ de Lege et Evangelio et Justificatione; De Imagine Dei quid sit. His son Luke was also a Lutheran minister, and died at Tubingen, in 1604. He was author of Commentaries on the Bible; Institutions of the Christian Religion; Abridgment of the Centuriators of Magdeburg, 4to.; Enchiridia Controversiarum, &c.—Another Luke was chancellor of Tubingen university, and died 1638, aged 68. He wrote on the Omnipresence of Christ, in two Latin pamphlets; Funeral Orations; De Baptismo; De Regimine Ecclesiæ, &c.—There were two others, Andrew and John Adam, who wrote some Latin treatises. The first died 1617, aged 54, and the last 1697.

OSIUS, bishop of Cordova, presided at the council of Nice, which had been assembled 325, by Constantine, agreeable to his advice. He shared the confidence of Constantius as he had shared that of his father; but in those turbulent times he was persecuted by the Arians, though nearly 100 years old, and at last by threats and by blows, he was prevailed upon to subscribe to their confession of faith. This had such effect upon him that he led a life of penitence and sorrow, and soon after died, renouncing the tenets which he had embraced, and declaring them unchristian and heretical.

OSIUS or OSIO, Felix, professor of rhetoric at Padua, was born at Milan, 1587. He published Romano Græcia—Tractatus de Sepulchris et Epitaphiis Ethnicor. et Christianor.—Elogia Scriptorum Illustr.—Orationes—Remarks on Mussati's History—Collection of Historians at Padua. He died at Padua, 1631.

OSMAN I. son of Achmet I. succeeded his uncle Mustapha, 1618, on the Turkish throne. His expedition in 1621, against Poland, was very unfortunate, and after the loss of 80,000 men, and 100,000 horses, he submitted to a disadvantageous peace. These misfortunes were attributed to the Janissaries, and therefore a new militia of Arabs was substituted in their room; but this violent measure produced a revolution, and Osman was hurled from his throne, and strangled by the rebellious soldiery, 19th May, 1622, and Mustapha placed in his room.

OSMAN II. emperor of Constantinople after his brother Mahomet V. 1754, died after a short reign, 29th Nov. 1757, aged 59. He reneted, under severe penalties, the Mahometan law, that his subjects should drink no wine.

OSMOND, St. a Norman, who followed the fortunes of William the Conqueror, and was made by him, chancellor of England and bishop of Salisbury. The liturgy which he introduced in his diocese was universally adopted, and called the liturgy of Salisbury. He died 1099, and was canonized by Calixtus III.

OSORIO, Jerome, a learned Portuguese, born at Lisbon, 1506. He studied at Salamanca, Paris, and Bologna, and at his return home was appointed professor of divinity at Coimbra. His abilities recommended him to the court, and he was made bishop of Sylva, by the queen regent. He went afterwards to Rome, and in consequence of the disasters of his country, brought on by the death of king Sebastian in the field of battle, and against his advice, he died, it is said, of a broken heart, Aug. 1580. He wrote commentaries, paraphrases, and other works, and by the elegance and correctness of his diction, deserved to be called the Cicero of Portugal. His works were published at Rome, 1592, in 4 vols. folio, by his nephew.

OSORIO, Jerome, nephew to the above, was canon of Evora. He wrote his uncle's life, besides Annotations on his Paraphrase—and Paraphrasis in Canticum Canticorum, &c.

Maria, a neighbouring gentleman, saw and patronised his abilities, and by his own assiduous application, he soon became capable to be tutor to his patron's nephew, and other noblemen. He afterwards studied at Bourges, and applied to the law; and was called to the bar at Paris. In 1580 he went to Rome as secretary to the archbishop of Toulouse, the ambassador from France, and on his death he passed into the service of cardinal d'Este, and then of cardinal de Joyeuse. When Henry IV. of France quitted the religion of the protestants, d'Ossat, then French resident at Rome, obtained the papal absolution, and for this service was made bishop of Rennes. He was afterwards raised by the pope to the dignity of cardinal, and made by Henry, bishop of Bayeux. He, however, still continued at Rome, as protector of the French nation, and died there, March, 1604, aged 68. He was buried in St. Lewis's church at Rome. He was a most able, skilful, and sagacious negotiator, and in every thing which he undertook, succeeded to increase the influence of his master, and the glory of his nation. His "Letters" have been frequently published, of which the best edition is that of Amsterdam, 5 vols. 12mo. 1708.

OSSIAN, the son of Fingal, an ancient Scotch bard, who flourished about the beginning of the third century. He accompanied his father in his wars, and in the latter part of his life, which was protracted to a good old age, he became blind. In 1758, some poems appeared in a flowery and poetical style, said to be translated from the original Gaelic poems of Ossian, by the hands of Mr. Macpherson; and as they immediately excited the attention of the learned by their beauty and simplicity, they produced an animated controversy about their authenticity. The ablest writers of the age were engaged in the contest, which never, perhaps, can be decided, and the poems have acquired a deserved celebrity through Europe.

OSTADE, Adrian Van, an eminent Dutch painter, born at Lubec, 1610. He studied at Haerlem, under Frank Hals, but he was endued with such powers by nature, that he equalled all other painters in the representations of droll and vulgar scenes. He perfectly understood the chiaro obscuro, and his smoking-rooms, alehouses, kitchens, and stables are particularly admired. He died at Amsterdam, 1685, much regretted. His prints, engraved by himself in aquafortis, make a set of 54 pieces. His brother Isaac studied under him, and would have acquired reputation, but died young at Haerlem.

OSTERVALD, John Frederick, a protestant minister, born at Neufchatel, 1663. He was learned, pious, and humane, and from his friendship with Turretin and Werenfels arose the common expression of the triumvirate of Swiss theologians. He died 1747. He wrote a Catechism of the Christian Religion, 8vo.—Arguments and Reflections on the Books of the Bible, 2 vols. 8vo.—Treatise against Uncleanness, 8vo.—on the Sources of Corruptions, 12mo.—Sermons, 8vo. &c. His son, John Rodolph, was minister of the French church at Basil, and was universally esteemed. He wrote a Discourse on the Duties of Communicants, 12mo.

OSTERWY, Maria Van, a native of Delft. She excelled as an elegant artist, and her flowers, fruits, and scenes of still life, possessed particular beauty, and displayed great ease and delicacy. She died 1693, aged 63.

OSWALD, king of Northumberland, fled to Ireland at the death of his father Ethelfred, to avoid the persecution of his uncle Edwin, who usurped the throne. He returned, became a Christian, defeated and slew Cerdowalla, king of the Britons, and was afterwards killed in battle with Penda, king of Mercia, 643. His virtues have been recorded by monkish writers, who declare that miracles were wrought at his tomb.

OSWALD, Erasmus, professor of mathematics and Hebrew at Fribourg, published a translation of the New Testament in Hebrew, and other learned works, and died 1579.

OSYMANDYAS, an Egyptian king, said to be the first who erected a public library.

OTHO, Marcus Salvius, became emperor of Rome 69, after the murder of Galba and Piso, and three months after he was defeated near Cremona, by Vitellius, who also aspired to the throne. He killed himself not to fall into the hands of the conqueror.

OTHO I. surnamed the great, eldest son of Henry the Fowler, was crowned emperor of Germany at Aix-la-Chapelle 936. He was an active prince; he defeated the Danes, subdued Bohemia, and carried his arms into Italy against Berenger, who had assumed the title of emperor. Berenger was easily routed, and Otho, crowned again at Rome, by the hands of the pope, John XII. assumed the title of Cæsar and Augustus. Displeased with the chains imposed upon him, John XII. revolted against the power of Otho, but he was soon attacked and deposed, and Leo VIII. elected in his room, promised submission to the imperial decrees. The Romans, however, again revolted, and were severely punished by the offended emperor. Afterwards Otho was engaged in a war with the Eastern empire, because his ambassadors had been treated with insult and cruelty by Nicephorus, and he therefore invaded Apu-lia and Calabria, which belonged still to the Greek emperors, and after desolating the country, he sent his prisoners to Constantinople with their noses cut off. Peace was at last restored between John Zimisces, the successor of Nicephorus, and Otho, and it was cemented by the marriage of Theophania the niece of the eastern prince, with the son of Otho. Otho died 7th May, 973, aged 62.

OTHO II. son and successor of the great Otho, was surnamed the bloody. Though his elevation was opposed by the arts of his mother Adelaide, he had the courage, though young, to expel her from the court, and to defeat her partisans, who had raised Henry, duke of Bavaria, to the throne. After routing the Danes and the Bohemians, who wished to take advantage of the troubles of the empire, he invaded the French territories with an army of 60,000 men; but peace was restored in 980. The next year Otho crossed the Alps, to reduce the Calabrians to subjection; but he was defeated in a battle by the Saracens, who supported the cause of his enemies; and in his escape he fell into the hands of pirates, who restored him to liberty for a large ransom. Undismayed by calamity, he assembled another army, and attacked the Calabrians and Saracens, and obtained a great victory. He died soon after, on his return to Rome, according to some, by poison, 7th Dec. 983.

OTHO III. only son of Otho II. was crowned emperor at Aix-la-Chapelle, 983, though only three years old. His elevation was opposed by the duke of Bavaria, who before had rebelled against his father; but the energy of his ministers defeated the measures of his rivals. When he took the reins of government, Otho went into Italy, where he was crowned by the hands of pope Gregory V. and soon after he revisited the country to repress the insurrection of Crescentius, and of the anti-pope, John XVI. On his return to Germany, Otho made Boleslaus king of Poland, and soon after again went to Italy to defend it against the Saracens. He died at the castle of Paterno, in the Campagna, 28th Jan. 1002, aged 22; after having enlarged the power of the pope, and enabled the see of Rome to dispute for temporal sovereignty with his imperial successors.

OTHO IV. surnamed the Proud, son of Henry the Lion, duke of Saxony, was elected emperor 1197. After being consecrated at Rome by Innocent III. he laid claim, against his solemn promise, to the territories of Ancona and Spoleto, which had been left by Matilda to the Holy See. In consequence of this he was excommunicated, and the princes of Germany, exhorted by their bishops, elected Frederic, king of Sicily, emperor. Otho in vain attempted to resist the power of his enemies. Though he leagued with the court of Flanders, he had the misfortune to see his army defeated at the battle of Bouvines, in 1214, and therefore he retired in disgrace and despair to the castle of Hantzburg, where he died 19th May, 1218.

OTHO, bishop of Frisingen, was author of a chronicle in seven books, of some merit, though abounding in fables. He died at Morimond, 12th Sept. 1158.

OTHO, Venius, a Dutch painter, born at Leyden, 1556. He studied at Liege, and afterwards resided seven years at Rome, where he greatly distinguished himself. He was next patronised by the emperor of Germany, the duke of Bavaria, and the elector of Cologne, and then returned to Antwerp, and afterwards was appointed master of the mint at Brussels, by the arch-duke Albert. He died at Brussels, 1634, aged 78. He had Rubens among his pupils. His brother Gilbert was eminent as an engraver, and Peter as a painter.

OTIS, James, a lawyer of Barnstable, Massachusetts, eminent for talents and patriotism. He was for a long time a member of the general court, and of his majesty's council; a colonel of the militia, justice of the court of common pleas, and judge of probate. At the commencement of the controversy with Great Britain he distinguished himself by a zealous defence of the colonial rights. He died in 1778.

OTIS, James, a distinguished civilian of Massachusetts, and son of the preceding, was born at West Barnstable, February 5th, 1725, and graduated at Harvard college in 1743. After devoting several years to the cultivation of literature and the study of law, he established himself as an attorney at Boston, and quickly rose to the highest distinction in the profession. After a long course of successful practice, he was in 1661 elected to a seat in the legislature, and continued a member of that body, in which he held the first rank in talents, in zeal in defending the rights of the colony against the encroachments of British despotism, and in influence, till 1772. To recount the services he rendered the public, while in the legislature, would be to give almost a complete history of that period. He was in 1765 a member of the congress which assembled at New-York. At length the partisans of the British ministry who held offices in Boston, provoked at the bold opposition he maintained to their ambitious measures, vilified him in the papers, and proposed to the ministry to arrest him for high treason. Otis in return indignantly denounced those officers in an advertisement, and soon after, in September, 1769, meeting with one of them, John Robinson, was attacked by him, and others, and received several severe wounds. From that time he was subject to the frequent loss of his intellect, and in 1772 retired from public life. He survived till 1783, when he was struck by lightning on the 23d of May, and expired immediately. He was a man of powerful genius, of great wit and humour, and of a temper verging in ardour toward that highly susceptible and enthusiastic complexion, which frequently indicates a tendency to insanity. As an orator he was bold, argumentative, impetuous, and skilful in communicating his own excitement to his hearers. As a lawyer he stood at the head of the profession in talents and knowledge; he was a profound statesman, an inflexible patriot, and a highly accomplished classical scholar. His publications were a Latin and Greek prosody, and several political pamphlets.

OTROKOTSKIFORIS, Francis, a Hungarian, who studied at Utrecht, and became a protestant minister in his native country. He afterwards embraced the catholic faith, and was professor of law at Tirnau, where he died 1718. He wrote Origines Hungaricæ, 2 vols. 8vo.—Antiqua Religio Hungorum vere Christiana et Catholica, 8vo. besides some polemical works, which he refuted after he became a member of the church of Rome.

OTT, Henry, a learned Swiss divine, born at Zurich, where he became professor of eloquence, Hebrew, and ecclesiastical history, and where he died 1682, aged 65. As an orientalist, his abilities were very great, and he was the correspondent of several learned men in Europe.

OTTER, John, author of Travels in Turkey and Persia, with an account of Kouli Khan's expeditions, was born at Christianstadt, 1707, and died 1748.

OTWAY, Thomas, a celebrated dramatic writer, born at Trotting, Sussex, March, 1651. He was educated at Winchester school and Christ church, Oxford, but left the university without a degree, and repaired to London, where he became a writer and actor of plays. By the friendship of lord Plymouth, natural son of Charles II. he obtained a cornetcy in the army, and embarked with the forces for Flanders, in 1677; but a military life proved disagreeable to him, and he returned to London poor, and necessitated to write for his support. He died April 14th, 1685, in a manner, says Dr. Johnson, which I am unwilling to mention. Having been compelled by his necessities to contract debts, and hunted by the terriers of the law, he retired to a public house on Tower-hill, where he died of want, or, as related by one of his biographers, by swallowing, after a long fast, a piece of bread, which charity had supplied. He went out, as reported. almost naked, in the rage of hunger, and finding a gentleman in a neighbouring coffee-house, asked him for a shilling; the gentleman gave him a guinea; and Otway, going away, bought a roll, and was choked with the first mouthful. As a writer, he had extraordinary powers, in touching the heart, in his tragedies, of which his Orphan, and Venice Preserved, are noble instances. Besides ten dramatic pieces, he wrote some miscellaneous poems and translations. His works have appeared in 3 vols. 12mo. 1757.

ODENARDE, Robert Van, a native of Ghent, who learnt painting under Carlo Maratti, and exercised his art in his native town, where he adorned the churches, and public and private edifices with valuable paintings. He died 1743, aged 80.

ODIN, Casimir, a French monk, born at Mezieres, 1638; son of a weaver. He burst from the obscurity of his father's profession, and became a recluse in the abbey of Boucilly, in Champagne, where Lewis XIV. accidentally passed, and discovered his abilities, which were soon after employed in visiting the archives of the monasteries of Lorraine, Alsace, Burgundy, &c. In 1690 he left France, turned protestant, and was made under librarian at the university of Leyden, where he died 1717. He wrote Commentarius de Scripturis Ecclesiæ Antiquis et eorum Scriptis, three vols. folio—Veterum aliquot Gallicæ et Belgicæ Scriptorum Opuscula Sacra, &c. 8vo.—Supplement to Ecclesiastical Authors, omitted by Bellarmine, 8vo.—the Monk of Premontre unfrocked.

ODIN, Francis, a native of Vignori, in Champagne, who studied at Langres, and was admitted among the Jesuits, 1691. He became professor of humanity and theology, and settled at Dijon, where he died of a dropsy in the chest, 28th April, 1752, aged 79. He was well versed in divinity and in the ecclesiastical history of the fathers. He published Somnia, an elegant Latin poem, odes, elegies, &c. printed in his Poemata Didascalica, 3 vols. 12mo.; Bibliotheca Scriptorum Societatis Jesu; Celtic Etymologies; Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans; Historia Dogmatica Conciliorum; Lives of several Persons included in Niceron's Collection, &c.

ODINET, Mark Anthony, a French medallist, born at Rheims 1643. He quitted his professorship of law at Rheims, to go to Paris with his relation Raissant, as keeper of the medals in the king's cabinet. The order and arrangement which he introduced in this valuable collection, obtained for him a pension from the king, and the honour of a seat in the academy of belles-lettres. He died at Paris 1712. He wrote three dissertations of great merit on medals.

ODRAT, John Baptist, a French painter, who studied under Largillieres, and acquired great celebrity in his correct representation of animals. Some of his hunting pieces adorn the palaces of France. His adoration of the Magi is in high esteem. He was treated with distinction by the French king, and received a pension. He died at Paris, his native town, 1st May, 1755, aged 69.

OVERALL, John, an English prelate, born 1559. He was of St. John's college, Cambridge, and removed to Trinity, where he became fellow. In 1696 he was made regius professor of divinity, D.D. and master of Catherine-hall, and in 1601, he succeeded to the deanery of St. Paul. In 1614 he was made bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, and in 1618 translated to Norwich, where he died May, 1619. His tomb remained neglected till 1669, when his pupil Cosin, bishop of Durham, erected a monument over it. Overall was a learned divine, distinguished by wisdom, erudition, and piety, and connected by literature with the most eminent men of the times. He wrote a "Convocation book," and other works.

OVERBEKE, Bonaventure Van, a native of Amsterdam, eminent as a designer and an antiquarian. He went three times to Rome, to take correct copies of her ancient monuments, and he made beautiful engravings of his pieces. The description with which he accompanied his plates, written in Flemish, was translated into Latin and French, three vols. folio, and possesses great merit. He died at Amsterdam, 1706.

OVERBURY, Sir Thomas, a polite English writer, born in 1581, at Compton-Scorfen, Warwickshire. He was of Queen's college, Oxford, where he took his bachelor's degree, and then entered at the Middle Temple; but he soon relinquished the law for literature, and for the favours of the court. He became the confidential friend of Car, earl of Somerset, by whose influence he was knighted; but he stained his character in promoting the amours of that profligate nobleman with the licentious countess of Essex; and as if ashamed of his conduct, he boldly attempted to dissuade him from marrying so worthless a woman. Car was weak enough to reveal the friendly advice, and the enraged countess meditated revenge. By the means of Car, Overbury was appointed ambassador to Russia, and by his insidious advice, encouraged to refuse the office, in consequence of which the king caused him to be sent to the Tower as a disloyal man. In this place poison was administered to him, and he at last thus fell a sacrifice to the diabolical intrigues of his perfidious friend and his guilty mistress 15th September, 1613. The murder, though noised abroad, was hushed by the power of the offender; but two years after, it was fully disclosed; the under-agents were tried, condemned, and executed, but the earl and the countess, after being found guilty, were pardoned by the king. Sir Thomas, who has been compared in his learning, his wisdom, and his melancholy fate, to Germanicus Cæsar, was the author of some works in prose and verse, of considerable merit, reprinted 1753, 8vo.

UGHTRED, William, an English divine, born 1573, at Eton, and educated on the foundation there, from whence he was removed as fellow of King's college, Cambridge. In 1603 he was presented to the living of Aldbury, near Guilford, where he devoted himself to mathematical studies. During the usurpation of Cromwell, he was frequently molested, though a peaceful and harmless resident in his parish, and he was liberated from the danger of sequestration only by the interference of Lilly, Whitelocke, and other friends. He died the beginning of May, 1660, aged 86. On hearing the news of Charles's restoration, he expired, it is said, in a sudden ecstasy of joy. He was the friend and correspondent of the most learned men of the times, and as a mathematician his works are numerous and valuable. He published in 1631, his "Clavis," a most valuable work, containing many new theorems in algebra and geometry, which have been adopted by Newton, and other learned philosophers. This little volume became a standard book at Cambridge, by the introduction of Seth Ward. His "Opuscula," were published after his death, at Oxford, 1676.

OID, Pub. Naso, a celebrated Latin poet, born at Sulmo, B. C. 43. He was bred up for the bar, but poetry had greater charms for him, and under the patronage of Augustus, he acquired celebrity and honours. He was afterwards banished by his imperial patron, for causes not satisfactorily known, and died on the borders of the Euxine Sea, A. D. 17. His works, which are elegant, polished, and animated, though often licentious, are well known.

OVIEDO, John Gonsalvo de, a learned Spaniard, born at Madrid 1478. He was one of the pages of Ferdinand of Arragon and Isabella, and was at Barcelona in 1493, on the return of Columbus from the discovery of the new world. The adventures of this extraordinary man raised his attention; he became his friend, and accompanied him in his next voyage. As he had rendered important services to Spain in the wars of Naples, Ferdinand considered him as the fittest man to examine the commerce and resources of the new world; and on his return from the island of Hayti, he published the result of his intelligent inquiries, called the General and Natural History of the West Indies, afterwards enlarged to a folio volume, Salamanca, 1535. In this work he paid particular attention to the venereal disease, which was lately become known in Europe, and which some thought was introduced from America; and he ascertained that the use of guaiacum was very salutary in the relief of this terrible disorder.

OUSEL, Philip, a native of Dantzic, descended from a family originally from France. He became protestant minister at Leyden, and afterwards was appointed theological professor at Frankfort on Oder, where he died 1724, aged 53. He was well skilled in Hebrew literature, and published Introductio in Accentuationem Hebræorum Metricam, 4to. in which he supports that the Hebrew points and accents are as old as the Bible—de Accentuatione Hebræorum Prosaicâ, 8vo.—de Leprâ, 4to. His relation James wrote valuable notes on the Octavius of Minutus Felix, inserted in the variorum edition of 1672.

OUWALER, Albert, a historical painter of Haerlem, who died 1515, aged 71.

OWAIN, a prince of Powys, who fled to Ireland, in consequence of carrying away Ness, the wife of Gerald, constable of Pembroke. He succeeded his father Cadwygan ap Bleddyn in 1119, and was slain by Gerald four years after. He was in the service of Henry I. of England, in Normandy, for some time, and was knighted by him.

OWAIN, son of Mæxen Wledig, a brave warrior, who broke the intimacy which existed between the Britons and their Roman conquerors, and was elected king. His services were such that he became a saint in the British calendar.

OWAIN, or OWEN TUDOR, lord of Penmynydd, in Anglesea, married Catharine, the widow of Henry V. in 1426, and was father by her of three sons, the eldest of whom embraced the monastic life; the second was Edmund, earl of Richmond, father to Henry VII. and the third Jasper, earl of Pembroke. After the death of his wife, he was confined in Newgate, but escaped, and died in Wales.

OWAIN CIVEILOG, a Welch warrior, who attacked Hywel, of Cadwygan, and Rhys of Gruffydd, and died about 1197. He was also a poet, and some of his verses are preserved in the Welch Archæologia.

OWAIN GLANDWR, or OWEN GLENDOWER, last of the Welch princes, was in the service of Richard II. but was disgraced by Henry IV. In consequence of this he took up arms, burnt Ruthyn, and defeated lord Grey, who had, by false accusation, obtained his lands from the king; but afterwards he restored him to liberty for a large ransom. He continued his hostilities, and in 1402 routed Edward Mortimer in Radnorshire, and caused himself to be proclaimed, by the voice of his assembled and unanimous people. independent severeign of Wales. Though assisted by the French, his affairs, however, became desperate, and unable to withstand the incursions of the English, he led a life of retirement, and died at last in 1415, in the disguise of a poor shepherd.

OWEN, Dr. John, an eminent divine among the independents, of whom he is sometimes called the prince, the oracle, and the metropolitan. He was born 1616, at Hadham, Oxfordshire, and was educated at Queen's college, Oxford, which he left in 1637, as unwilling to submit to the regulations introduced by Laud, the university chancellor. He afterwards became chaplain to lord Lovelace, and at the breaking out of the civil war, embraced the party of the parliament with such warmth, that his uncle discarded and disinherited him. His "Display of Arminianism," published in 1642, rendered him very popular among the nonconformists; he was a frequent preacher before the parliament, and obtained the friendship of Cromwell, whom he served faithfully, and by whose influence he was made, in 1650, dean of Christ church. In 1652 he was, by Cromwell, chancellor of the university, nominated vice chancellor, and the next year took his degree of D.D. On the protector's death he was removed from the office of vice chancellor, and at the restoration he was deprived of his deanery, and retired into the country. He lived for some time in London, and then at Kensington, and died at his house at Ealing, Middlesex, 24th Aug. 1683, aged 67. Though violent as the friend of party and of usurpation, it is said, however, that he possessed moderation and kindness, and frequently exerted his influence in favour of such royalists as were distinguished for virtue and learning. His works were numerous, amounting to 7 vols. folio, 20 in 4to. and 30 in 8vo. the best known of which are, an Exposition of the Hebrews, 4 vols. folio—Discourse on the Holy Spirit, folio—treatise on Original Sin, 8vo.—sermons and tracts, folio.

OWEN, John, an English epigrammatist, born at Armen, Caernarvonshire, and educated at Winchester, and New college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He took the degree of LL.B. 1590, and then taught school at Tyrlegh, near Monmouth, and at Warwick on the foundation of Henry VIII. He had such a vein for satire and epigram, that he even wrote in ridicule of a rich uncle on whom he depended, in consequence of which he was excluded from his will. He was afterwards supported by his friend Williams, bishop of Lincoln. He died poor, 1622, and was buried in St. Paul's cathedral. His epigrams have been often printed. They are in Latin and much esteemed, and possess the elegance and humour of Martial's pieces. They have been translated into English, French, and Spanish.

OWEN, Dr. Henry, was born in Merionethshire, and educated at Ruthlyn school, and Jesus college, Oxford, where he took the degree of M.D. He had applied himself to mathematics, and afterwards studied and practised physic, and then took orders and obtained the livings of Edmonton, and St. Olave's, Hart-street, London. He left by his wife, daughter of Butler, bishop of Ely, one son and five daughters, and died at the close of 1795, aged 80. He was an able and pious divine, and wrote Observations on the Scripture Miracles—Remarks on the Four Gospels—Inquiry on the Septuagint Version—Sermons at Boyle's Lectures, 2 vols. 8vo.—Introduction to Hebrew Criticism—Modes of Quotation by Evangelical writers explained, &c.—Posthumous Sermons, 2 vols. &c.

OWEN, George, a physician, born in Worcestershire, and educated at Merton college, Oxford, where he became fellow, and took the degree of M.D. 1527. He was physician to Henry VIII. who left him a legacy of 100l. and afterwards to Edward VI. and to Mary, whom he brought into the world by the Cæsarean operation. He died 10th Oct. 1558, and was buried at St. Stephen's, Walbrook. He published a meet diet for the new Ague, folio, 1558.

OWEN, Charles, a dissenting divine, born in Montgomeryshire, and educated at Shrewsbury. He was minister of a congregation at Bridgenorth, but was obliged to remove to London by the violence of party, till the toleration of James II. permitted him to return. He afterwards went to Ellesmere, and died 1712, aged 58. He wrote some controversial tracts in favour of his persuasion.

OWEN, Rev. John, one of the secretaries of the British and Foreign Bible Society, was born in London about the year 1765, and was educated at Cambridge, where by his superior attainments he obtained several prizes, and was elected fellow of the Corpus Christi college. He soon after took orders and became distinguished as a preacher. He preached some time at Coggesham, in Essex, and afterwards at Fulham, and at length became minister of Park chapel, near Chelsea, where he laboured with great diligence till deprived of his health. He was present at the meeting held at the London Tavern, March 7th, 1804, to deliberate on the formation of the Bible Society, and was one of the most active in promoting its establishment. From that time he devoted his life with the greatest zeal to the objects of the society, and its progressive extension as well as its first establishment was in a great measure effected through his instrumentality. During several of his last years he suffered much from ill health in consequence of his arduous labours. His death took place September 26, 1822. He published "Travels in Europe," "The Christian Monitor," "The Fashionable World Displayed," and "A Vindication of the Bible Society." ¶ L.

OWTRAM, William, prebendary of Westminster in the reign of Charles II. was eminent as a preacher, and as a scholar in rabbinical learning. He died 1679. He published a learned book, "de Sacrificiis," and after his death a volume of sermons was published by bishop Gardner.

OXENSTIERN, Axel, grand chancellor of Sweden, and prime minister to Gustavus Adolphus, deserved his elevation by his merit and his abilities. After the unfortunate battle of Lutzen, 1632, in which his master lost his life, he was placed at the head of affairs, and rewarded this confidence of the nation with the most consummate wisdom, and the strictest integrity exerted for the happiness of Sweden. He died universally respected, 28th Aug. 1654, aged 71. The second volume of the History of Sweden, in German, is attributed to him. Of his sons, John was plenipotentiary at the peace of Munster, where he distinguished himself by his firmness and talents; Gabriel was marshal of Sweden, and Benedict grand chancellor, and prime minister of the kingdom. His grand nephew N. was distinguished as a man of letters. He travelled over the greater part of Europe, and published Thoughts on different Subjects, with Moral Reflections, printed 2 vols. 12mo. and died at an advanced age, 1707, governor of the dutchy of Deux-ponts.

OZANHAM, James, a French mathematician, born at Boligneaux, in Brescia, 1640. He studied divinity in compliance with the wishes of his father; but after his death he applied himself to mathematics, in which he was doomed to distinguish himself. He left his country, and taught mathematics at Lyons, and afterwards at Paris, where, though occasionally given to gaming and gallantry, he acquired some little property. The Spanish war, however, reduced his income by lessening his scholars, and the death of his wife, by whom he had 12 children, none of whom survived him, embittered with sorrow the last years of life. He died of an apoplexy, 3d April, 1717, aged 77. The best known of his works are, a Dictionary of Mathematics, 4to.—a Course of Mathematics, 5 vols. 8vo.—Mathematical Recreations, 4 vols. 8vo.—Use of the Compass of Proportion, 12mo.—Elements of Algebra, 4to.—Practical Geometry.

OZELL, John, an indefatigable English writer, educated at Ashby-de-la-Zouch school, and afterwards at Christ's hospital. His friends designed him for a college education, but disdaining the restraints of university discipline, he qualified himself by a most perfect knowledge of arithmetic for a public office, and obtained the appointment of auditor general of the city and bridge accounts, and auditor of the accounts of St. Paul's cathedral, and of St. Thomas's hospital. He died 15th Oct. 1743, and was buried in St. Mary, Aldermanbury parish. Though he wrote nothing original, he yet showed great assiduity and judgment in his translations of foreign authors; and Moliere, by his labours, appears in an English dress far from inelegant and disinteresting. In his conversation and manners, Ozell was agreeable; he had a good knowledge of modern languages, and had improved himself by travelling. He was one of those heroes whom Pope immortalized in his Dunciad; and in consequence of this, Ozell published a warm and self-consequential comparison between himself and his antagonist, more deserving ridicule than approbation.

PAA

PAAS, Crispin, a native of Cologne, eminent as an engraver, and as the pupil of Cornehard, whose celebrity he equalled. He was patronised by the king of Denmark, and died at Copenhagen in the beginning of the 17th century. His engravings were numerous and highly finished, especially those of the Bible, &c. His daughters Magdalen and Barba also acquired celebrity as engravers; and there were besides two engravers of the same family, Simon and Crispin the younger, who were equally distinguished by their merit.

PAB

PAAW, Peter, a native of Amsterdam, known as a physician and botanist. He practised with great reputation at Leyden, where he died, 1617, aged 53. His works, once much admired, were a Commentary on Vesalius, 4to.—a treatise on the Plague, 4to.—Hortus Lugduno-Batavus, 8vo.—and other works mentioned by Niceron.

PABO, a British prince in the fifth century. It is said that after a defeat he retired to the court of the king of Powys, and afterwards became a monk and a saint. The church of Mona was founded by him, and there his remains were deposited according to the inscription which still records his adventures.

PACA, William, governor of Maryland, was graduated at the college of Philadelphia in 1758, and was educated a physician. He resided at Annapolis, and was several years a delegate to the assembly from that city, previous to the revolution. In 1774 he was appointed a member of the committee of correspondence of Maryland, and the same year a delegate to Congress, in which capacity he was one of the signers of the declaration of independence in 1776. He was afterwards judge of the court of appeals in cases of maritime captures, but resigned the office in 1782 on being elected governor of the state. In 1785 he was again elected governor, as the successor of Smallwood. In 1788 he was a member of the Maryland convention which ratified the federal constitution, and in 1789 was appointed district judge for Maryland. He died in 1799.

PACATIANUS, Titus Julius Marinus, a Roman general who revolted in Gaul against the authority of the emperor Philip, and assumed the purple. He was defeated and slain 249.

PACE, Richard, a learned Englishman, born 1482. He was patronised by Langton, bishop of Winchester, and cardinal Bainbridge, and recommended himself by his great abilities to Henry VIII. who employed him in several negotiations. He then took orders, and was raised to a prebend of York, and to the deanery of St. Paul's, London, and also that of Exeter. He was afterwards employed in an embassy to Rome, to solicit the popedom for Wolsey, and was next sent as ambassador to Venice. In this distant employment he felt all the weight of Wolsey's jealousy and resentment, no directions were sent him for his guidance, and no remittances of money made, and in consequence of this his spirits were so affected that he became delirious. He returned home, but the ill treatment which he had received was not sufficient to open the king's eyes to the cruelties and oppression of his favourite. He resigned his deaneries some time before his death, and expired at Stepney, where he had retired for his health, 1532, aged 50. He was a man universally beloved, and by his meritorious services deserved and enjoyed the friendship of cardinal Pole, sir Thomas More, Erasmus, and other learned men. He wrote Epistles—de Fructu Scientiarum, 4to.—de Lapsu Hebraicorum Interpretum, &c.

PACHECO, John de, marquis de Villena, was brought up with Henry IV. of Castille, and became his favourite. He acquired in consequence so much power that all offices of trust and honour were at his disposal ; but so venal is the attachment of flatterers, that he was bribed by Lewis XI. of France, and on the peace of 1413, he consented to various articles which betrayed the interests of his master, and were prejudicial to the honour of his crown. The injured monarch expostulated with the guilty subject, but Pacheco, full of resentment, revolted against him, and placed the prince Alphonsus on the throne of his brother. Alphonsus, though proclaimed king of Castille, 1465, soon after died, it is said by poison administered by the too powerful favourite, who now was reconciled to his lawful sovereign, and continued in the office of prime minister to the end of life. This artful sycophant died of an abscess in the throat, 1473, and it is reported was sincerely lamented by Henry, who forgot his perfidy in the vigour of his measures for the welfare of the kingdom.

PACHYMERUS, George, a Greek historian, born at Nice. He was patronised by Michael Palaeologus, and his son Andronicus, and obtained honours in church and state. He died 1310. His history of the East, inserted among the Byzantine historians, has been published with a Latin translation at Rome, 1669, folio.

PACIAUDI, Paul Maric, a native of Turin, of the order of Theatins. He was correspondent of the Paris academy of belles lettres, and librarian to the duke of Parma. He was an able and learned antiquarian, and wrote Monumenta Peloponnesiaca, 2 vols. 4to.—Memoirs of the Grand Masters of the order of Jerusalem, in Italian, 3 vols. 4to.—Letters between him and count Caylus, 8vo. He died of an apoplexy, 1785, aged 75.

PACIFICUS, Maximus, born of a noble family at Ascoli, 1400, was an elegant Latin poet. His poems called "Hecatelegium," were printed at Florence, 1489, 4to. and it is remarkable that in them he makes mention of the venereal disease, supposed not to have been known before Columbus sailed to America. The best edition of his works is that of Parma, 1691, 4to. which is free from all licentious passages.

PACIUS, Julius, a native of Vicenza, who travelled over Switzerland, Germany, and Hungary, where he maintained himself by giving lectures on jurisprudence. He was afterwards at Sedan, Montpellier, Aix, &c. and distinguished himself so much that he was offered a professor's chair at Leyden, at Pisa, and Padua. He settled at Padua, and was honoured with the collar of St. Mark, and afterwards went to Valence, where he died 1635, aged 85. He is author of a treatise on Arithmetic, written when only 13 years old ; de Contractibus, fol. 1606 ; de Jure Maris Adriatici, 8vo. 1669 ; in Decretales Libri quinque, 8vo. ; Corpus Juris Civilis, fol. 1580 ; Aristotelis

Organum, 8vo. 1598; an excellent translation of Aristotle's Logic. Pacius was a firm protestant, though it is said that by the representations of his pupil Peiresc he embraced the Catholic tenets a little before his death.

PACORUS, son of Orodes, king of Parthia, is known in Roman history for his defeat of Crassus. He afterwards espoused the cause of Pompey, and was slain in battle by Ventidius B.C. 39.

PACUVIUS, Marcus, a Latin poet, nephew to Ennius. He wrote satires and plays, now lost. He died at Tarentum B.C. 154.

PADARN, a British bishop, to whose honour several of the churches of Wales are dedicated. He is one of the three blessed visiters who preached the Gospel to the astonished inhabitants. His two companions were Dewi and Teilo.

PADERNA, Paul Anthony, a native of Bologna, eminent as a historical and landscape painter. He died 1703, aged 59.

PADUAN, Lewis Leo, surnamed the was a native of Padua, who acquired celebrity as a painter, and as engraver of medals. He died 1615 aged 75. His son Octavian excelled as a portrait painter.

PADUANINO, Francisco, a historical painter of Padua, who died 1617, aged 65. His best piece preserved at Venice, is the Deliverance of two malefactors at the earnest solicitation of a saint.

PADILLA, Mary de, a Spanish lady, who became the favourite of Peter the Cruel, king of Castille. She possessed such influence over him that three days after his marriage with the virtuous and beautiful Blanche, of Bourbon, he abandoned his lawful wife for the company of his guilty mistress. After his divorce from Blanche, and his marriage with Jane de Castro, Peter showed himself an equally capricious lover, and two days after he was again at the feet of the all-powerful Padilla, who died soon after, and was buried with all the magnificence due to a crowned head.

PAEZ, Francis Alvarez, a Portuguese divine, of the order of the Cordeliers. He was patronised by pope John XXII. who made him bishop of Coron, afterwards of Sylves, and sent him as his legate into Portugal. He died at Seville, 8th May, 1532. He is author of a famous treatise de Planetu Ecclesiæ, in which he boldly supports the temporal powers of the see of Rome; a Summary of Theology; Apology of John XXII. fol.

PAGAN, Blaise Francis, count de, a French mathematician, born at Avignon in Provence, 3d March, 1604. He entered into the army, and early distinguished himself in various actions, but at the siege of Montauban he lost his left eye by a musket shot. At the passage of the Alps, and at the siege of Susa, he bravely led on his soldiers to glory, and in the year 1642 he was sent by Lewis XIII. with the rank of field-marshal, to gather fresh laurels in the service of Portugal. Here, however, he had the misfortune to lose his eyesight by a distemper, and with the volume of the world thus closed upon him, he retired to study and meditation. The mathematics and fortification were his favourite pursuits, and on these sciences he wrote some valuable works, consisting of a treatise on Fortification; Geometrical Theorems; Astronomical Tables; Theory of the Planets; Historical Relation of the Amazon River, Svo.; Hoïame Heroique, &c. This great man, beloved by his sovereign, respected by his country, and by all learned and virtuous men, for his genius, his abilities, and his benevolence, died at Paris, 18th Nov. 1665.

PAGAN, Peter, professor of poetry and history at Marburg, died at Wanfrid 1576. He wrote miscellaneous poetry; Praxis Metrica; History of the Horatii and Curiatii, in elegant Latin verse.

PAGANI, Gregorio, a native of Florence, whose pictures were so highly finished as to be regarded equal to those of Michael Angelo. He died 1560, aged 31.

PAGANO, Paul, a painter of Milan, whose picture, representing the Christian attribute of Mercy, in clothing the naked, is preserved at Venice, and much admired. He died 1716, aged 55.

PAGE, William, an English divine, author of Animadversions on John Hale's Tracts of Schism—Genuflexionis ad Nomen Jesu Defensio, Oxon. 1631—Thomas à Kempis de Imitatione Christi, translated into English, &c. He was a native of London, and was in 1619 fellow of All Souls, Oxford. During the civil wars he was exposed to great persecution for his attachment to the royal cause, and he died about 1669.

PAGE, John, governor of Virginia, was born about the year 1743, and was distinguished for talents, purity of morals, and patriotism. He displayed during the war of the revolution an ardent attachment to the cause of the colonies, and was in 1776 one of the most conspicuous members of the convention which formed the constitution of Virginia, and was appointed one of the first council under that constitution. He was also elected one of the first members of congress from that state after the establishment of the federal government. In 1800 he was appointed one of the electors of the president, and in December, 1802, was chosen governor of the state. He died October 11th, 1808.  L.

PAGE, Benjamin, was born in Kensington, New-Hampshire, and was the eldest member of one of the most extensive and respectable families in Maine. He was a physician by profession, a member of the New-Hampshire medical society, and for several years, also, a member of the legislature of that state. He was a patriot of the revolution, and acted many months as surgeon in the American army, during the years 1777-81, and was present at the battles of Bennington and Ticonderoga. He removed to Maine in 1800, and continued in medical practice, to which he was ardently attached, until within the few last years of his life. His manners were courtly, and his mind active and intelligent, and he was greatly esteemed for his excellence as a man, his usefulness as a physician, and his patriotism as a citizen. He died in Hallowell, October 28th, 1824, aged 78, in the firm belief of the Christian religion, and assurance of future happiness.

PAGE, John Odlin, son of the above, was born in Exeter, New-Hampshire, in 1772. In the early part of his life he removed to Maine, and soon became distinguished as one of her most worthy and enterprising citizens. He travelled in Europe for the benefit of his health, and was the bearer of American despatches from Paris to London in 1811, where he died. His remains were interred in St. Michael's church. He was distinguished for his elegance of person, urbanity of manners, decision of character, ardent philanthropy, and love of liberty.

PAGET, William lord, though but the son of a sergeant at mace, was noticed by Henry VIII. and on account of his abilities was patronised and made successively clerk of the signet, of the council, and afterwards went as ambassador to France, and on his return was knighted by the king, in approbation of his conduct. He was soon after made secretary of state, and was one of those who were executors of the monarch's will. His consequence increased; in the next reign he was sent ambassador to Charles V. but his intimacy with Somerset proved injurious to his interests, and he shared his disgrace, and was sent a close prisoner to the tower, and fined 6000*l.* On the accession of Mary he was restored to favour, and continued in the service of the court under Elizabeth. He died 1564, and the queen in gratitude for his public services ordered his remains to be conveyed to London at the national expense, and to be magnificently buried.

PAGI, John Baptist, a native of Genoa, author of a treatise on Painting, in Italian, fol. He was eminent not only as a painter, but as an engraver, and died at Genoa 1629, aged 74.

PAGI, Anthony, a Cordelier, the ablest critic of his time, was born at Rogna in Provence, 1624. He was provincial of his order, and distinguished himself by his writings. His great work is "a Critique on the Annals of Baronius," a most valuable performance, the first volume of which appeared at Paris 1689, and the rest was completed after his death, containing 4 vols. fol. Geneva, 1705. He wrote besides a Latin Dissertation on the Consular Office, and other things, and died at Aix 1699. His character was that of a learned chronologer and historian, candid and moderate in his expressions, and simple in his style.

PAGI, Francis, nephew to the preceding, was born at Lambese in Provence, 1654. He followed his uncle's example, and entered among the Cordeliers, and greatly assisted him by his learning in the completion of his Critique on Baronius, of which he published the three last volumes. He wrote besides in Latin "a History of the Popes," 4 vols. 4to. He died Jan. 21st, 1721. His nephew was also a man of letters, and published a History of Cyrus, the younger, 12mo. 1736—a History of the Revolution in the Low Countries, 1727, 12mo. &c.

PAGNINUS, Sanctes, a Dominican, born at Lucca, 1466. He was well skilled in the knowledge of the learned languages, and particularly Hebrew, Chaldee, and Arabic, and for 25 years he was engaged in examining the Vulgate Bible with the originals, and in consequence of these labours published a new translation of it from the Greek and Hebrew, in which he was liberally patronised by pope Leo X. and his two successors. The work, however, is blamed by father Simon, as being too closely and servilely translated, and in language barbarous, obscure, and full of solecisms. He wrote besides a Hebrew Lexicon, and a Hebrew Grammar, much commended by Buxtorf. He died 1536, aged 70.

PAINE, Thomas, a political writer, was born in 1737, at Thetford, in Norfolk, where he was brought up to the business of a stay-maker. He afterwards became an exciseman at Lewes; but being dismissed for some malpractices, he went to America, where he contributed much to the Revolution by a pamphlet, entitled "Common Sense;" for which he was rewarded with five hundred pounds by the legislature of Pennsylvania. He also obtained a grant of land in the province of New-York. In 1790 he came to London, and excited considerable notice by his "Rights of Man," in answer to Burke. A prosecution, however, being instituted against Paine, he went to France, where he was chosen into the national assembly; but in the time of Robespierre he was thrown into prison, and narrowly escaped the guillotine. During this confinement he wrote his infamous work, called "The Age of Reason," in which he endeavoured to bring religion into contempt. After his liberation he published some political tracts of little moment; but one of them was a scandalous attack upon the character of Washington. In 1802 he went to America, where he ended a debauched life, June 8, 1809.—W. B.

PAINE, Robert Treat, LL.D. one of the signers of the declaration of American independence, was born at Boston, March 11th, 1731. He received his education under the celebrated master Lovell of Boston, and at Harvard college, where he was graduated in 1749. After an interval of several years, during which he visited Europe, he commenced the study of law, and about 1759 settled in the practice at Taunton. Ten years after, he was elected a representative from that town, and continued to be engaged in public life without intermission from that period until his appointment to the office of attorney general of Massachusetts under the new constitution of the state. During the eventful period of the revolution he was a firm and powerful supporter of the rights of his countrymen. In 1774 he was appointed a delegate from Massachusetts to congress. In 1777 he was a member of the convention which formed the constitution of Massachusetts, and one of the committee which prepared the draft of it. He was attorney general until 1790, when he was appointed a judge of the supreme court, and held the office till 1803. The remainder of his life he spent in retirement, and died at Boston, where he had resided many years, May 12th, 1814, aged 83. He possessed an original, inquisitive, and independent mind, and great liveliness of fancy. No man of his time was more celebrated for brilliancy of wit. He was a profound lawyer, well versed in literature, and eminently upright.  L.

PAINE, Robert Treat, a poet, was the son of the preceding, and born at Taunton, Massachusetts, December 9th, 1773. He was graduated at Harvard in 1792 with a high reputation for genius. He was soon after placed in the counting-room of a merchant, but left it for literary occupations, and published several poems and orations, which exhibited uncommon talents and were highly popular. In 1800 he began the practice of law, but failed of success from want of application, and spent the close of his life in poverty. He died November 13th, 1811, aged 38. His works have since been published.  L.

PAINTER, Gamaliel, judge of the county court of Vermont, was born at New-Haven, Connecticut, May 22, 1743. He enjoyed only the advantages of a common education, and was indebted for the influence and offices to which he was advanced to the superior energy of his mind. He removed in 1773 to Middlebury, Vermont, and erected the first house in that town. In 1776 he joined the American army with a captain's commission, and served in the quartermaster's department. He commenced the settlement of the village of Middlebury in 1788, and resided there till his death, May 21st, 1819, aged 76. He filled at different periods the offices of representative, judge, and councillor, and was a member of the convention which formed the first constitution of Vermont, and was one of the most influential men in the state. He was a principal patron of Middlebury college, one of its trustees, and at his death left the institution a bequest of about 10,000 dollars.  L.

PAJON, Claude, a protestant divine, born at Romorantin, 1626. His abilities highly recommended him, at the age of 24 he entered into orders, and soon after was made professor of theology at Saumur, and afterwards Calvinistic minister at Orleans. He was engaged in controversy with Jurieu, on the power of grace, and on the conversion of sinners; and his followers, who were numerous and respectable, assumed the name of Pajonites. He died 1685, aged 59. He wrote a Defence of the Calvinists, 2 vols. 12mo.—Remarks on l'Avertissement Pastoral, &c. works of merit.

PAJOT, Lewis Leo, count of Osembray, was born at Paris 1678. He enjoyed, in consequence of his learning and abilities, the favour of Lewis XIV. and his cabinet, on account of its curiosities in mechanics and natural history, was visited with attention by the Czar Peter, by prince Charles of Lorraine, and other great men. He contributed much to the memoirs of the academy of sciences, of which he was a member, and left his valuable collection to that learned body for the use of the public. He died universally lamented, 1753.

PAKINGTON, lady Dorothy, daughter of lord Coventry, and wife of sir Thomas Pakington of Worcestershire, is supposed by Dr. Hickee to be the author of the Whole Duty of Man, though some ascribe the work to other authors. She was eminently distinguished for her learning, and had among her friends several celebrated divines, such as bishop Fell, Hammond, Sanderson, Hickee, &c. She died 1679, and was buried in Hampton Lovet church, in Worcestershire.

PALEMON, Q. Rhemm, a Roman slave, who, by his application and ingenuity, acquired celebrity as a rhetorician and grammarian in the age of Tiberius.

PALEPHIATUS, a Greek philosopher, author of a book de Incredibilibus. He lived before the Christian era.

PALAFOX, John de, a Spaniard of illustrious birth, born in Arragon 1600. He studied at Salamanca, and was patronised by Philip II. and when he embraced the ecclesiastical profession, he was appointed bishop of Los Angeles, in America, with the title of judge of the administration of the three viceroys of the Indies. In his new office he behaved with great humanity, and though he had to encounter the prejudices and the virulence of the Jesuits, he maintained his character of moderation and of benevolence towards the unfortunate natives, and was rewarded by the king with the bishopric of Osma, 1653. He died 30th Sept. 1659, universally respected. He wrote the history of the Siege of Fontarabia, 4to.—history of the Conquest of China by the Tartars, 8vo.—sermons, homilies, and other religious tracts. His works have been published altogether at Madrid, 1762, in 13 vols. folio.

PALAGE, N. de la Curne, a native of Auxerre, member of the French academy, and that of inscriptions and belles lettres, and author of valuable memoirs of Ancient Chivalry, 3 vols. 12mo.—Memoir on Glaber's Chronicle, inserted in the papers of the academy of inscriptions. He died at Paris 1781, aged 84.

PALAPRAT, John, a French writer, born at Toulouse, 1650. He distinguished himself as a lawyer, and as a poet, and in 1684, was made judge of the consistory. He paid his court to queen Christina at Rome, in 1686, and afterwards resided at Paris. He wrote eight pieces for the stage, and other things, comprised in 5 vols. 12mo. He was employed as a negotiator, and acted with great sagacity, and died at Paris 1721.

PALATI, John, a Venetian historian of the 17th century, whose principal work is monarchia Occidentalis, sive Aquila inter Lillia, et Aquila Saxonica, 2 vols. folio, ornamented with figures of medals, &c.

PALEARIUS, Aonius, an eminent writer, born at Veroli, near Rome. He studied in various parts of Italy, and at last fixed his residence near Sienna where he married, and maintained himself by instructing some pupils in the learned languages. Here he had an unfortunate quarrel with a rival in literature, and afterwards, in consequence of the able defence which he made of a certain nobleman, against the accusation of the monks, he became an object of persecution, and retired to Lucca, and next to Milan. In this place, where he hoped to pass his days in peace, he found himself exposed to fresh persecution, he was again accused by the monks of heresy, and being carried to Rome, was condemned for saying that Luther's followers were to be commended in some degree, and he was accordingly burnt to death, 1566. The best known of his works is his Latin poem on the Immortality of the Soul, 3 vols. Amsterdam, 1696, 8vo.

PALEY, William, an eminent English divine, born at Peterborough, July 1713. He was educated under his father, who after removing from Peterborough, where he was minor canon of the cathedral, became master of Giggleswick school, Yorkshire, and then entered at Christ's college, Cambridge, where he took his bachelor's degree in 1763. He was for three years after assistant at Greenwich school, till he was elected fellow of his college, where he now became an active and popular tutor, and had for his coadjutor Dr. Law, afterwards bishop of Elphin. By the kindness of this friend's father, who was bishop of Carlisle, he obtained a living in Cumberland, and next Appleby in Westmoreland, to which were afterwards added a prebend in Carlisle cathedral, and the living of Dalston. In 1780 he was made chancellor of Carlisle, and in 1785 he proved to the world how well entitled he was to the patronage of the great, by the publication of his Elements of Moral and Political Philosophy, in 4to. a most valuable work, often reprinted, in 2 vols. 8vo. In 1789 he declined the mastership of Jesus college, Cambridge, which the bishop of Ely, sensible of his great merit, wished to confer upon him. He was afterwards presented to a prebend at St. Paul's by the bishop of London, to the sub-deanery of Lincoln, by Dr. Prettyman, and to the valuable living of Bishop Wearmouth, by the bishop of Durham. He published, in 1790, Horæ Paulinæ, or the Truth of the Scripture, History of St. Paul, &c. 8vo.—a View of the Evidence of Christianity, 3 vols. 8vo. 1792, dedicated to the bishop of Ely. Natural Theology, 8vo. 1802, besides some single sermons, &c. His Moral Philosophy is become a popular book, and its chapters are frequently subjects for disputation in the schools of the universities, yet it did not establish its reputation without being exposed to the censures of contemporaries, and remarks upon it have been published by Mr. Gisborne, and Mr. Pearson. The preferment which Dr. Paley held was justly due to his merits, as the friend of virtue, and the eloquent advocate of Christianity, and he must be ranked among the few whose services to literature, to morality, and to religion, are honourably rewarded by the patronage of the great. This truly illustrious divine and accomplished scholar, died at Sunderland, 25th June, 1805, in his 62d year. His father, who was 54 years master of Giggleswick school, had the happiness of seeing the distinction and the honours which his son had deservedly acquired, and he died 29th Sept. 1779, aged 88.

PALFIN, John, an eminent surgeon, born at Ghent, where he acquired great reputation as reader of anatomy and surgery. He died there advanced in life 1730. He wrote Osteology, much esteemed—Anatomy of the Human Body, translated into French by himself, and with additions by his friend Davaux, 1713, 2 vols. 12mo.

PALINGENIUS, Marcellus, an Italian poet of the 16th century, born at Stellada, in Ferrara. His real name was Pierre Angelo Manzoli. He wrote and dedicated to his patron Hercules II. duke of Ferrara, his poem in 12 books, called Zodiacus Vitæ; but he spoke with such freedom of the popish clergy, that not only the book was prohibited, and publicly burnt as heretical, but the body of the author was ordered to be dug up and burnt, which indignity was, however, prevented by the dutchess of Ferrara.

PALISSY, Bernard de, a native of Agen, eminent as a potter, a chymist, and skilful painter on glass. He was patronised by Henry III. who wished him to embrace the Roman catholic religion, which he, as a stern Calvinist, refused to do. He was an able philosopher; he first explained the true theory of springs, and made many valuable discoveries in natural history. He wrote books on subjects of agriculture, fire, earth, salts, &c. collected and published at Paris, 2 vols. 8vo. and again in 4to. 1777, with the notes of Faujas de St. Fond. He died about 1590.

PALLADINI, Arcangela, a native of Pisa, instructed in the art of painting by her father. She acquired great celebrity as a portrait painter, and died 1622, aged 23.

PALLADINO, James, an ecclesiastical writer, called also James of Taramo, because born there. He was successively bishop of Monopoli, Tarentum, Florence, and Spolitto, and papal nuncio in Poland. The best known of his works is a pious romance often printed, and possessing some merit, in the midst of many incongruities, called compendium per-breve, Consolatio Peccatorum nuncupatum et apud nonnullos Belial vocitatum, id est Processus Luciferi contra Jessum, Augsburg, 1572, fol.

PALLADIO, Andrew, a famous Italian architect, born at Vicenza, in Lombardy. He was early instructed in architecture, his favourite study, by George Triffinus, and by visiting Rome he had an opportunity of viewing, and of studying the venerable relics of ancient times, which had been despoiled by barbarian ignorance. He made very beautiful drawings of these precious monuments of departed genius, and published them with commentaries, and afterwards gave to the world his four books of architecture, in 1570, a work translated into French, and also into English, and commented upon by the excellent remarks of Inigo Jones. The most magnificent monument of his architectural genius is the theatre called Degli Olympici at Vicenza. He died 1580, and after his death appeared his work on the antiquities of ancient Rome.

PALLADIUS, Rutilius Taurus Æmilian, a Latin writer, author of a treatise de Re Rusticâ, published among the Leipsic collection, 2 vols. 4to.

PALLADIUS, a Cappadocian, who from a hermit became bishop of Helenopolis in Bithynia, 401. He was the friend of Chrysostom, and wrote the History of Anchorets, printed, 4to. Paris, 1455.

PALLAJUOLO, Anthony and Peter, two Florentine brothers, eminent for their mutual affection, and their reputation as painters. They were among the first who painted successfully in oil. They both died 1498, aged above 70.

PALLAS, a freedman of Claudius. It is said that he caused the death of his master, at the instigation of Agrippina. He was put to death by Nero. Felix, before whom Paul appeared, was brother to this Pallas.

PALLAS, Peter Simon, a naturalist, was born at Berlin in 1741. He studied at Halle and Gottingen, at which last university he wrote a treatise, "De infestis viventibus intra viventia," or inquiry concerning worms in the human body. In 1760 he went to Leyden, where he took his doctor's degree; and the year following visited London, to improve himself in surgery and medicine. After residing in England about a year, he returned to Berlin, from whence he removed to the Hague, where he published his "Elenchus Zoophytorum," and his "Miscellanea Zoologica." In 1767 he went to Petersburg; and the next year accompanied an expedition sent to explore the distant provinces of the Russian empire; which tour took up six years, and the account of it was published by Pallas, in 5 vols. 4to. Soon after this he printed his collections relative to the Monguls. In 1794, Pallas made a journey into the Crimea, of which he published an account, entitled "A Physical and Topographical Picture of Taurida." Soon after this he took up his residence in that country; where the empress Catherine gave him an estate. He died at Berlin, in 1811. His other works on natural history, are numerous and valuable.—W. B.

PALLAVICINI, Anthony, a native of Genoa, descended from a noble family. His abilities, as well as his birth, recommended him to the pope, who employed him in several embassies, and in affairs of importance, and made him bishop of Pampeluna, and a cardinal. He died 1507, aged 66.

Italian, born at Placentia of a noble family. He was early distinguished by his learning, and mental endowments, and assumed the habit of an Augustine friar; but instead of a regular life he devoted himself to the amours of courtezans, and the most libidinous gratifications. Rendered poor by his incontinence, he had recourse to his pen for support, and wrote his "Courier robbed of his Mail," a periodical work, which for a while was read with avidity, but soon, from its satirical nature, attracted the notice of the inquisition. For a while he avoided the dangers of persecution by travelling into Germany; but upon his return to Venice, he again resumed his courier, and in greater violence vented his satire, not only against the secretary of the republic who had been his enemy, but against the pope Urban VIII. and all the Barberini family. In consequence of this he was seized, but he made his escape by means of one of his mistresses, and he might have avoided the impending storm, had not Morfu, a creature of the pope's nuncio, prevailed on him to go to France, in hopes of meeting there encouragement and protection from Richelieu. Pallavicini was caught in the snare, but instead of being conducted by his perfidious friend to Paris, he was brought to Avignon, where his person and papers were seized. After some severe and inhuman treatment he was brought to trial; but though he made an able defence he was condemned to lose his head, which took place at Avignon 1644. Morfu, who was liberally rewarded for his villany, was afterwards murdered by one of Pallavicini's friends. This extraordinary character, who debased the best faculties of the mind by a whimsical fondness for low company, and the most abandoned of prostitutes, wrote some books of merit, which were printed at Venice, 4 vols. 12mo. 1655, the most curious of which is the Celestial Divorce, or separation of Jesus Christ from the Roman church.

PALLAVICINI, Sforza, an eminent cardinal, born at Rome 1607. Though eldest son of a noble family, he preferred the ecclesiastical state, and he entered into the order of Jesuits, among whom he taught philosophy and theology, and by his regular and exemplary life, he gained the esteem and respect of the world. He was honoured with the confidence of Innocent X. and made a cardinal by Alexander VII. He died 1667, aged 60. He wrote an Italian treatise on Style, and on Dialogue—some letters—but his best known work is the History of the Council of Trent, in opposition to that of father Paul, written in a correct style, but considered as partial. The best edition is that of Rome, 2 vols. folio, 1656.

nently known as a bookseller and a printer. He settled at Dijon, where he died 1698, aged 90. He was well skilled in genealogies and in heraldry, and wrote some curious works, le Parlement de Bourgogne, ses Origines, Qualités, Blazon, fol. 1649—Science des Armoiries de Gelliot, avec 6000 Ecussons, Paris, 1660, folio, with plates engraved by himself. He left in MS. 13 vols. in folio, on the families of Burgundy.

PALLISER, Sir Hugh, an English admiral, who is known for his dispute with admiral Keppel in the battle off Ushant, 27th July, 1778, which unfortunately prevented the total defeat of the enemy's fleet. These circumstances, which proved so disagreeable to the nation, produced two courts martial. Keppel was tried at the instance of Sir Hugh, and acquitted, and Sir Hugh, as second in command, was next brought to trial, and censured by his judges. His bravery, however, was never impeached, and he was rewarded by the ministry with the appointment of governor of Greenwich hospital, where he died 1786, aged 65. In the former part of life Sir Hugh had served in the Mediterranean under admiral Matthews, and he was also at the storming of Quebec. He was made post 1746, and afterwards was comptroller of the navy, and in 1773, created a baronet.

PALLUEL, Francis Crete de, a native of Duguy in France, son of the post-master of St. Denis. He was educated at Paris, and as he possessed a strong propensity for agricultural pursuits, he applied his attention to the improvement of this important branch of national prosperity. He was, on the revival of the Paris agricultural society by Malesherbes chosen one of its first members, 1779, and in the revolution he became a member of the national assembly, and directed his labours to the collection of useful papers for the improvement of agricultural knowledge. He was also a justice of peace, on which office he published a dissertation. He died 1799, aged 57. Some of his papers have appeared in the learned memoirs of the Paris academies, and reflect great honour on his abilities. His observations on draining marshes were universally admired.

PALMA, James, the elder, a painter born at Sermaletta, in Italy. He was the pupil of Titian, whose style he adopted, and also the manner of Giorgione, though not with equal success. His pictures, though inferior to those of the great masters, are yet esteemed. He died 1588, aged 40.

PALMA, James, the younger, was nephew to the preceding, and was born at Venice. He studied under Tintoret, and possessed graces and beauties of his own. The expression of his figures, the boldness and delicacy of his characters are much admired, and his draperies display great taste and judgment. He died 1628, aged 84.

PALMER, Samuel, an eminent printer of London, in whose office for some time the celebrated Benjamin Franklin was employed. He wrote a History of Printing, 4to. of some merit, and died 1732.

PALMER, John, son of the door-keeper of Drury-lane Theatre, imbibed from his earliest years a strong partiality for the stage, and despising the meaner occupation of a fruiterer to whom he had bound, he began his theatrical career in a low character at Norwich; he rose to provincial eminence, and there married, and instead of fixing himself in some respectable company, he preferred the uncertain profits of an itinerant player and lecturer on heads. He afterwards acquired distinction as a comic actor at the Hay-market and at Drury-lane; but his erection of the Well-close square theatre ruined his fortunes, as he was, through the opposition of the other theatres, unable to obtain a license from the lord chamberlain. Thus reduced from a comfortable situation to indigence, he again engaged in provincial companies, and died suddenly while performing on the Liverpool stage in the Stranger, 1798, aged 57. The last remarkable words which he uttered when he dropped down were engraved on his tomb, "there is another and a better world!"

PALMIERI, Matthew, a native of Florence, distinguished in the council of his country, where he died 1475, aged 70. He wrote a treatise Della Vita Civile, 8vo. 1529—Citta Divina, a poem in three books, in which he maintained that our souls are those angels which in the revolt of Lucifer against God stood neuter, and that in punishment for this they are sent into the world, where their good or evil conduct is to entitle them hereafter to eternal happiness or misery. This work was condemned as dangerous, and was publicly burnt. He wrote besides a continuation of Prosper's Chronicle to 1449, which was afterwards continued still further to 1483, by Matthias Palmieri of Pisa, in that age, who was the translator of Aristeas's History of the Septuagint version, printed with the Bible, 2 vols. folio, Rome, 1471.

PALONINI, Anthony, a native of Cordova. Though an ecclesiastic, he employed himself sedulously in painting, and many of his pieces, which possess great merit, still adorn the churches of Spain, especially Valencia. He wrote the lives of painters—a work on painting, 2 vols. folio, &c.

PALSGRAVE, John, an English writer, born in London. He studied at Cambridge, and afterwards at Paris, and when Mary of England, sister to Henry VIII. was married to Lewis XII. he was nominated her tutor in the French language.

He afterwards returned to England, became chaplain to the king, and settled at Oxford, where he took the degree of B.D. He was an able French grammarian, though an Englishman, and published very useful rules for the pronunciation of that language. He translated also into English the Latin comedy called Acolastus, by Fullonius. He died after 1540.

PALUDANUS, John, a native of Malines, divinity professor at Louvaine, and minister of St. Peter's church there, died 1630. He was an able divine, and wrote Vindicia Theologicae adversus Verbi Dei Corruptelas, 2 vols. 8vo. 1620—Apologeticus Marianus, 4to. de S. Ignatio Concilio Sacra, 8vo.—Officina Spiritualis Sacris Concionibus adaptata, 4to.

PALUDANUS, Bernard, professor of philosophy at Leyden, travelled over the four quarters of the globe, and wrote valuable notes on Linschot's Voyages Maritimes, folio. He died at Leyden 1634.

PAMELIUS, James, a learned Fleming, born at Bruges, 1536. He became canon of Bruges, and archdeacon of St. Omer's, and was nominated bishop of St. Omer's by Philip II. of Spain; but he died at Mons as he was going to take possession of his see, 1587, aged 51. He wrote Liturgica Latinorum, 2 vols. 4to.—Micrologus de Eccles. Observationibus—Catalogus Commentariorum in Bibliam, 8vo.—Conciliorum Paralipomena—besides editions of Tertullian's and Cyprian's works, and Cassiodorus's treatise de Divinis Nomini-bus, &c.

PAMMACHUS, St. a Roman senator, converted to Christianity. He married Paulina, daughter of St. Paula, the friend of Jerome, and by his conduct and writings he displayed great zeal in favour of Christianity. He founded a hospital at Porto, and died 410.

PAMPHYLUS, a Macedonian under Philip, the father of Alexander. He was an able painter, and established a school at Sicyon. He had Appelles among his disciples.

PAMPHYLUS, St. a priest of Cæsarea, in Palestine, who suffered martyrdom under Maximin, 308. His explication of the Acts of the Apostles was published by Montfaucon.

PANAGIOTI, a Greek of Chios, interpreter to the grand Seigneur. He was a zealous opponent of the patriarch Cyril Lucar, and wrote in modern Greek the orthodox confession of the Catholic and Apostolic eastern church, printed in Holland. He died 1673.

PANARD, Charles Francis, a French poet, born at Couville, near Chartres, 1691. He was drawn from obscurity by Le Grand, the player, and was universally beloved for his probity and sweetness of manners. He died at Paris, of an apoplexy, 1765. His works, consisting of comedies, comic operas, epigrams, songs, anacreontic odes, &c. were published in 4 vols. 12mo. 1763.

PANCIROLLUS, Guy, a famous lawyer, born of an illustrious family at Reggio, 1523. He studied law under his father, and improved himself further at Ferrara, Pavia, Bologna, and Padua, under the best masters; and in consequence of his great celebrity was nominated by the republic of Venice, in 1547, second professor of institutes in the university of Padua. He succeeded to the chair of Roman law, but at last, under pretence of ill treatment, he retired to Turin, 1571, and was there made also professor of the Roman law. He was, however, recalled by his grateful countrymen, and in 1582, he was honourably replaced in his professorial chair at Padua. He died 1599, universally respected. He wrote De Rebus Inventis et Perditis, in Italian, translated by H. Salmuth into Latin—Commentarius in Notitiam Utriusque Imperii, et de Magistratibus, folio—De Magistrat. Municipal. et Corporibus Artificum.—De XIV. Regionibus Romæ, earumque Ædificiis, &c.

PANCKOUKE, Andrew Joseph, a bookseller of Lisle, who died at Paris 1753, aged 53. He was an indefatigable writer; the best known of his works are the Best Studies for Young Ladies, 2 vols. 12mo.—Chronological Epitome of the History of the Counts of Flanders, 8vo.—a Collection of Bon Mots, 2 vols. 12mo.—Dictionary of French Proverbs, 8vo.—Philosophical Manual, 2 vols. 12mo.—Elements of Geography and Astronomy, 12mo.—Essay on Philosophers, 12mo.

PANCKOUKE, Charles Joseph, son of the preceding, was born at Lisle 1736. He followed his father's profession, and as he possessed genius and perseverance, he acquired celebrity in the typographical art at Paris. He wrote Mathematical Memoirs, addressed to the academy of Sciences—Translations from Lucretius, Tasso's Jerusalem, Orlando Furioso, &c. 10 vols. 12mo.—Philosophical Discourse on the Beautiful, 8vo.—another on Pleasure and Grief—Methodical Encyclopedia, &c. He died at Paris 1799.

PANEL, Alexander Xavier, a native of Franche Comté, who embraced the order of the Jesuits, and then passed into Spain, where he became preceptor to the royal family. He wrote a Letter on the Medal of Le Bret, 4to.; Dissertation on Alexander's Medal; de Cistophoris, 4to.; de Colonia; Tarraconæ Nummo, 4to. and other treatises on Coins and Antiquities. He died in Spain, 1777, aged 82.

PANETIUS, a stoic of Rhodes, who settled at Rome, and had among his pupils

Lælius, Scipio, and other illustrious Romans. He exerted his influence at Rome in favour of his countrymen. He flourished about 150.

PANIGAROLA, Francis, a native of Milan, who was made by Sixtus V. bishop of Asti, in Piedmont, and was sent in 1590 with Gactan and Bellarmin into France to support the interests of the league against Henry IV. His eloquence was powerfully exerted in encouraging the Parisians to resist their sovereign, and to submit to every privation, and to all the horrors of famine and pestilence, rather than to yield. On his return to Italy, he was so zealous in reforming the abuses of his clergy and of his diocess, that he was poisoned, as is generally supposed. He died at Asti, 1594, aged 46. His sermons appeared at Rome, 1596, in 4to. but of all his works his II Predicatore, or on the Eloquence of the Pulpit, published at Venice, 1609, in 4to. is the best.

PANIN, Nakita Ivanowitz, count de, a Russian statesman, one of the lieutenant-generals of the armies of the Czar Peter, originally of Lucca, was born 15th Sept. 1718. From being a horse soldier in the guards of the empress Elizabeth, he became by the friendship and patronage of prince Kourakin, gentleman of the imperial chamber, and rose gradually to offices of trust and dignity. In 1747 he was sent as ambassador to Copenhagen, and two years after to Stockholm, and on his return he was appointed governor of the grand duke Paul, and soon after became the prime minister of the great Catherine. During his residence at Stockholm he was so warm an admirer of the constitution, and of the aristocratical senate of the country, that he formed the plan of introducing it into Russia, which, however, he had not the courage to effect. With great powers of mind, and a comprehensive knowledge of the affairs and political connexions of independent states, he was, nevertheless, indolent in business, haughty in his conduct, and in his manners luxurious and intemperate. He died March, 1783; but though long at the head of affairs, so disinterested had been his conduct, that his property was inadequate to pay his debts. His brother distinguished himself as a general against the Prussians and the Turks, and by the taking of Bender. He also established the independence of the Crimea, and crushed the rebellion of Putgatscheff, and died soon after, respected as an able general.

PANINI, Paul, a native of Placentia, eminent as a painter. His pieces in architecture are deservedly admired. He died 1758, aged 67.

PANNARTZ, Arnold, a German, who left Mayence with Ulric-Han, to come and establish a printing-office in Italy, in the beginning of the pontificate of Paul II. They first published Donatus, and then Lactantius, 1465, and Augustin, 1467, and afterwards the Letters of Cicero, &c. issued from their press, which was set up, from the monastery of Sublac, their first residence, in the house of Francis de Maximis, a rich Roman.

PANNONIUS, James or John, a Hungarian bishop, author of some elegant epigrams, elegies, and poems, printed Venice, Svo. 1553, and among the Deliciæ Pœtarum Hungaror. 1619. He died 1472, aged 38.

PANOPION, a Roman, saved from death by the fidelity of his servant, who assumed his dress, and suffered himself to be killed for his master.

PANORMITA, Anthony, a Sicilian, secretary to Alfonso, king of Naples. He possessed great poetical powers, and had such veneration for classical works, that he sold an estate to purchase a copy of Livy. He died 1471.

PANSA, C. Vibius, a Roman consul, killed in battle against Antony.

PANTÆNUS, a stoic of Sicily, at the head of the Alexandrian school in the reign of Commodus. He wrote Commentaries on Scripture, and was an able supporter of Christianity.

PANTIN, William, a physician of Bruges, author of a Commentary on Celsus's treatise De Re Medicâ, fol. &c. He died 1583. His great nephew Peter was born at Thiel, in Flanders, and taught the learned languages with reputation at Louvain, Toledo, &c. and was dean of the church at Brussels, where he died 1611, aged 56. He wrote a treatise De Dignitatibus et Officiis Regni, et Domus Regiæ Gothorum, &c. besides translations from Greek authors, &c.

PANVINIUS. Vid. ONUPHRIUS.

PANZACHIA, Maria Helena, a lady of Bologna, of noble birth, born 1668. She possessed great abilities as a painter, and her pieces on subjects of history, and in landscapes, are much and deservedly admired.

PAOLI, Sebastian, an ecclesiastic, born at Lucca. He was well skilled in antiquarian history, and contributed to the Italian journals various dissertations, full of learning and deep research, on subjects of physic, history, sacred criticism, and antiquity. He wrote besides, the lives of several illustrious Italians, &c. He died of a dropsy, 1751, aged 67.

PAOLI, Hyacinth, a native of Corsica, who acquired great weight among his countrymen, and was one of their chief magistrates, 1735. In consequence of the civil dissensions which distracted his country, and the oppression of the Genoese, he left Corsica and retired to Naples, where he died. His son Pascal was distinguished by his zeal in the cause of Corsican freedom, but all his struggles against the Genoese and the French were unavailing, and when the island became the conquest of France, he retired in 1769 to England, where he gained an honourable asylum, and where he died in privacy.

PAOLI, Pascal de, was born in the island of Corsica, in 1726. His father, Hyacinth Paoli, after labouring in vain to establish the freedom of his country, went to Naples, where Pascal was educated in the college of Jesuits. In his twenty-ninth year he was chosen generalissimo of Corsica, where he exerted himself in promoting such objects as were best calculated to secure the independence of the republic. The Genoese, however, having made a transfer of the island to France, that power sent such an overwhelming force into it as compelled Paoli to seek an asylum in England, where he obtained a pension. On the breaking out of the French revolution, he returned to Corsica, and prevailed upon his countrymen to submit to the English government; after which he returned to London, and died in 1807.—W. B.

PAOLUCCIO, Paul Anafeste, a noble Venetian, elected for his services first doge of Venice, 697. He died 717. Before his time the government had been administered by annual tribunes for 200 years.

PAPERBROCH, Daniel, a Jesuit of Antwerp, born 1628. He was a respectable professor of belles lettres and philosophy, and assisted Bollandus and Henschenius in their collection of the acts of the saints. In these labours he proceeded with great caution and impartiality, and rejected the improbable legends of former ages, but in consequence of this he drew upon himself the violent persecution of the Carmelites, because he had called Berthold their first general, and refused to ascribe the foundation of their order to the prophet Elijah. Notwithstanding this persecution, which dragged him as a criminal before the pope, and caused the Spanish inquisition to condemn 14 of the volumes of the acts of the saints, in which he was concerned, he continued his literary labours, and died 1714, aged 86, universally respected for his learning and his virtues. He wrote also Propylæum ad Acta Sanct. Maii, fol. which gives an account of the popes.

PAPINUTIUS, bishop of Thebes, treated with great severity under the persecutions of Galerius and Maximinus. He opposed the celibacy of the clergy, and warmly supported the cause of Athanasius at the council of Tyre.

PAPIAS, a bishop of Hierapolis, author of the doctrine of the millennium, or the reign of Christ on earth 1000 years before the resurrection. Some suppose him to be the disciple of St. John the Evangelist. A grammarian of that name lived 1053, and wrote Vocabularium Latinum, Milan, 1476, fol.

PAPILLON, Thomas, a native of Dijon, celebrated for his knowledge of jurisprudence, and his popularity as a pleader. He was advocate in the parliament of Paris, and died at Paris, 1596, aged 82. He wrote Libellus de Jure Accrescendi—De Directis Hæredum Substitutionibus, 8vo.—Commentarii in quatuor priores Titulos Libri Primi Digestorum, 12mo. &c.

PAPIN, Isaac, a French divine, born at Blois, 1657. He studied divinity at Geneva, and also at Saumur, under his uncle Pajon, whose opinion he espoused and defended, concerning the doctrine of efficacious grace, in opposition to the reformed church, and also to Jurieu. This measure proved offensive to the protestants, and Papin, to avoid contempt and persecution, came over to England, 1686, and was ordained according to the forms of the Anglican church. He afterwards left England, and went to Hamburgh, where the resentment of Jurieu followed him, and from thence he was invited to Dantzic, to fill a chair among the French refugees. His refusal, however, to subscribe to the decrees of the Walloon churches in Holland, brought on him fresh troubles, and at last he, in 1690, embraced the Roman catholic tenets, for which he was accused, not only of inconsistency, but of all disregard for religion. He died at Paris, 19th June, 1709. His theological works were published by his relation Pajon, of the oratory, 1723, in 3 vols. 12mo. His cousin Isaac was a physician, and the author of several medical works; and his uncle Nicholas was also an eminent physician, whose treatises on the Saltness of the Sea, its Flux and Reflux, and on the Origin of Rivers and Fountains, &c. were much admired.

PAPINIAN, a learned lawyer of the third century. He was put to death by Caracalla, for refusing to vindicate that tyrant's murder of his brother Geta, 212. His works on jurisprudence are much esteemed.

PAPIRIUS, Cursor, a Roman dictator, who triumphed over the Samnites, &c.

PAPIRIUS PRETEXTATUS, a Roman youth, who was admitted into the senate, and refused to reveal to his mother the secrets of that august assembly.

PAPON, John Peter, a native of Pujet, near Nice, who was a priest of the oratory, and died at Paris in the winter of 1803, aged 65. He was a man of amiable manners, and regardless of the calls of ambition, concealed himself during the storms of the revolution. He wrote an Ode on Death—the Art of the Poet and Orator—and an Essay on Education, five times edited—Funeral Oration on Charles Emanuel, king of Sardinia, 8vo.—History of Provence, 4 vols. 4to.—Travels in Provence, 2 volumes, 12mo.—History of the French Government, from the Assembly of the Notables, 22d Feb. 1787, to the end of 1788, 8vo.—Memorable epoch of the Plague, &c.

PAPPUS, a philosopher of Alexandria in the fourth century, whose works consist of Commentaries on Ptolemy's Almagest—a Description of the Rivers of Libya—Treatise on Military Engines, &c.

PARABOSCO, Girolamo, a comic writer, born at Placentia, in the 16th century. He was author of six comedies, which possess merit and originality, and he also wrote some romances in the style of Boccaccio and Bandelli, besides letters, &c. All these were published at Venice, 1558.

PARACELSUS, Aureolus Philippus Theophrastus Bombast de Hohenheim, a celebrated physician, born at Einsidlen, a village near Zurich, 1493. His father, the natural son of a master of the Teutonic order, himself distinguished as a practitioner in medicine, educated him with great attention, and permitted him to pursue his inclination towards alchymical studies. The young student, eager after fame, travelled through the various countries of Europe in pursuit of knowledge, and carefully treasured up the medical information respecting cures, which he could collect from physicians, barbers, old women, chymists, and conjurers. On his return to Switzerland he was honourably received by the magistrates of Basil, who in 1527 made him professor of medicine. He soon became eminent here by the number, respectability, and attachment of his pupils; and by the many extraordinary cures in the leprosy, itch, dropsy, and particularly the venereal disease, which he performed by the prudent use of mercury and of opium, whose powers, till then, were little known, or unskillfully applied. In the midst of his medical celebrity he was called to the bed of a sick canon of Liechtenfels, who had been given over by his physicians, and so successful were his applications, that by the taking of three pills of laudanum, he recovered; but when he demanded the 100 crowns which the patient had promised, he was rejected with contempt. The offended physician brought his cause before a court of judicature; but the judge, regarding more the medicine given than the skill of the practitioner, awarded him but a small gratuity, and Paracelsus, indignant at the treatment, left the court and the country with the highest disdain. He went to Alsatia, where he led a wandering, unsettled life, accompanied by his friend and follower, Oporinus; but while he pretended to have discovered the philosopher's stone, and to have invented an elixir which would prolong his days to the age of Methusalem, he found himself poor, and he fell a sacrifice to a fever at a public inn at Saltsburg. He died Sept. 1541, aged 43, and was buried in St. Sebastian's hospital, Saltsburg. The works of Paracelsus have been frequently edited. The best edition is that of Geneva, 1658, 3 vols. folio. The celebrity of Paracelsus is to be attributed as much to the ignorance and superstition of his contemporaries, as to the successful cures which he performed by the proper use of his empirical art. He pretended that there was a regular agreement between the planets and the various parts of the human body, and considered the seven planets as equally corresponding with the seven metals or minerals. With such and similar chimerical opinions, the effect of a heated and disordered imagination, which depended more upon revelations from departed or evil spirits, than the results of sound and clear experiment, he thus raised himself to consequence, and obtained a reputation for a while regarded as the fruit of superior intelligence, and of a divine agency.

PARADIN, William, a laborious French historian, dean of Beaujeu, who died about 1582, aged 81. He published Aristeas' History of the Septuagint Pentateuch, 4to.; Latin History of his own Times, 1552, Annals of Burgundy, in French, folio; De Moribus Galliarum Historia; Memoirs of Lyons; De Rebus in Belgio; Historia Ecclesiarum Gallicanarum; Chronicle of Savoy, &c.

PARAMO, Lewis de, a Spanish inquisitor, who published "The Holy Office," at Madrid, in fol. 1598. This work is an account of the inquisition, and is curious and valuable.

PARCELLES, John, a native of Leyden, eminent as a painter, born 1579. His sea pieces, his storms and shipwrecks possessed singular merit. His son Julius was also an artist of eminence, and in the same walk of science.

PARCIEUX, Anthony de, a French mathematician, born at Clotet de Cessoux, in the diocese of Uzès, 1703. He studied at Lyons and Paris, and acquired reputation by his valuable and intelligent publications, as well as by his lectures. He was member of the learned societies of Berlin, Sweden, &c. and died universally regretted, 2d Sept. 1768. His works are a Treatise of Trigonometry, 4to.; Essays on the Probability of the Duration of Human Life, 4to.; Memoirs on the Practicability of bringing to Paris the Water of the Yvette, 4to. His nephew, of the same name, possessed equal abilities. He was brought up at the college of Navarre, at Paris, and at the age of 24 became a public lecturer. He was in 1779, professor of experimental philosophy in the military college of Brienne, and afterwards succeeded to a chair at the Lyceum at Paris. He was author of Orozio, a tragedy, written when young, and an elementary book on geometrical and astronomical calculations, &c. He died at Paris, 1798.

PARDIES, Ignatius Gaston, a French Jesuit, born at Paris, 1636. He for some years devoted his time to polite literature, and afterwards applied himself to the more laborious studies of mathematics and philosophy, in which he became a distinguished professor. He died at Paris, at the early age of 37, in consequence of a contagious distemper. He wrote Horologium Thaumaticum Duplex, 4to.; Dissertatio de Motu et Natura Cometarum, 8vo.; Discourse on Local Motion, 12mo.; Elements of Geometry, 12mo.; the Science of Moving Bodies, &c.

PARE, Ambrose, an eminent surgeon, born at Laval. Though a protestant he was surgeon to Henry II. of France, and to his three successors; and his services were so highly valued, that at the massacre of St. Bartholomew, Charles IX. saved his life by shutting him up in his own closet. He made some useful discoveries in anatomy, and died much respected, Dec. 1590, at an advanced age. His works were translated into Latin by Guillemeau, of which the best edition is that of Paris, 1614, folio.

PARE, David, a protestant divine, born 1548, at Francolstein, in Silesia. By the jealous treatment of his stepmother, his studies were checked, and he was placed with an apothecary, and afterwards with a shoemaker; but his father at last recovered to a sense of his duty, and permitted him again to cultivate literature. By the advice of his master Schilling he exchanged his German name of Wangler for the Greek word Pareus, which was equally derived from the substantive cheek; and he recommended himself so much by his abilities, that he was patronised by the elector palatine, and made theological professor at Heidelberg. The best part of his life was engaged in controversy, in which he displayed learning, spirit, and moderation. He died June, 1622, in his Paresium, a house which he had in the suburbs of Heidelberg. Besides some tracts against the pope, and Bellarmine, he published a commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, which, when translated into English, was, for its anti-monarchical expressions, condemned by the university of Oxford, and burnt publicly by order of James I. His exegetical works were published, 3 vols. folio, Frankfort, 1617.

PARE, Philip, son to the above, was a celebrated grammarian, born at Hambach, 24th May, 1576. He was early eminent for his abilities, and was received in various universities of Germany with respect. He was rector of the college of Neustadt, and afterwards of Hanau, and died 1650. Besides publishing his father's works, and de-sending them against David Owen, he wrote Lexicon Criticum, Svo.; Lexicon Plantinum, or a Vocabulary of Plautus's Comedies; Galligraphia Romana, Svo.; Analecta Plautina; a valuable edition of Plautus; Electa Symmachiana, &c.

PARE, Daniel, son of Philip, was equally known as an able classical scholar. He was unfortunately killed by some highwaymen, in his father's lifetime. He published the Hero and Leander of Musæus, with notes; Mellificium Atticum, 4to.; Medulla Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ; Lexicon on Lucretius, &c.

PARAJA, Juan de, a native of the West Indies, originally the slave of Diego Velasquez, the painter. With strong natural genius for painting, he copied by stealth the finished pieces of his master, and he acquired such skill, that he ventured to show one of his performances to Philip IV. of Spain, who often visited the house of Velasquez. The monarch was pleased with the abilities of the slave, and obtained his liberty; but the faithful Pareja would not abandon the service of his master, to whom he owed his own celebrity, and from whom he had received every mark of kindness and protection. He died 1670, aged 60. His pieces are highly finished, and deservedly admired.

PARENIN, Dominic, a Jesuit of Lyons, who went in 1698 as missionary to China. He was kindly treated by the emperor Cam-Hi, for whom he translated into Chinese, some of the most interesting articles on geometry, anatomy, astronomy, &c. from the memoirs of the French academy. His interference was honourably exerted in producing a reconciliation between the courts of Moscow and Pekin. He published the Chart of the Chinese Empire, and wrote besides, several curious letters on the Chinese, which appeared in 1759, with the letters of Mairan. He died at Pekin, 27th Sept. 1741, in a good old age, and the emperor, in respect for his great learning and his many virtues, ordered his funeral expenses to be defrayed by the public, and his remains to be honourably attended to the grave by the noblest of the Chinese mandarins.

PARENT, Anthony, a French mathematician, born at Paris, 1666. His propensity to mathematical studies was so great, that even at the age of 13, he filled the margins of his books with notes on the subject. His friends indeed wished him to pursue the law; but though he went through a course in that faculty, he returned to his favourite studies in the college of Dormans, and soon after gave lectures on mathematics and fortification. He was made member of the academy of sciences, to whose memoirs he communicated some valuable papers, and was cut off by the smallpox, 1716, aged 50. His works were Mathematical and Philosophical Researches, 3 vols. 12mo.; Theoretical and Practical Arithmetical, 8vo.; Elements of Mechanics and Natural Philosophy, 12mo. &c.

PARFAIT, Francis, the historian of the French drama, was born of an ancient family at Paris, 1698, and died 1753, much respected for his good nature, innocent conviviality, and original fund of anecdotes. He wrote General History of the French Theatre, 15 vols. 12mo.; History of the Ancient Italian Theatre, 2 vols.; Theatrical Dictionary, 7 vols. 12mo.; Dramatic Pieces, never represented, &c.

PARIS, Matthew, an English historian, who was a Benedictine of the order of Clugny, in the monastery of St. Alban's, in the 13th century. He was a universal scholar, and confessedly possessed in that dark age, great and astonishing erudition. His abilities, and his well-known integrity were usefully employed in visiting and reforming the monasteries, and in re-establishing the ancient unsullied discipline of the church, even against the influence and power of the pope. His great work was "Historia Major," in two parts, from the creation of the world to William the Conqueror, and from the Conqueror to the year 1250, which he afterwards continued to 1259. The work was afterwards brought down to 1273, by Rishanger, a monk of the same monastery. This valuable work was first published by archbishop Parker, London, 1571, folio, and by Dr. W. Watts, 1640, 2 vols. folio.

PARIS, Francis, a native of Chantillon, near Paris. From poverty and servitude in the house of Varet, grand vicar of Sens, he rose to distinction, and by the friendship of his master, he was admitted into orders, and procured the benefice of St. Lambert. He wrote the lives of the saints, and other works, and died at Paris, 1718.

PARIS, Francis, an abbé at Paris, of the order of the Jansenists. He was the son of a counsellor of parliament, but he renounced the honours and emoluments which, by means of his family, he might have obtained; and after bestowing all his property on his brother, and rejecting the preferment offered by cardinal Noailles, he devoted himself to the austerities of an ecclesiastical life. He died May 1st, 1727, at the early age of 37, and was buried in the churelyard of St. Medard, where his brother erected a monument to his honour. Those who had admired his sanctity visited his tomb in reverence, and at last pretended that their diseases were cured by the touch of his holy monument. The report no sooner spread, than thousands flocked to the hallowed spot, through superstition or curiosity, till the government, apprehensive of the enthusiastic madness of the people, ordered the churchyard to be shut; and the miracles of Paris ceased. He wrote Annotations on the Epistles to the Romans, Galatians, and Hebrews.

PARISEAU, N. a native of Paris, distinguished as a dramatic writer. The seven plays which he produced were received with great approbation by the public, but his popularity was unable to save him from the horrors of the revolution, as he was guillotined among thousands of other victims, 1794.

PARKER, Matthew, the second protestant archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Norwich, 1504, and educated at Benet college, or Corpus Christi, Cambridge, where he became fellow. He was not only eminent as a scholar well versed in antiquity, but as a preacher, and he was made chaplain to queen Anne Boleyn, and to Henry VIII. and Edward VI. He was chosen master of Corpus college by the recommendation of Henry VIII. and under Edward VI. he was elected dean of Lincoln; but under Mary he was stripped of all his ecclesiastical honours, on pretence that he was married. On the accession of Elizabeth, over whose education he had presided, he was recalled from privacy, and made archbishop of Canterbury. His consecration took place in Lambeth chapel, though the malevolence of the Romanists spread the report that this consecration took place at the Nag's head, Cheapside, a wicked falsehood, warmly refuted by some able writers. In his new character he behaved with great spirit and firmness, and zealously promoted the cause of the reformation not only in his own diocese, but over the whole kingdom. This venerable character died May 17th, 1575, aged 72. He published an edition of Matthew Paris, folio—an historical work on the Antiquity of the English church, besides other works, and he also improved the translation called the Bishop's Bible.

PARKER, Samuel, an English prelate, born at Northampton, Sept. 1640. His father was a practitioner of the law, and by his servility to the parliament and to Cromwell, he obtained a place in the high court of justice, and was made one of the barons of the exchequer, and sergeant at law at the restoration. The son was educated among the puritans, and in 1659 was admitted at Wadham college, Oxford, and became known in the university as a strict and regular student, more given to fasting and prayer, than to the amusements of the age. Soon after, however, interest or conviction induced him to renounce his favourite opinions; he became a zealous anti-puritan, was patronised by archbishop Sheldon, and continued a servile and temporising follower of the court. Under James II. his hypocrisy was rewarded: he was made bishop of Oxford, privy counsellor, and by royal mandamus, appointed president of Magdalen college in the university, against the statutes of the society. Thus elevated in dignity, he sacrificed his religion to his interests, and became contemptible to his clergy. Though thus devoted to the papists, in compliance with the times, it is said that he wrote a letter to James II. to persuade him to return to the protestant faith. He died at Magdalen college, unlamented, 20th March, 1687. He wrote various things, respectable in themselves, in favour of the papists, beside a history of his own times, which has appeared in Latin and English. His descendants have continued to reside in Oxford.

PARKER, George, earl of Macclesfield, son of Parker the first earl and lord chancellor of England, is known for his knowledge of mathematics, which he evinced in preparing the bill by which the style, in 1752, was to be altered according to the Gregorian calendar. The speech which he spoke on the occasion was published, and shows him in a very respectable light. He was at one time president of the Royal Society, and died 1766.

PARKER, Richard, a native of Exeter, who served in the navy as midshipman, but was dismissed from the service for ill conduct. He was afterwards as a common sailor on board of the fleet, and with all the mean arts which dissatisfaction could suggest, he obtained universal influence over the sailors during the unfortunate rebellion which distracted and dishonoured the fleet at the Nore, in 1797. The address, ready elocution, and above all, the deep dissimulation which he possessed, marked him for a desperate leader; but after he had for some days exercised the sovereign power over his associates in the character of admiral of the fleet, he was delivered up by his penitent associates. When tried by a court martial, he answered to his accusation with great firmness, and when condemned, implored mercy on his accomplices. He was hanged on board the Sandwich, the scene of his short glory, 30th June, 1797.

PARKHURST, John, an able divine, born in London, and educated at Clarehall, Cambridge, where he was elected fellow in 1751. He devoted himself much to classical literature, especially Greek and Hebrew, and published an excellent Greek and English Lexicon, 4to. and also a Hebrew and English Lexicon, 4to. reprinted in 8vo. These works display great learning and deep critical knowledge. He published also a pamphlet against J. Wesley—an Answer to Dr. Priestley on the pre-existence of Christ, &c. and he ably defended, with Bishop Horne and other celebrated characters of those times, the popular opinions of Hutchinson. He settled at Epsom, in Surrey, and died universally respected, 1797.

PARKINSON, John, an eminent botanist, born 1567. He was bred an apothecary in London, and obtained such reputation in his profession, and such botanical knowledge, that he was appointed botanist to Charles I. He published Paradisus in Sole, Paradisus Terrestris, a valuable book, in which he described nearly 1000 plants, and was thus the first who gave figures of the subjects of the flower garden. By the words Paradisus in Sole, he quaintly Latinized his own name, Park-in-sun. He published besides, Theatrum Botanicum, in which he describes above 3800 plants, and in this and in his other work he shows himself, according to Dr. Pulteney, more of an original author than Gerard or Johnson. He died about 1645.

PARMENIDES, a philosopher of Elis, disciple to Xenophanes, B. C. 436. He maintained the rotundity of the earth, &c.

PARMENIO, one of Alexander's generals. His attachment was cruelly rewarded by the conqueror, who ordered him and his son to be put to death.

PARMEGIANO. Vid. MAZZUOLI.

PARMENTIER, James, a Frenchman, eminent as an historical and portrait painter. He came to England, and settled in Yorkshire, where his abilities were exerted and liberally patronised. The altar piece of St. Peter's church by him is much admired. He died 1730, aged 72.

PARMENTIER, Jean, or Jehan, a native of Dieppe, celebrated as a merchant and a navigator. He was the first who fitted out vessels to the Brazils, and also the first Frenchman who discovered the Indies as far as the Island of Sumatra, where he died 1530, aged 36. His knowledge of astronomy and of cosmography was very great, and he constructed maps with much skill.

PARNELL, Thomas, an eminent poet, the friend of Pope, was born in Dublin, 1679. He was educated at Dublin university, where he took his degree of M. A. 1700, and was ordained. He came to England in 1706, where his fame had preceded him, and he was introduced among the Scriblerus club, with Gay, Pope, Arbuthnot, Swift, and Jervas. He obtained a prebend in Ireland, and the vicarage of Finglass by the recommendation of his friend Swift, from archbishop King, and might have risen to higher dignities had not the death of his wife rendered the latter part of his life melancholy. He fled to society for relief, but acquired, instead of consolation, habits of intemperance, which proved fatal. He died at Chester, on his way to Ireland, July, 1717, in his 39th year, and was buried in Trinity church there.

His poetical pieces were selected by Pope, and published, 1721, 8vo. to which a volume was added at Dublin, 1758. As a man, his character was benevolent, mild, and amiable; as a poet, he possessed not the higher powers of the muse, but elegance, delicacy, and grace, every where abound. The moral tendency of his poems besides, cannot be sufficiently admired; and if he had written only his Hermit, Parnell would have ranked among the most pious and useful poets in the English language. He contributed also to the Spectator, Guardian, &c. and the Life of Homer, prefixed to Pope's version, was written by him. He had by his wife, two daughters, who died before him, and a daughter who survived him. His estates in Ireland were inherited by his nephew sir John.

PARODI, Dominico, a painter of Genoa. He was also eminent as a statuary. His portraits possess merit, and his altar pieces are much admired. He died 1740.

PARR, Catherine, sixth queen to Henry VIII. was daughter of sir Thomas Parr, and widow of lord Latimer. She was carefully educated in polite literature, in the fashion of those days, and was well skilled in divinity, upon which she frequently conversed with the king. She laboured much for the establishment of the reformation, and her interference proved at one time so disagreeable to the capricious monarch, that he permitted Gardiner, and her other catholic enemies, to draw articles of impeachment against her, but her prudence restored her to the confidence and affection of the king. After Henry's death she married sir Thomas Seymour, lord admiral of England, who treated her with great harshness, so that she died the next year in child-bed, not without suspicion of poison, 1548. She published her Lamentations of a Sinner—Prayers and Meditations, &c.

PARR, Thomas, a peasant of Shropshire, who lived to the great age of 152 years and nine months. It is remarkable that he performed penance in his parish church at the age of 100, for a bastard child, and at the age of 120 he married a second wife, by whom he had a child. He was, in 1635, brought to London, and introduced by lord Arundel to Charles I. but the change of situation, and his altered mode of life, and particularly drinking wine, soon proved fatal to a constitution hitherto supported by more temperate and abstemious habits, and he died the same year.

PARRHASIUS, a celebrated painter of Athens, the rival of Zeuxis, B. C. 420. From his great success in his art, he was crowned king of painters.

PARRHASIUS, James, an Italian grammarian, born at Cosenza, near Naples, 1740. According to the affectation of the times.

he exchanged the name of Parasio for the more learned word Parrhasius, and taught belles lettres and rhetoric at Milan, where he was much admired for his graceful delivery. On a charge of improper converse with his pupils, he retired to Vicenza, and afterwards to Rome, where he was patronised by Leo X. His great application, however, soon rendered him incapable of acting as professor, and upon his return home he fell into a fever, which proved fatal. He wrote some Fragments of Antiquity—Commentaries on Horace's Art of Poetry—Ovid's Ibis—Claudian, &c.

PARROCEL, Joseph, a native of Brignoles in Provence, eminent as a painter and engraver. He studied at first under one of his brothers, and afterwards under Bourignon, and deserved to be admitted member of the French academy of painting. His portraits, and also his historical pieces, and his battles, were executed with great taste and effect. He died 1704, aged 56. His son Charles was also an eminent artist, and member of the academy, and died 1752, aged 53. His conquests of Lewis XV. possess merit. Peter, the nephew and pupil of Joseph, was also distinguished as a painter of merit, and died at Avignon, 1739, aged 74.

PARRY, Richard, rector of Wichampton, Dorsetshire, and preacher at Market Harborough, Leicestershire, was a student of Christ-church, Oxford, where he took the degree of M. A. 1747, and that of D. D. 1757. He died at his cure, Leicestershire, very poor, 9th April, 1780. He wrote some sermons, besides divinity tracts—a Dissertation on Daniel's Seventy Weeks—Remarks on Dr. Kennicott, &c.

PARRY, Richard, an able divine, educated at Oxford, and made master of Ruthyn school, Denbighshire, after which he was raised to the see of St. Asaph, 1604. He revised the first edition of the Welch Bible, which was published 1620.

PARSONS, Robert, or PERSONS, an English Jesuit, son of a blacksmith of Netherstoway, near Bridgewater, was born 1546, and educated at Baliol college, Oxford, at the expense of the vicar of his parish. He soon distinguished himself as an able disputant, and became fellow and tutor of his college; but being accused by his society of incontinence, and of embezzling the college money, he left the university, and retired to Antwerp, then to Louvain and Padua, and afterwards to Rome, where he renounced the protestant faith, and entered among the Jesuits. Here he acquired such reputation, that the pope permitted him to establish an English college at Rome, for the instruction of missionaries to attempt the conversion of the English nation to the catholic religion. He came himself in disguise to London, and in the character of preacher, he strongly and efficaciously recommended the Romish faith to his auditors, and prevailed upon the papists never to frequent or join in the service of the protestant church. This violent attack against the established religion of England, and the doctrine that Elizabeth might safely be deposed, were too daring to be long concealed from the penetrating knowledge of Burleigh, but Parsons escaped his pursuers, though some of his associates were seized. On the preparations of Philip to invade England, the good father was laboriously active in stirring up not only foreigners, but natives abroad against their country; and when the armada was destroyed he endeavoured by means of lord Derby, to excite a rebellion in the kingdom. This turbulent, insidious, and intriguing Jesuit, who proved so virulent an enemy to his country, died on the 18th April, 1610, and was buried with all the honours due to a cardinal, a dignity to which he aspired, but which he did not obtain. His writings were numerous, amounting to 33 tracts, chiefly on divinity and controversial subjects, and in favour and support of his religion and politics.

PARSONS, James, an eminent physician, born at Barnstaple, Devon, March, 1705. His father, the youngest of nine sons, was soon after his birth, appointed barrack-master at Bolton in Ireland, and removing with his family into that kingdom, his son received his education at Dublin college. He studied medicine with great assiduity, and after improving himself in the celebrated schools of Paris, he took his degrees at the university of Rheims, and returned to London, 1736. He became physician to the Saint Giles infirmary, and was made member of the Royal Society in 1740, licentiate to the college of physicians, 1751, and he acquired deserved reputation, especially in the obstetrical art. He was the intimate friend of Dr. Douglas, Sir Hans Sloane, Mead, and other celebrated men, and the learned correspondent of Buffon, and other great literary characters on the continent. He died in London, 4th April, 1770, and was buried at Hendon, 17 days after, as he had required that his remains should not be entombed before a visible alteration took place in his corpse. He had by his wife, Elizabeth Reynolds, two sons and a daughter, who died young. He was a man of great and extensive erudition, as Dr. Maty, his successor in the office of secretary to the Royal Society, has, in the language of truth and friendship observed; and he has obliged the world with various publications, the best known of which is his "Remains of Japhet, or Historical Inquiry into the Affinity and Origin of European Languages." report, Massachusetts, and distinguished for his talents, piety, and usefulness, was graduated at Yale college, in 1729; and was soon after settled in the ministry at Lyme, Connecticut, where he continued several years. He removed about the year 1746 to Newburyport, where he laboured in the presbyterian church with great reputation and success till his death in 1776. He was esteemed for his acquaintance with the classics, for superior theological knowledge, and unusual skill as a reasoner. ¶ L.

PARSONS, Samuel H., a general in the army of the American revolution, was the son of the reverend Jonathan Parsons of Newburyport, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1756. He soon after established himself as a lawyer in New-London county, Connecticut, and rose to distinction in the profession. At the commencement of the revolution he entered the army as lieutenant-colonel, and during the progress of the war, through the whole of which he served with reputation, was advanced to the rank of major-general. On the arrival of peace he resumed his profession. He was not long after appointed one of the commissioners to form a treaty with the Indians, northwest of the Ohio; and on the establishment of a territorial government over that district, was appointed its first judge. He removed to Marietta, and entered on the office in 1778. He was drowned in the great Beaver Rivulet, near Pittsburgh, Nov. 17th, 1789. ¶ L.

PARSONS, Theophilus, LL.D. chief justice of the supreme court of Massachusetts, was born at Byfield, in that state, February 24th, 1750, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1769, with a high reputation for talents and knowledge. After qualifying himself for the bar, he settled at Falmouth, now Portland, Maine, and after the destruction of that place by the British in 1776, removed to Newburyport, Massachusetts, where he soon rose to the highest eminence in the profession. In 1777 he was one of the delegates appointed in Essex county to consider the constitution formed by the legislature, and drew up the famous report on it, called the Essex Result, and in 1780 was a member of the convention which formed a new constitution for the state, and was one of the most able in that body. He was also one of the convention in 1780 which accepted the constitution of the United States, and employed his influence to procure its adoption. In 1800 he removed to Boston, where among many distinguished lawyers, he held the first rank in talents, learning, and extent of business. In 1806 he was appointed chief justice of the state, and continued in that station till his death in October, 1813. He was justly considered one of the greatest men who had adorned the American nation. His mind was of the first order. His memory retained whatever came within his observation; his imagination was prolific; his wit keen, and his understanding seldom equalled in strength, rapidity of perception, or facility in classifying its knowledge. He was a powerful speaker, unrivalled in the knowledge of the law, surpassed by few in acquaintance with the sciences and literature, and was equally distinguished for integrity in public and private life. ¶ L.

PARTHENAY, John de, lord of Soubise, was born 1512. While commanding the French troops in Italy, he imbibed the principles of the protestants, which he afterwards maintained with much firmness and constancy. He was made governor of Lyons, 1562, by the prince of Condé, the head of the Huguenots, and he bravely defended it when besieged by the duke de Nevres. He died 1566, aged 54.

PARTHENAY, Catherine, daughter and heiress of the preceding, is eminent for her wit, her beauty, and her writings. In 1568, at the age of 14, she married du Quellence, baron du Pont, a man distinguished in the wars of those times, but accused of impotency by the malice of his mother-in-law. While the suit was pending, the husband was slaughtered among those who fell in the Bartholomew massacre; and his widow, who paid great respect to his memory, took for her second husband, 1575, Renatus, viscount Rohan, who died 1586, leaving her two sons and three daughters. She was at Rochelle when the town was besieged, and she shared with magnanimity all the calamities of that disastrous siege, and refusing to be included in the capitulation, she was, with her surviving daughter, Anne, conveyed a prisoner of war to Niort. She died 1631, aged 77. She wrote some poems, printed 1572, besides a tragedy, called Holofernes, acted at Rochelle, and the Precepts of Isocrates, translated into French, and other works. Her eldest son was the famous duke de Rohan, who supported the cause of the protestants with such intrepidity in the reign of Lewis XII. Her daughter Catherine, who married the duke of Deux-ponts, was the celebrated female who so nobly met the amorous addresses of Henry IV. in these words: "I am too poor, sire, to be your wife, and too nobly born to be your mistress."

PARTHENAY, Anne de, a lady of illustrious birth. She married Anthony de Pons, count de Marennnes, and was the most distinguished ornament of the court of Renata, dutchess of Ferrara. She was a protestant, and well skilled in Grecian and Roman literature.

nor of New-Hampshire, obtained the appointment through the agency of Sir Henry Ashurst, and succeeded Usher in 1697. He was a native of Portsmouth, and had been treasurer of the province. He was a shipwright of an extraordinary mechanical genius, of a politic turn of mind, and a popular man. In 1703 Usher was again commissioned as lieutenant-governor, and Partridge retired to Newbury, where he died, January 2, 1729.  L.

PARUTA, Paul, a noble Venetian, who usefully served his country in various embassies, and was afterwards governor of Brescia, and procurator of St. Mark. He died 1598, aged 58. He was the author of notes in Italian on Tacitus—Political Discourses—a History of Venice, from 1513, to 1572, and other works.

PAS, Manasses de, marquis de Feuquieres, was born at Saumur, after the death of his father who was slain at the battle of Ivry. He trode in the steps of his father for valour, and distinguished himself at the siege of Rochelle, where he was taken prisoner, but liberated after a month's confinement. His abilities were equally displayed in the cabinet, and he went as ambassador to the courts of Sweden and of Germany. He was placed at the head of the French army with the duke of Saxe Weimar in 1635, and died of the wounds which he received at the siege of Thionville, 14th March, 1640. The account of his negotiations in Germany was published 1753, in 3 vols. 12mo.

PAS, Anthony de, marquis of Feuquieres, a famous French officer, whose military merits remained unknown till his 40th year. In 1688, at the head of 1000 men in Germany, he so eminently distinguished himself, and afterwards in Italy, that his promotion was very rapid. He was so strict a disciplinarian that the wits said of him he was the boldest man in Europe, since he daily slept in the midst of 100,000 enemies, meaning his soldiers. He died 1711, aged 63. His memoirs, which, as containing the History of the generals of Lewis XIV. are considered very interesting, were published in 4to. and in 4 vols. 12mo.

PASCAL, Blaise, a celebrated French divine, born at Clermont in Auvergne, 19th June, 1623. He was educated by his father, who was president of the court of aids in his province, and possessed great mathematical abilities; but while his father sought for distinction as the friend of Des Cartes, he forbade his son the use of all books of geometry, that his attention might not be diverted from belles lettres and classical knowledge. Young Pascal from his infancy displayed extraordinary abilities; he inquired into the reasons and causes of every thing, and never was satisfied but with what appeared most probable and rational. His father, who knew he had no opportunity of studying mathematics, accidentally discovered him surrounded with figures in charcoal on the floor of his chamber, and found on inquiry that he was engaged in what makes the 32d proposition of Euclid's first book, which the unassisted powers of his genius, by a connected series of ideas and of demonstrations, had pointed out to him. At 16 he wrote his treatise of Conic Sections, and so ably composed, that Des Cartes attributed it to the labours of the father and not of the son. At 19 he contrived an arithmetical machine, much admired for its ingenuity, and at 23 he saw, corrected, and improved the Toricellian experiment, and soon after solved a problem proposed by Mersennus, which had hitherto perplexed the ablest mathematicians of Europe. But in the midst of this increasing reputation, Pascal all at once renounced literary and mathematical pursuits for religion, and after being one of the greatest of philosophers, he became the most humble and penitent of devotees. He rejected all the pleasures of life, and frequently wore an iron girdle with sharp points towards his skin, that he might thus mortify himself, and by inflicting pain on his body banish the vain or profane thoughts which might intrude on his holy meditations. Though, however, regardless of the world, he embraced the cause of the Jansenists against the Jesuits, and in his "Provincial Letters," attacked them with all the shafts of genuine wit, yet with the force of truth and conscious virtue. These letters, according to Voltaire, who calls him the first, and Boileau the second, satirist against the Jesuits, are a model of eloquence and wit, equal to the finest comedies of Moliere, and possessed of the sublimity of the finest of Bossuet's orations. These celebrated letters have been frequently published, and have appeared in all the languages of Europe. Pascal died at Paris, 19th August, 1662, aged only 39. He was in the last year of his life engaged in a work against atheists and infidels, which, however, he did not complete. After his death were published from among his papers, "Pensées," on religion and other subjects, much admired, and also the "Equilibrium of Fluids," and the weight of "the Mass of the Air." Pascal was undoubtedly a very extraordinary man. If rivalled in talents, says his biographer, no one, however, of equal eminence, can be found who lived with such exemplary innocence. His works were printed, Paris, 5 vols. 8vo. 1799

PASCHAL I. St. Paschasius, a Roman, who succeeded Stephen IV. on the papal throne, 817. He was benevolent in his conduct, and received with great humanity the Greeks who had been exiled for their

PASCHAL II. Reinier, a Tuscan who succeeded Urban II. on the papal throne 1099. He excommunicated the antipope Gilbert, and claimed with the most unyielding pertinacity the right of investitures, which was opposed by Henry I. of England, and Henry IV. emperor of Germany. Henry visited Italy in hopes of receiving from the sovereign pontiff the imperial crown; but Paschal refused to officiate till he renounced his claims to the investitures. The emperor incensed, seized the person of the pope, and though the Romans immediately took up arms in defence of their sovereign, he carried him away captive, and refused to restore him to liberty, till he had renounced his pretensions to the disputed rights. This extorted concession was cancelled by two councils held at Rome, in 1112, and 1116. The pope, tired with the dissensions which harassed him, wished to resign the sovereignty, but died before, 22d January, 1118. Some of his letters are preserved in the councils of P. Labbe. There were two antipopes of that name, one in the age of Sergius II. and the other in the reign of Alexander III.

PASCHIUS, George, author of Tractatus de Novis Inventis quorum accuratori Cultui Facem prætulit Antiquitas, 4to.; de Fictis Rebus Publ. 4to.; de Variis Modis Moralia Tractandi, 4to. was the son of a merchant of Dantzic, and became professor of moral philosophy at Kiel, and died 1707, aged 56.

PASOR, George, a protestant, Greek professor at Franeker, where he died 1637. He wrote Lexicon Novi Testamenti, a useful work. Manuale Testamenti, &c. 12mo.; Collegium Hesiodæum, &c.

PASOR, Matthias, son of the preceding, was born at Herborne, April 12th, 1599. He studied at Heidelberg and Marburg; but in consequence of the wars which disturbed his countrymen, he left Germany and came to England, and was incorporated A.M. at Oxford, 1624. He here resided at Exeter college, and read lectures in oriental languages, and with great reputation and success, but 1629, he was induced to go to Groningen, where he was presented to some of the professorial chairs. He died there Jan. 1658. He wrote several things, but never published them.

PASQUALINO, an Italian painter, whose conversations, and groups of common people were highly finished, and particularly interesting. He died 1700, aged 59.

PASQUIER, or PAQUIER, Stephen, an eminent advocate in the parliament at Paris, rewarded by Henry III. with the office of advocate general to the chamber of accounts, in consequence of his able pleadings against Versoris, the defender of the Jesuits. He resigned this honourable place to his eldest son Theodore, and died at Paris, Aug. 31st, 1615, at the great age of 87. As a man his character was mild and benevolent, as a writer acute and sensible, and as a poet graceful and sublime. Of his poems the best known is his "Puce," or flea, in consequence of a flea which he saw on the breast of the learned Catherine de Roches, 1569. His other works consist of epigrams, epitaphs, letters, researches, portraits, &c. He left three sons worthy of him.

PASSEMANT, Claude Simeon, a native of Paris, brought up to trade, which he quitted to pursue the bent of his genius in the construction of optical and mathematical instruments. Among his ingenious labours are mentioned an astronomical pendulum with a moving celestial sphere, presented to Lewis XV. a burning mirror, and some globes. He wrote a treatise on the reflecting telescope, and another on the use of telescopes. He died suddenly 6th Nov. 1769, aged 67.

PASSERAT, John, professor of eloquence in the Royal college at Paris, was born at Troyes in Champagne, 1534. He studied law at Bourges under Cujacius, and became professor of eloquence upon the assassination of Ramus, 1572. He acquired great and deserved eminence in this employment, and died of the palsy, 1602. His works are numerous, and his poetry is particularly admired: besides some French and Latin poems, he published Commentaries on Catullus, Tibullus, and Propertius—Orationes et Præfationes—Conjecturarum Liber—de Literarum Cognitione, &c.

PASSERI, Giovanni Battista, a painter, the pupil of Dominichino, and author of the lives of the painters, sculptors, and architects of his time, died at Rome 1679, aged 70. He wrote also poetry. His nephew Joseph studied under him and Maratti, and was much admired for his portrait painting. He died at Rome 1714, aged 60.

PASSERI, Gio. Battista, an Italian antiquary, born at Gubio, in the duchy of Urbino, Nov. 1694. He studied the law at Rome for four years, and began to make collections of Etruscan antiquities; but in 1738, the loss of his wife had such influence on his feelings, that he embraced the ecclesiastical state. He became apostolic prothonotary, and vicar general of Pesara, and died Feb. 1780, in consequence of being overturned in his carriage. He wrote Lucernæ Fictiles Musci Passeris, 3 vols.—on the History of Fossils—Pictura Etruscorum in Vasualis in unum collectæ, Dissertationibus Illustratæ, 3 vols.—Thesaurus Gemmarum Astrii Ferarum Antiquarum, tom. 2 and 3, in continuation of

PASSEROTTI, Bartholomew, a painter of Bologna, the disciple of Zuccherò. His portraits were highly finished, and his church pieces were also much admired. He died 1595. His sons Tiburzio and Ventura were also eminent as painters.

PASSINELLI, Lorenzo, a Bolognese painter. Several of his historical pieces of great value are preserved in his native city. He died 1700, aged 71.

PASSIONEI, Dominicò, an Italian cardinal, born at Fossombrone, in the duchy of Urbino, 1682. He studied at Rome, where he made a most valuable collection of books and manuscripts, and in 1706 he came to Paris, where he became acquainted with Mabillon, Montfaucon, and other learned men. In 1708, he went to Holland, and continued there, and attended the congress of Utrecht, 1712, as the pope's secret agent. He was afterwards employed by the pope in various negotiations, and every where displayed his zeal, sagacity, and talents. He published an account of his Embassy in Switzerland, with the title of "Acta Legationis Helveticæ," fol. 1738. While nuncio at Vienna, he pronounced the funeral oration of prince Eugene, and for his many services was made archbishop of Ephesus, and raised to the dignity of cardinal by Clement XII. This learned man, particularly distinguished as the friend and patron of literature, died 15th July, 1761, aged 79. His nephew Benedict published his collection of Latin and Greek inscriptions, &c. Lucca, 1765, folio.

PATEL, a celebrated French painter, of whose birth and age nothing is known. He is called by his countrymen, the French Claude, as he imitated most successfully that able master. His buildings, scenery, and trees, are particularly admired.

PATER, Paul, a native of Menersdorf in Hungary, who was exiled from his country for his attachment to the protestant faith. He became successively librarian to the duke of Wolfenbuttle, mathematical professor at the college of Thorn, and afterwards at Dantzic, where he died 1724, aged 68. He was an able mathematician, and so ardent in the pursuit of knowledge that he slept only two hours in the summer and four in the winter. He wrote Labor Solis, sive de Eclipsi Christo patiente Hierosolym. Visa.; de Astrologia Persicâ; de Mari Caspio; de Cælo Empyrio; de Insignibus Turcicis ex Variis Superstitioum Tenebris Orientalium maxime Illustratis, &c.

PATER, John Baptist, a painter, born at Valenciennes. He studied under Watteau, with whom he unfortunately quarrelled. He excelled in the colouring of his pieces, though his designs were often incorrect.

He was more anxious after money and independence than after fame, and therefore his landscapes were often executed with hurry and inelegance. He died at Paris 1736, aged 41.

PATERSON, Samuel, a native of London, chiefly educated in France. He settled as a foreign bookseller in the Strand, but did not succeed in business, in consequence of which he retired to the continent in 1776, and made a valuable collection of books, which on his return to England, he recommended to the public in his catalogue called Bibliotheca Universalis Selecta. This performance was so much approved by the public that he acquired some celebrity as a bibliographer, and was not only engaged as a librarian by Lord Lansdown, but was employed by the London booksellers in forming their catalogues, several of which, especially of the Beauclerk, Crofts, Pinelli, and other collections, he completed in a very satisfactory manner. He was author of Cursory Remarks on a Journey through the Netherlands by Coriat, 3 vols. 12mo.; Joineriana, or Scraps, 2 vols. 8vo.; the Templar, a periodical paper: Speculation on Law and Lawyers, 8vo. At one time of life he was engaged as an auctioneer, and had the good fortune to save from destruction Sir Julius Cæsar's manuscripts, which from mere waste paper were made productive to him of 350l. He died 1802, aged 74.

PATERCULUS, Caius Velleius, a Latin historian, general of cavalry in Germany under Tiberius. He wrote an epitome of Roman history still extant.

PATIN, Guy, an eminent French writer and physician, born at Houdon, near Beauvais, in Picardy, 1602. His father intended him for the active life of an advocate, but he soon found medicine more congenial to his feelings, and after studying that science with great application, he became professor of physic in the Royal college of Paris, and distinguished himself by his defence of the ancients against the moderns. He also violently opposed the use of Antimony as a medicine, and wrote a book on it called "Martyrology of Antimony, &c." His "Letters," published in 3 vols. after his death, acquired him great celebrity; they were read, says Voltaire, with avidity, because they contained things which every body loves, and satires liked still more. He died 1682. It is said that his features greatly resembled those of Cicero, as represented in his statues.

PATIN, Charles, second son of the preceding, was born at Paris 23d Feb. 1633. His abilities were so early displayed, that at the age of 14, he maintained for five hours a disputation in Greek and Latin, and was admitted M. A. with great applause. He studied the law, but had a stronger inclination for physic, in which faculty he at last took his degrees. He practised with great success, and read lectures to numerous and admiring auditors; but dreading persecution and imprisonment for some unknown causes, he suddenly left France, 1668. After visiting England and the North of Europe he fixed at Basil, and afterwards removed to Padua, where he became professor of physic, and was honoured with the title of knight of St. Mark. He died there 2d Oct. 1693, of a polypus in the heart. His two daughters were distinguished for their learning. They were with their mother, members of the Ricovrati academy at Padua, of which their father was president, and they wrote some respectable books. His chief works are Itinerarium Comitis Brienne; Familia Romanæ ex Antiquis Numismat. fol.; Introduction to History by Medals, 12mo.; Imperatorum Romanor. Numismata, folio; Travels in different parts of Europe; Prattica della Medaglia; Suctonius ex Numismat. Illustratus, 4to.; de Optimâ Medicorum Secta; de Avicenna; Lycæum Patavinum, &c. His works, says Voltaire, are read by men of learning, as his father's are by men of leisure.

PATKUL, John Reginald de, a Livonian gentleman, who resented the oppressions which his country suffered from the power of Charles XI. and XII. of Sweden. He appeared before Charles XI. 1689, at the head of six other deputies, who were empowered by their country to lay their grievances at the feet of their sovereign, but the circumstance was regarded as treasonable, and he escaped with difficulty into Russia, from his persecutors, who condemned him to death. Though afterwards invested with the sacred office of ambassador of Russia in Saxony, Charles XII. refused to make peace with Augustus of Poland, except Patkul was delivered into his hands, and by this base treachery the unfortunate man was seized, and broken on the wheel, and quartered, at Casimir, 1707. This cruel measure, so outrageous to humanity and to the independence of nations, has deservedly fixed an indelible stigma on the character of the otherwise heroic Charles of Sweden.

PATRICK, St. the apostle and guardian saint of Ireland, was, as is supposed, a native of Wales or of Cornwall, who was seized by pirates and carried to Ireland, where he converted the inhabitants to Christianity. He was made the spiritual head of Ireland, and fixed his residence at Armagh, which is become the metropolitan see; and further to establish the doctrines which he taught with such eloquence and effect, he built several churches and religious houses. He died about 460, aged 83. Some pieces in Latin, under his name, have been published in London by sir James Ware, 1658, in 8vo.

PATRICK, Peter, a native of Thessalonica, in the age of Justinian, whom he served as ambassador to Amalasonte queen of the Goths, and Chosroes, king of Persia. For his services he was made master of the palace. He is author of the history of ambassadors in the collection of Byzantine historians, folio, Louvre, 1648.

PATRICK, Samuel, a learned English divine. He was one of the masters of the Charter-house, and is known for his edition of Hederic's Greek Lexicon, which has since been improved by Ernesti, Morell, and others.

PATRICK, Simon, a learned prelate, son of a mercer at Gainsborough, Lincolnshire, where he was born, 8th Sept. 1626. He was educated at Queen's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, and of which in 1661 he was elected master, against Sparrow, appointed by royal mandamus. His opponent, supported by power, prevailed, while he himself retired from Cambridge, and became rector of St. Paul's, Covent-garden, where he continued an active parish priest during the whole of the plague. He took his degree of D.D. as a member of Christ church college, Oxford, 1666, and was made chaplain to the king. In 1672 he was made prebendary of Westminster, and in 1679 dean of Peterborough. During the reign of James II. he showed himself an active advocate for the protestant cause, and though flattered and courted by the king, was steady and sincere in his principles. At the revolution his abilities were employed in settling the affairs of the church, and in reviewing the liturgy. In 1689 he was made bishop of Chichester, two years after translated to Ely, where he died, 31st May, 1707, aged 80. This worthy prelate, so highly commended by Burnet, wrote sermons—tracts against popery—Commentaries on the Scriptures, 3 vols. fol. which with Lowth on the prophets, Arnold on the apocrypha, and Whitby on the New Testament, contain a regularly continued commentary on the Bible.

PATRIX, Peter, a French poet, born at Caen, 1585. He became a favourite at the court of Gaston, duke of Orleans, by his wit and his social conversation. His poems are little above mediocrity, some are licentious, and gave much sorrow to the author in his old age, when reflecting on the fatal consequences which his lines might have produced by the corruption of morals. He died at Paris, 1672, aged 88. Among his poems, that called the "Dream," though of a serious cast, is known to most English readers by being introduced into our common jest books. "I dreamt that buried in my fellow clay," &c.

PATRIZI, Francis, author of dialogues in Italian, on the Manner of studying and writing History, 4to. ; de Institutione Reipublicæ ; de Regno et Regis Institutione, fol. ; del Vero Regimento ; Poemata de Antiquitate Sinarum, was bishop of Gaieta in Italy, and died there 1494.

PATRIZI, Francis, a native of Cherso, in Istria, who became professor of philosophy at Ferrara, Padua, and Rome, and distinguished himself by his learning, and his bold opposition to the philosophy of Aristotle. He wrote some poems in Italian ; a Parallel of the Military Art between the Ancients and Moderns, and edited the works of Mercurius Trismegistus. He died at Rome 1597, aged 67.

PATRU, Oliver, a polite scholar, born at Paris 1604. He became eminent for his knowledge of literature, and as an advocate, he was the first, says Voltaire, who introduced correctness and purity of language in pleadings. When admitted into the French academy in 1640, he pronounced an animated speech, and from that circumstance the same adulatory address has continued to be expected from every new member. As a critic Patru was well informed and judicious, but rigid, so that he was called the Quintilian of France, and his grammatical decisions were submitted to as oracles. His abilities were universally respected not only by the learned, but the great, and even by Colbert, and by the king. He died 16th Jan. 1681. His miscellaneous works were printed at Paris 1670, 4to. of which the third edition appeared 1714, and the whole in 1732, 2 vols. 4to.

PATTEN, Thomas, fellow of Corpus Christi, Oxford, and D.D. 1754, died 1790, rector of Childrey, Berks. He wrote the Christian Apology, a sermon ; St. Peter's Christian Apology, a sermon against the objections of Ralph Heathcote, 8vo. ; the Sufficiency of the external Evidence of the Gospel against Heathcote ; Opposition between the Gospel and the religion of Nature ; David's Character vindicated, 1762, &c.

PATTERSON, William, governor of New-Jersey, was a native of that state, and educated at Princeton, where he was graduated in 1763. His superior talents procured him several important offices, both from his native state and from the United States. He was a member of the convention in 1787 which formed the federal constitution, and on the organization of the new government was elected a member of the United States senate. In 1790 he was chosen governor of New-Jersey ; and some time after was appointed judge of the supreme court of the United States, and held the office till his death in September, 1806. His talents, integrity, and patriotism, ren-

PATRISON, William, an English poet, born at Peasmarsh, Sussex, 1706. He was educated at Appleby school, where his rising talents were noticed and encouraged by Mr. Noble, a neighbouring clergyman, and from thence he went to Sidney college, Cambridge, which, from a spirit impatient of discipline, he left without taking a degree. He came to London, but as he had nothing to support him he soon experienced all the horrors of indigence and distress. An intimate acquaintance with the wits of the time, and repeated solicitations for the cold and tardy patronage of the great, were little calculated to dispel the miseries which poverty, intemperance, and imprudence, gathered around him, and therefore we find him describing himself as destitute of friends, of money, a prey to hunger, and passing his nights on a bench in St. James's park. The success of some of his pieces recommended him at last to Curl, who took him into his house, but a month after the smallpox came to put an end to the sufferings of a dejected and broken heart. He died 1727, in his 21st year, and was buried in St. Clement Danes's churchyard. He possessed great genius, but without the cheering patronage of a friend his blossoms withered under an unpropitious sky. His works appeared, 2 vols. 8vo. 1728.

PAU, Claude Peter, a native of Paris, author of some poems, dramatic pieces, and also plays translated from the English. His works possessed merit, and were received with applause by the public. He died 1757, aged 28.

PAUCTON, Alexis, a French mathematician, born of obscure parents near Lassay, in Mayenne. He studied at Nantes, where he paid great attention to mathematics and navigation, and afterwards he came to Paris, where with some difficulty he recommended himself and obtained patronage in the military school. He was amiable in his manners and possessed of great erudition. He died at Paris 1799, aged 67. He is author of Theory of the Force of Archimedes, 12mo. , Metrology, or a treatise on the Weights, Measures, and Moneys of all Countries, Ancient and Modern ; Theory of the Laws of Nature, with Dissertations on the Pyramids of Egypt, 8vo. It is said that he left in MS. a translation of the Hymns of Orpheus.

PAVILLON, Nicholas, a French ecclesiastic, whose abilities were distinguished at Paris, and became known to cardinal Richelieu, who made him bishop of Alet. In his diocese he laboured with zeal for the suppression of vice and the dispersion of ignorance, but though he founded schools, and in every respect devoted himself to enlighten the people, his conduct was misrepresented at court, and the king sent commissioners to examine the complaints preferred against him. Though acquitted, a fresh offence, and his unwillingness to submit to the royal mandate, incensed the monarch against him, and he was deposed from his see, and died in exile, 8th Dec. 1677, aged above 80. His works are a Ritual for his Diocese; Synodal Statutes and Ordinances, &c.

PAVILLON, Stephen, a French poet, born at Paris 1652. He was advocate general in the parliament of Metz, but the laborious office was too difficult for his weak constitution, and he retired to literary ease. He was a member of both the academies, and received a pension from Lewis XIV. His poems, which are after the manner of Voiture, and possess some merit, were published in 1720, 2 vols. 12mo. He wrote also in prose, the Portrait of Pure Love, disinterested counsels, and other moral pieces, &c.

PAUL, Mark, or MARCO PAULO, a Venetian traveller. He penetrated, 1272, as far as the capital of Cublai Chan, the sixth descendant of Genghis Chan, of which he published an interesting account. Some authors imagine that Cambalus, which he mentions, is the town of Peking. It is remarkable that he makes no mention of the great wall of China.

PAUL, St. originally called SAUL, was a native of Tarsus, in Cilicia, and educated among the Pharisees of Jerusalem under the care of Gamaliel. He imbibed among this sect a most violent hatred against the Christians, and when Stephen was stoned he kept the raiment of his murderers and assented to his death. He afterwards set out for Damascus with authority from the chief priests to imprison the Christians, but in the way a supernatural vision, and a voice from heaven, converted his rancour into zeal for the persecuted faith, and he entered into the city the adherent, and not the foe of the Christian name. From Damascus he went into Arabia, Jerusalem, Tarsus, Cæsarea, and Antioch, and assumed the name of Paul. He preached the gospel with such eloquence and efficacy that he was called the apostle of the Gentiles. When accused by the Jews before Felix, whom in his spirited address he made to tremble, he appealed to the emperor and was conveyed to Rome; but after two years of captivity he was liberated without any punishment from his persecutors. He afterwards travelled over various parts of the world, where he founded churches, and increased the number of the saints. He was at last imprisoned at Rome, and put to death by Nero, the emperor, 29th June, 66. A magnificent church, still in existence, was built on the spot where his remains were deposited. His 14 epistles are nervous and persuasive. Among his converts were the learned Dionysius, the Areopagite, and according to some, king Agrippa and many others.

PAUL I. pope after his brother, Stephen II. 757, died 10 years after, respected for his wisdom and learning.

PAUL II. Peter Barbo, a Venetian noble, elected pope after Pius II. 1464. He permitted the cardinals to wear a purple habit, and the red cap of silk, and the mitre which hitherto had distinguished the sovereign pontiff. He died 26th July, 1471, aged 54.

PAUL III. Alexander Farnese, bishop of Ostia, was elected pope 1534, after Clement VII. In his time began the famous council of Trent, whose first sitting was in 1545. He made a treaty with the Venetians and the emperor against the Turks, and he established the inquisition, and approved of the institution of the Jesuits, but condemned the interim of Charles V. and pursued measures of severity against the defection of Henry VIII. He was a pontiff of high character, respectable in private life, and at all times anxious to procure concord among the Christian princes. He died 10th Nov. 1549, aged 82.

PAUL IV. John Peter Caraffa, succeeded Marcellus II. on the papal throne, 1555, aged near 80. He behaved with great haughtiness on his elevation; he not only issued a bull against all heretics, but he threatened with his severest displeasure Charles V. because he did not oppose sufficiently vigorous measures against the protestants; and when Elizabeth by her ambassador announced to him her accession, he complained that she had ascended the throne, especially as she was illegitimate, without the concurrence of the holy see, on which all the crowns of Europe were dependent. His reign tended little to advance the true interests of Rome, so that he died unlamented, 18th Aug. 1559. He wrote treatises de Symbolis; de Emendandâ Ecclesiâ, &c.

PAUL V. Camillus Borghese, a native of Rome, made a cardinal by Clement VIII. and raised to the popedom after Leo XI. 1605. He was engaged in a dispute with the Venetians, and as he had humbled the Genoese, he expected the same success with this powerful republic; but though he excommunicated the doge and the senate, he found his decrees little regarded. He had recourse to arms, but without intimidating the Venetians, till at last by the friendly interference of Henry IV. of France a reconciliation was effected. Paul deserved the gratitude of the Romans for the various embellishments which he introduced, the collections of paintings, sculpture, &c. which he made, and the erection of public fountains and aqueducts. Greater as a priest than as a politician, Paul acquired the esteem of the learned whom he patronised. He died 25th Jan. 1621, aged 69.

PAUL, Petrowitz, emperor of Russia, son of the great Catherine and Peter III. was born 1st Oct. 1754. He married 1774, the daughter of the landgrave of Hesse Darmstadt, who died two years after, and for his second wife he took a princess of Wirtemberg, niece to the king of Prussia. He began to travel in Europe in 1780, and during 14 months visited Poland, Austria, Italy, France, and Holland, and every where displayed an amiable character, and a strong desire of understanding the various establishments which guide the destinies of Europe. On the death of his mother in 1796, he ascended the throne, and then began to take an active part in the general confederacy of Europe, against the tyrannical and ambitious conduct of France. He sent the brave Suwarrow into Italy, where victory followed his steps, and he attacked the northern frontiers of France, in conjunction with the English; but all at once, while the world expected still higher exertions in the cause of the allies, the fickle monarch was reconciled to his enemies. To show more strongly his change of sentiments, he seized the property of the English, and with unparalleled cruelty, banished their unhappy sailors to Siberia, while his own subjects experienced all the misfortunes of distracted councils and of capricious measures. This extravagance was stopped by the sudden death of the unfortunate Paul, who was assassinated in April, 1801, by some of his discontented nobles. The cause of his extraordinary change of politics has been ascribed to the influence of a beautiful French mistress, who was sent by the cabinet of Paris to second the labours of diplomatic intrigue, by the prostitution of her charms to the capricious monarch.

PAUL, a celebrated heresiarch of Samosata, a city on the Euphrates. He was raised to the see of Antioch in 260, and soon after he was invited to the court of Zenobia, queen of Palmyra, who favoured the Jewish religion, but could not comprehend the mysteries of Christianity. Paul represented to the queen that the Trinity consisted not of three real persons, but only three attributes, and that the Saviour had appeared on earth not as a god, but as a man endowed with a superior portion of wisdom. This doctrine, which at first was propagated to convert Zenobia, was more fully defended by Paul, and therefore drew upon him the censures of the church. He was deposed from his dignity by a synod at Antioch, 270, and excommunicated. His followers, who were called Paulinists, did not increase, and few of them remained at the end of the fifth century.

PAUL, of Tyre, a rhetorician, who went as ambassador from his country to Adrian, 120, and obtained the title of metropolitan to his native city.

PAUL, the silentary, a Greek writer, so called from the office which he held in the palace of the emperor Justinian. He wrote in Greek verse a curious History of the Church of St. Sophia, besides epigrams—a poem on the Pythic Baths, &c.

PAUL, of Sancta Maria, a learned Jew of Burgos, who, it is said, was converted to Christianity by reading a work of St. Thomas Aquinas. After the death of his wife he embraced the ecclesiastical state, and by his merits obtained places of honour and trust. He was preceptor to John II. king of Castile, and was afterwards successively archdeacon of Trevigno, bishop of Carthagenia, and then of Burgos, where he died 29th Aug. 1445, aged 82. Some authors report that he was patriarch of Aquileia. He was a learned prelate, and wrote Scrutinium Scripturarum, folio, 1474—Additions to Nicholas de Lyra's works, &c. His three sons were baptized at the same time with him, when he became a Christian convert, and they all distinguished themselves by their merit. The eldest, Alphonso, bishop of Burgos, wrote an Abridgment of Spanish History; the second, Gonsalvo, died bishop of Placentia, and the third, Alvares, published a History of John II. king of Castile.

PAUL, deacon of Aquileia, was secretary to Didier, the last king of Lombardy. He was afterwards in the service of Charlemagne; but when accused by his enemies, of conspiring against the life of his protector, he was banished to the island of Tremiti, in the Adriatic. He left his exile for the court of the duke of Benevento, after whose death he retired to a monastery. He died 801. He is author of a History of the Lombards, in 6 books, to the death of Luitprand, 744—History of the bishops of Metz, and he contributed much to the composition of the Historia Miscellanea, in continuation of the work of Eutropius.

PAUL, an ecclesiastic of Merida, in Estremadura, in the seventh century, author of a History of the Spanish Fathers, edited at Antwerp, 1635, 4to.

PAUL, a physician of Ægina, in the seventh century, author of a treatise de Re Medicâ, an Epitome of Galen's works, and other Greek works.

PAULA, St. a Roman lady of noble birth, and of great learning. She embraced Christianity, and when become a widow, she retired to Bethlehem, where she built a monastery, and displayed in the sight of her female associates, all the virtues and mortifications of ascetic life. St. Jerome was the director of her charitable institutions, and he also taught her to understand the Hebrew Scriptures. She died 407, aged 60. It is said that she was descended from the illustrious families of the Gracchi and Scipios.

PAULET, William, marquis of Winchester, son of Sir John Paulet, of Somersetshire, was one of the courtiers of Henry VIII. and of his three successors. He had the art during those times, when religious opinions and political sentiments were so liable to persecution, to retain his places, and when asked how he had so securely weathered the storm, he replied, by being a willow, and not an oak. He died 1572, aged 97, and transmitted his honours and fortunes to his family, 105 of whom he saw descended from his loins.

PAULI, Simon, author of treatises on Malignant Fevers; against Tobacco and Tea; Flora Danica, 4to.; and other medical works, was professor of medicine at Copenhagen, and physician to Christian V. who rewarded his services by making him bishop of Arrhas. He died 1680, aged 77.

PAULIAN, Aimé Henry, a Jesuit, born at Nimes, 1722. He was a learned man, and wrote some valuable works, the best known of which are Dictionnaire de Physique, 5 vols. 8vo.—Système General de Philosophie, 4 vols. 12mo.—Dictionnaire Philosopho-Theologique, 4to. &c. He died at the advanced age of 80.

PAULINUS, St. a native of Bourdeaux, whom his learning and virtues recommended to the highest offices of the state. He was made consul in 378, and soon after married Therasia, a Spanish lady of great opulence and high birth. He settled in Spain, and by the persuasion of his wife became a convert to Christianity, and he applied his large resources to charitable uses, and the most benevolent munificence. To increase the labours of his Christian calling, he took orders, 393, and soon after coming to Italy, was chosen bishop of Nola, where he died 431, aged 74. Some authors ascribe to him the invention of church bells. Some of his Latin poems, letters, and other works, are extant. There was another who was bishop of Treves, and the defender of Athanasius. He died an exile in Phrygia, 359. Another was bishop of Aquileia, and distinguished himself at the council of Frankfort, in 794. He was author of a Treatise on the Trinity; a book of salutary instructions, &c. and died 804.

PAULMIER DE GRENTMESNIL, Julian de, a French physician, educated under Fernel. He was physician to Charles IX. whom he succeeded to restore to health. He was afterwards in the service of the duke of Anjou, and died at Caen, 1588. He wrote treatises de Vino et Pomacco; De Luc Venerea; De Morbis Contagiosis, &c. His son James was also a physician.

but educated in the protestant faith. He wrote Observationes in Optimos Auctores Græcos, 4to; a Latin Description of Ancient Greece, 4to.; poems in Greek, Latin, Italian, French, and Spanish, not very valuable. He died at Caen, 1st Oct. 1670, aged 83.

PAULMY, Mark Anthony René de Voyer, marquis de, son of the marquis of Argenson, is known for his valuable library, which he sold to the count of Artois, brother to Lewis XVI. He was also distinguished as a man of letters, and was honoured with a seat in the French academy, and raised to the dignity of minister of state. He published Melanges d'une grande Bibliothèque, sixty-nine vols. 8vo. and also essays in the style of Montaigne, 9 vols. 8vo. 1778. He died 1787, aged 65.

PAULZE, N. a native of Montbrisson, made one of the farmers general of France by the influence of his relation Terray. He was a man of great intelligence and erudition, and he formed a company for the improvement of Guyenne, which was not, however, fully adopted. He was imprisoned during the revolution, and guillotined, 1794. The commercial details on the Indies in Raynal's History, are attributed to his pen.

PAUSANIAS, governor of the kingdom of Sparta, during his nephew's minority, was brave in war and intriguing in the cabinet. After serving against the Persians, he grew discontented with his country, and made a secret treaty with the enemy. The measure was discovered, and to escape punishment he took refuge in a temple, where, on account of his perfidy, his mother first brought a stone to ensure his confinement. He was starved to death, B. C. 474.

PAUSANIAS, a celebrated Greek orator and historian, who settled at Rome in the second century. Of his Account of Greece, the best edition is that of Kuhnus, 1696, folio.

PAUSIAS, a painter of Sicyon, about 352 B.C. He first applied colours to wood and ivory, by the power of fire, called encaustic painting. His pictures were purchased by Scaurus, and preserved at Rome.

PAUTRE, Anthony le, an architect of Paris, whose abilities were patronised by Lewis XIV. He built the church of the nuns of the Port Royal at Paris, and contributed by other works to the embellishment of Paris. He was made member of the academy of sculpture, 1671, and died a few years after. His works appeared at Paris, 1652, in folio, with 60 engravings. One of his relations, John, was also a native of Paris, and eminent as a designer and engraver, especially in architectural ornaments. He was member of the academy of painting and sculpture, and died 2d Feb. 1682, aged 65. His works appeared in 3 vols. folio, adorned with above 1000 plates. His son Peter, who was born at Paris, 4th March, 1659, directed his attention to sculpture, and was made director of the academy of St. Luke. His Æneas and Anchises, which adorns the Thuilleries, and his Lucretia stabbing herself in the presence of her husband, are very valuable specimens of his great genius. He died at Paris, 22d Jan. 1744.

PAUW, N. de, a German ecclesiastic, uncle to the famous Anacharsis Cloktz. Though bold and singular in his opinions, he was respected for his learning and virtues, and was much noticed by Frederic the Great, of Prussia. He wrote Inquiries on the Greeks, the Americans, the Chinese, and Egyptians, 7 vols. 8vo. a work full of curious details, bold conjectures, and energetic description, mixed with occasional weakness of thought and paradoxical sentiments. He died at Xanten, near Aix-la-Chapelle, in the summer of 1799.

PAUW, Cornelius, a native of Utrecht, eminent for his learning. He published some valuable editions of several Greek authors, especially of Anacreon, 1732, 4to. Calaber, Æschylus, &c.

PAYNE, Nevil, a dramatic author in the reign of Charles II. He wrote the Fatal Jealousy—the siege of Constantinople, tragedies—the Morning Rambles, or Town Humours, a comedy, 1675.

PAYNE, Roger, an English book-binder, who ended a life of labour, poverty, and intemperance, in St. Martin's lane, 1797, and was buried at the expense of Mr. Payne the bookseller, his friend, though no relation. His workmanship was in a very superior style, and consequently procured him high prices, so that for the binding of an Æschylus for lord Spencer, it is said that he received not less than 15 guineas. He was very singular in his conduct; he made himself all his tools, and never would work before any person, but always in some dark cellar, and when his necessities called upon him for exertion.

PAYS, René le, a French poet, born at Nantes, 1636. He was comptroller of the imposts of Dauphiné and Provence, and rendered himself known at court, and the favourite of the ladies, by his miscellanies, called "Amitiés, Amours, et Amourettes," published 1685. He died 30th April, 1690. He wrote besides Zelotide, a romance, some colloquies, sonnets, &c.

PAZZI, James, a banker of Florence, of illustrious family. He headed the faction which opposed the Medicis, and he conspired with Salviati, archbishop of Pisa, and with cardinal Riario, to cut off the two brothers, Julian and Laurent, and to seize upon the sovereign power. The elevation of the host, 26th April, 1478, was the signal for this murderous action, and at the moment of this solemn ceremony, Julian was stabbed to the heart by a brother of Pazzi; but Laurent escaped with a slight wound. The popularity of the Medicis, and the atrocity of the deed soon armed the people in their favour, and the conspirators were seized, and punished with death, and among them Pazzi suffered. The house of the Pazzis was afterwards reconciled to the Medicis, and became allied to them by marriage. One of their descendants, Cosmo, was archbishop of Florence, 1503, and would have risen to the dignity of cardinal, if he had not died before the elevation of his uncle Leo X. to the chair of St. Peter. He translated Maximus Tyrius into Latin. His brother Alexander wrote some tragedies, and translated the Poetics of Aristotle.

PEACOCK, Reginald, an Englishman, made by the interest of his friend Humphrey, duke of Gloucester, bishop of St. Asaph, and afterwards of Chichester, from which he was banished in disgrace, for opposing the papal authority, and denying transubstantiation. He was obliged to make a public recantation, and then retired to an abbey, where he died 1486. His books were burnt publicly, as profane and heretical.

PEAPS, William, a dramatic writer, educated at Eton, where, it is said, he wrote the only piece mentioned of his composition, Love in its Ecstasy, or the Large Prerogative, 1649, in 4to.

PEARCE, Zachary, an English prelate, son of a distiller in Holborn, born 1690. He was educated at Westminster school and Trinity college, Cambridge, and distinguished himself at the university by some light compositions, and by some entertaining papers in the Guardian and the Spectator. He was patronised by lord Parker, earl of Macclesfield, to whom he dedicated his edition of Longinus, and from whom he obtained some preferment. He received, in 1724, the degree of D.D. from Lambeth; but though noticed after the disgrace of his friend, lord Macclesfield, by lord Hardwicke, by Potter, Pulteney, Newton, and even the queen, he was not raised to any ecclesiastical dignity till 1739, when he was made dean of Winchester. In 1748, he was made bishop of Bangor, and in 1756, bishop of Rochester, and dean of Westminster. These last honours were conferred unsolicited, and the bishop, who longed for the privacy of retired life, was anxious to resign; but as some of the ministry objected to the person thought of for his successor, he was permitted to divest himself only of the deanery of Westminster, in favour of Dr. Thomas. He died June, 1774. Dr. Pearce was eminent as well for his philological learning, as his classical knowledge. He wrote a Vindication of the Miracles against the attacks of Wool-ston, besides an Account of Trinity College, Cambridge—Letters against Conyers Middleton, &c.—a Review of Milton's Text—an Essay on the Origin of Temples—sermons, &c. After his death appeared his Commentary on the four Evangelists, and the Acts, 2 vols. 4to.—and 4 vols of sermons, 8vo.

PEARSON, John, an English prelate, born 12th Feb. 1612, at Snoring, Norfolk, and educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge. In 1639 he resigned his fellowship at King's, and afterwards became chaplain to lord keeper Finch, and to lord Goring, and obtained the living of Torrington, Suffolk, and of St. Clement's, Eastcheap, London. In 1661 he became Margaret professor at Cambridge; in 1662 was made master of Trinity college, and in 1673 succeeded Dr. Wilkins in the see of Chester. He died at Chester, 16th July, 1686. He is particularly known for his valuable "Exposition of the Creed," which appeared 1659, in 4to. and has often been republished. He wrote besides "Vindicia Ignatii," against Daille—Annales Cyprianici, &c. and some posthumous works.

PECHANRE, Nicolas de, a French poet, born at Toulouse, 1638. He obtained three times the laurel at the academy of Floral games, and acquired great popularity by his tragedy of Geta, acted at Paris, 1687. He wrote, besides, the tragedies of the Sacrifice of Abraham—Joseph sold by his Brethren—the death of Nero—Jugurtha, &c. He died at Paris 1709.

PECHLIN, John Nicholas, a native of Leyden, who studied medicine and became professor of it at Kiel. He was afterwards physician to the duke of Holstein Gottorp, and preceptor to the prince, his son. He wrote treatises De Purgantium Medicamentis. Facultatibus—De Vulneribus Sclopetorum—De Aeris et Alimentis Defectu et Vita sub Aquis—De Habitu et Colore Æthiopum—Observationum Physico-Medicarum—a poetical Panegyric on Tea, in Latin, &c. He died at Stockholm, 1706, aged 39.

PECHMEJA, John de, professor of eloquence in the college of La Fleche, was born at Villa Franca, in Rouergue, and died April, 1735, aged 44. His Eulogium on Colbert merited and received the approbation of the French academy in 1773. His best work is his Telephus, in 12 books, in which he draws a beautiful description of true friendship, of which he gave, with his friend Du Breuil, so interesting an example, that the two friends were called the Pylades and the Orestes of France.

PECK, Francis, an eminent antiquary, born May 4th, 1692, at Stamford, Lincolnshire. He was educated at Cambridge, where he took his master's degree, and soon after obtained the living of Godeby, near Melton, Leicestershire, where he died 13th August, 1743. He published 1727, in folio, "the Antiquarian Annals of Stamford," &c. inscribed to the duke of Rutland—Memoirs of Cromwell and of Milton, 2 vols. 4to. He published besides "Desiderata Curiosa," 2 vols. containing curious pieces of English history, &c. and it is said, that before his death he had in contemplation no less than nine different works on historical and antiquarian subjects.

PECKWELL, Henry, an English divine, rector of Bloxham, Lincolnshire, and a popular Calvinistic preacher. He chiefly resided in London, where he studied physic and anatomy for the benefit of poor persons of his persuasion. He died of a mortification, caused by a wound in the dissection of a young woman who had died of a putrid fever, 1787, aged 40. He published some sermons, &c.

PECQUET, John, a physician, born at Dieppe. He is distinguished for discovering the receptacle of the chyle, which he perceived to be conveyed by the lacteal vessels to the heart, and thence to the subclavian vein. This ingenious author died at Paris, Feb. 1674. He published his Discoveries in Anatomy, 4to. 1654—De Thoracis Lacteis, 1661.

PECQUET, Anthony, a French writer, grand master of the water-works, and the forests of Rouen. He presided also over the military school there. He wrote Analysis of the Spirit of Laws and of Political Maxims, 3 vols.—the Forest Laws of France, 2 vols.—Thoughts on Man, besides French translations of Guarini's Pastor Fido, and other Italian works. He died 1762, aged 58.

PEELE, George, a native of Devonshire, in the reign of Elizabeth, entered at Broadgate hall, Oxford, and thence was elected student of Christ-church, where he took his master's degree 1579. From Oxford he went to London, where he became the city poet, and had the management of the pageants. He died before 1598. He is mentioned by Wood as no inconsiderable poet, whose tragedies and comedies were acted at Oxford with great applause. His pastorals were also in high esteem. Only five of his plays are known, Edward I.—King David and fair Bethsabe—the Turkish Mahomet and Hyren—the Old Wives' Tale, &c.

PEIRESC, Nicholas Claude Fabri, descended from a noble family at Pisa, was born 1580, and studied at Avignon, Aix, and Tournon, under the care of the Jesuits. He devoted himself with uncommon assiduity to mathematics, and particularly to antiquities, though he studied the law to please an uncle from whom he expected some considerable property. In 1599 he began to travel in Italy, and after visiting Padua, Venice, Naples, Rome, and all the curiosities of that celebrated country, during a residence of three years, he returned to France, loaded with valuable collections of antiquities, and accompanied by the friendly wishes of men of learning and science. In 1604 he took his degree of doctor of laws at Aix, and succeeded his uncle, who fondly resigned to him his senatorial dignity. In 1606 he visited England, where he was honoured with the friendship and attentions of Camden, Cotton, Saville, and other men of celebrity, and even of James I. himself, and then returned through Antwerp, Brussels, and Paris, to his residence at Aix. Though a layman, he was made by Lewis XIII. abbot of Santa Maria Aquistriensis. He died at Aix, 24th June, 1637, aged 57, of a retention of urine; and as he was a member of the Humorists' academy at Rome, his eulogium was recited by Bouchier, and verses in his praise were publicly repeated, which were afterwards printed in a collection of funeral elegies in 40 different languages, called Panglossia. This learned man, so deservedly esteemed by Casaubon, by de Thou, by Grotius, by J. Scaliger, and other eminent men, was a most amiable and benevolent character, and not improperly compared by one of his biographers to the Roman Atticus. He wrote Historia Provinciæ Gallicæ Narbonensis—Nobilium ejusdem Provinc. Familiarum Origines—Commentarii Rerum omnium Memoria dignarum suâ Ætate gestarum—Liber de Ludicis Naturæ Operibus—Mathematica et Astronomica Varia—Nummi Gallici, Saxonici, Britannici, &c.—Linguae Orientales, Hebraea, &c.—Observationes in Varios Auctores, and other learned works. His library was very choice and valuable, and from it his friends were at liberty to take whatever pleased their taste or fancy.

PELAGIUS I. a native of Rome, elected pope 555. He was a moderate and pious pontiff, but laboured ardently in reforming the manners of his clergy, and in promoting the true spirit of Christianity. When Rome was besieged by the Goths under Totila, and at last plundered, he softened the calamities of war among his subjects, by his interference with the enemy's general, who respected his virtues. He died 2d March, 560. He wrote sixteen epistles, still preserved.

PELAGIUS II. a Roman, who succeeded on the papal throne after Benedict I. 578. He maintained with spirit the rights of the church, and opposed the pretensions of John, patriarch of Constantinople, who had assumed the title of Œcumenical bishop. He died 12th Feb. 590, of a pestilential disorder, which proved very fatal at that time, and was so violent in its effects, that the patients expired suddenly, either in sneezing or in gaping, whence arose, as is supposed, the custom still observed of saying, God bless you! to persons who sneeze, and of making the sign of the cross on the mouth of those who gape.

PELAGIUS, an illustrious Spaniard, related to the king of the Visigoths. He was driven from his possessions by the Moors, but after an obscure exile of three years, he attacked his enemies and defeated them in 716, and assumed the title of king of Leon and the Asturias. He died 737, universally respected for valour, piety, and prudence.

PELAGIUS, a celebrated heresiarch in the fifth century. He was a native of Wales, and as is supposed, a monk of Bangor, and he went to Rome, where he dropped his name of Morgan for the more classical Greek name of Pelagius. In his zeal to make converts, and to rouse those who pleaded temptations and human infirmities for their lukewarm conduct in the cause of practical religion, he became the supporter of new opinions, and rejected the doctrine of original sin, while he maintained free will in its fullest extent, and asserted that man may be saved by his own merits and virtuous exertions. His opinions, which he published in his book against St. Jerome, drew upon him the censures and condemnation of the synod of Carthage, and of several other councils. Pelagius left Rome with Celestius, the ablest of his followers, and retired to Jerusalem, but it is unknown where and when he died. He wrote besides letters, Commentaries on St. Paul's Epistles, &c. The History of the Pelagian schism has been written in a very able manner by cardinal Norris, and also by Patouillet, 12mo. 1751.

PELETIER, Claude de, counsellor of the Chatelet, and of the parliament, president of the chamber of requests, provost of merchants, and builder of the quay which still bears his name at Paris, was born in that city 1630. He was educated for the law, and was the intimate friend of Boileau, Bignon, Lamoignon, and other great men, and he succeeded in 1683 the famous Colbert, as comptroller general of the finances. After six years' laborious application, he resigned this office, and exchanged the court for a life of retirement and devotion. He died Aug. 1711, aged 81. Though much engaged in public affairs, he however found time to publish Extracts and Collections from the Fathers, &c.—Comes Senectutis—Comes Rusticus—Pithou's Comes Theologus et Comes Juridicus—the Body of the Canon Law, &c. His brother Michael was counsellor of state, and member of the academy of inscriptions, to whose memoirs he contributed. He resigned his offices at the age of 80, and retired to the abbey of St. Victor, at Paris, where he died 1725.

PELL, John, an English mathematician, born at Southwyke, Sussex, 1st March, 1610. He was educated at Stenning school, and at 13 entered at Trinity college, Cambridge, where he applied himself to mathematics with unusual assiduity. After taking his master's degree, he was incorporated at Oxford in 1631, and by his various publications he acquired so much reputation that he was invited in 1639 to fill up a professor's chair at Amsterdam, to which he succeeded 1643. In 1646, he settled at Breda as professor of philosophy and mathematics, at the request of the prince of Orange, and in 1652 returned to his native country. In 1654 he was sent by Cromwell as English resident to the protestant cantons of Switzerland, and returned a little while before the protector's death. In 1661 he was ordained by the bishop of Lincoln, and obtained from the crown the rectory of Fobbing in Essex, to which the bishop of London afterwards added the rectory of Lavingdon in that county. Though respectable as a scholar and a man of science, Dr. Pell was unfortunately very inattentive to the state of his domestic affairs, and consequently became poor in his old age, and was even confined in the king's bench as a debtor. He died Dec. 12th, 1685, and was interred by the charity of Busby, master of Westminster school, and Sharp, rector of St. Giles. He had by his wife 4 sons and 4 daughters. He published Controversia cum Longomontano de Verâ Circuli Mensurâ, 4to.—An Idea of Mathematics, 12mo.—Table of 10,000 Square Numbers, folio—Demonstration of the second and tenth book of Euclid—Description of the Use of the Quadrant—Letter on Logarithms—Astronomical History of the Heavenly Motions and Appearances—Eclipticus Prognostica, &c. and he left various MSS. which by means of Dr. Birch were obtained for the collection of the Royal Society.

PELLEGRIN, Simon Joseph, a French ecclesiastic, born at Marseilles 1663. He was of the society of the Servites, and obtained in 1704 the prize of the French academy, for his poetical "Epistle to the King on the glorious success of his Arms." This made him known at Court, and by means of madame de Maintenon, he was permitted to remove to the ecclesiastical order of Clugny; but as he kept a shop for the sale of poetical pieces, amorous odes, and ballads, and even wrote for the stage, he drew upon himself the animadversion of cardinal de Noailles, who insisted upon his relinquishing either his theatrical employments, or the privilege of officiating at the mass. He chose the latter, and subsisted afterwards by his pen. He died 5th Sept. 1745, aged 82. His works consist of dramas from the Old and New Testament; the

PELEGRINI, Antonio, a native of Padua, celebrated as an historical painter. He visited England through the friendship of the duke of Manchester, and several specimens of his excellent execution are preserved in this country. He died 1741, aged 67.

PELEGRINO, Tibaldi, or PELLEGRIN of Bologna, where he was born 1522, was eminent as an architect and painter. He displayed his abilities at Rome and Pavia, and also at Milan, where he built the cathedral of St. Ambrose, and afterwards he was invited to Spain, to direct the paintings and architecture of the Escorial. His services were liberally rewarded by Philip II. who made him a marquis, and sent him back loaded with presents. He died at Milan, 1592, aged 70.

PELEGRINO of Modena, a painter, born 1511, was bred under Raphael, and employed in adorning the Vatican. He died of some wounds received in rescuing his son, who had unfortunately committed a murder in the streets of Modena.

PELLERIN, Joseph, commissary-general and chief clerk of the French marine, is famous for his fine and valuable collection of medals, which was purchased by the king in 1776. He published his interesting Observations on Medals, in 9 vols. 4to. with plates, a work of great beauty. He died Aug. 1782, aged 99.

PELLETIER, John le, a native of Rouen, who studied painting, which he afterwards abandoned for literature. Blessed with strong powers of mind, he made himself completely acquainted with the learned languages, Italian, Spanish, mathematics, chymistry, astronomy, &c. without the assistance of a master; and in the latter part of life he devoted himself to religious studies. He died 1711, aged 78. He wrote a Dissertation on Noah's Ark—on St. Benedict's Hemina—on the Journal of Trevoux—the Life of Sixtus V. by Leti, translated—Nauntou's Fragmenta Regalia, or Queen Elizabeth's History translated, &c.

PELLETIER, Gaspard, physician and counsellor of Middleburg in Zealand, acquired reputation in his profession, and died in his native town, 1659. He is author of Plantarum tum Patriarum, tum Exoticarum in Wallachia, Zealand, nascentium Synonyma, 8vo. 1610.

PELLETIER, Bertrand, a native of Bayonne, distinguished for his knowledge of chymistry and pharmacy. He settled at Paris as an apothecary, and deserved to be admitted member of the academy of sciences, and afterwards of the Institute. He wrote various dissertations in the memoirs of the French academies, and had a share in the Journal of Natural History, and wrote besides, Observations on Arsenic. He died 1797, aged 36.

PELLETIER, James, a French physician, born at Mans, became principal of the colleges of Bayeux and Mans at Paris, where he died 1582, aged 65. He published Latin Commentaries on Euclid—Description of Savoy—treatise on the Plague—Curious Dialogue on Orthography—Poetic works—a French Art of Poetry, and other works.

PELLICAN, Conrad, a native of Rusac in Alsace, who became a cordelier in 1494, and afterwards presided over the convent of Basle. He embraced the tenets of Luther, and abandoning the religious habit in 1556, came to Zurich, where he settled and taught Hebrew, and married. He died 1556, aged 78. He was the friend of Erasmus, and published some controversial works, and commentaries illustrative of Scripture, in 7 vols. fol much commended by Richard Simon.

PELLISON-FONTANIER, Paul, a French writer, born of an ancient family at Beziers, 1624. He studied the law, which he afterwards abandoned for belles lettres. He settled at Paris, where he became the friend and correspondent of madame Scuderi, and in 1562 was made secretary to the king, and admitted into the French academy, in consequence of his excellent "History" of that society. He was much patronised by Fouquet, superintendent of the finances; but upon the fall of that minister, he shared his disgrace, and was sent for four years to the Bastille. When set at liberty 1666, he was honoured with the attention of the learned and the great, and his merits as well as his innocence soon restored him to the favour of Lewis XIV. whom he accompanied in his expedition against the United States, of which he wrote an interesting account. In 1670 he renounced the protestant religion, and embraced the ecclesiastical life, and thus obtained preferment. He died at Versailles, 7th Feb. 1693. His works are very respectable, consisting of the History of Lewis XIV.—the life of Anne of Austria—History of the Conquest of Franche Comté—Poems—Historical Letters—Reflections on Religious Differences—treatise on the Eucharist—Pleadings in favour of his friend Fouquet, &c.

PELLOUTIER, Simon, a protestant divine, descended from a Lyonesse family, but born at Leipsic. He was member of the Berlin academy, and became there an active pastor, and distinguished himself also as an able writer. His History of the Celts, particularly of the Gauls and Germans, is a valuable work, edited in 2 vols. 4to. and 8 in 12mo. He died 1757, aged 63.

PELOPIDAS, a celebrated Theban, the friend of Epaminondas. Devoted to the interest of his fellow-citizens, Pelopidas, with the assistance of his friend, raised Thebes from a dependent state to glory and victory. He was at last slain in battle, B.C. 364.

PEMBERTON, Henry, an English physician of eminence. His treatise on Chymistry, and his View of sir Isaac Newton's Philosophy, in 4to. display his abilities as a man of science and erudition, in a very favourable view. He was fellow of the Royal Society, and died in an advanced old age, 1771.

PEMBERTON, Ebenezer, minister of Boston, Massachusetts, was born in that town in 1672, and graduated at Harvard college in 1691. He was afterwards a tutor in that seminary. He devoted himself to the ministry, and in 1700 was ordained assistant pastor of the Old South church, Boston, where he remained till his death in 1717. He is regarded as one of the most accomplished preachers his country has produced. He possessed a mind of uncommon energy, and had enriched it with extensive learning. His style of writing was highly forcible, and his delivery vigorous and impressive. A volume of his sermons has been published since his death.

PEMBERTON, Thomas, distinguished by his knowledge of American history, was born at Boston in 1728. He employed himself a number of years in merchandise, but at length devoted his attention to American history, and wrote fourteen or fifteen historical and biographical manuscript volumes. He was a member of the Massachusetts Historical Society, and furnished a large proportion of its collections. He bequeathed his manuscripts to that institution. He died on the 5th of July, 1807, in his eightieth year.

PEMBLE, William, an English ecclesiastic, tutor and divinity reader at Magdalen-hall, Oxford. His abilities as a scholar and a divine were of a superior rank, but unfortunately he did not live long to display them. His works appeared in one vol. folio. He died 1623, aged 32.

PEMBROKE, Thomas, an English painter, the pupil and imitator of Larroon. He painted much for the earl of Bath, and excelled chiefly in historical pieces and portraits. He died at London 1730, aged 28.

PENDLETON, Edmund, of Virginia, who was distinguished for talents and patriotism, and was one of the most conspicuous among the great men of that state during the war of the revolution. His education was defective, but his fine endowments and vigorous application soon remedied that disadvantage. He was for a long time one of the leading members of the house of burgesses of that state, and in 1773 was appointed one of the committee of correspondence for gaining intelligence of the acts of the British government, and communicating with the colonies. He was a member of the congress of 1774. In 1787 he was appointed president of the convention of Virginia, elected to consider the constitution of the United States, and employed his influence to obtain its adoption. In 1789 he was appointed judge of the United States' district court for Virginia, but declined the office. He was for many years a judge of the court of appeals of that state, and its president at the time of his death, which took place at Richmond, 23d October, 1803. He held the first rank as a lawyer and statesman, and was particularly distinguished for the force and clearness of his thoughts, for subtlety in discrimination, and dexterity in argument.

PENINGTON, Isaac, son of a lord mayor of London, was born 1617. He was well educated, and much given to religious meditation; and by the conversation and preaching of George Fox, he became a zealous and active quaker. Not only as a writer, but as a travelling minister, he spread the tenets which he had embraced, and at last drew the attention of the magistrates so severely upon his conduct, that he was imprisoned not less than six times in the reign of Charles II. After suffering much undeserved persecution, this man, who was of inoffensive manners, and of a meek and quiet spirit, died at Goodnestone court, Sussex, 1679. His publications were numerous, and all in favour of the quakers. They are mostly dated from Alesbury, where he chiefly lived, and were collected into one folio volume, 1681, and afterwards reprinted in 2 vols. 4to. and 4 in 8vo. The persecution exercised against the son arose, it is said by some, from the conduct of Isaac Penington, the father, who was an alderman, violent against Charles I. and who headed some of the riots against the court. He sat also as one of the king's judges, and at the restoration was tried and condemned, but respited, and kept a prisoner in the Tower, where he died.

PENN, William, a native of Bristol, distinguished in the British navy as an able admiral. He was commander of the fleet in the reduction of Jamaica in 1655 by Venables, but he lost for a time the good opinion of the protector, who confined him in the Tower for absenting himself from the American station without leave. He was member for Weymouth, and after the restoration he obtained a high command under the duke of York, and greatly contributed to the defeat of the Dutch fleet, 1664. He was knighted by Charles II. for his services, and died at his house, Wanstead, Essex, 1670, aged 49.

of the above, was born in London, 1644. From a private school at Chigwell, Essex, he entered in 1660 as a gentleman commoner at Christ-church, Oxford; but as he withdrew from the national forms of worship with other students, who, like himself, had listened to the preaching of Thomas Loe, a quaker of eminence, he was fined for non-conformity, and the next year, as he pertinaciously adhered to his opinions, he was expelled from the college. This disgrace did not promote his comfort, his father considered his singularly sober and serious conduct as tending to impede his elevation to the favours of the licentious court, and therefore, after being, as he says, whipped and beaten, he was turned out of doors, 1662. His father, however, sent him to France, and on his return he entered at Lincoln's-inn as a law student. In 1666 he was sent to manage an estate in Ireland, and during his residence there he renewed his acquaintance with Loe, and showed such partiality to the quakers, that he was in those days of persecution, taken up at a meeting at Cork, and imprisoned by the mayor, who at last restored him to liberty, at the request of lord Orrery. His return to England produced a violent altercation with his father, who wished him to abandon those singular habits, so offensive to decorum and established forms, and when he refused to appear uncovered before him and before the king, he a second time dismissed him from his protection and favour. In 1668 he first appeared as a preacher and as an author among the quakers, and in consequence of some controversial dispute he was sent to the Tower, where he remained in confinement for 7 months. The passing of the conventicle act soon after again sent him to prison in Newgate, from which he was released by the interest of his father, who about this time was reconciled to him, and left him on his decease some time after a valuable estate of about 1500*l.* per annum. In 1672 he married Gulielma Maria Springett, a lady of principles similar to his own, and then fixed his residence at Rickmansworth, where he employed himself zealously in promoting the cause of the Friends by his preaching, as well as by his writings. In 1677 he went with George Fox and Robert Barclay to the continent on a religious excursion; and after visiting Amsterdam, and the other chief towns of Holland, they proceeded to the court of princess Elizabeth, the grand-daughter of James I. at Herwerden or Herford, where they were received with great kindness and hospitality. Soon after his return to England, Charles II. granted him, in consideration of the services of his father, and for a debt due to him from the crown, a province of North America, called the New Netherlands, but now denominated Pennsylvania.

In consequence of this acquisition he invited, under the royal patent, settlers from all parts of the kingdom, and drew up in twenty-four articles the fundamental constitution of his new province, in which he held out a greater degree of religious liberty, than had at that time appeared in the Christian world. A colony of people, chiefly of his persuasion, soon flocked to share his fortunes; the lands of the country were cleared and improved, and a town was built, which, on the principle of brotherly love, received the name of Philadelphia. In 1682 Penn visited the province, and confirmed that good understanding which he had recommended with the natives, and after two years' residence, and with the satisfaction of witnessing and promoting the prosperity of the colonists, he returned to England. Soon after Charles died, and the acquaintance which Penn had with the new monarch was honourably used to protect the people of his persuasion. At the revolution, however, he was suspected of treasonable correspondence with the exiled prince, and therefore exposed to molestation and persecution. In 1694 he lost his wife, but though severely afflicted by the event, he in about two years married again, and afterwards employed himself in travelling in Ireland, and over England, in disseminating as a preacher the doctrines of his sect. He visited in 1699 his province with his wife and family, and returned to England in 1701. The suspicion with which he had been regarded under William's government ceased at the accession of queen Anne, and the unyielding advocate of quakerism was permitted to live with greater freedom, and to fear persecution less. In 1710 he removed to Rushcomb, near Twyford, Berks, where he spent the rest of life. Three repeated attacks of an apoplexy at last came to weaken his faculties and his constitution, and after nearly losing all recollection of his former friends and associates, he expired 30th July, 1718, and was buried at Jordan, near Beaconsfield, Bucks. The character of Penn is truly amiable, benevolent, and humane; his labours were exerted for the good of mankind, and with the strictest consistency of moral conduct and religious opinion, he endured persecution and malice with resignation, and guided by the approbation of a pure conscience, he showed himself indefatigable in the fulfilling of what he considered as the law of God, and the clear demonstration of the truth of the gospel. He published various works to advance and support his religious opinions, which were widely disseminated among the friends of his persuasion. The best known of these are No Cross, No Crown, to show that the denying of self and daily bearing the Cross of Christ is the only way to the kingdom of God—a Brief Account of the Rise and Progress of the People called Quakers—Primitive Christianity revived—Innocency with her Open Face, written in his vindication when confined in the Tower.

PENN, Thomas, son of William Penn, the founder of Pennsylvania, was born March 8th, 1702, and succeeded to the share in the proprietary previously owned by his brother John, who died in 1746. He left the province and went to England in 1741, but had the principal direction of its affairs for half a century. He was a principal founder of the college at Philadelphia, and the hospital, the library, and other literary, charitable, and religious societies, shared his bounty. He died in London, March 21st, 1775.

PENNANT, Thomas, an able naturalist and antiquary, born at Downing, his family estate in Flintshire, 1726, and educated at Wrexham school, and Oxford. He early distinguished himself by his application to natural philosophy, and after examining with judicious attention whatever was curious and valuable in England, he travelled on the continent, and was introduced to the wits and learned men of Europe, especially Buffon, Voltaire, Linnæus, &c. Soon after his return to England he commenced author, and from the year 1750, when his British Zoology appeared, to the time of his death, he was usefully employed in elucidating the history, geography, and natural curiosities of his country. This truly amiable and virtuous man, whose learning was equalled by his goodness of heart, died at Downing, 1793. His works are numerous and very respectable, the best known of which are Tour in Scotland, 1771, often edited—Tours in Wales, from Chester to London—Account of London—Literary Memoirs of himself—A Geographical Account of India, of which only the first volume appeared before his death, and other publications.

PENNI, John Francis, surnamed Il Fattore, as the prudent steward of his master Raphael's affairs, was a painter, born at Florence. His landscapes were much admired. He died 1528, aged 40. His brother Lucas was also eminent as a painter, and was patronised by Henry VIII. in England, and also by Francis I. at Fontainebleau.

PENNICUIK, Alexander, a Scotch physician, born at New Hall, Edinburghshire. His father, who was of a very respectable and ancient family, had been surgeon under general Bannier in the Swedish army, and the son, after travelling abroad settled in his native country, where he published a topographical account of Tweedale, some poems, descriptive of the manners of his countrymen, &c. He died 1722, aged 70.

It is said that he communicated to Allen Ramsay the incidents which he hath clothed in such interesting beauty of language in his Gentle Shepherd.

PENNY, Thomas, an English naturalist of celebrity. He travelled over England and other various countries in search of botanical knowledge, and brought from Majorca the curious plant called Hypericum Valericum, which Clusius in honour of him names Myrto Cistus Pennæi. He was very communicative of his information to his friends, especially to Lobel, Gerard, Gesner, and other botanists. He wrote letters on insects, inserted in Trew's collection. He was fellow of the college of physicians, London.

PENRUDDOCK, John, son of Sir John of Wiltshire, was zealous in the cause of his sovereign during the civil wars, and obtained the rank of colonel in the royal army. He was defeated by colonel Croke, who, after he had solemnly promised him pardon, caused him to be beheaded in 1655. He was a man of great piety, and equally distinguished for the virtues of private life. The letters which passed between him and his wife after his condemnation, have been published by Steele, and display him in the most affecting language, in the amiable light of the good Christian and the loyal subject.

PENRY, John, or AP-HENRY, a native of Brecknock, who studied at Cambridge, and afterwards at Oxford, where he took his master's degree. In consequence of some offence he altered his religious principles, and became an anabaptist or Brownist, and not only preached, but wrote with great virulence against the episcopacy. His writings, under the assumed name of Martin Mar-Prelate, gave great offence to the ministry; and in consequence of their seditious tendency he was arrested, and condemned, and executed in 1593. His publications were numerous and all on divinity subjects.

PENS, George, a native of Nuremberg in the 16th century. He greatly distinguished himself as a painter and engraver.

PEPIN, the Short, son of Charles Martel, was the first monarch of the second French dynasty, and was elected at Soissons 752. Though small of stature he commanded the respect of his people, by the valour and heroic firmness of his conduct. He listened to the complaints of the pope Stephen II. and marched to attack Astolphus king of the Lombards who besieged Rome, and after he had routed him, he turned his victorious arms against the dukes of Saxony, and of Aquitaine, whom he defeated and made tributary to his power. He died at St. Denys, 23d Sept. 768, aged 54, and divided his possessions among his sons, Charlemagne and Carloman.

PEPIN, the Fat, mayor of the palace, governed Austrasia, Neustria, and Burgundy, and maintained his power by firmness, vigour, and wisdom. He died 16th Dec. 714, after governing more as a master than as a minister 27 years.

PEPPERELL, Sir William, lieutenant-general in the British service, was a native of Maine, Massachusetts, and bred a merchant. He was early appointed an officer in the militia, and after advancing through several grades of rank, was at length intrusted by the colonies with the command of the expedition against Louisburg, which he succeeded in capturing. In reward for his services on that occasion he received from the king the dignity of baronet of Great Britain, and was regarded with great respect and admiration by the colonies. He possessed great courage, activity, and an aptness for command, and was prepossessing in his manners. Besides his military offices he held a seat in his majesty's council for thirty-two years. He died in 1759, in the sixty-fourth year of his age.

PEPUSCH, John Christopher, an eminent musician, born at Beriin 1667. His abilities were so early displayed, that at the age of 14 he was employed at the Prussian court to teach music to the prince royal. In 1700, he came over to England, and was engaged at Drury-lane, and acquired some celebrity and more fortune as a teacher. In 1713, he was admitted doctor of Music at Oxford, and about 1725, he married Margarita de l'Epine, an Italian singer, of light character, but who had by her engagements on the stage amassed a fortune of 10,000 guineas. This woman, whose figure and complexion entitled her to the appellation of Hecate, by which her husband distinguished her, brought him one son, who died before his parents. Pepusch lost his wife in 1740, and died himself 20th July, 1752, aged 85, at the Charter-house, of which he was organist.

PEPYS, Samuel, a learned Englishman, known as the indefatigable secretary of the admiralty under the reign of Charles II. and his brother. He introduced order, regularity, and method in his department, and devoted much of his time to the collecting of memoirs of the navy, and other valuable documents, which have been preserved, together with his library, at Magdalen college, Cambridge. To his great exertions, his patriotic conduct, and his judicious arrangements, the navy of Britain is much indebted for the superiority in naval affairs which it began to acquire after the fatal effects of the civil wars. This respectable man died 1703. He was related to the great earl of Sandwich, who fell gloriously while fighting against the Dutch fleet, and he was descended from an ancient family settled at Impington, Cambridgeshire.

PERANDA, Santa, a native of Venice, eminent as an historical painter. He imitated very successfully the style of Titian, Tintoretto, and Paul Feronese, and died 1738, aged 72.

PERAU, Gabriel Lewis Calabre, a French ecclesiastic of the Sorbonne, who continued d'Auvernigne's lives of Illustrious Frenchmen, and wrote the life of Jerome Bigno, besides an edition of Bossuet's works, &c. He died March, 1767, aged 67.

PERCEVAL, Spencer, was born in 1762. He was educated at Harrow school, and next at Trinity college, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree in 1782, and the year following became a student of Lincoln's-Inn. He commenced practice as a barrister in the King's Bench, from whence he removed to the court of Chancery. In 1796 he was made king's counsel, and, about the same time, attracted the notice of Mr. Pitt, by a pamphlet, proving that an impeachment of the House of Commons does not abate by a dissolution of parliament. The same year he was returned for Northampton. In 1801 he was made solicitor-general, and the next year, attorney-general. On the change of administration in 1807, he was appointed chancellor of the exchequer, in which situation he displayed great political talents, particularly in the settlement of the regency; but, unhappily, he fell soon afterwards, in the lobby of the House of Commons, by the hands of an assassin, named Bellingham, who was actuated by no other motive than that of a determination to murder a minister, May 11, 1812.—W. B.

PERCIVAL, Thomas, an English physician, born and educated at Warrington, Lancashire. He studied medicine at Edinburgh, and afterwards visited the continent, and took his degrees at Leyden, 1765. He settled in 1767, at Manchester, where he continued to practise with increasing reputation till his death in 1804. In private life Dr. Percival was a most amiable man, and to his zeal in the cause of philosophy, Manchester is chiefly indebted for the establishment of its literary society, to whose memoirs he made many valuable contributions. He published besides moral and literary dissertations—medical ethics, &c. besides a Father's Instructions to his Children, &c. In his principles Dr. Percival was a dissenter, and it is remarkable that one of his sons, after receiving all the instruction which so able and so learned a father could communicate, became a convert to the principles of the church of England, and was made one of its most active ministers.

PERCY, William, the progenitor of the illustrious house of the Percys, was one of the courtiers of William the Conqueror, and attended him from Normandy on his invasion of England, and was rewarded for his services and attachment by the grant of lands in the counties of York and Lincoln. The Percys, distinguished by their zeal in the cause of their sovereigns, were raised in 1377, to the rank of earl of Northumberland by Richard II. The most celebrated of the Percys was Henry, surnamed Hotspur, who after being the firmest support of the throne of Henry IV. took up arms against him, and after various encounters was at last defeated at the battle of Shrewsbury in 1403. His father, who had instigated him to hostilities, made peace with the conqueror, but again abandoned his allegiance, and at last three years after fell in the field of battle, fighting against the forces of his sovereign in Yorkshire.

PERCY, George, president of the colony of Virginia, was appointed by the council in the place of captain John Smith, when he returned to England in September, 1609. lord Delawar succeeded him in June, 1610. He was also at the head of the administration from the departure of lord Delawar in March until the arrival of Sir Thomas Dale in May, 1611. L.

PERCY, Thomas, a learned prelate, and related to the family of Northumberland, was born at Bridgenorth, in Shropshire, in 1728. He was educated at Christ-church, Oxford, where he took his master's degree, in 1753, and, on entering into orders, was presented to the vicarage of Easton Mauduit, in Northamptonshire, which he held with the rectory of Wilbye, in the same county. In 1769 he was made chaplain in ordinary to the king, in 1778 promoted to the deanery of Carlisle, and in 1782 advanced to the bishopric of Dromore in Ireland, where he died in 1811. His works are—1. Han Kiou Chouan, a translation from the Chinese. 2. Chinese Miscellanies. 3. Five Pieces of Runic Poetry, translated from the Icelandic Language. 4. A new Translation of the Song of Solomon. 5. Reliques of Ancient English Poetry, 3 vols. 6. A Key to the New Testament. 7. The Northumberland Household Book. 8. The Hermit of Warkworth, a poem, in the ballad style. 9. A translation of Wallet's Northern Antiquities.—W. B.

PERDICAS, one of Alexander's generals. He engaged after his master's death in the wars which were kindled among the ambitious generals, and was killed in Egypt, B. C. 322.

PEREFIXE, Hardouin de Beaumont de, author of an excellent History of Henry IV. of France, was patronised by Richelieu, made a doctor of the Sorbonne, preceptor to Lewis XIV. and in 1664, raised to the see of Paris. He died 1670, much respected. He wrote besides Institutio Principis, 1647.

PEREIRA-GOMEZ, George, author of Nova Veraque Medicina, Experimentis et Rationibus Evidentibus Comprobata, fol. 1558—and a now scarce treatise, to prove the Brute Creation to be mere Machines, 1554, was a physician of eminence, born at Medina del Campo in Spain.

PEREIRA DE FIGUEIREDO, Anthony, a Portuguese divine, born at Macao, 14th Feb. 1725, died at Lisbon 14th Aug. 1797. In the dispute between the courts of Rome and Lisbon, he published various tracts to prove the independence of kings in ecclesiastical affairs, and received the applause of his countrymen for his learning and spirited conduct. He wrote also a New Method of Latin Grammar, edited ten times—a Portuguese Translation of the Bible, 23 vols. 8vo.—Tentativa Theologica, 1769—Elements of Ecclesiastical History in the form of dialogues, 2 vols. 8vo. 1765, left unfinished.

PEREZ, Anthony, a Spanish writer, nephew to the secretary of Charles V. When disgraced in Spain he retired to Paris, where he died 1611. He published "letters," which are well written and interesting. His works appeared at Paris 1598. There was also a Spanish lawyer of eminence of that name, who died at Louvain 1672, aged 89. Also another who was surgeon to Philip II. and wrote a treatise on the plague.

PERGOLESI, John Baptist, an Italian musician, born at Casoria, and educated under Gaetano Greco at Naples. He was afterwards patronised by prince Stigliano, and his operas, when introduced on the theatre, were attended with extraordinary success. His Olympiad appeared at Rome, but by some accident did not meet the applause which its merits deserved. He died of a consumption at Naples, at the early age of 33, 1737. In compliment to his abilities he is called by the Italians the Dominichino of music. His chief works are "Stabat Mater," "Dixit et Laudate," "Sylve Regina," "la Serva Padrona—Orfeo et Eurydice. Dr. Burney thinks very highly of his genius and of his compositions.

PERIANDER, tyrant of Corinth, is placed among the seven wise men of Greece, though he oppressed his country, murdered his wife Melissa, and banished his son Lycophron. He died B.C. 585.

PERIANDER, Giles, a native of Brussels, 1540, who became professor of belles lettres at Mentz, and published Germania, in qua Doctiss. Virorum Elogia et Judicia continentur, 12mo. 1567—Nobilitatis Moguntiaë Diæcesis, Metropolitanæque Ecclesiæ, 8vo. 1568.

PERICLES, an illustrious Athenian, known as a general, orator, and statesman. By his arts and influence he gained an extraordinary ascendancy over his countrymen, and prevailed upon them to begin the famous and fatal Peloponnesian war. He was cut off by the plague, B.C. 429.

PERINGSKIOLL, John, a native of Stregni in Sudermania, who became professor of antiquities at Upsal, secretary to the king, and counsellor. He wrote a history of the Kings of the North, 8vo. 1720—of the Kings of Norway, 2 vols. fol. 1697—Historical and Chronological tables from Adam to Christ, 1713, folio, besides an edition of J. Messenius's treatises on the kings of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, 14 vols. folio, 1700. He died 24th March, 1720, aged 66.

PERIZONIUS, James, a learned German, born at Dam in Holland, 26th Oct. 1651. He studied at Deventer, and afterwards at Utrecht under the learned Grævius, and in 1674, he removed to Leyden. He was afterwards made rector of the Latin school at Delft, and then professor of eloquence and history at Franeker. He went in 1693 to Leyden, to fill the chair of eloquence, history, and Greek, and died there 6th April, 1717. He was a man of extensive erudition, great application, and sound judgment. He published various works in Latin on history, classical literature, and antiquities, the chief of which are Animadversiones Historicae, 8vo.—Dissertationes on various Points of Antiquity, &c.—orationes—Origines Babylonicæ et Ægyptiacæ, 2 vols. 8vo.—an edition of Ælian, 2 vols. 8vo.—Historical Commentaries—an edition of Q. Curtius—notes on Sanctius's Minerva, &c.

PERKINS, William, a native of Marston, Warwickshire, educated at Christ college, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow. He was in his principles a strict Calvinist, and his writings when translated into Dutch, drew upon him the attack of Arminius, and other polemics, and this occasioned the calling of the Synod of Dordt for the settlement of theological disputes. His works are comprised in 3 vols. fol. He died 1602, aged 46.

PERNETY, James, a native of Forez, historiographer of Lyons, and member of the academy there. He was an able writer, and assumed the pompous title of Miles Ecclesiæ Lugdunensis. He wrote History of Cyrus, 3 vols. 12mo.; Counsels of Friendships; Letters on Physiognomy, 3 vols.; Abuses of Education, 12mo.; Picture of Lyons; Lyonesc worthy to be recorded, 2 vols. 8vo. He died 1777, aged 81.

13th Feb. 1716. He became librarian to the king of Prussia, and after residing for several years at Berlin, he returned to France, and died in the bosom of his family. He wrote a Dictionary of Painting, Sculpture, and Engraving, 12mo.—Dissertation on America against Pauw, 2 vols. Svo.—History of a Voyage to the Maldives, Svo. &c.

PEROUSE, John Francis Galoup de la, an illustrious navigator, descended from a noble family at Toulouse, and born at Albi, 1741. He early entered into the French navy, and distinguished himself by his services for 17 years in the Indian seas, and in 1778, was employed in America under d'Estaing. He was present at the taking of Grenada, and, in 1782, he destroyed the English factories which were established in Hudson's bay. At the peace he was selected by Lewis XVI. to command the Astrolabe and the Boussole, on a voyage of discovery, and the expedition was so popular that the monarch himself traced out the places which he wished the bold adventurer to examine. After following the track of Cook, visiting the northwest coast of America, and advancing to Behring's straits, Perouse came down the eastern coast of Asia along Japan, and in Feb. 1788, visited Botany bay in New Holland, where he was received with merited distinction by the English settlers. After leaving Botany bay, no intelligence whatever has been received of this unfortunate navigator, but it is imagined that he perished with his valiant crew on some unknown shoals, or fell a sacrifice to the fury of some inhuman savages. In 1791, the national assembly ordered two ships under Entrecasteaux, and Petit-Thomas, to go in pursuit of him; but after exploring those seas which he had lately visited, they returned without being able to satisfy their countrymen and the friends of humanity with respect to the fate of these unhappy adventurers. His voyages, as far as he sent a report of them to Europe, have been published, in 4 vols. 4to.

PERRAULT, Claude, an eminent author, born at Paris, 1613. He was bred up a physician, but he practised only in his own family, and for the poor, and abandoned the profession for the more pleasing pursuits of literature and the fine arts. In architecture he was particularly great, and the entrance into the Louvre, as Voltaire observes, is one of the most august monuments of architecture in the world. At the request of Colbert he translated Vitruvius, and adorned the work with plates. He also contributed some valuable papers to the memoirs of the academy of sciences, of which he was member. He was unfortunately engaged in a quarrel with Boileau, against whom he maintained the superiority of the moderns against the ancients; but though the poet ridiculed the artist, and was consequently abused in his turn, they were afterwards happily reconciled. Perrault died 9th Oct. 1688, aged 75. He wrote besides, Abridgment of Vitruvius, 12mo.—Description of Machines of his own Invention—Memoirs for a Natural History of Animals, folio—on the Ancient Columns of Architecture and their Ornaments, &c. Though he never practised physic, the faculty of Paris placed his picture by the side of those of Fernelius, Riolanus, and others, in respect not only for his knowledge of medicine, but for his superior acquirements in physics, and in the fine arts.

PERRAULT, Charles, brother of Claude, was born at Paris, 1626. His abilities early recommended him to Colbert, by whom he was made clerk of the buildings, and afterwards comptroller general of the finances. This high situation enabled him to gratify the wishes of his heart. He patronised learned men, and encouraged the arts and the sciences, and to his honourable influence the establishment of the academies of painting, sculpture, and architecture, was owing. The death of Colbert, however, in 1683, produced his disgrace, and he retired from an ungrateful court to a life of solitude and study. He wrote various works in verse and prose, and his poem called La Heinture, was received in 1668 with great applause. Le Siecle de Louis le Grand, which appeared in 1688, was a declaration of war against the opinions of learned men, and by elevating the moderns to a rank superior to the ancients in every species of composition, he brought on a controversy, in which he had to oppose the powerful abilities of Boileau, Menage, and other respectable writers. The opposition of Boileau was guided by interest as well as pride; and when the prince of Conti threatened to write on his seat in the academy, "tu dors, Brutus," thou sleepest, Brutus, the poet considered himself seriously called upon to combat Perrault, which he did most ably, in his work annexed to Critical Reflections on Longinus. These two great antagonists were reconciled in 1699, and Perrault some time after published his Historical Eulogiums on the Great Men of the 17th century, 2 vols. folio. Perrault died 1703, aged 77. He was a man of great respectability, since madam Dacier, who has censured him with severity as an author, describes him as a pious, sincere, virtuous, polite, and modest character, employing his influence not to serve himself, but his friends. He wrote besides, Parallel of the Ancients and Moderns—the Cabinet of the Fine Arts, folio—Reflections on Longinus, Svo.—Poems—

Taernus's Fables, &c. He had two other brothers, Nicolas and Peter, also distinguished in literature.

PERRIER, Francis, a French painter, born at Maçon, 1590. He was dissipated in his youth, and ran away from his parents, and then joined himself to a blind beggar, whom he accompanied to Rome, and with whom he shared the alms obtained on the road from the hands of charity. In the midst of his distress at Rome he applied himself to his pencil, and soon was enabled to live independently. He then returned to France through Lyons, and after a second residence of 10 years in Italy, he came again to Paris, in high favour with the great. He painted the gallery of the Hotel de la Vrilliere, and died professor of the academy, 1650. He etched some of Raphael's works, and other pieces, and also engraved in the chiaro oscuro, some antiquities in an admired style, of which he was said by some to be the inventor. In his manner he chiefly imitated Lanfranc, and in his landscapes was little inferior to Caracci.

PERRIER, Charles, a French poet, nephew to the preceding, was born at Aix in Provence. As a Latin poet he possessed such excellence, that Menage, who had the settlement of a political dispute between him and his pupil Santeuil, honoured him with the title of prince of lyric poets. He afterwards applied himself to French poetry, and with such success that he obtained twice the prize of the French academy. He died 1692. Though respectable as a writer, he was, as a man, very affected, self-conceited, and disagreeably proud of his poetical name.

PERRON, James Davy du, a cardinal celebrated for his learning and his political knowledge. He was born of noble parents, 25th Nov. 1556, and educated in the protestant faith; and he displayed so much attention to his studies, that he was early distinguished as a scholar, and in 1576, he was introduced by Desportes, abbot of Trion, to Henry III. at Blois, as a prodigy of great learning. As a theological disputant he acquired much celebrity at Paris; but he soon after abjured the tenets of the protestants, and laboured with great assiduity to convert others to the catholic faith. Henry IV. was in the number of those on whom his eloquence and subtilty prevailed, and so highly valued were his services, that he was made by the grateful monarch, at first bishop of Evreux, and afterwards grand almoner of France, archbishop of Sens, and at last raised to the dignity of cardinal, 1604. His abilities as a negotiator were repeatedly employed by the king with the see of Rome; and with the most persuasive eloquence and inviolate integrity he served his master without injuring the interests of the church. The last years of his life were devoted to retirement and the revision of his works. He died at Paris, 5th Sept. 1618, aged 63. Du Perron was universally acknowledged to be a man of deep erudition, well versed in profane and ecclesiastical history, artful and penetrating, capable of painting his plans as plausible and reasonable, and so powerful and argumentative in disputes, that the ablest scholars were afraid of him, and even Du Plessis Mornay, himself so celebrated, appeared against him in the presence of Henry with almost inferior abilities. He wrote a Treatise on the Eucharist—another against king James I. of England—Letters—Dissertations—Acts of Conference with Du Plessis Mornay, &c. all of which have been collected in 3 vols. folio, with an account of his life. The "Perroniana," published after his death, are unworthy of his fame, and probably were impositions on the credulity of the world.

PERRON, Anquetil du, a learned Frenchman, member of the academy of inscriptions and belles lettres, and of the national institute. He undertook a voyage to the East, and became acquainted with the original works of Zoroaster, and also the language of the ancient Persians; and after surmounting many difficulties he returned to Europe, loaded with the literary spoils of India, which were deposited in the king's library at Paris. An account of this journey, so interesting to science, was published in 1771, 3 vols. 4to.; but it is to be lamented that he speaks with virulence and disrespect of the English, from whom he had received every mark of attention and courtesy. This learned man died at Paris, Nov. 1805, aged 73. He published several historical works besides, and left some valuable MSS.

PERRONET, John Rodolphus, member of the academy of sciences at Paris, and of the learned societies of London, Stockholm, &c. rose by his merit to the respectable office of director general of bridges and roads in France. He was a pupil of Beaufire, and for his services was rewarded with the order of St. Michael, and became inspector, and afterwards director of the school of engineers at Paris. The bridges of Neuilly, Nantes, Orleans, &c. were constructed under his direction, and the public roads of the kingdom were improved by his judicious plans. This worthy man, as respectable in private life as he was esteemed for his public services, died 1794, aged 86. He published a Description of the Bridges which he had erected, 2 vols. folio—Memoirs on the Method of Constructing Grand Arches of Stone from 200 to 500 feet, over Valleys, 4to. &c.

and died 1480. He was author of a Commentary on Martial; of a Treatise on Hippocrates; and of a Translation of Polybius into Latin, &c.

PERROT, Sir John, was born of a respectable family, about 1527. Educated for the services of the court in the house of the marquis of Winchester, he quickly became one of the favourites of Edward VI. and was made a knight of the Bath at his coronation. Under Mary he was disgraced, and with difficulty escaped with his life, for extending his protection to some suspected protestants; but in the next reign he was recalled to court, and sent in 1572, as president of Munster, to quell a dangerous rebellion in Ireland. He also distinguished himself as admiral of the fleet, against the meditated invasion of Ireland by the Spaniards; but when appointed lord lieutenant of that kingdom in 1583, he rendered himself very unpopular by the severity of his measures. His enemies had, in consequence, sufficient influence to procure his recall, and in 1588, he returned to England, and was sent to the Tower, and four years after tried for high treason, and condemned. His services pleaded so strongly in his favour with Elizabeth, that she acknowledged his innocence, and respited him. He died the same year in his confinement.

PERROT, Nicolas, sieur d'Ablancourt, a learned Frenchman, born at Chalons sur Marne, April 5th, 1606. He studied at Sedan and at Paris, and applied himself to the law, and was admitted advocate of the parliament. He soon after abandoned that profession, abjured the protestant faith, and devoted himself to literature. His preface to the "Honnete Femme" of du Bosc procured him high reputation, and soon after he was again reconciled to the protestant tenets, and then visited Holland and England, till the clamour excited by his religious inconsistency had been hushed. In 1637 he was admitted into the French academy, and afterwards undertook a translation of Tacitus. He spent his last years in retirement, and died on his estate of Ablancourt, of the gravel, Nov. 17th, 1664. He translated into French Tacitus, Minutius Felix, Lucian, Cæsar, Arrian, Thucydides, and others. He wrote, besides, a Discourse on the Immortality of the Soul; and a History of Africa, 3 vols. 4to.

PERRY, John, an Englishman, captain in the navy, and celebrated as an engineer. He was employed by Peter the Great, of Russia, to form a communication between the Wolga and the Don, and in making the Veronise navigable; but though thus useful to the kingdom, and though laboriously engaged in improving the Russian navy, he was unhandsomely treated by the government, and when unable to obtain any remuneration for his services, he quitted the place, 1712, under the protection of the English envoy, Mr. Whitworth. His abilities were next successively engaged in 1721, in stopping the breach at Dagenham, in Essex, of which he published an account. He wrote also the State of Russia, 1716, 8vo. and died 11th Feb. 1733.

PERRY, Oliver Hazard, captain in the navy of the United States, was born at Newport, Rhode Island, in August, 1785. He entered the navy as a midshipman, in 1798, and served in the Mediterranean during the war with Tripoli. He became a lieutenant in 1810, and in 1812 had charge of a flotilla of gun-boats in the harbour of New-York. He was soon after removed to lake Ontario, to serve under commodore Chauncey, and was despatched by that officer to take charge of the squadron fitting on lake Erie. Having equipped a fleet of nine small vessels he met the enemy on the tenth of September, who were superior in force, and succeeded after a conflict of three hours in capturing their whole fleet. This extraordinary victory gave him great reputation, and procured his immediate advancement to the rank of captain. After the peace he commanded the Java in the expedition under commodore Decatur to the Mediterranean. In 1819 he sailed in the John Adams on a cruise to the West Indies, and died of the yellow fever near Port Spain, Trinidad, August 23d, 1820. Congress exhibited the respect in which they held him, by making provision for the support of his family.

PERSÆUS, son of Philip of Macedonia, was defeated at Pydna, and his kingdom destroyed by Paulus Æmilius, B.C. 168. He was carried a captive to Rome.

PERSIUS, Aulus Flaccus, a celebrated Roman satirist in the age of Nero. Cornutus, the stoic, was his master. He died A.D. 62. His satires are very severe and obscure.

PERTINAX, Publius Helvius, a Roman emperor of obscure origin. From an instructor of youth he became a soldier, and on the death of Commodus, 193, he was raised to the imperial purple. His virtues promised a happy reign for Rome, but the state was too deeply sunk into vice and debauchery to suffer the rule of a magnanimous prince. He was assassinated by his soldiers a few months after his elevation.

PERUGINO, Pietro, an Italian painter, born 1446, at Perugia. He was the disciple of Verocchio, at Florence, and chiefly excelled in the natural and elegant expression of his female figures. He was the master of Raphael, and was patronised by Sixtus IV. for whose chapel at Rome he painted some beautiful pieces. He was remarkably fond of money, and the loss of his treasure, which he always carried about him, and of which he was robbed, caused his death, 1524, in his 78th year. His best piece is an altar piece, in St. Peter's church, Perugia.

PERUZZI, Balthasar, eminent as a painter and architect, was born at Volterra or Sienna, 1481. He was patronised by the popes Alexander VI. Julius II. and Leo X. and under the last he finished some designs and models for the ornamenting of St. Peter's, under the architect Bramante. He was taken prisoner at Rome, when that city was sacked by Charles V. but he was restored to liberty by painting a portrait of the constable Bourbon. His execution of the perspective, and of the chiaro oscuro, was so perfect as to excite the astonishment of Titian. He died poor, 1556.

PESELLI, Pesello, a painter of Florence, who died 1517, aged 77. He was the pupil of Andrea del Castagno, and his historical pieces, his animals, &c. were finished in such correct and elegant style as to command universal approbation.

PESELIER, Charles Stephen, member of the academies of Nancy, of Amiens, Rouen, and Angers, was born at Paris, 9th July, 1712. His parents wished to educate him for the law, but such was his partiality for literature and poetry that his leisure hours were assiduously devoted to the muses. He was united with Lallemand in the management of the finances of the kingdom, and the plans he proposed were applauded by the French ministry. His extreme application to financial affairs proved too powerful for his delicate constitution, and he fell a victim to excessive mental fatigue, 24th April, 1763. He wrote "Ecole du Temps," a comedy—Esopé au Parnasse, a comedy—la Mascara de du Parnasse, a comedy in one act—Letters on education, 2 vols. 12mo.—General Idea of the Finances, folio, 1759—Doubts addressed to the Author of Theory of Taxation, 12mo.—Fables after la Fontaine's manner, &c.

PETAVIUS, Dionysius, or DENIS PETAU, a French Jesuit, born at Orleans 21st Aug. 1583. His abilities were early observed and encouraged by his father, and after acquiring the most perfect knowledge of belles lettres, the classics, mathematics, and philosophy, he was at the age of 19 made professor of philosophy at Bourges. He was admitted among the Jesuits 1605, and his great and extensive erudition was employed in the defence of the catholic religion against the protestants, and his criticisms were particularly directed against Scaliger, and even against his friend Casaubon. He died after a laborious life spent in the service of science and literature, 11th Dec. 1652, at Paris, in the college of Clermont. He was, according to Gassendus, the most consummate scholar the Jesuits ever had, and so high was his reputation that Urban VIII. and Philip IV. of Spain, invited him with the most liberal promises to settle in their respective territories, which his attachment to his native country and the precarious state of his health obliged him to decline. As a chronologist he was particularly eminent, and his Latin is universally acknowledged as elegant and refined. He wrote de Doctrina Temporum, 2 vols. fol.—Uranologia, 3 vols.—Rationarium Temporum, fol. and Leyden, 2 vols. 8vo. a valuable work abridged by Le Clerc—Dogmata Theologica, 5 vols. fol.—the Psalms translated into Greek verse, 12mo.—de Ecclesia Hierarchia, folio, besides controversial pamphlets, and some valuable editions of some of the fathers.

PETHION DE VILLENEUVE, Jerome, a native of Chartres, who quitted the profession of the law to become a member of the constituent assembly. His conduct as a legislator was violent and factious, and as he possessed some powers as a speaker, he contributed much in extinguishing the splendour which surrounded the monarch. His popularity raised him to the dangerous office of mayor of Paris, and on the 20th of June he proved to the people how little he respected the unhappy Louis. His hatred against the king hastened the horrors of the 10th of August, and of the first days of September; but when he, as first magistrate of the city, might have checked or arrested the 30 assassins who murdered in cold blood the most innocent victims, he affected to permit the people to punish their enemies. The abolition of royalty and the fall of Louis completed the gratification of his guilty ambition, but while he aspired to the difficult office of guiding the destinies of a tumultuous republic, he found a powerful rival in Robespierre, and in the struggle was defeated by his antagonist. Outlawed by his victorious opponents, 31st May, 1793, he fled from the capital in disguise, and was some time after found lifeless in a corn-field near St. Emilion, in the Gironde, a victim to hunger and misery, and with his corpse disfigured and partly devoured by birds of prey. His friends and supporters have represented him as a man of obliging manners, and of strict undeviating integrity; but posterity must view him as an ambitious hypocrite, whose sole aim was to gain popularity, and to ascend to the sovereignty on the ruins of the throne. With a pleasing figure and captivating manners he possessed deep dissimulation, and while he affected the justice and the sobriety of Aristides, his conduct betrayed the dark designs of the murderer and incendiary. His works, containing some political tracts, speeches, &c. have appeared in 4 vols. 8vo. 1793.

PETER, chief of the apostles, was son of John and brother of Andrew, and of the city of Bethsaida. He was fishing on the borders of the lake Gennesareth when called by Christ to become an apostle, and he not only obeyed the benign invitation, but ever after showed his strong and decided attachment to the person of his master. He was one of the three apostles who were present at the transfiguration, and it was to him particularly that the Saviour recommended the care of his sheep. When Jesus was betrayed Peter displayed great courage, and drawing his sword cut off the ear of the high priest's servant; but when he saw that his master was detained as a malefactor, his courage failed him, and he followed with pusillanimous curiosity, and when questioned who he was, denied three times his blessed master, that the words of Jesus might be fulfilled, "before the cock crow thou shalt deny me thrice." After the ascension of Christ Peter evinced great boldness in the cause of the gospel; by his preaching he converted to the faith 3000 souls at once, and manifested the truth of his doctrines by signs and miracles. When imprisoned by Herod Agrippa, he was set at liberty by an angel, and sent forth to preach the gospel out of Judea. Under the persecutions of Nero, Peter was seized and put to death at Rome, by being crucified with his head downwards, A.D. 66. He wrote two epistles which are among the canonical books, but the gospel, the Acts, &c. said to have been written by him are popular inventions of the monks.

PETER, St. a bishop of Alexandria, 300, who suffered martyrdom 311. He was a learned prelate, and formed the penitential canons, and made some wholesome regulations for the suppression of vice in his diocess. Some of his letters are extant in Theodoret.

PETER CHRYSOLOGUS, St. archbishop of Ravenna, 433, died about 458. His works, consisting of 176 sermons, &c. have been edited, Venice, 1750, fol. and Augsburg, 1758.

PETER III. king of Arragon, succeeded to his father, James I. 1276. He laid claim to the dominions of Navarre, but was unable to establish his pretensions by force of arms. As he had married Constance, daughter of Mainfroy, king of Sicily, he formed the plan of seizing the kingdom against the claims of Charles of Anjou, and to support the success of his designs he determined to assassinate at one blow all the French in the island. This horrid massacre, which was perpetrated on Easter day, 1282, and which was therefore called Sicilian Vespers, made him easily master of the kingdom; but the indignation of the people rendered his possessions precarious. Martin IV. excommunicated him, together with all the Sicilians, and also placed his Spanish dominions under the same interdict. Peter attempted to ward off the public odium by challenging his rival of Anjou; but though the day was appointed he had not the courage to appear against him in the field. He died at Villefranche, 28th Nov. 1285, leaving Sicily to his second son, James, and Arragon to his other son, Alphonso.

PETER, the Cruel, king of Castile, succeeded at the age of 16 his father, Alphonso XI. 1350. He was wanton and tyrannical, and three days after he had married Blanche, daughter of the duke of Bourbon, he repudiated her with every mark of disgrace, to renew his infamous connexion with Maria de Pradilla, his mistress. Another queen was treated with equal indignity, and Peter at last so irritated his subjects by his inhumanity that they rose up against him, 1366, headed by his natural brother, Henry, count of Transtamare. Though for a while he withstood his enemies, by the assistance of the English, he soon found the general odium too great to be conquered, and in a battle which was fought 14th March, 1369, he was defeated and killed by his brother, who ascended the throne.

PETER ALEXIOWITZ I. surnamed the Great, son of Alexis Michaelowitz, Czar of Muscovy, succeeded to the throne on the death of his brother Theodore, to the exclusion of his elder brother Iwan, whose health and intellects were too feeble to support the cares and fatigues of government. This gave offence to the princess Sophia, his half sister, who roused into rebellion the Strelitzes, a formidable body of militia, nearly resembling the Janissaries of the Ottoman Porte; but Peter was too wise to foment a civil war, and he consented to share the throne with his brother Iwan. Without education, yet endowed with the strongest powers of nature, Peter felt that much was still to be acquired before he could realize the vast projects which he had formed in his mind. To counteract the formidable power of the Strelitzes, who were not only devoted to the interests of the intriguing Sophia, but more inclined to dispute than to obey the commands of their superior, he determined to become the favourite of the army, and enlisting as a private soldier in a company which were dressed and disciplined in the German manner he gradually rose to command by his services, and by sharing the toils and the privations of the military life. The sight of some Dutch and English ships roused his attention to naval affairs, and while he meditated the aggrandizement of Russia he never abandone his favourite scheme of erecting a navy. By the death of his brother, in 1696, he became sole emperor, and then increased his dominions by the conquest of Azoph from the Turks. Still, however, feeling his inferiority as a naval power, he sent in 1698 an embassy to Holland, and went in a disguised character in the ambassador's suite: and that he might personally be acquainted with the process of ship building, he enrolled himself at Amsterdam among the ship carpenters, and worked with unusual assiduity, under the name of master Peter. The next year he passed over to England, where in four months he acquired the complete knowledge of ship building, and after receiving every mark of respect from William III. he left the country, accompanied by several English ship builders and artificers, whom he employed with great liberality and kindness in his naval yards. From England he went to Vienna: but the intelligence that Sophia had again intrigued with the Strelitzes, and roused them to rebellion, hastened his return to Moscow. The ringleaders were punished with severity; but the princess, who was the most guilty, was only confined with greater severity in the solitude of a monastery. Improved by the view of foreign countries, the forms of their government, and the knowledge of their commercial resources, Peter now displayed to the world the enlightened plans of his capacious mind. He not only sent his nobles to foreign countries, to improve and adorn their minds, but he liberally invited the wisest and the most learned among distant nations to come and seek an honourable residence in Russia, and to instruct his uncivilized subjects in the various arts which humanize and sweeten life. The hitherto barbarous coasts of Russia were therefore visited by sailors, artists, mechanics, mathematicians, and adventurers of every degree and profession, and though his subjects viewed these new settlers with jealousy, the policy of Peter soon mingled and united them by the strong ties of mutual dependence and social union. In 1700 he declared war against Charles XII. of Sweden, and though frequently defeated by the superior tactics and heroic valour of his enemy, he nevertheless persevered with undaunted courage, observing, "though I know I must be overcome for a great while, my armies will at last be taught to conquer." In the midst of his disasters in Poland, he formed the vast project of erecting a new metropolis on the Baltic Sea, for his immense territories; and after he had added to his dominions the best part of Livonia and Ingria, he in 1703 laid the foundations of Petersburg, which he destined for the northern capital of his empire. Though often defeated, at last the battle of Pultowa, in 1709, came to crown his earnest wishes, and he saw the long-victorious Swedes conquered, and their heroic leader Charles obliged to fly for safety into the Turkish dominions. Peter used this great victory like a wise man; the Swedish prisoners were induced, by liberal offers, to settle among their conquerors, and not less than 3000 officers were prevailed upon, by the kind treatment of the Czar, to fix their residence and spread civilization, improvement, and the arts of polished life, in various parts of his extensive empire. In consequence of the victory of Pultowa, Peter was enabled to secure the possession of Livonia and Ingria, to which he afterwards added part of Pomerania and Finland; but the intrigues of Charles XII. at the Turkish court, at last prevailed upon the Ottomans to break the truce, and in 1712 Peter was suddenly surrounded on the banks of the Pruth, and his army devoted to destruction. While he considered every thing lost, his wife Catherine had recourse to stratagem, and by offering a large bribe to the grand vizier, she saved her husband's honour, and his army, and in consequence of this meritorious action, the grateful Czar established the order of St. Catherine, into which only women are admitted. The defeat of the Swedish fleet near Holstein in 1714, and the subsequent treaty of peace with Charles XII. now enabled Peter to visit again foreign countries in pursuit of improvement and better knowledge. In 1716 he was in Denmark, and after visiting the schools, public places, and curiosities, he passed to Hanburgh, Hanover, Wolfenbuttle, and Holland, and the next year proceeded to Paris. In the capital of France he was received with great ceremony, and admitted member of the academy of sciences; but despising the pomp and pageantry of greatness, he preferred the conversation of the learned and the intelligent, and returned home better pleased with the information which he had received, than with the unmeaning marks of homage which flattery had paid to his imperial rank. When at Paris he visited the tomb of Richelieu, exclaiming, "great minister, would it might have happened you had lived in my age, I would have granted you half of my dominions to learn from you how to govern the rest." Returned to Russia, Peter laboured earnestly to reform and improve the character of his country. After breaking gradually to pieces the dangerous establishment of the Strelitzes, he established a regular body of 100,000 troops; he built a navy of forty ships of the line; he established colleges and schools of medicine, botany, belles lettres, &c. in the chief cities of his dominions, and by purchasing pictures of value and celebrity from Italy, he introduced a taste for painting and the fine arts among his subjects ; and to supply resources for their gradual improvement, he made the largest possible collections of books and manuscripts in various languages, which were wisely distributed where they could prove most useful. In other respects he was equally attentive to the happiness and morality of his people. Religion, pure and uncorrupt, was made, as far as his zealous endeavours could, to supersede superstition and ignorance ; the patriarchate, which had once been formidable even to the sovereign, was abolished, and while canons the most salutary were made for ecclesiastical affairs, it was ordered that the people should be instructed in religious knowledge by their priests in their own, and not in a foreign language. The laws also were rendered more simple and less arbitrary, and the decisions of all law-suits, were to be announced before the expiration of eleven days ; and in short every measure which could tend to meliorate the situation of the people, to increase their knowledge, to enlarge their understanding, and to contribute to their comfort, was, with the wisest and most liberal policy, adopted and enforced. This truly great and worthy prince died of a strangury, caused by an imposthume in the neck of his bladder, 28th Jan. 1725, in his 53d year. Peter had a son Alexis, who lived to the age of manhood ; but he unfortunately engaged in a conspiracy in 1717 against his father, and was condemned to die ; and though the sentence was suspended, he died some short time after, not without suspicion of being cut off privately by the resentment of the Czar, as several of his accomplices suffered the severest punishment of the law. At his death, Peter appointed for his successor his widow the Czarina, Catherine, whom, from a soldier's wife he had raised, in consequence of her great merits and heroic character, to share his bed and his throne. Peter is one of the few sovereigns who have been authors. He wrote several pieces on naval affairs ; and as he was member of the Paris academy, he sent to that learned body a chart of the Caspian, which had been taken by his directions, and he always received with pleasure the volumes of their memoirs, which were regularly transmitted to him.

PETER II. emperor of Russia, son of Alexis Petrowitz, was declared grand duke of Russia 1726, and the next year succeeded the empress Catherine, at the age of 13. The prominent feature of his reign is the banishment into Siberia of the great favourite and minister, Menzikoff. The emperor died of the smallpox, 1738, aged 15.

PETER III. Emperor of Russia, son of Anne Petrowna, the eldest daughter of Peter the Great, and Charles Frederic, duke of Holstein-Gottorp, was born 1728, and declared grand duke of Russia 1742, by his aunt, the empress Elizabeth, after whom he ascended the throne, 25th Dec. 1761. The beginning of his reign was auspicious ; he disregarded the measures of severity which his predecessors had practised, and sought for popularity in the mildness and justice of his government. He was a strong admirer of the character of the heroic king of Prussia, but unfortunately wanted the vigour and decision which marked that great man. His attempts therefore to reform his people proved abortive, and rendered him contemptible ; so that his wife Catherine took advantage of his timidity, and dethroned him, 6th July, 1762, and assumed the reigns of government under the name of Catherine II. Peter died seven days after this degradation ; but though his death was attributed by some to an hemorrhoidal flux, it is too evident that violence terminated his existence. Little respect has been shown to his memory, and probably because he meditated the subversion of the religion of his country, and the introduction of the simpler worship of the protestants, in the stead of the more ceremonious and corrupted forms of the Greek church.

PETER NOLASQUE, a native of Languedoc, in the service of James, king of Arragon, under whose patronage he established, in 1223, the order of Mercy, whose sole business was the redeeming of Christian slaves from the power of the infidels. This worthy ecclesiastic, who so successfully and honourably contributed to soften the horrors of warfare and of captivity, died 1256, aged 67.

PETER of Sicily, was author, in the eighth century, of a curious and interesting History of the Manichees, published at Ingolstadt, by Mr. Raderus, in Greek and Latin, 1604.

PETER of Cluni, or the Venerable, was born in Auvergne, of a noble family, and embracing the ecclesiastical state, was made in 1121, general of the order of Cluni. He received with becoming magnificence at his abbey, pope Innocent II. in 1130, and he afterwards granted a kind and friendly asylum to the unfortunate Abelard. He died 24th Dec. 1156, aged 65. He was a man of great learning, and exemplary piety. He wrote, among other things, treatises on the Divinity of Christ—against the Jews—on Infant Baptism—the Authority of the Church—the Sacrifice of Mass, &c.

PETER, an ecclesiastic of Blois, who studied at Paris and Bologna, and was preceptor and then secretary to William II. king of Sicily. He was afterwards invited by Henry II. to England, where he obtained the archdeaconry of Bath, and afterwards that of London. He was a strict disciplinarian in the church, and a man of great piety. He died in England, 1200. Of his writings, 183 letters, 65 sermons, &c. have been preserved, best edited by Goussainville, in folio, 1667.

PETER the Hermit, a gentleman of Amiens in Picardy, who quitted the military profession to become a hermit and pilgrim. He was actuated by the sentiments which pervaded the Christian world at the close of the 11th century; and under the expectation of the immediate dissolution of the world, he, with many other deluded men, hastened to the Holy Land in 1093, that there he might terminate his days in a spot which had given birth to the Saviour of the world. On his return he spoke in so affecting a manner of the cruel treatment which the Christian pilgrims experienced in Palestine, that Pope Urban II. sent him over Europe to preach a general crusade to deliver the Holy Land from the oppression of the infidels. The eloquence of Peter, and the spirit of the times prevailed; a numerous concourse of people flocked together for the pious labour, and the holy hermit began his march at the head of above 40,000 men, all animated with the zeal of devotion, and the hopes of celestial protection. In crossing Hungary this religious army committed the most horrid excesses, and so provoked the inhabitants to revenge, that in skirmishes with them and with the Turks, many lost their lives, and only 3000 reached the gates of Constantinople. In advancing through Asia, the siege of Antioch delayed their progress, and Peter would have abandoned the hopeless enterprise had he not been bound by an oath by Tancred to share the dangers of the crusade. At the conquest of the Holy Land, and in the siege of Jerusalem, 1099, Peter behaved with great valour, and for his services was appointed vicar-general of Palestine. He afterwards returned to Europe, and died at the abbey of New-Montier, of which he was the founder.

PETER the wild boy, a youth found in a savage state in the woods near Hamelen in Hanover, 1726, where he had lived for some time on berries and roots. He was about 12 years old, but it is unknown how long he had been in that wild state; though from the remains of a shirt collar found about his neck, it is probable he had not been many years exposed. He came to England in 1727, by the direction of queen Caroline, and was placed at a farm-house at North Church, Herts; but neither care nor imitation could make him articulate words, and he died in 1735, a melancholy spectacle of savage idiotism, and uncivilized nature. He was in his conduct very tractable. The government very handsomely allowed a pension of 35*l.* a year for his support.

PETER LOMBARD. Vid. LOMBARD.

PETER MARTYR. Vid. MARTYR.

PETER d'OSMA, an ecclesiastic of the 15th century, at Salamanca, who may be said to be the forerunner of the reformation, as he preached and wrote against the doctrines and the infallibility of the church of Rome. The archbishop of Toledo ordered his writings to be burnt, and the pope confirmed the sentence in 1479.

PETERS, Gerard, a native of Amsterdam, 1580, who distinguished himself as a painter. His conversations, landscapes, &c. possess merit.

PETERS, Bonaventure, a native of Antwerp, eminent as a painter. His sea storms and other marine pieces, are highly admired. He died 1652, aged 38. His brother John also excelled as an artist, in his representation of sea fights, landscapes, &c.

PETERS, Francis Lucas, a painter, born at Mechlin. He was the pupil of Gerard Segers, and deserved the patronage of the archduke Leopold. His landscapes are highly admired. He died 1654, aged 48.

PETERS, Hugh, a native of Fowey in Cornwall, educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, from which he was expelled for irregularity. He next became an actor on the stage, and acquired some celebrity in low and buffoon characters, and afterwards was ordained by bishop Mountaine, and obtained the lectureship of St. Sepulchre's church in London. An intrigue with a married woman drove him from England, and after joining the independents at Rotterdam, he passed to North America; but on the breaking out of the civil wars, he returned to England. His turbulent spirit quickly engaged him in the cause of the parliament, whose interests he greatly and powerfully promoted in the pulpit, by his vehement eloquence and vulgar buffoonery. He was so inveterate against the king, and so instrumental to his condemnation, that at the restoration he was excepted from the act of pardon, and therefore was hanged and quartered, 1660. He was then 61.

PETERS Hugh, an English Jesuit, known in history as the friend and confessor of James II. His advice contributed much to the rash measures which rendered the monarch so unpopular, and which at last hastened his ruin.

PETERS, Charles, the learned author of a "Critical Dissertation on the Book of Job," was presented by Elizabeth, lady Mohun, to the living of Boconnoc in Cornwall in 1715, and resided there till 1727, when he obtained that of St. Mabyn in the same county, where he resided till his death in 1777. He was the intimate friend and correspondent of bishop Lowth, who speaks highly of him in his letter to Warburton.—W. B.

PETIT DE LA CROIX, Francis, interpreter of oriental languages to the French king, visited Turkey and Persia to perfect himself in the languages of those countries. He wrote the History of Gengis Khan, and other works on oriental history. He died at Paris, 1713.

PETIT, John Lewis, a celebrated surgeon, born at Paris, 1674. Under the kind directions of Littre, the anatomist, and Castet and Mareschal, the surgeons, he made such progress in anatomical and surgical knowledge, that he acquired a respectable practice in 1700. In 1726 he was invited to Poland, to cure the king, and he was equally successful in his attendance, in 1734, on Ferdinand, afterwards king of Spain. Though solicited to settle abroad on the most liberal terms, he preferred his native country, where he was noticed, and where he was honoured with a seat in the academy of sciences, and with the rank of rector of the royal school of surgery. He died at Paris, 20th April, 1750, aged 77. He invented some valuable surgical instruments, and wrote also, Surgery, published in 3 vols. 8vo. by Lesne, 1774—treatise on the Diseases of the Bones, 2 vols. 12mo.—Dissertations in the memoirs of the academy—besides Consultations on Venereal Complaints.

PETIT, Anthony, an eminent physician of Orleans. He wrote Chirurgical Anatomy, 2 vols. 12mo.—Discourse on Surgery—Report in favour of Inoculation—Medical Consultations—Project of a Reformation in Medicine, &c. He was member of the academy of sciences, and after practising with great celebrity at Paris, he retired to Olivet, near Orleans, where he died, 21st Oct. 1794, aged 72.

PETIT, Samuel, an eminent scholar, born at Nismes, and educated at Geneva, where he became professor of theology, of Greek and Hebrew. He was a man of extensive learning, and very amiable manners, and died at Geneva, Dec. 1645, aged 51. He wrote Miscellanea—Eclogæ Chronologicæ, 4to.—Varia Lectiones—Leges Atticæ, fol. a valuable work.

PETIT, Peter, a French mathematician, born at Montlucon in the diocess of Bourges, 1598. He came to Paris, 1633, and was employed as engineer by Richelieu, and visited the sea ports to examine their state, and suggest improvements. These public employments did not prevent him from applying to philosophical experiments; he was the friend of Pascal, of Mersennus, and of Des Cartes, whose opinions he at first opposed, but afterwards warmly adopted. He died 1677. He was author of Treatises on the Compass of Proportion—on the

PETIT, Peter, a learned Frenchman, born at Paris, 1617. He studied medicine, and took his degrees at Montpellier; but he neglected the profession when he came to Paris, and was tutor to Lamoignon's sons, and other great men. He was an excellent scholar, and wrote with great facility. He died 1687. His works are various. He wrote a Treatise on the Motion of Animals; Homeri Nepenthes, 8vo.; a Latin Treatise on the Amazons, 8vo. and in French 2 vols. 8vo.; Miscellaneous Observations; a Treatise on the Sibyl; de Novâ curandorum Morborum Ratione per Transfusionem Sanguinis; de Naturâ et Moribus Anthropophagorum, 8vo. besides some poems, one of which, Codrus, in Latin, is mentioned with great applause.

PETITOT, John, a celebrated painter, born at Geneva, 1607. From a jeweller, and the trade of enamelling, he acquired a great taste in painting; and with Bordier his friend, and afterwards his brother-in-law, he travelled into Italy, and by studying chymistry obtained a perfect knowledge of the useful preparation and management of colours. They afterwards came to England, and Petitot, whose pieces were now in universal esteem, was introduced by Mayerne the physician to Charles I. and he had the honour to take portraits of the whole family. The unfortunate death of his royal patron, to whom he was particularly attached, obliged him to fly to Paris, where he was treated with kindness by the second Charles, and particularly noticed by Lewis XIV. who granted him a pension, and a lodging in the Louvre palace. The revocation of the edict of Nantes terrified the painter, who was a zealous protestant, and after thirty-six years of residence he quitted France for Geneva. He died at Vevay in the canton of Berne, where he had retired, 1691, aged 84. In his private character he was very amiable, and of the meekest disposition. He lived in the greatest harmony with his brother-in-law for fifty years, and separated from him only when their respective families became too numerous for the comforts and privacy of one house. Petitot had seventeen children by his wife, but only one of his sons followed his profession. In the completion of his pictures he painted the heads and hands with astonishing effect of colouring, and his friend Bordier painted the hair, the draperies, and the ground. He is deservedly regarded as the inventor of painting in enamel, in which he greatly excelled.

PETIVER, James, an English botanist, apothecary to the Charter-house, and fellow of the Royal Society, was distinguished as a judicious collector of natural curiosities. Sir Hans Sloane offered him 4000*l.* for his valuable museum, and he afterwards obtained it when disposed of after his death. He died 20th April, 1718, and was honourably attended to his grave by the most eminent men of the age. He published Musæi Petiveriani Centuriæ decem, 8vo.; Gazophylacii Naturæ et Artis Decades decem, folio; a Catalogue of the Plants on the Mountains near Geneva; Pterigraphia Americana, folio; Plantæ rariores Chinesenses, &c.; besides communications to the philosophical transactions, and assistance to Mr. Ray. His works altogether appeared, two vols. folio, and one 8vo. 1764.

PETRARCH, Francis, a celebrated Italian poet, deservedly called the father of modern poetry, as his genius and great learning tended to revive ancient literature in Europe. His father, who was of noble birth, was driven from Florence by the superior influence of the party of the Neri, and retired to Arezzo, where the poet was born, 1304. Afterwards the father settled at Avignon, and sent his son to the school of Carpentras; and there, and then at Montpellier and Bologna, he completed his education. The future bard was intended by his father for the law, but poetry, eloquence, and history, had more charms for him than all the writers on jurisprudence. Losing his mother in 1324, and his father the next year, he was left to his own independent choice, and soon fixed his residence at Vaucluse, five miles from Avignon, where he devoted himself to literary pursuits. This spot became more and more endeared to him from his love for the beautiful Laura de Noves, whom he first saw and passionately admired in 1627; but though the warm feelings of his heart were conveyed in the most rapturous language of elegant poetry, he could, it is said, make no impression on the heart of the unkind fair. Perhaps to divert his affections, he now began to think of travelling, and after visiting Paris, Flanders, Germany, and Rome, he was at last persuaded to enter into the service of pope John XXII. The love of Vaucluse and of Laura, however, prevailed over the temptations of greatness, and the favour of the powerful; and Petrarch, once more restored to his favourite seat, again devoted his hours to studious pursuits, and to the praises of his beloved mistress. The sweetness of his poetry, and the graces of his muse spread in the mean time his celebrity beyond the confines of Avignon, and at the same moment he was solicited by the senate of Rome, by the university of Paris, and by the king of Naples, to come and receive the poetical crown. The offers of Rome, once the mistress of the world, and the cradle of poets, historians, and orators, were too flattering to be withstood, and the modest bard appeared in the capitol, where the poetic crown was fixed on his head with the most solemn ceremony by the Roman senator Orso count d'Anguillara, on Easter-day 1341, and he was declared a citizen of Rome. From Rome he visited Parma, and in 1343 was drawn from his favourite Vaucluse by pope Clement VI. who sent him to compliment Joan on her accession to the Neapolitan crown. While at Verona, in 1348, he was informed of the death of his favourite Laura, a melancholy event which deeply affected him, and which he immortalized by all the powers of poetry. In 1352 he bid adieu for ever to his beloved retreat of Vaucluse, which the death of Laura had converted from a scene of pleasure and enjoyment, to corroding care and melancholy reflection; and he entered afterwards in the service of the Visconti at Milan. and was engaged in negotiations and political affairs. Though informed that his patrimony was restored by the Florentines, he preferred to these new honours from the city of Florence, the peaceful retreat of Arquà, near Padua, given him by his friend and patron, Francis de Carrara, and there he died July 1374, aged 70. Petrarch was an ecclesiastic, though he never took priests' orders, and he obtained an archdeaconry and two canonries. He was in private life a very amiable and respectable character; he neither coveted nor despised riches; but was guided by moderation, though flattered by the great, and honoured by the powerful. His passion for Laura was of the purest kind, though some have ventured to assert, that it was not unmixed with the most licentious concessions. He had a natural daughter by a lady of respectable family. Petrarch as a poet is deservedly celebrated as one of the restorers of classical learning, and he displayed all the powers of genius and poetical inspiration, not only in his own native language, but in Latin. His sonnets are esteemed as the sweetest, the most elegant, and most highly finished verses ever written in Italian, and his songs possess equal beauty and grace. His Latin poems are not entitled to similar praise. His Africa, or the Punic War, is censured as faulty, incorrect, and unclassical. His other works are De Remediis utriusque Fortunæ, 4to. translated into French—De Otio Religiosorum—De Verâ Sapientiâ—De Vitâ Solitariâ—De Contemptu Mundi—Rerum Memorabilium Libri Sex—De Republicâ optime administrandâ—Itinerarium Syriacum—Epistolæ—Orationes. His works have been edited in 4 vols. folio. Of his poems the best editions are that of Venice, 2 vols. 4to. 1756. His life has been written by twenty-six different authors, and of these the most valuable are those by Muratori, by De Sade, and by Dodson.

PETRE, Sir William, a native of Exeter, educated at Exeter college, Oxford, and in 1523, elected fellow of All-Souls. He applied himself to the study of the law, and took his degree of LL.D. and was appointed principal of Peckwater Inn. His abilities recommended him to lord Cromwell, who employed him in visiting the monasteries, and in the midst of the plunder of ecclesiastical property under Henry VIII. he received a considerable share. He had the art to continue in power under Henry VIII. Edward VI. and Mary, though the politics of the three reigns were very dissimilar; and under Elizabeth he added to his other employments, the office of secretary of state. Though dishonourably enriched by the plunder of the church, Sir William was a man of great talents, and he evinced his respect for learning and piety by some munificent donations to Exeter college, and other charitable institutions. His large property in Essex has devolved to his descendants, who were ennobled by James I. 1603. He died 1574.

PETRONIUS MAXIMUS, a Roman senator, who assassinated Valentinian III. and seized the throne, 455. He married the widow, who, ignorant of his crime, soon after called to avenge the death of her husband, Genseric, king of the Vandals. Petronius was put to death, and his body thrown into the Tiber.

PETRONIUS ARBITER, Titus, a Latin poet, who enjoyed the favour of Nero. He was accused of a conspiracy against the tyrant, and destroyed himself by opening his veins, A.D. 65. His poems are very elegant, though licentious.

PETTUS, Sir John, a native of Suffolk, who obtained the rank of deputy governor of the Royal mines, and was member of parliament for Dunwich, in the reign of Charles II. He wrote the History, Laws, and Places of the Chief Mines and Mineral Works in England and Wales, fol. 1670—Volatiles from the History of Adam and Eve, 8vo.—England's Independency of the Papal Power, 4to.—Fleta Minor, or the Laws of Art and Nature in knowing, assaying, &c. of Metals, fol. 1683, from the German, and translated while the author was in the Fleet prison. This intelligent man died about 1690.

PETTY, Sir William, an eminent writer born 16th May, 1623, at Rumsey in Hampshire, where his father was a clothier. In his native town at the grammar-school by strong application he acquired a competent knowledge of Latin, Greek, and French, besides arithmetic, geometry, dialing, and navigation, and at the age of 15 he went over to Normandy to improve himself further in the university of Caen. On his return home he was preferred in the navy, and at the age of 20, being master, as he says himself, of threescore pounds, he determined to travel abroad to augment his stock of knowledge. He visited Leyden, Utrecht, Amsterdam, and Paris, where he studied medicine, and so managed his little property that at his return to Rumsey in 1646, he was richer by 10*l.* than when he set out three years before. In 1647 he obtained from the parliament a patent for 17 years for his invention of a machine for double writing; but though the scheme did not succeed, it yet recommended him to the notice of the learned, and procured him a settlement at Oxford, where he acquired some reputation as assistant to the anatomical professor. By the influence of the parliament he obtained a fellowship at Brazen-nose, and was created M.D. in 1649, and two years after appointed professor of anatomy, and soon after music professor at Gresham college. In 1652 he went as physician to the army in Ireland, under Lambert, Fleetwood, and Henry Cromwell, and in 1654 he obtained the permission of the government to measure the various estates of the island, so that by his perseveance and ingenuity, there was no estate worth 60*l.* per annum, but was accurately marked, and all its boundaries ascertained. He was in 1655 made secretary to Henry Cromwell, and three years after was elected member of parliament for West Looe; but he was at that time accused of some misdemeanors, and though he could have vindicated his innocence, and proved the malice and persecution of his enemies, he was dismissed from his employments. At the restoration he was treated with great attention by the king, and knighted, and by patent created surveyor general of Ireland. About 1663 he invented his double bottomed ship, which could sail against wind and tide, of which he gave a model to the Royal Society, a learned body, of which he was one of the first members, and the most active promoter of its establishment. Sir William, whose mind was perpetually engaged in promoting the honour of his country, by useful projects and ingenious inventions, paid at the same time particular attention to his own interests, and acquired honourable opulence by being concerned in iron works, in a pilchard fishery, in lead mines, and in the timber trade. Though he was a considerable sufferer by the great fire of London, in 1666, he yet died very rich, and left to his family, estates of the value of not less than 15,000*l.* a year, at 6 per cent. interest. He died of a gangrene in his foot, occasioned by the gout, in Westminster, 16th Dec. 1687, and was buried at Rumsey, in his family vault. His son was created lord Shelburne, by king William. Sir William was a most correct and intelligent writer, and his various pamphlets on subjects of political economy, national and commercial pursuits, and financial affairs, all amounting to nearly 30, display his abilities as a man of superior knowledge, extensive information, and the most consummate judgment, to which were united, the purest benevolence, and all the amiable virtues of private life.

PETYT, William, a native of Skipton, Yorkshire, eminent for his knowledge of law antiquities. He studied the law, and was bencher and treasurer of the Inner Temple, and keeper of the records in the Tower. He wrote the Ancient Rights of the Commons Asserted, 8vo.—a Summary Review of the Kings and Government of England, and of the Jus Parliamentarium, or Rights of Parliament, folio. He died at Chelsea, 1707. His valuable Collection of Parliamentary Tracts is preserved in the library of the Inner Temple.

PEUCER, Gaspard, an eminent physician and mathematician, born at Bautzen, in Lusatia, 1525. He was professor of medicine at Wittemberg, and married Melancthon's daughter, whose works he edited, 5 vols. folio, but his opinions brought him into trouble. He was for 10 years imprisoned, and during that time he committed his thoughts on the margins of old books by means of ink, which he made with burnt crusts of bread infused in wine. He died 25th Sept. 1602. He wrote *De Præcipuis Divinationum Generibus—Methodus curandi Morbos Internos—de Febribus—Hypotheses Astronomicæ—Vita Illustrium Medicorum—*the Names of Moneys, Weights, and Measures.

PEUTEMAN, Peter, a painter, born at Rotterdam. It is said that he was roused by an earthquake from sleep, in the dissecting room of an anatomical school, which he had entered to become more familiarized with the appearances of dead bodies, in the representation of some scenes of mortality in which he was engaged; and when he saw, during the violent concussion, the skeletons all in motion from the ceiling, and the skulls rolling around him, he fled with terror and precipitation, and never recovered from the sudden shock, but died soon after, 1692, aged 42.

PEUTINGER, Conrad, a learned German, born at Augsburg, 1465. He studied in some of the Italian universities; and at his return home was appointed secretary to the senate of Augsburg. He was also useful to his country as an able negotiator in some of the European courts. He died 1547. He published Convivial Discourses, 8vo.; De Inclinatione Romani Imperii et Gentium Commigrationibus; De Rebus Gothorum, fol.; Romanæ Vestutatis Fragmenta in Augusta Vindelicorum, fol. besides a Chart formed in the reign of Theodosius the Great, containing the roads of the Roman armies in the Western empire, edited at Vienna, 1753, with dissertations and notes by Scheib.

PEYER, John Conrad, a physician of Schaffhausen, in the 17th century, famous for giving first an account of the intestinal glands, and of the fluid which lubricates the intestines. He published Exercitatio Anatomico-medica, &c. 1677; Methodus Historiarum, &c.; Experimenta circa Pancreas, &c.

PEYRERE, Isaac, a protestant writer, born at Bourdeaux. He was imprisoned at Brussels for publishing a book to prove that Adam was not the first man; but he was set at liberty by means of the prince of Condé his patron, and then went to Rome, where he abjured his opinions and Calvinism before Pope Alexander VII. He died 1676, aged 84. He wrote a relation of Greenland, 8vo.; of Iceland, 8vo.; and a book on the Restoration of the Jews, and other things.

PEYROUSE, Vid. PÉROUSE.

PEYSSONNEL, Charles, a French writer, born at Marseilles, 17th Dec. 1700. He went as secretary to Villeneuve, the ambassador to Constantinople, and travelled over Asia Minor, with the judicious observations of the philosopher and antiquary, and not only accurately marked the situation of some of the most famous cities of ancient times, but made the most valuable collection of medals, coins, and curiosities. He was afterwards consul at Smyrna, and with equal zeal advanced the interests of his country, and the progress of science. He was member of the academy of inscriptions, whose memoirs he enriched by several valuable dissertations. He wrote besides an Eulogy on Marshal Villars; a Dissertation on Coral, and other pieces on Commerce, &c. He died 1757, aged 56. His son was also consul at Smyrna, and a man of science and general information. He wrote Historical Observations on the Barbarians who once inhabited the shores of the Euxine and the Danube, 4to.; Observations on Baron de Tott's Memoirs, 8vo.; Les Numeros, 4 vols. 12mo. often edited; treatise on the Commerce of the Black Sea, 2 vols. 8vo.; Political Situation of France, 2 vols. 8vo.; Discourse on the Alliance of France with the Swiss and the Grisons, 8vo.; Examen of the Considerations on the Turkish War by Volney. This able and indefatigable author died 1790, at the age of 80.

PEZAY, Masson, Marquis of, captain of dragoons, born at Blois. He instructed Lewis XVI. in military tactics, and was rewarded with the place of inspector general of the coasts. He behaved with haughtiness in this employment, and in consequence of complaints made against him was disgraced and banished to his estate, where he died soon after 1778. He wrote poetry with great success. His Zelis au Bain, in six cantos, Les Soirées Helvétiques, &c. ; and the Campaigns of Maillebois, 3 vols. are admired. He also translated Catullus and Tibullus in French verse, but not elegantly.

PEZENAS, Esprit, a learned Jesuit, born at Avignon, where he also died 4th Feb. 1776, aged 84. He was professor of philosophy and hydrography at Marseilles, and published various things, the most known of which are a treatise on Pilotage, 8vo; Theory of Gauging, 8vo; Memoirs of Mathematics and Philosophy, &c. ; besides translations of Maclaurin's Algebra and Fluxions; Desagulier's experimental Philosophy; Ward's Young Mathematician's Guide; Baker on the Microscope; Smith's Optics; Dyche's Dictionary of Arts, &c.

PEZRON, Paul, a learned Frenchman, born at Hennebon, in Bretagne, 1639. He devoted himself to the study of Greek and Latin historians, and employed much time in tracing the origin of the language of the Goths, and set up a new system of chronology, in which he supposed that the world was far more ancient than 4000 years; but nearer 6000 before the birth of Christ. He was of the order of Citeaux, a doctor of the Sorbonne, and in 1697, abbot of Charmoye. He died 10th Oct. 1706. His works were l'Antiquité des Temps retable, 4to. in which he ingeniously defends the chronology of the septuagint against that of the Hebrew text; a Vindication of that work against Martianay et le Quien; Evangelical History confirmed by Jewish and Roman Histories; on the Antiquity of the Nation and Language of the Celts, 8vo. &c.

PFANNER, Tobias, called from his extensive knowledge, the living Archives of the house of Saxony, was secretary of the Archives to the duke of Saxe Gotha. He was born at Augsburg, and died at Gotha 1717, aged 76. He wrote the History of the Peace of Westphalia, 8vo. ; the History of the Assemblies of 1652-4; Theology of the Pagans; treatise on the Principle of Historic Faith, &c. all in Latin.

PFEFFERCORN, John, a famous converted Jew, who wished to persuade the emperor Maximilian to burn all Hebrew books except the Bible, because they contained magic, blasphemies, and other dangerous things. This artful scheme would have been adopted, had not Caprio and Ulric de Hutten exerted themselves successfully against it. He wrote Narratio de Ratione celebrandi Pascha apud Judæos; de abolendis Judæorum Scriptis, &c. and died about 1520.

PFEIFFER, Augustus, a learned orientalist, born at Lavenbourg, 1640. He was professor of Oriental languages at Wittemberg, Leipsic, and other places, and became superintendent of the churches of Lubeck, where he died Jan. 1698. He wrote Pansophio Mosaica; Critica Sacra; de Madora; de Trihæresi Judæorum; Sciagraphia Systematica Antiquit. Hebræorum, and his philosophical works were collected at Utrecht in 4to. 2 vols.

PFEIFFER, Lewis, a native of Lucerne, distinguished as a famous general in the service of Charles IX. of France. At the retreat of Meux, he preserved that monarch's life against the artful manœuvres of Condé, and by his valour contributed much to the victory of Montcontour, in 1569. He influenced the Swiss to favour the cause of the duke of Guise, and afterwards retired to his native country, where he died 1594, aged 64, chief magistrate of Lucerne.

PHÆDON, a native of Elis, the disciple of Socrates. After his master's death he returned to Elis, where he formed the sect of Elean philosophers.

PHÆDRUS, a Thracian, the freedman of Augustus. He was an excellent poet, and his fables possess great merit, beauty, and correctness. He was persecuted by Sejanus, in the reign of Tiberius.

PHÆDRUS, Thomas, professor of eloquence at Rome, and keeper of the Vatican library, in the 16th century, obtained that name in consequence of performing the part of Phædra in Seneca's Hippolytus. He had prepared some learned works for the press; but he was unfortunately run over by a cart, and though not wounded, died in consequence of the fright.

PHÆR, Thomas, a physician born in Pembroke-shire, and educated at Oxford. He studied the law for some time at Lincoln's Inn, but afterwards took his medical degrees, 1559, and published various works, chiefly compiled from the French. He also translated the nine first books, and part of the 10th of Virgil's Æneid, in Alexandrines of seven feet. The other books, together with Mapheus's 13th book, were afterwards finished by Thomas Twyne, a young physician, but with some carelessness, as he prints, "they whisted all," conticuere omnes, in the opening of the second book "they whistled all," a ludicrous mistake. He died soon after, the 12th August, 1560.

PHALARIS, a tyrant of Agrigentum in Sicily. He was particularly cruel towards his enemies, and the bull in which he tormented those who had incurred his displeasure is well known. He was at last put to death by his subjects, in his brazen bull, B. C. 561. The letters extant under his name are supposed to be spurious.

PHARAMOND, first king of France, and author of the famous Sauque law, which forbade the succession of females on the throne, reigned at Treves about 420. Some consider him only as a general of the combined forces of the Franks.

PHARNACES, son of Mithridates king of Pontus, cruelly revolted against his father. He was defeated by Cæsar with such facility, that he expressed the rapidity of the conquest by these words, veni, vidi, vici.

PHIEROCRATES, a Greek comic poet in the age of Aristophanes and Plato. His plays have perished.

PHIERECYDES, a philosopher of Scyros, B.C. 560, known as the master of the great Pythagoras. The invention of prosody is attributed to him by Diogenes. There was another of that name, 456 B.C. author of a history of Athens.

PHIDIAS, a celebrated sculptor of Athens. He formed for his country the famous statue of Minerva, and when banished in disgrace, he determined to outdo himself in making for the people of Elis the beautiful statue of Jupiter Olympius, which was reckoned one of the wonders of the world. He died about 432, B.C.

PHILANDER, William, a native of Chatillon, secretary to cardinal d'Armagnac, and archdeacon of St. Antoninus. He wrote a commentary on Vitruvius, fol. 1552, and a commentary on part of Quintilian, and died at Toulouse, 1565.

PHILELPHUS, Francis, a learned Italian, born at Zolentino, in the march of Ancona, 1398. He was, after studying at Padua, made professor of eloquence at Venice, and went as secretary to an embassy to Constantinople, where he married the daughter of the learned Emanuel Chrysoloras, 1419. He was afterwards noticed by the emperor John Palæologus, who sent him to Sigismund of Germany, to implore assistance against the Turks. He afterwards taught at Venice, Bologna, and other Italian universities with great popularity; but he was so sensible of his eminence in literature that he wished to tyrannize over the rest of the learned, and therefore he quarrelled not only with literary men, but with Cosmo de Medicis, his patron and friend. He died at Florence 31st July, 1481, aged 83. He wrote treatises de Morali Disciplinâ; de Exilio; de Jocis et Seriis Conviviorum; dialogues, odes, and poems, &c. which were all collected and published, Basle, 1739, folio. His eldest son Marius, a man also of learning, died at Milan, 1480.

PHILEMON, a comic poet of Greece, whose plays were, it is said, imitated by Plautus. He died B.C. 274, aged 97, in consequence of laughing at the sight of an ass eating figs.

PHILETUS, a Greek poet and grammarian of Cos, preceptor to Ptolemy Philadelphus, and author of epigrams and elegies now lost.

PHILLIDOR, N. a French musician of great eminence. He wrote several operas for the Parisian theatres, which were received with great applause, and still are repeated with increasing popularity. He also set to music the Carmen Seculare of Horace, which was much admired both at Paris and in London. As a calculator he had strong powers, and as a chess player he was superior to every other living person, so that a little before his death he, though blind, and aged 80, laid a wager against two skilful players, and beat them both at the same time. He died in London 30th Aug. 1795.

PHILIP, St. a native of Bethsaida, on the borders of the lake of Gennesareth, was the first whom Jesus called to become his disciple. He was a fisherman, and was also a married man and had several daughters. He preached the gospel in Phrygia, and died there at Hierapolis, though some suppose that he suffered martyrdom. The person who converted Candace's eunuch to the faith was also of that name, and was deacon in the church.

PHILIP II. king of Macedonia, was son of Amyntas, and ascended the throne 360 B.C. He had in his youth been educated at Thebes, and to the information and precepts which he received from the wisdom of Epaminondas he added the most heroic valour and the most ardent ambition. After defeating the Illyrians and other barbarians, he made war against Athens, and aspired to the sovereignty of Greece. His gold proved as powerful as his arms, and neither the eloquence of Demosthenes, nor the desperate courage of the Athenians, could oppose the torrent of his victories. He was assassinated by Pausanias B.C. 336, while meditating the conquest of Persia, at the head of the Grecian forces, of which he had artfully been declared the general, and he left his projects to be pursued by his son and successor, Alexander the Great.

PHILIP V. king of Macedonia, succeeded B.C. 220. His jealousy of the Roman power, and his alliance with Hannibal, proved the source of his misfortunes. His dominions were invaded by the consul Lævinus, and he was conquered. He is deservedly censured for putting his eldest son Demetrius to death, at the base instigation of his other son Perseus. He died B.C. 178.

PHILIP, Marcus Julius, the Arabian, from an obscure origin, and the low rank of a common soldier, ascended the imperial throne of Rome, by the assassination of the younger Gordian, 244. Though guilty of murder he acquired popularity at Rome, by his conduct and the magnificent manner in which he celebrated the secular games. He was assassinated by his soldiers near Verona, 249.

PHILIP I. king of France, succeeded his father Henry I. 1060, at the age of eight. His minority was under the care of Baldwin V. count of Flanders, but he lost this virtuous guardian in 1067, and gave way to mad schemes of ambition. He was defeated by the Flemings at Mont Cassel, and opposed with success by William the Conqueror of England; but he forgot his misfortunes in intoxication and voluptuous pleasures. Dissatisfied with his queen Bertha, he carried away Bertrade, the wife of the count of Anjou, and married her, for which flagitious conduct he was condemned by pope Urban II. and excommunicated by the council of Poitiers. He was afterwards, however, reconciled to the church, and his marriage with Bertrade declared valid. He died at Melun, 29th July, 1108, after a reign of 48 years.

PHILIP II. king of France, surnamed Augustus, succeeded his father Lewis VII. 1180, when 15 years old. His youth promised success to the machinations of his enemies, and therefore the king of England invaded his dominions; but Philip bravely met him, and obliged him to renounce his pretensions, and to renew the former treaties which existed between the two kingdoms. In the moments of peace he devoted himself wisely to improve the character of his subjects, and to meliorate their situation. Public robberies were repressed with severity, the respect for religion was enforced, the streets of Paris were rendered more commodious, and were paved, and the whole city was surrounded and fortified with walls and battlements. His conduct towards the Jews, however, tarnished the glory of his reign, and all their extortions could not justify his cruelty, nor permit that their just and lawful debtors should be discharged from their bonds. His disputes with the count of Flanders, and afterwards with Henry II. of England, were forgotten in his wishes to accompany the crusaders to the Holy Land. With the new king of England, Richard I. he laid siege to Acre, at the head of 300,000 men; but though victorious, he returned to Europe with little glory, and with no solid advantage. Jealousy between him and the king of England had produced a rupture, but though, on a mutual reconciliation, Philip had sworn on the gospel not to make any attempt against his rival's dominions in his absence, he had the cowardice to invade Normandy, and to take Evreux and other places. A defeat at Rouen was followed by a truce, and the French monarch soon after married Ingelberge, princess of Denmark, who was afterwards dishonourably divorced for Agnes, the daughter of the duke of Merania. This conduct roused the resentment of the pope, and for fear of excommunication, the monarch resigned his new bride, and was reconciled to his insulted queen. In 1199 Philip supported the pretensions of Arthur to the crown of England against his uncle, the usurper, John, and on the base murder of the young prince, the guilty monarch was summoned before the peers of France, to answer for his unnatural conduct. Condemned for the atrocious murder, he was deprived of his dominions on the continent, and Philip, pleased to strip so powerful a vassal, was still further animated in his hostility by the pope, whom John had offended. The French monarch was empowered by Innocent II. to seize England; but while he prepared to execute this pleasing command, the cowardly John resigned his dominions into the hands of the holy see, and Philip was required to desist from attempts against the fief of the church. The numerous armaments which had been prepared for the conquest of England, alarmed the neighbouring princes, and Philip had a war to maintain against Germany; but the famous battle of Bovines, in 1214, restored peace to France. Still ambitious to possess England, the French king prevailed upon the English barons, who offered him the crown, to call to their assistance his son Lewis, who, consequently, with his support, invaded the British dominions, and was crowned king at London. The death of John, however, frustrated all the plans of Philip; the English renounced their allegiance to their foreign master for their lawful prince, and Lewis returned a private man to France. Philip died soon after at Nantes, 14th July, 1223, aged 59. He was a wise and politic prince, intrepid as a warrior, enlightened as a legislator, and impartial as a judge. He was the most powerful of the French kings of the third race, and more than any other enlarged his dominions by the acquisition of new provinces.

PHILIP III. or the Hardy, was proclaimed king, 1279, in Africa, on the death of his father Lewis IX. whom he had accompanied against the infidels. After defeating the Saracens, and making a truce for 10 years with the king of Tunis, he returned to France. The murder of the French at Palermo, at the Sicilian vespers, roused his indignation, and as Peter, king of Arragon, was the cause of this dreadful massacre, Philip marched against him with an army. He took the towns of Elna and of Gironne, and might have enlarged his conquests had he not been seized by a violent fever, which proved fatal at Perpignan, 6th Oct. 1285, in his 41st year.

PHILIP IV. or the Fair, succeeded his father Philip III. at the age of 17. He was early engaged in a quarrel with Edward I. of England, and had, in consequence, to maintain a war against him, the count of Flanders, and the emperor of Germany. Philip proved victorious in Guienne and at Furnes, 1296, but six years after lost the battle of Courtrai, in which the count of Artois and 10,000 of the chosen troops of France lost their lives. Two years after the French army recovered their honour at Mont-en-Puelle, where 25,000 Flemings were slain, and to celebrate this important victory, the highly finished equestrian statue of the monarch was erected in the church of Notre Dame. The peace with the Flemings was followed by a new dispute with the pope Boniface VIII. and by opposing the claims of the holy see, in the collation of benefices, Philip saw himself excommunicated, and his kingdom under an interdict. The monarch, undismayed, ordered the pope's bull to be burned with every mark of indignity; but the differences were at last settled by the death of the pontiff; and the two next successors, Boniface IX. and Clement V. more peaceful and moderate, annulled the proceedings of their more violent predecessor, and a reconciliation was effected with France. More fully to please Philip, the pope assented to the abolition of the order of the knights templars, and these innocent victims to royal prejudice, were in consequence treated with great cruelty, and the most wanton persecution. Philip died by a fall from his horse, 29th Nov. 1314, aged 46. He had married Jane, the heiress of the kingdom of Navarre, by whom he had Lewis X. whose only daughter Jane brought the dominions of Navarre to the house of Evreux.

PHILIP V. king of France, surnamed the Long, was the younger son of Philip the Fair, and succeeded to the throne after his brother Lewis Hutin, 1316, to the exclusion of his niece, agreeable to the provisions of the Salique law. He made war against the Flemings, renewed the alliance with Scotland, and banished the Jews from his kingdom. He formed the plan of equalizing weights and measures all over his dominions, but could never effect it. During his reign leprosy was very prevalent, and as those afflicted with that terrible disorder were exonerated from certain taxes, and enjoyed peculiar immunities, instead of being lessened the evil seemed to increase, till the general indignation was excited, and the wretched sufferers, accused of flagitious crimes, were either put to death or confined in prisons. The king died 3d Jan. 1328, aged 28.

PHILIP DE VALOIS, first king of France, of the collateral branch of the Valois, was son of Charles count de Valois, the brother of Philip the Fair, and he ascended the throne on the death of his cousin Charles the Fair, 1328. His elevation was disputed by Edward III. of England, the maternal grandson of Philip the Fair, though he had lately done homage to the new monarch for the territories of Guienne, and in consequence of this a terrible war was kindled between the two nations. Assuming the title of king of France, Edward invaded the country, supported by the arms of the Flemings, and victory marked his steps. His fleet defeated the French ships in 1340, and in 1346 the celebrated battle of Cressy was fought, in which France lost nearly 30,000 men, among whom were the flower of the French nobility, and the gallant blind king of Bohemia. The loss of Calais, and other important places, were the rewards of this signal victory; but though Philip refused to accept the challenge of his rival to single combat, a short cessation of arms was agreed upon. Philip died soon after, 23d Aug. 1350, aged 57, leaving an impoverished kingdom, and a disputed succession.

PHILIP I. son of the emperor Maximilian, by his marriage in 1490, with Jane, queen of Spain, the heiress of Ferdinand of Arragon, and Isabella of Castile, obtained the Spanish crown. He was a man of very moderate abilities, but regarded as the fairest man of his age. He died at Burgos, 25th Sept. 1506, aged 28, in consequence of exerting himself too much in playing at tennis.

PHILIP II. son of Charles V. and Isabella of Portugal, was made king of Naples and Sicily in 1554, on his father's abdication, and also king of England by his marriage with queen Mary, and two years after he ascended the Spanish throne by the extraordinary resignation of his father. He made war against the French, and obtained a famous victory at the battle of St. Quintin, in 1557, during which, it is said, he was so terrified, that he made two vows; the one, never again to appear in a fight, and the next, to erect a monastery in honour of St. Lawrence, to whose powerful influence he ascribed the success of his arms. This celebrated victory, which might have made him master of France, was followed by the capture of only a few neighbouring little towns, so that Charles, his father, on hearing of the battle, asked if his son was at Paris, and being answered in the negative, turned his back with contempt on the messenger. Another victory at Gravelines was equally abused, till the treaty of Cateau Cambresis re-established peace between the two monarchies in 1559. On his return to Spain, Philip gratified himself with the exhibition of an auto-da-fe, when the inquisition condemned to the flames 40 wretches who were accused of heresy. Sanguinary in his conduct, and violent in his measures, he soon alienated the affections of his subjects, and the Flemings, harassed by his oppressions, threw off the yoke. In vain the duke of Alva, by valour as much as by severity, attempted to restore subordination ; seven provinces were severed from the Spanish yoke, and under the name of United Provinces, established their rank and independence among nations. Though unsuccessful in the Low Countries, Philip had the good fortune to subdue Portugal to his power, and in the madness of his ambition he now formed plans for the subjection of England, which the death of Mary had placed under the administration of the heroic Elizabeth. In 1588, the Invincible Armada sailed from Lisbon, for the conquest of England ; but the storms and the valour of the English were enemies which the ambitious monarch was not prepared to encounter. The fleet was dispersed and cut to pieces, and when Philip heard of the loss of his 100 ships, and of 20,000 of his men, he replied with great resignation, " I had sent my fleet against the English, and not against the winds ; the Lord's will be done." Ever restless, Philip still sowed dissension among his neighbours, by encouraging the league in France against their lawful sovereign, and by assuming the title of protector of the rebels ; but death, at last, came to terminate his ambition and his life. He died 13th Sept. 1598, aged 72. Though represented by some, ferocious and unprincipled as Tiberius, and by others wise and discreet as Solomon, Philip may be considered as a man of great abilities, too much, indeed, guided by superstition, and too strongly attached to family pride, and the love of universal dominion, yet endowed with sagacity, able and eager to distinguish merit, and during a long reign, if not the first man, yet the chief personage in Europe who could decide and regulate the interests of states, and command respect among all nations.

PHILIP III. son of Philip II. and Anne of Austria, succeeded his father on the Spanish throne at the age of 20. The war of the Netherlands was continued with increased virulence, and he made himself master of Ostend by his general Spinola, after a siege of three years, and the loss of 80,000 men ; but vigour was wanted to guide his counsels, and by making peace with his enemies, he firmly established the house of Nassau in the possession of the rebellious provinces of Holland. Dissatisfied with the conduct of his Moorish subjects, who were accused of being Mussulmans at heart, though their general behaviour was peaceful, and their industry was the support of the kingdom, Philip, in an unlucky hour, issued a decree for their banishment in 30 days, and thus robbed his kingdom of the arts, the knowledge, and the laborious services of above a million of his subjects. This severe blow on the population and the industry of the country could never be recovered, though the monarch granted the most liberal privileges for the encouragement of agriculture and of the arts. He died soon after, a victim to court etiquette. While in the council with his ministers, he complained of the disagreeable smell of the brazier which warmed the room ; but as the officer who took care of the fire was absent, no one ventured to remove the offensive utensil, and in consequence the king was taken ill, and soon after died, 31st March, 1621, aged 43.

PHILIP IV. son of Philip III. and Margaret of Austria, was king of Spain after his father, 1621. On his accession, the war with Holland was renewed, as the truce was expired ; but though the Spaniards were successful while commanded by Spinola, they were defeated at sea by the Dutch, near Lima. In 1635, Philip increased the number of his enemies by declaring war against France ; but though at first victorious, his troops were defeated at Aveness and Casal, and Artois was taken. The Catalonians also rebelled against their sovereign, under the patronage of France, and Portugal shook off her foreign yoke, and re-established her monarch under the auspicious government of the house of Braganza, 1640. These severe losses, occasioned by the incapacity of the monarch, and the negligence of his minister Olivares, instead of rousing the nation to active exertions, were received with indifference. Olivares was indeed disgraced ; but the war, instead of being prosecuted with vigour, was concluded with France by a dishonourable treaty, which separated Rousillon, Artois, and Alsace, from the Spanish crown, 1659. The war with Portugal was still continued, but two unfortunate battles soon obliged Philip to acknowledge the independence of his rebellious subjects. This weak and effeminate monarch died 17th Sept. 1665, aged 60, and was succeeded by his son Charles II.

PHILIP V. duke of Anjou, second son of Lewis the dauphin of France, and Maria Anne of Bavaria, ascended the Spanish throne 1700, agreeable to the will of the last monarch Charles II. Though received with acclamations at Madrid, his elevation was opposed by the archduke Charles of Austria, supported by his father, the emperor, by England, Holland, Savoy, Prussia, and Portugal. The first events of the war were disadvantageous to the new king : he lost Arragon, Gibraltar, the Balears, Sardinia, and Naples, and was obliged to quit his capital ; but while he thought of relinquishing his European dominions, and of passing to America, there to establish a new kingdom, he received powerful assistance from France, under the duke of Vendome, and in the battle of Villa Viciosa, in 1710, he recovered his losses, and was more firmly fixed on his throne by the conquests of Villars in Flanders, and by the treaty of Utrecht, in 1713. Devoted to the improvement of his people, under the administration of Alberoni, Philip still sought the recovery of his lost dominions, and by degrees made himself master of Majorca, Minorca, Sardinia, and Palermo. The measures which he pursued, and the jealousy of his neighbours again kindled a new war in 1717, and the Spanish fleet was defeated with great loss in the Mediterranean, by admiral Byng. These and other disasters made the monarch anxious for peace, and the four allied courts of France, Germany, England, and Holland, insisted, as a preliminary, on the expulsion of the intriguing Alberoni, from the counsels of his master. Though peace was re-established in 1720, Philip no longer found happiness in the attachment of his people, but he became a prey to superstitious fears and melancholy suspicions. Under this terrible mental calamity he resigned his crown, in 1724, in favour of his son Louis, and retired to a monastery; but the sudden death of the new monarch, a few months after, of the smallpox, left the kingdom without a master. Roused from his retirement, Philip again resumed the reins of government; and leaving all his superstitious apprehensions behind, he became the watchful, attentive, and affectionate father of his people. In 1733, he joined France against the emperor, in the war which was rekindled in Europe, by the nomination of Stanislaus to the Polish throne, and he had the good success to see his son, Don Carlos, with an army of 30,000 men, conquer Sicily and Naples, and establish himself on the throne. These happy events from without, were counterbalanced from within, by the dreadful conflagration which reduced the royal palace of Madrid, the archives of the kingdom, and the most valuable paintings, to ashes. Peace was restored in 1736, and Carlos confirmed in the possession of his Italian kingdoms. A new war was again kindled in 1739, but Philip died before its conclusion. He died 9th July, 1746, aged 63, after a reign of 45 years, and was succeeded by his eldest son Ferdinand VI.

PHILIP, the Good, duke of Burgundy, Brabant, and Luxemburg, succeeded on the death of his father, John, who was killed at Montereau, 1419. To avenge the fate of his father, he warmly embraced the party of the English against Charles VI. of France, and his successor, Charles VII. He defeated the dauphin at the battle of Mons-en-Vimen, 1421, and attacked with success, Jacqueline, countess of Hainault, and obliged her to acknowledge him as the successor to her dominions. In 1435, he abandoned the English interest, and was reconciled to Charles VII. but afterwards he embraced the party of Charles, duke of Berri, against his brother, Lewis XI. and engaged in all the tumults of war. He intrusted the command of his troops to his son, the count de Charolois, who treated with unparalleled cruelty the town of Dinan, near Liege, of which he burned the walls to the ground, and put the inhabitants to the sword; and instead of condemning such barbarity, the aged father caused himself to be carried from his bed of sickness to view with delight the mournful spectacle. Philip, who by this lost all title to the appellation of Good, died at Bruges, 15th June, 1467, aged 71.

PHILIP DE DREUX, son of Robert of France, count of Dreux, was made bishop of Beauvais. Possessing, however, a strong inclination for military affairs, he joined the crusades, and behaved with great valour at the siege of Acre, 1191. He afterwards joined Philip Augustus in his war against the English, and being taken prisoner, was treated with more harshness than was due to his rank. Philip complained of the severity of his confinement to pope Innocent III. who claimed him as his own son from Richard II. of England. The monarch in answer, sent to the pope the bishop's coat of mail, all covered with blood, and asked the pontiff, in the words of Joseph's brethren to Jacob, "Is this thy son's coat?" upon which Innocent declined further to intercede. He was set at liberty, 1202, and afterwards fought at the battle of Bovines, in 1214, and again distinguished himself against the Albigenses, in Languedoc. He died at Beauvais, 2d Nov. 1217.

PHILIP, duke of Swabia, and son of Frederic Barbarossa, was elected emperor after the death of his brother Henry VI. 1198; but a more powerful party placed the imperial crown on the head of Otho, duke of Saxony. This unfortunate division kindled a war in Germany; but at last the pope threw the weight of his authority on the side of Otho, and excommunicated Philip. Philip, however, made so respectful a submission to the sovereign pontiff, that he withdrew his anathema, and laboured earnestly to effect a reconciliation between the two rivals. Arms, nevertheless, would have decided their different claims, had not Philip been basely assassinated at Bamberg, 25th June, 1208, after a reign of 11 years. He was a prince of great wisdom and strong powers of mind, and his memory is still respected in Germany.

PHILIP, the Bold, fourth son of John, king of France, is celebrated for the valour with which he fought at the battle of Poitiers against the English, though only 16 years old, whilst his other timid brothers fled from the scene of slaughter. He was created duke of Burgundy, and during the confusion which prevailed in France, under his nephew Charles VI. he was called upon by the general voice of the nation to support the tottering power of the government. This elevation, and his marriage with the queen, excited against him the jealousy of the duke of Orleans, and laid the foundation of that enmity which proved so fatal to those two illustrious houses and to the kingdom. This brave and virtuous prince unfortunately was profuse in his liberalities beyond example, so that at his death his body was seized by his creditors, and with difficulty redeemed by his dutchess. He died at Halle, in Hainault, 27th April, 1404, aged 63.

PHILIP of Orleans. Vid. ORLEANS.

PHILIP, infant of Spain, was placed by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, in possession of the dutchies of Parma and Placentia; and after signalizing himself in war, he devoted himself to the happiness of his new subjects, and to the prosperity of the nation. He died 1765, aged 45, universally regretted.

PHILIP, a Phrygian, made by Antiochus Epiphanes governor of Jerusalem. He behaved with great cruelty, and compelled the Jews to change their religion. He was appointed by Antiochus, on his death-bed, guardian of the minority of his son; but Lysias seized upon the authority, and obliged him to fly. Philip returned and took Antioch, but was afterwards defeated and put to death by his rival.

PHILIP the Solitary, a Greek author about 1105. He wrote Dioptra, or the Rule for a Christian.

PHILIP, of the Holy Trinity, a French ecclesiastic, who travelled into the Levant, Persia, and India, and afterwards visited all the convents of Europe. He died at Naples 1671. He wrote Itinerarium Orientale, 8vo.—Summa Theologiae, &c.

PHILIP, Sachem of Pokanoket, New-England, usually called king Philip, was the youngest son of Massasoit, and succeeded his brother Alexander in 1657. He soon after renewed the friendship which had long subsisted between his tribe and the English, but in 1675 commenced a furious war on the English, which nearly involved them in ruin. He was brave, crafty, politic, possessed of great influence over the neighbouring tribes, and implacable in his hostility to the colonies. He excited many of the frontier tribes to unite in his attempt to exterminate the English, but after many defeats, was at length killed in 1676, and the power of his tribe annihilated.

PHILIPS, Thomas, a native of Ickford, Bucks, educated at St. Omer's among the Jesuits, whose order he soon quitted. He was promoted to a prebend in Tongres cathedral, by the influence of the Pretender, and died at Liege, 1774, aged 66. He published a letter to a Student in Divinity, 8vo. 1756, a performance of merit, and three times edited—the life of cardinal Pole, 2 vols. 4to. 1764, and 2 vols. 8vo. 1767, a work of great celebrity, in which he supported the principles of the Romish church, and attacked the tenets of the protestants, and thus drew against himself a host of able and judicious opponents. He had a sister of the same persuasion, who died abbess of a convent of Benedictine nuns in the town of Ghent.

PHILIPS, Fabian, a learned antiquary, born at Prestbury, Gloucestershire, 28th Sept. 1601. He studied in the inns of court in London, and was a zealous supporter of the king's prerogative, which he ably defended with all the information he could collect as filazer of the records of London, Middlesex, &c. from those rich depositaries of ancient customs. He strongly protested against the beheading of Charles I. and posted up his sentiments in the most public places of the city. He wrote various pamphlets, and died 17th Nov. 1690.

PHILIPS, Catherine, a lady of great accomplishments, daughter of Mr. Fowler, a London merchant, born 1631. She married at the age of 16, James Philips of Cardigan, Esq. and died much regretted, of the smallpox, in London, 22d June, 1664. She translated Corneille's Pompey, and also the four first acts of his Horace, besides various poems which she published under the assumed name of Orinda, of which a second edition appeared, 1678. Her poetical talents were very respectable, and she deserved to be celebrated by the learned men of her age, by lords Orrery, Roscommon, and by Cowley and others. Her elegant correspondence with Sir Charles Cotterel appeared in 1705, under the title of Letters from Orinda to Poliarchus.

PHILIPS, John, an English poet, born at Bampton, Oxfordshire, 30th Dec. 1676. He was educated at Winchester school and Christ church, Oxford, where extraordinary application marked his progress in literature. His first poem was the "Splendid Shilling," an excellent composition, which describes the most trivial things in the lofty language of Milton. "Blenheim" was the next effusion of his muse, and the "Cyder," a happy imitation of Virgil's Georgics, appeared 1705. He wrote besides a Latin "Ode" to his patron St. John, and it has been remarked by one of his biographers, that such was his addiction to tobacco, that he has introduced the praises of the fragrant fume in all his pieces except Blenheim. This excellent poet, whose character in private life was amiable and benevolent, died of a consumption and asthma at Hereford, 15th Feb. 1708, aged 32. A monument was erected to him in Westminster abbey by his friend chancellor Harcourt, with an inscription written by Atterbury, or as some say Dr. Freind.

PHILIPS, Ambrose, an English poet, educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. While at college, he wrote his "Pastorals," a species of poetry in which he is said to have excelled, though Pope ridiculed them, and to render his satire more poignant, introduced into the Guardian a paper which in a delicate strain of irony, compared the pastorals of the two rivals, and gave in an affected manner the superiority to Philips. Philips resented the attacks of the satirist, and unable to revenge himself by his pen, he stuck up a rod at Button's coffee-house, which was frequented by all the wits and literati of the age, and threatened to chastise his antagonist wherever he saw him. In his circumstances he was very independent, as connected with persons high in the state, and as a friend of the Hanoverian succession, he was made a justice of the peace, and in 1717 appointed one of the lottery commissioners. He was in 1734 made registrar of Dublin prerogative court by his friend Boulter the primate, and he sat in the parliament of Ireland for Armagh. He returned in 1748 to England, to live on an annuity of 400*l.* which he had purchased; but a stroke of the palsy carried him off, 18th June, 1749, aged 78, at his lodgings near Vauxhall. He wrote three dramatic pieces of some merit, the Distressed Mother—the Briton—and Humphrey, duke of Gloucester—besides the life of archbishop Williams, and a little poem called "a Winter Piece," which Pope condescended to commend, though he ridiculed all his other works. Dr. Johnson says he was eminent for bravery, and in conversation solemn and pompous.

PHILLIPS, John, LL.D. a distinguished friend of learning, was graduated at Harvard college, Massachusetts, in 1735, and for several years held a seat in the council of New-Hampshire. In 1778, he, in conjunction with Samuel Phillips, Esq. his brother, founded an academy at Andover, Massachusetts, by liberal endowments, and eleven years after he added to its funds a further bequest of $20,000. He also, in 1781, founded an academy at Exeter by a donation of 15,000*l.* and at his death bequeathed the whole of his remaining estate to those institutions.  L.

PHILLIPS, Samuel, LL.D. lieutenant governor of Massachusetts, was graduated at Harvard college in 1771. In 1775, he was a member of the provincial congress, and for several years after of the house of representatives. In 1780, he was chosen to a seat in the convention which formed the constitution of that state. He afterwards was elected a member of the senate, and presided in that body a number of years. He also held a seat on the bench of the court of common pleas from 1781 to 1797. In 1801, he was chosen lieutenant-governor of the state, and died on the 10th of Feb. of the following year. He possessed respectable talents, and was distinguished for integrity, patriotism, liberality, and piety. He gave considerable sums both to the academy at Andover, where he resided, and at Exeter, which his father and uncle had founded; and presented handsome benefactions to several other pious and useful objects.  L.

PHILLIPS, John, president of the senate of Massachusetts, was a nephew of lieutenant-governor William Phillips, and graduated at Harvard college in 1788. He was bred a lawyer, and was appointed at an early age county attorney for Suffolk. For the last nineteen years of his life he was a member of the senate of Massachusetts, and when Mr. Otis was elected into the house in 1813, succeeded him as president. He was also a member of the convention which revised the constitution of the state in 1820, and on the incorporation of the city of Boston in 1823, was elected the first mayor. He died May 29th, 1823, aged fifty-three. No man in Boston possessed through life a greater share of the public confidence, or was more continually employed in the public service. He was industrious, intelligent, faithful, and discreet.  L.

PHILO, a Jew of Alexandria, sent by his countrymen to complain of the Greeks, before Caligula, A.D. 40. He wrote several things, and was called the Jewish Plato, as he was a Platonist in principles.

PHILO, a grammarian of Byblos, who translated Sanchoniathon from the Phœnician into Greek.

PHILO, an architect of Byzantium, 300 B.C. He is author of a treatise on Military Machines, &c.

PHILOLAUS, a Pythagorean philosopher of Cretona, who asserted the rotundity of the earth, &c. B.C. 392.

PHILOPOEMAN, a native of Megalopolis, celebrated as a general in the Achæan league against the Spartans and Ætolians. He was inhumanly poisoned by Diocætes, the enemy's general, B.C. 183.

PHILOPONTUS, John, an Alexandrian, author of a Commentary on the Creation, &c. and head of the tri-theists in the seventh century.

PHILOSTORGIUS, an Arian of Cappadocia in the fifth century, author of an Ecclesiastical History of his own time, &c.

PHILOSTRATUS, Flavius, a Greek sophist at the court of Julia, the wife of the emperor Severus. He is author of the Life of Apollonius Tyaneus, and other works.

court of Dionysius of Syracuse, who died at Ephesus, 350 B.C.

PHILPOT, John, a native of Hampshire, educated at Winchester and New college. He was a strong friend of the reformation, and was made under Edward VI. archdeacon of Winchester, but in the next reign he was convicted of heresy before Gardiner, and burnt in Smithfield, 1555.

PHINEHAS, son of Eleazar, the son of Aaron, the priest, was commended for his zeal in the cause of God, for killing the Israelite, and the Midianitish woman, who committed fornication in the camp of Israel, B.C. 1455.

PHIPS, Sir William, governor of Massachusetts, was born at Pemaquid in Maine, February 2d, 1650, of obscure parents, and was one of the youngest of twenty-six children which his mother bore. He remained at home without education till 18 years old, when he bound himself to a ship-carpenter. After learning that trade, he removed to Boston, and established himself in the business, and learned to read and write. He afterwards went to sea, and hearing that a Spanish ship richly laden, was wrecked near the Bahamas, went to England, and offered to search for the treasure. He made one voyage without success, but on being sent again by the duke of Albe-marle, he obtained from the vessel 300,000 pounds, 16,000 of which fell to his share. This success procured him much applause, and the king, as a reward, knighted him, and appointed him high sheriff of New-England. In 1690 he commanded an expedition against Port Royal, and captured that place. On the gift to Massachusetts of a new charter he was appointed governor, and soon after entering on the office, put an end to the persecution for witchcraft. In 1694 he was removed from the office, for abusing the collector of the port, but on visiting England was exculpated. He died on the 18th of February, of the next year, in his forty-fifth year. The important offices to which he rose, without the aid of education, and the skill with which he conducted in them, show him to have possessed talents of a very superior order.

PHIPPS, Constantine, lord Mulgrave, eldest son of Lord Mulgrave, was born 1746. He early embraced the naval profession, and by the influence of friends was made post-captain in 1765. In 1768 he was elected member for Lincoln, and distinguished himself in parliament by his bold and manly conduct in the several popular questions which then agitated the house, especially the Westminster election, and the libel laws. His abilities as a sailor were employed in a voyage of observation and discovery towards the north pole in 1773, and he set sail with captain Lutwidge in two ships, and at his return published an interesting narrative of his remarks and observations in 4to. He was also author of a Letter of a Member of Parliament to his Constituents on the Proceedings of the House of Commons in the Westminster Election. He succeeded to the Irish honours of his father in 1775, and in 1790 was created an English peer, and died 1792.

PHLEGON, a native of Tralles in Lydia, author of some historical tracts under Adrian. It is said that he mentioned the darkness which took place at the crucifixion of our Saviour.

PHOCAS, a Chalcedonian noble, who seized on the empire of the East, by the murder of the emperor Maurice, and of his children, 602. To maintain his power, he dispersed his spics all over the empire, and devoted to destruction those who presumed to speak against his tyranny. But though absolute, he dreaded the attacks of foreign enemies, and afraid to meet the Persians in the field, he had the art to bribe their general Narses, and to draw him to Constantinople, where, in reward for his treachery, he burned him alive. A conduct so flagitious at last roused the general indignation, and Heraclius, governor of Africa, boldly conspired against the monster, and cut off his head and his right hand, 5th Oct. 610.

PHOCAS, John, a monk of the 12th century, born in Crete, or according to others in Calabria. He for some time was in the military service of Emmanuel Commenus, but quitted it for the monastic life; and after visiting the Holy Land, he built a small church on mount Carmel, where he fixed his residence, with other monks. He wrote a Description of the Holy Land, of Syria, Phœnicia, &c.

PHOCION, an Athenian general, who bravely fought against Philip and Alexander. Though forty-five times placed at the head of affairs, he was accused at last of treachery, and cruelly put to death by his ungrateful countrymen, 318 B.C. His death was avenged by his son Phocus.

PHOCLIDES, a Greek poet of Miletus, about 540 B.C.

PHORMIO, a peripatetic philosopher of Ephesus. He had once Annibal among his auditors, when ignorantly lecturing on the art of war.

PHORMIO, an Athenian general, who displayed great bravery during the Peloponnesian war. He sold his property to supply the pay of his army, but refused the rank of commander-in-chief.

PHOTINUS, bishop of Sirmium, was deposed for supporting that Christ was only a man. Though recalled by Julian, he was afterwards exiled by Valentinian, and died 376.

PHOTIUS, patriarch of Constantinople, for ten years, during which he was exposed to turbulent opposition and cabal. He was at last deposed, and died in a monastery 891. He is author of a Commentary on Ancient writers, folio; a Collection of the Canons of the Church, folio; Letters, folio.

PHRAATES III. king of Parthia, after Pacorus, was murdered by his two sons Orodes and Mithridates, B.C. 36.

PHRAATES IV. was raised to the Parthian throne by Orodes his father, whom he soon after murdered. His conduct was so tyrannical that his subjects revolted, but he was restored to his throne by the assistance of the Scythians, and at last perished by the hands of his own son.

PHRANZA, George, a Greek author, master of the wardrobe to the emperor of Constantinople. When the city was sacked by the Turks he fled to Corfu, where he wrote an History or Chronicle of his own Times, to 1641.

PHREAS, or FREAS, John, an English writer, born in London about the close of the 14th century, and educated at Oxford, where he became fellow of Baliol college. He settled at Bristol, but afterwards travelled to Italy, where learning was beginning to revive, and meeting with his countryman Tiptoft, earl of Worcester, he dedicated to him some of his performances. He translated into Latin, Diodorus Siculus, and Synesius, &c. He took his doctor's degree at Padua, where he read medical lectures, as well as at Florence, and Ferrara. He was presented by Paul II. to whom he dedicated his Diodorus, to the see of Bath, but survived the appointment only one month, being poisoned, it is said, by a competitor. It is said he acquired some fortune by practising physic in Italy. He died about 1466.

PHRYNE, a celebrated courtesan of Athens, the mistress of Prexiteles, B. C. 328. She wished to rebuild Thebes, provided her name was inscribed on the walls, which was refused.

PHRYNICUS, a Greek orator of Bithynia under Commodus, author of some treatises, &c.

PHRYNIS, a musician of Mitylene, who is said to have added two strings to the lyre, which before had only seven, B. C. 438.

PIA, Philip Nicholas, an eminent chymist born at Paris 15th September, 1721. He was for some years chief surgeon of the hospital at Strasburg, and on his return to Paris, was named sheriff of the city in 1770. In this last place he exerted all his influence, and the knowledge which he derived from experience, to establish a society for the recovery of drowned or suffocated persons. He furnished the establishment with the necessary apparatus, and the first year not less than 24 persons were saved and restored from the waters of the Seine; but the revolution unfortunately ruined his humane projects, and reduced him to extreme poverty. This benevolent and amiable man died 11th May, 1799. He wrote an account of his humane projects in several vols. 8vo. and 12mo. published 1770, and 1773.

PIAZZI, Jerome Bartholomew, an Italian born at Alexandria. He turned protestant from a Dominican friar, and came to England, where he published a curious account of the inquisition in Italy, with which he was well acquainted, as he had been one of its delegate judges. He maintained himself by teaching French and Italian at Cambridge, and died there 1745.

PIAZETTA, John Baptist, a painter of Venice, whose pieces possess great merit in the elegance, expression, and grace of his figures. He studied much the style of Michael Angelo; but in the midst of his great abilities, he was intemperate and prodigal, and died so poor that his body was conveyed to the grave at the common expense of his friends. He died 1754, aged 72.

PIERAC. Vid. FAUR.

PICARD, John, a French ecclesiastic, born at La Fleche. He was prior of Rille in Anjou, and member of the academy of sciences, and acquired great celebrity as an astronomer. By order of the French king, he visited, in 1671, Uraniburg, and there assisted Tycho Brahe in his celestial observations, and after his return he was employed with Cassini in measuring an arc of the meridian in France. He died 1683. He wrote treatises on Leveling—on Measures—on Dioptries—on the Measurement of the Earth—an Account of his Observations at Uraniburg, &c.—besides communications to the memoirs of the French academies. He was also the first who applied a telescope to a quadrant.

PICART, Bernard, a famous engraver, born at Paris 1673. He studied design under his father, and perspective and architecture under Sebastian le Clerc. As he was a protestant he settled in Holland, where he produced the best part of his admired pieces. He died at Amsterdam, 1733, 12 years after his father, who was then ninety. His engravings were published, folio, Amsterdam, 1784. His best performance is an illustration of the various religious ceremonies of all nations, and his plates for the temple of the muses are also much admired.

PICART, Michael, a native of Nuremberg, who was professor of philosophy and poetry at Altorf, where he died 1620, aged 46. He was the friend of Isaac Casaubon, and published Commentaries on some of Aristotle's works—Disputes—Harangues—Critical Essays—a Latin translation of Appian, 1604.—His Liber Singularis Periculatorum Criticorum, was published at Nuremberg by John Saubert, thirty-seven years after his death.

PICCINI, Nicholas, a celebrated musician, born at Bari, in the kingdom of Naples. He was intended for the church by his father, but his fondness for music prevailed, and he had for his masters the famous Leo, and afterwards Durante, who saw and foretold his future celebrity. In 1754 he began to display his great abilities, and soon acquired the highest reputation in the cities of Italy. From Italy he came to Paris, and for a while divided the applauses of the public with Gluck; but the climate of France was too severe for his weak constitution, and he returned to Naples. Instead, however, of being received with kindness, he was treated as a revolutionist, and accused before the government as a jacobin, mischievous and violent. Without the possibility of vindicating himself, he escaped from Italy and returned to France, and died at Passy, overpowered by age and misfortunes, 7th May, 1800, aged 72. In private life he was an amiable man, distinguished by benevolence, kindness, and affability. His operas, which he composed in Italy, are above 100 in number, besides those performed in France, the best known of which are, Roland—Atys—Iphigenia in Tauris—Dido, &c. An account of his life and works has been published by his friend Ginguene at Paris.

PICCOLOMINI, James, an Italian ecclesiastic, born near Lucca. He became successively bishop of Massa, of Frescati, was made a cardinal 1641, and exchanged his name of Ammati for that of Piccolomini, out of respect for Pius II. his patron. He died 1479, aged 57, of an indigestion. Sixtus IV. claimed the property which he had left at his death in the hands of his bankers, and appropriated part of it in the endowment of the hospital of the Holy Ghost. Piccolomini wrote Commentaries, or History of his own Times, from 1464 to 1469—besides Letters, &c.

PICCOLOMINI, Alexander, author of several dramatic pieces, was born at Sienna, where he was coadjutor, and also archbishop of Patras. He died at Sienna, 12th March, 1578. He was the first who used the Italian language in philosophical subjects. His works are numerous, the best known of which are a treatise on the Sphere—Moral Institutes—a Theory of the Planets—the Morality of Nobles, &c. The work called, "Della Bella Creanza della Donne," is attributed to him.

PICCOLOMINI, Francis, of the same family, was born 1520, and taught for twenty-two years philosophy in the Italian universities. He died at Sienna, 1604, and his death was mourned by the whole city. He wrote Commentaries on Aristotle, 4to. Universa Philosophia de Moribus, folio.

PICHEGRU, Charles, a French general, born at Arbois in Franche Comte, 1761. Though of obscure birth, he received a good education among the monks of his native place, and then entering into the army, he rose from the ranks by gradual steps to command, and at the revolution obtained the office of general. His abilities were well known to his superiors, and therefore were usefully employed; and by the victory at Hagenau over the combined forces, he procured promotion, and was named commander-in-chief of the army of the north. The relief of Landau, the discomfiture of the Austrians under marshal Cobourg, and the able and rapid manœuvres by which he completed the conquest of Holland, tended strongly to recommend him to the national gratitude, and therefore he was elected in 1797 a member of the legislatrue. In this new office his conduct was firm and manly; but his opposition to the measures of the directory, drew upon him unpopularity, and he was one of those unfortunate victims, who were accused of intentions to destroy the republic and restore royalty, and who were, without trial, and in the most arbitrary manner, sent with every mark of ignominy prisoners to Cayenne. He had the good fortune to escape from this climate which proved so fatal to several of his fellow-sufferers, and came to England. Here he remained an honourable exile till 1804, when he ventured to visit Paris in disguise; but so vigilant is an arbitrary government, he could not escape the eyes of the police, and as rumours of plots against the ruler of France were industriously circulated, he was seized with others on suspicion of machinations against the safety of the country, and immured in the Temple. A little time after, 6th April, 1804, he was discovered in his apartment, strangled by means of a black silk handkerchief, twisted round his neck with a short stick, taken from the faggot which was to light his fire. The position of his body was such that no struggle seemed to have been made in the agonies of expiring nature; but though it could easily be concluded that he had been assassinated, and that he could not possibly have been himself the cause of his own suffocation, the corpse was examined before a select number of medical men, and a prolix report was drawn up to prove that he had destroyed himself. So improbable an imputation against a man who had braved death in a thousand dangers, could not be believed even in the streets of Paris.

PICHON, John, a native of Lyons, eminent among the Jesuits. He was employed in Lorraine by king Stanislaus; but his zeal gave offence to his superiors, and his book called the Spirit of Jesus Christ and of the Church, &c. not only was condemned at Rome, but received afterwards the severe censures of the author himself. He died 5th May, 1751, aged 68.

PICHOT, Peter, a physician of eminence at Bourdeaux, in the 15th century. He published treatises on the Plague; de Morbis Animi; de Rheumatismo, &c.

PICHOU, N. a French poet of Dijon, who was assassinated in 1631, in the flower of his age. He was author of some dramatic pieces of no great merit, l'Aminte, a pastoral; a poetical translation of the pastoral of la Filis de Scire.

PICKERING, John, LL.D. and F.A. Acad. was born at Newington, New-Hampshire, and graduated at Harvard college in 1761. He was an eminent lawyer, and sustained some of the first offices in the state with great respectability. He was a principal member of the convention which formed the constitution of New-Hampshire, and was at the head of the administration from the period of governor Langdon's resignation in 1789 until a new election took place. In 1787 he was elected a member of the convention which framed the constitution of the United States, but declined taking his seat in it. He was a judge of the supreme court of the state from 1790 to 1795, and at one period chief justice. Afterwards he was judge of the district court of the United States, for New-Hampshire. For several years before his death his reason was impaired, and he was removed by impeachment in 1804. He died at Portsmouth, April 11th, 1805, aged 67. L.

PICRET, Benedict, a native of Geneva, who after studying in his native city, with great reputation, and travelling over Holland, England, and other parts of the continent, was honourably solicited to fill the chair of theology at Leyden. He declined the liberal offer, and preferred the divinity chair of his native town, which he filled with great ability. He died at Geneva 9th June, 1724, aged 69. He was a most benevolent man, and a most pious and vigilant pastor. He was author of Christian Theology, 3 vols. 4to. in Latin—Christian Morality, 8 vols. 12mo.—History of the 11th and 12th centuries, 2 vols. 4to. treatise against Religious indifference—sermons—letters—and other religious tracts.

PICUS. Vid. MIRANDULA.

PIDOU, Francis, lord of St. Olon, a native of Touraine, became gentleman in orinary to Lewis XIV. who discovered his abilities, and employed him as his ambassador to Madrid, Genoa, and Morocco. He acquitted himself much to the satisfaction of his master, and was made knight of St. Lazarus. He died at Paris 1720, aged 80. He wrote the present State of Morocco, 1694, 12mo.—the most remarkable Events in the Reign of Lewis XIV. 12mo.

PIERCE, Edward, an English painter in the reign of Charles I. and II. He excelled in drawings of architecture, perspective, altar pieces, &c.; but unfortunately the best part of his works was destroyed in the fire of London. He died in London about 1715, leaving three sons.

PIERCE, James, a native of Exeter, eminent as a presbyterian divine. He was at the head of a dissenting congregation in his native town; but in 1725 his preaching in favour of Arianism produced a violent dispute, in consequence of which he was expelled from his meeting, and opened another in conjunction with his friend Hallet. He also published a vindication of his conduct, and of his principles, in a pamphlet called Western Inquisition, which occasioned a tedious paper war. He wrote also a Commentary on St. Paul's Epistles, 4to.—sermons—a Vindication of the Protestant Dissenters, English and Latin, &c. He died 1730.

PIERINO, or PIRINO DEL VAGA, a native of Tuscany, son of a soldier, and nursed by a she-goat. He was taught painting by Vaga, and exchanged the name of Buonacorsi for that of his teacher. By great application he acquired extensive reputation, and was engaged by Raphael in the completion of his designs at Rome in the Vatican, and afterwards he embellished Doria's palace at Genoa, and adorned other cities of Italy with the extraordinary labours of his pencil. His passage of the Jordan, the fall of the walls of Jericho, the sun standing still at Joshua's command, are among his best pieces. He died of an apoplexy, 1547, in his 47th year.

PIERQUIN, John, son of a lawyer at Charleville, studied at Rheims, where he took his divinity degrees. He was for 40 years minister of Chatel in the diocese of Rheims, and died there 1742, aged 70. He wrote on the Colour of Negroes; on Raising Spirits; on the Sabbath of Witches; Magical Transformations; Proof of Innocence by Immersion; Amphibious Animals; on the Conception of Jesus Christ, a dissertation; Life of St. Juvin, &c.

PIERSON, Christopher, a historical and portrait painter, born at the Hague. His hunting pieces were particularly admired. He died 1714, aged 83.

PIERSON, Abraham, first president of Yale college, Connecticut, was educated at Harvard where he obtained his degree in 1668. He studied theology and settled at Killingworth, Connecticut. He soon became conspicuous for his learning and talents as a preacher, and in 1701, when the college was established at Saybrook, was chosen its rector, and held the office till his death in 1707. He was greatly respected for his abilities and piety. He wrote a system of natural philosophy, which was for a long time studied in the college. ¶ L.

PIETRO DI PETRI, a historical painter. He was a native of Rome, and the pupil and imitator of Carlo Maratti. He died 1716, aged 51.

PIETRO DE LA FRANCISCA, a native of Florence, distinguished as a painter, and as a popular writer on arithmetic and geometry. He was patronised by Nicolas V. and employed in adorning the Vatican. He died 1443.

PIGALLE, John Baptist, an eminent sculptor, born at Paris, 1714. By the liberality of the elder Conston he was enabled to go to Italy, where, with assiduous zeal, he studied the works of the best masters. On his return to France he was patronised by Lewis, who made him knight of the order of St. Michael, and chancellor of the academy of painting. His best works are a Mercury and Venus, for the king, and presented by him to the king of Prussia; Saxe's Monument; the Statue of Lewis XV.; Voltaire; a Boy holding a Cage; a Girl extracting a Thorn from her Foot, &c. He died at Paris, 20th Aug. 1755.

PIGANIOL DE LA FORCE, John Aymar de, a native of Auvergne, who acquired some eminence as a writer on geography and history. He is author of a Description, Historical and Geographical, of France, 15 vols. 12mo. a work of merit; a Description of Paris, 10 vols. 12mo. afterwards abridged in 2 vols. 12mo.; Description of Versailles and Marly, 2 vols. 12mo.; Voyage de France, 2 vols. &c. This respectable man, amiable in private life, died at Paris, Feb. 1753, aged 80.

PIGHUS, Albert, a native of Kampen in Overyssel, who studied at Cologne, and Louvaine, and was provost of St. John's church at Utrecht, where he died 1542, aged 52. He was author of Assertio Hierarchiæ Ecclesiasticæ, fol. and controversial works against Luther, Melancthon, and the other great reformers.

PIGHUS, Stephen Vinand, a learned German, nephew to Albert, was born at Kampen in Overyssel, 1520. He was well versed in Roman antiquities, and was patronised by Cardinal de Granvelle, and by the prince of Juliers and Cleves, to whose son he was tutor. He died at Santen, where he was canon, in his 85th year. He published an edition of Valerius Maximus—Latin Annals of Rome, 3 vols. fol.—Hercules Prodicus, a panegyric on the premature death of his illustrious pupil, and other works.

PIGNONI, Simon, a native of Florence, eminent as a painter. His pieces are on religious subjects, and are few, but very valuable. He died 1612.

PIGNORIUS, Laurentius, a learned Italian, born at Padua, 1571. He was canon of Treviso, and died of the plague at Padua, 1631. He wrote Mensa Isiaca, to illustrate the Egyptian antiquities; poems; a treatise De Servis et eorum apud Veteres Ministeriis; Origini de Padoua, and other works.

PIGRAY, Peter, an eminent surgeon at Paris, employed in the armies of Henry IV. and Lewis XIII. He was the disciple and rival, and yet the friend, of the celebrated Ambrose Paré, and published Chirurgica cum aliis Medicinæ Partibus, &c.; Epitome Præceptorum Medicinæ, &c. He died 1613.

PIKE, Zebulon Montgomery, a brigadier general in the army of the United States, was born at Lambertton, New-Jersey, January 5th, 1779. When young he entered the army employed on the western frontier, as a cadet, and was some time after advanced to the rank of lieutenant. In 1805 he was employed at the head of a small party to explore the Mississippi, while Lewis and Clarke were sent on a similar errand up the Missouri. He was afterwards despatched to traverse the interior of Louisiana, and examine its principal rivers. He published an account of both those expeditions. In 1810 he received the commission of colonel; and at the commencement of the war, in 1812, was stationed on the northern frontier. In the beginning of 1813, he was appointed brigadier general, and in April of that year despatched at the head of about 1500 troops against York, the capital of Upper Canada, and in a successful assault on that place was killed, with many of his troops, by an explosion of the magazine of the fort. ¶ L.

PILATE, Pontius, a Roman governor of Judea. It was before him that our Saviour was brought, and by him he was ignominiously condemned to death, through the fear of the Jews, though he asserted himself, from the tribunal, his innocence. Pilate was removed from Judea by Tiberius for his cruelty and oppression, and sent an exile to Gaul, where he hanged himself, A.D. 37. The letter, said to be written by him, to Tiberius, giving an account of our Saviour, and his miracles, is spurious.

PILATRE DU ROSIER, Francis, a native of Metz, who learned the business of an apothecary in his native town, and then came to Paris, where he established a museum, and studied chymistry. The discovery of balloons by Montgolfier, roused all his attention, and he was one of the first who ventured to ascend the air in those frail and dangerous vehicles. After various successful experiments in the presence of the learned of Paris, and also of the Royal family, Pilatre formed the bold plan of passing over to England. He came to Boulogne, and on the 15th June, 1783, he, accompanied by his friend Romain, rose in a beautiful balloon before thousands of spectators, with the hopes of crossing the channel. Half an hour after, however, the machine caught fire, and the two unfortunate aeronauts were precipitated from a height of above 1500 feet to the ground, and dashed to pieces. Pilatre was taken up dead; but his companion showed signs of life for a few minutes. They were buried in the village of Wimille, where a monument records their merits and their misfortune.

PILES, Roger de, an ingenious painter, born at Clamecy, 1635. He studied at Nevers and Auxerre, and afterwards at Paris. He was tutor to Amelot, son of the president of that name, whom he attended when sent as ambassador to Venice, and other European courts, and thus had the opportunity of viewing the finest executions of art. After thus visiting Lisbon and Switzerland, he was, in 1692, sent to Holland as a secret negotiator, but in the character of a picture virtuoso. His intrigues, however, were discovered, and he was thrown into prison, from which the peace of Ryswick liberated him. In his confinement he wrote the lives of painters, and on his return to France received a pension. He died 1709, aged 74. He published besides a Translation of Dufresnoy; an Abridgment of Anatomy accommodated to Painting and Sculpture; Dissertation on the Works of Famous painters; Dialogues on the Knowledge of Painting, &c.

PILKINGTON, Lætitia, a lady of great wit and literary celebrity, daughter of Dr. Van Lewen, of Dutch extraction, was born in Dublin, 1712. She became early known for her poetical talents, and out of her many admirers she selected the Rev. Matt. Pilkington, author of some miscellanies, for her husband; but her union was attended with unhappiness. The husband grew jealous, and the wife rendered the quarrel more inveterate by her levity of conduct. They separated, but afterwards she followed her husband to London, and lived with him; but at last, the apprehension of a gentleman in her bed-room, at two o'clock in the morning, rendered the breach between them incurable. She attempted to vindicate herself by saying, that this nocturnal intruder was waiting for her reading a book, which he refused to lend; but the apology is as improbable as it is indelicate. She afterwards lived on the generosity of the great and the learned, and especially of Cibber, and at one time set up with a stock of five guineas, a small shop for books, in St. James's-street. She died soon after at Dublin, 29th Aug. 1750, aged 39. She wrote the Turkish Court, or London Apprentice, a comedy; the Roman Father, a tragedy; Memoirs of herself, &c. besides light poems of considerable merit.

PILON, Germain, a native of Maine, known as an able sculptor and architect. The ingenious productions of his chisel adorn the churches and the palaces of Paris. He died 1590.

PILON, Frederic, a native of Cork, in Ireland, who studied medicine at Edinburgh, under Dr. Cullen, but quitted it for the stage. Nature had not, however, formed him for eminence as an actor, and he had recourse to his pen, and commenced author by the publication of an Essay on the Character of Hamlet, as performed by Henderson. He afterwards wrote the Invasion, or a Trip to Brighton, well received in 1778. He wrote besides the Humours of an Election, a farce, 1780; He would be a Soldier, a comedy, represented with applause at Covent Garden, 1786. This author, whose merit began to be liberally patronised by the town, and whose company was courted by the witty and the fashionable of the times, unfortunately gave way to debauched habits, and died of intemperance, 1788, aged 38.

PILPAY, an ancient Bramin fabulist, whose fables, written above 2000 years ago, were translated into French from the Greek or Persian by Galland, 1755. It is supposed that he was governor of Indostan, and counsellor to an Indian king. The "Shipwreck of the Floating Islands" is also attributed to him.

PINEUS, Severinus, or PINEAU, an eminent surgeon, born at Chartres, 1550. He became surgeon to the king, and acquired reputation in cutting for the stone, an operation then little understood. He published a Latin Treatise on the Marks of Virginity, much read, besides a French Account of Stones extracted from the bladder. He died at Paris, 1619.

PINAS, John, a native of Haerlem, 1696, who studied painting in Italy. His beauties, and particularly his mode of colouring, were imitated with great success by Rembrandt. His brother James also acquired reputation as an eminent painter.

PINDAR, prince of lyric poets, was born at Thebes in Bœotia. He was particularly happy in celebrating the conquerors at the public games of Greece, and his fame was so highly honoured, that when Alexander sacked Thebes, he spared the house where the poet was born. He died about B.C. 440.

PINEAU, Gabriel du, a native of Angers, who was called to the bar, and came to Paris, where he acquired great celebrity by his genius and eloquence. His abilities were so respectable, and his opinions so disinterested, that he was confidentially consulted in all affairs of moment, so that he was made master of requests by Mary de Medicis, and by her son Lewis XIII. mayor and captain general of the town of Angers. He was so universally respected that he acquired the extraordinary appellation of father of the people. He died 15th Oct. 1644, aged 71. He was author of Latin Notes on the Canon Law, in opposition to Du Moulin—Commentaries, Observations, and Consultations on various Questions on Custom and Law, with Dissertations, &c. 2 vols. fol.

PINEDA, John, a learned Jesuit, born at Seville. He was well skilled in oriental literature, and taught philosophy and theology in several colleges. He died 1637, much regretted. He wrote Commentaries on Job, 2 vols. fol.—and also on Ecclesiastes—a learned work De Rebus Solomonis, fol.—a Universal History of the Church, in Spanish, 4 vols. fol.—a History of Ferdinand II. in Spanish, &c.

PINELLI, John Vincent, an Italian, son of a noble Genoese, was born at Naples 1533. He settled at Padua, where he showed his taste, and the fruit of his excellent education, by holding a learned correspondence with the most scientific men of Europe, and by making a noble collection of books, which, to his honour, was freely opened to the perusal of the curious. He died 1601, and his excellent library, enriched with the most valuable MSS. and the most curious specimens of antiquity, medal, and botany, was removed from Padua to Naples, where his descendants preserved it. In 1785, on the death of Maphæus, his descendant, who had been a learned printer at Venice, this noble collection passed into the hands of an English bookseller, and was sold in London by public auction in 1790.

PINET, Anthony du, a native of Besançon, who defended, in the 16th century, the protestant tenets, which he had embraced. He also translated Pliny's Natural History into French, Lyons, 2 vols. fol. 1566, and Paris 1608, a work of great merit, on account of his learned notes.

PINET, N. a merchant of Paris, to whose intrigues the scarcity of grain, during the year 1789, was attributed. He was summoned to Marly, to discover to the king's ministers the cause of this supposed monopoly; but a few days after the conference he was found murdered in a wood near Passy, 29th July, 1789.

PINGERON, I. C. a native of Lyons, author of some works of merit on commercial and political subjects. He also translated several works from the Italian and the English. He died at Versailles 1795, age d 60.

PINGRE, Alexander Guy, librarian of St. Genevieve, was born at Paris, 14th Sept. 1711. His great abilities, and his partiality for astronomy soon recommended him, and he was sent by the French government, in 1760, to the South Seas, to observe the passage of Venus over the sun's disc. He afterwards went with Courtanvaux, to Holland, to ascertain the accuracy of the sea time-pieces of Le Roy, and then embarked as historian on board of the Isis and Flora, on a voyage of discovery. He was, for his services to science, made marine astronomer, and admitted member of the academy of sciences, and afterwards of the Institute. This venerable philosopher died at Paris, 1796, aged 84. His works are, State of the Heavens from 1755 to 1757—Memoir on the Discoveries in the South Seas, 4to.—a Historical and Theoretical Treatise on Comets, 2 vols. 4to.—a translation of Manilius's Astronomy, 8vo.—History of Astronomy in the 17th Century—Memoirs of the Abbé Arnaud, &c.

PINKNEY, William, LL.D. a learned and eloquent lawyer, was born at Annapolis, Maryland, March 17th, 1765. Having prepared himself for the bar under the instruction of judge Chase, he was admitted to practise in 1786, and immediately gave promise of high distinction. He was a member of the convention of Maryland, which ratified the federal constitution, and in 1789 was elected a member of the state legislature. In this station he continued until 1792, when he was elected a member of the executive council, and became its president. In 1795 he was again a member of the legislature. In 1796 he was appointed, in conjunction with Mr. Gore, a commissioner under the British treaty. The state of Maryland also employed him to procure an adjustment of its claims on the Bank of England, and he recovered for it the sum of 800,000 dollars. His agency detained him in England until 1804, when he returned and resumed the practice of law. His experience, his talents, and his intimate acquaintance with the political affairs of the period led to his appointment in 1806 as envoy extraordinary to London, and on the return of Mr. Monroe in 1808 he was clothed with the authority of minister plenipotentiary. He returned to the United States in 1811. He was soon after elected a member of the senate of Maryland, but resigned his seat after a short time, and in December 1811, received the appointment of attorney general of the United States. This office he sustained with high reputation until 1814, when he resigned it. During the incursion of the British into Maryland, he commanded a battalion of riflemen, and was engaged and severely wounded in the battle of Bladensburgh in August 1814. Soon after this event he was elected a representative in congress, and in 1816, was appointed minister plenipotentiary to Russia, and envoy to Naples, after his return he was appointed in 1819 one of the senators of Maryland in congress, and continued in that station till his death at Washington, February 25th, 1822. He possessed splendid talents, and was one of the most accomplished orators and statesmen of his time.

PINON, James, a native of Paris, distinguished at the bar for his eloquence, his integrity, and extensive information. He was also a good Latin poet, and wrote De Anno Romano, a poem, dedicated to Lewis XIII. &c. His poetical pieces were published at Paris, 1615, and 1630, 8vo. He died 1641.

PINSON, Richard, a native of Normandy, in the service of Caxton. It is said, that like his master, he excelled as a printer, as he was honoured by the patronage of Henry VII. and VIII. He printed the Magna Charta, and various books, which are now very scarce, but objects of great curiosity. He died 1530.

PINTOR, Peter, a native of Valencia, in Spain; physician to pope Alexander VII. He was an able writer, and died at Rome, 1503, aged 83. His works, now scarce, are Aggregator Sententiarum Doctorum de Curat. Pestilentia, fol. 1499—De Morbo Fædo et Occulto, &c. 1540, 4to. a work in which he asserts that the venereal disease was known in Europe before 1496.

PINTURICCIO, Bernardino, an Italian painter, who was patronised by pope Innocent VIII and Alexander VI. His historical pieces and portraits were much admired. He died 1513, aged 59.

PIPER, Francis le, an English painter, descended from a Walloon family, settled in Kent. He was early fond of designing, and took particular delight in drawing ugly faces. He was so happy in delineating the features, that he could draw from memory, so that he was said to steal a face, and every person either deformed or averse to be exhibited on canvass, was afraid in his company, of having his imperfections made the subject of his pencil. His fortune was independent, therefore he never took any thing for what he drew; so that by frequenting the Mitre tavern, in Stock's market, he contributed to the celebrity of the house, by his humour and vivacity, and to its ornament by giving it many of his pieces. In the last part of his life he brought on a fever upon himself by free living, and upon being bled, the surgeon unfortunately pricked an artery, which accident proved mortal 1740.

PIPER, Count, counsellor of state and first minister to Charles XII. of Sweden, was taken prisoner by the Russians, at the fatal battle of Pultowa, and conveyed to Petersburg. His captivity was rendered more dreadful, as the Czar Peter suspected him to be the cause of the war which Charles had undertaken against Russia. He died in the fortress of Schlussburg 1716, aged 70, and his remains were delivered to the Swedish monarch, who by a magnificent funeral atoned for the hardships which his minister had endured.

PIRANESI, John Baptist, an eminent architect and engraver, born at Venice. He settled at Rome, where he acquired great celebrity. His style of etching was so free that he generally drew all at once upon the plate without a previous sketch, so that his plates were very numerous and equally well finished. His engravings have been collected in several vols. folio, containing a very great number of most interesting and valuable plates. He was intimate with some of the English artists, especially Mylne, the architect of Blackfriar's bridge, and promised to dedicate one of his works to lord Charlemont, but erased, in consequence of a quarrel, the name of his patron from his plates. He died about 1778. His daughter Laura, was also famous as an engraver after the manner of her father, and died 1785. One of his sons was employed in a diplomatic line.

PIROMALLI, Paul, a Dominican of Calabria, sent as missionary into the East. During his residence in Armenia he converted to the catholic faith several Eutycheans and other heretics, and after visiting Persia and Georgia, he returned to Europe to represent Urban VIII. as his nuncio in Poland. On his return to Italy he was seized by pirates and carried to Tunis, and when set at liberty he was received by the pope with every mark of kindness and esteem. After revising an Armenian Bible, he was again sent into the East, and appointed bishop of Nassivan. After a residence of nine years there he returned to Italy, and died three years after, at Basignano, 1667. He was a zealous and most learned ecclesiastic. He was author of Controversial and Theological Tracts—two Dictionaries, the one Latin-Persian, and the other Armenian-Latin—an Armenian Grammar—and a Directory.

PIRON, Alexis, author of Metromanie, a comedy, and of other works, plays, poems, tales, &c. collected in 7 vols. 8vo. was born at Dijon, 1679. His vivacity, and the wit and agreeable manner of his conversation, rendered him the friend and favourite of the great at Paris. He died 1778. His comedies are said to be far superior to his tragedies, and the best of his works.

PISAN, Thomas, an astrologer of Bologna. He went to Venice at the solicitation of Forli, counsellor of the republic, whose daughter he married, and afterwards when invited by Charles V. of France, he settled in Paris, and died there 1380, the very day it is said which he had foretold.

PISAN, Christina de, daughter of the above, was born at Venice 1303, and went with her father to Paris, where at the age of 15 her beauty and wit procured an excellent husband, whom she lost ten years after. She was patronised and pensioned by Charles V. whose history she wrote. She died about 1420. She wrote besides, a hundred stories of Troy in rhyme—a collection of poems—Treasure of the City of Ladies.

PISANI, Victor, a Venetian general who distinguished himself against the Genoese and the Dalmatians. An unfortunate expedition turned his popularity into public odium, but the sentence of death was changed into imprisonment for five years. At the expiration of his confinement the sailors of Venice loudly demanded him to conduct them against the Genoese, who threatened their country with a dreadful war, and he was received with acclamations, and led his countrymen to victory. He died in the midst of his successes, 1380.

PISCATOR, John Fischer, professor of theology at Strasburg, was obliged to fly to Herborn, on embracing the tenets of the Calvinists. He was author of valuable Commentaries on the Old and New Testaments—Amica Collatio de Religione cum C. Vorsitio, 4to. and died 1546.

PISISTRATUS, an Athenian general, who by artifice seized upon the sovereign power of his country. Though absolute, he paid respect to the laws and privileges of his fellow-citizens, and he died B. C. 528, in possession of the supreme power, which was inherited by his sons, but soon after lost.

PISO, CNEIUS, a Roman consul, accused of poisoning Germanicus in Syria, upon which he destroyed himself, A. D. 20. A senator of that family assumed the imperial purple on Valerian's death, but was defeated by Valens, and put to death 261.

PISSELEU, Anne de, a woman of great beauty, born in Picardy. She was one of the maids of honour to Louisa the mother of Francis I. and she captivated the heart of the young prince. More freely to enjoy her company, he married her to John de Brosse, who in thus assenting to a disgraceful union, recovered some lands which his family had lost, and rose to the rank of duke of Etampes, that his guilty wife might shine with greater splendour in a corrupt court. Though the new dutchess had a polished mind, and deserved to be called the fairest of the learned, and the most learned of the fair, yet she used her powerful influence to crush her enemies; and to enrich herself she hesitated not to betray the secrets of the state to the emissaries of Charles V. After the death of Francis she retired to one of her estates in the country, by order of the next king, Henry II. and there she died neglected and despised 1576. In the last years of her life she became a convert to the principles of the protestants.

PISTORIUS, John, a native of Nidda, who studied medicine and afterwards the law, and became counsellor to the margrave of Baden Durlach. Some time after he again changed his profession, and abandoning the protestant tenets embraced the catholic faith, and became a doctor of divinity, counsellor to the emperor, and provost of the cathedral of Breslaw, and prelate to the abbot of Fulda. He was author of treatises against the Lutherans—Artis Cæbalisticæ Scriptores, a curious collection—Scriptores Rerum Polonicarum—Scriptores de Rebus Germanicis, 3 vols. fol. a valuable collection, &c. He died 1603, aged 52.

PITAU, Nicolas, a native of Antwerp, eminent as a painter and engraver. His portraits, especially that of St. Francis de Sales, and his engraving of the Holy family after Raphael, were deservedly admired. He died 1671, aged 38.

PITCAIRNE, Archibald, an able physician, of an ancient family, born at Edinburgh, 25th Dec. 1652. From Dalkeith school he was removed to Edinburgh, and applied himself to divinity, and afterwards to civil law; but at last adopted physic and mathematics as his favourite profession. He studied for some time at Paris, and on his return to Scotland, excited the public attention by a small publication in which he disputed the right of Harvey to the discovery of the circulation of the blood, which he asserted was fully known to Hippocrates. In 1692, he was invited to Leyden where he accepted a chair as professor of medicine; but the next year he returned to Scotland and married. He acquired here greater reputation by his pen than by his profession. His Dissertationes Medicæ, appeared 1701, and were again edited 1713. He wrote besides some obscure Latin satirical poems, chiefly levelled against the friends of the revolution, which he by no means approved. He died 1713. His Leyden lectures were published after his death. His only daughter married the earl of Kelly.

PIТНОВ, Peter, a learned Frenchman, born at Troyes 1539. He studied at Paris under Turnebus, and at Bourges under Cujacius, and soon became distinguished at the bar as a learned and eloquent civilian. He escaped with difficulty the slaughter of St. Bartholomew, and as if the catastrophe influenced his opinions he immediately embraced the Romish faith. He visited England in the retinue of the duke of Montmorency, and so great was his character for learning and integrity that Ferdinand, duke of Tuscany, referred some intricate points to his impartial decision, and the third and fourth Henries employed his abilities, not only to oppose the league, but to support the Gallican church against the usurpations of the Roman pontiff. Pithou died on his birthday 1596. He published some valuable works on law, history, and classical literature, and to his indefatigable industry we are indebted for the discovery of Phædrus, of the Novella of Justinian, and other ancient books buried in obscurity. The best known of his works are treatise on the Liberties of the Gallican Church, 4 vols. fol.—Commentary on the Customs of Troyes, 4to.—notes on authors, &c.

PITHOU, Francis, brother of Peter, was born at Troyes 1544, and became procureur general of the chamber of justice under Henry IV. against the financiers, and afterwards was admitted into the king's council. He discovered the fables of Phædrus, which he published conjointly with his brother. He was a learned and amiable man, and published of his own a comparison of the laws of the Romans with those of Moses, 12mo.; an edition of the Salique Law with notes; treatise on the Greatness and the Rights of the French Monarchy, 8vo.; an edition of Comes Theologus; Observationes ad Codicem, fol.; Antiqui Rhetores Latini, Rutilius Lupus, Aquila Romanus, &c. He died universally respected 7th Feb. 1621.

PITISCUS, Samuel, a learned man, born at Zutphen 1637. He studied at Deventer and Groningen, and was elected master of the school at Zutphen, and afterwards obtained the direction of the college of Jerome at Utrecht, where he died 1717. He was author of several learned works, Lexicon Latino-Belgicum, 4to.; Lexicon Antiquitatum Romanorum, fol.; besides an edition of Rufinus's Rom. Antiquities; and editions of Suetonius, Q. Curtius, Aurelius Victor, &c.

PITISCUS, Bartholomew, the learned author of Thesaurus Mathematicus, fol. and of a treatise on Trigonometry, died 1613.

PITKIN, William, was appointed a judge of the superior court of Connecticut in 1711, and in 1713 chief justice. He was twenty-six years a magistrate, and died at Hartford, April 5th, 1723, aged 50.

PITKIN, William, governor of Connecticut, was the son of the preceding, and was elected governor in 1766. He was appointed a judge of the supreme court in 1741, and chief justice in 1754. In this office he succeeded Mr. Fitch, and continued until chosen governor. In 1754 he was one of the delegates to the convention at Albany, and a member of the committee appointed to draw up the plan of union which was adopted on that occasion. He died at East-Hartford, October 1st, 1769.

PITOR, Henry, a French mathematician, who was born at Aramont in the diocess of Uses, 29th May, 1695, and died there 27th Dec. 1771. He was self-taught in mathematical knowledge, but so respectable that he gained the friendship of the great Reaumur, and in 1724, was admitted into the academy of sciences. He was in 1740, appointed by the states of Languedoc, their chief engineer, and he embellished the province with various monuments of his genius and abilities. He also conveyed water to Montpellier from a distance of nine miles, by canals which must ever excite the admiration of travellers. He was, in 1754, honoured with the order of St. Michael, and he had been long before elected member of the Royal Society of London, in consequence of his treatise on the Theory of the Management of Vessels, 1731, which was translated into English and much applauded. He enriched the memoirs of the French academies with valuable communications.

PITS or PITSEUS, John, an English biographer, born at Alton, Hants, 1560, and educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford. After two years residence at Oxford he went to Douay, and thence to Rheims, and next to Rome, where he studied seven years and became a priest. The civil wars of France drove him from the country to Lorraine, and afterwards to Germany. By the patronage of cardinal Lorraine he obtained a canonry at Verdun, and afterwards was confessor to the dutchess of Cleves for 12 years. He next was promoted to the deanery of Verdun, where he died 1616. He wrote a useful work collected from English history, containing the lives of the kings, bishops, apostolical men, and writers of England, in four large volumes; but of these only part was published under the title of "de Illustribus Angliæ Scriptoribus," and some other works.

PITT, Christopher, an English poet, born at Blandford 1699, and educated at Winchester school, where he distinguished himself so much, that when chosen to college he presented to his electors a poetical translation of Lucan's Pharsalia, which unfortunately is not now extant. In 1722 he obtained from his relation Mr. Pitt of Stratfieldsea, the living of Pimperm, Dorsetshire, and after taking his master's degree in 1724, he went to reside in his native county. He closed a life of benevolence and virtue 1748, and was buried at Blandford, where a stone records the candour and simplicity of his manners, and asserts that he lived innocent and died beloved. He is chiefly known as the author of an eloquent translation of the Æneid, which rivals Dryden's, but of which it may be said, that while Pitt pleases the critic, Dryden charms the people, and that Pitt is quoted while Dryden is read; each indeed possesses peculiar beauties, but if Dryden is admired for his vigour, Pitt is entitled to the highest commendation for the excellence of his lines, and the correctness of his versification. He also translated Vida's Art of Poetry, and wrote besides some poems published in an 8vo. vol.

PITT, William, earl of Chatham, an illustrious statesman, born 13th Nov. 1705. His father was Robert Pitt of Boconnock in Cornwall, esq. and his grandfather Thomas, was the governor of Madras, who acquired some property in the East Indies, and purchased for 20,400*l.* a celebrated diamond, weighing 127 carats, which received the name of Regent, because sold by him to the duke of Orleans the regent of France for 135,000*l.* The young statesman was educated at Eton, and in 1726, he entered at Trinity college, Oxford, which he left for the military profession, and the rank of cornet. A different field of action, however, was destined for the exhibition of his powers, and in 1735, he was elected into parliament for Old Sarum, and soon began to distinguish himself as an eloquent and well-informed speaker. He enlisted early in the ranks of opposition against Walpole, and in his speeches against the Spanish convention, and against the bill for registering seamen, displayed such acuteness, vehemence, and depth of argumentation as astonished the house, and marked him as worthy of the highest offices of the state. The dutchess of Marlborough also, the inveterate enemy of Walpole, applauded the patriotism of the young orator, and in her will left him an honourable legacy of 10,000*l.* for defending, as she said, the laws of his country, and preventing its ruin. In 1746 his abilities were solicited to support the administration which had succeeded to Walpole, and he became joint vice-treasurer of Ireland, and soon after treasurer, and pay-master of the army, and privy counsellor. In 1755, he resigned; but though the next year he received the seals of secretary of state for the Southern department, his continuance in office was of short duration, the public voice of applause, however, accompanied him in his retirement, and had such effect on the government, that in June, 1757, he was reinstated in his office of secretary. The restoration of this favourite of the people to power, was the beginning of a new era of splendid conquests, and of national glory. The arms of England proved everywhere successful in consequence of the judicious plans of the new minister; Quebec was conquered, the French were defeated in Africa, and in the East, and the shores of Europe too witnessed the bravery and the victories of the British by sea and land. The death of George II. in the midst of these brilliant achievements, and the accession of George III. was soon followed by the resignation of the popular minister, who refused to co-operate with an administration, which by the influence of lord Bute, as it is supposed, thwarted his vigorous measures. His retirement was accompanied not only by the regrets of the nation, but by the honourable grant of a peerage to his lady, and a pension of 3000*l.* The peace of 1763 was censured by this sagacious patriot, who declared that England, from the extent of her victories, was entitled to more solid advantages; yet whilst he blamed the minister, he did not continue a petulant and capricious opposition, but remained silent till the question of general warrants in 1764 called forth all his eloquence, and the keenness of his satire against the illegality and oppression of those unpopular engines of arbitrary power. In 1766 he was prevailed upon to accept the privy seal in the administration, and with it an earldom; but he resigned the office Nov. 1768, and ever after refused to be connected with the government. His health indeed declined, and a hereditary gout helped to undermine his constitution, without, however, diminishing the energetic powers of his mind. When the subject of the American war engaged the attention of the public, lord Chatham burst forth from his retirement, and, in his place in the house of lords, vindicated the honours of his country, and deprecated severe measures against the discontented colonists. On one of these occasions, after the duke of Richmond had replied to his powerful and convincing arguments in favour of conciliation, the venerable peer rose up to answer the speech of his opponent, but his debilitated constitution sunk under the attempt, and he fell in a fit into the arms of those who were near him. This extraordinary event, which exhibited a favourite statesman breathing his last, while he uttered the most animated sentiments for the honour, the glory, and the independence of his country, happened 8th April, 1778, and he died on the ensuing 11th May. All ranks and all parties now united to pay due respect to the memory of the departed patriot; the unpopularity which for a while had obscured his career, because he had accepted a pension and a peerage, had now disappeared in his unshaken character of the statesman, and the sagacious defender of the liberties of his country. A public funeral and a monument in Westminster-abbey, at the expense of the nation, were immediately voted by parliament, as a testimony, as the inscription records, to the virtues and abilities of a man, during whose administration divine providence had exalted Great Britain to a height of prosperity and glory unknown to any former age. As a statesman, says one of his biographers, lord Chatham was born with all the graces of the orator, and possessed every requisite to bespeak respect, and even awe. A manly figure and penetrating look fixed attention and commanded reverence, and the keen lightning of his eye spoke the high spirit of his soul, even before the lips had begun utterance. The most fluent and ready orators have shrunk back appalled from his all-powerful eloquence. He had not, indeed, the correctness of language so striking in the great Roman orator, but he had the verba ardentia, the bold glowing words, which darted with such irresistible efficacy, that Walpole, surrounded with power and the unshaken support of a decided majority, never heard his voice in the house of commons without being alarmed and thunderstruck. Lord Chatham had by his wife, daughter of Richard Grenville, five children, John, the inheritor of his titles, William, the subject of the next article, Charles, who died young, Hester, who married lord Stanhope, and is since dead, and Harriot, who married Mr. Elliot, and is also dead. His lady died in 1803, at Burton Pynsent, in Somersetshire, an estate which was left to him in 1766, in consequence of the exertion of his great talents in the service of his country, by sir William Pynsent, who in thus showing his admiration for the character of the great statesman, disinherited his own relations. Some letters from lord Chatham to his relation, the first lord Camelford, when resident at Cambridge, were published in 1804, by lord Grenville. The life of lord Chatham has been published in 3 vols. 8vo.

PITT, William, a celebrated statesman, second son of the preceding, was born at Hayes, 28th May, 1759. From his earliest years he was instructed by his father, who foresaw the future greatness of his son, and taught him to argue with logical precision, and to speak with elegance, correctness, and force. He was afterwards under the tuition of the Rev. Mr. Wilson, and at the proper age he was admitted member of Pembroke-hall, Cambridge, where he had for his tutors Dr. Turner, since dean of Norwich, and Dr. Prettyman, bishop of Lincoln. Under the guidance of these able men, he rapidly matured his knowledge of classical literature, and of mathematics, and he left the university with the degree of M.A. and a high character for application, for abilities, and for correctness and propriety of deportment. He next entered as student at Lincoln's-Inn, and was called to the bar, and afterwards went once or twice on the western circuit, where he was occasionally employed as junior counsel. A higher situation, however, awaited him. At the general election he was proposed as member for Cambridge university, but few seconded his pretensions, and the next year he obtained a seat for Appleby, on the interest of sir J. Lowther. In the house he enlisted on the side of opposition against lord North and the American war; and his first speech, in support of Mr. Burke's bill, displayed that commanding eloquence which many of the members had before so warmly applauded in his illustrious father. The first motion which he offered to parliament was for the more equal representation of the people in parliament; and though it was lost by a small majority, it rendered him a popular and a leading member in the Commons. On the death of lord Rockingham, he accepted, at the age of 22, the office of chancellor of the exchequer; and under the administration of which he formed a part, the American war was concluded. Though he ably defended the conduct of his colleagues, the terms of the peace were regarded by the majority of the nation as unpopular, and the ministry was dissolved. Restored to privacy, Mr. Pitt passed some months on the continent; and after visiting Italy, and several of the German courts, he returned to England, and on the dismissal of the coalition administration of Mr. Fox and lord North, he was selected for the arduous office of first lord of the treasury, and chancellor of the exchequer, 18th December, 1783. Thus seated at the head of affairs, he bent the great powers of his mind to the framing of a bill for the regulation of India affairs, which might be more palatable to the nation, and less objectionable than that of Mr. Fox. His attempts, however, were at first unavailing, as his predecessors, though dismissed from office, still retained their influence in the Commons; and in consequence of this struggle between the house and the king's prerogative, an appeal was made to the sense of the nation in a new parliament. The people warmly seconded the measures of the youthful premier, and the new parliament not only approved of his India bill, but adopted his financial system for the reduction of the national debt by a sinking fund, and cemented the commercial treaty which, under his auspices, had been concluded with France, on a basis advantageous to the interests and the prosperity of England. During the unfortunate illness with which the king was afflicted in 1788, Mr. Pitt was supported by the unanimous concurrence of the nation in boldly resisting the right of the prince of Wales to assume the reigns of government, which Mr. Fox, with more warmth than constitutional knowledge, had hastily asserted. Hitherto popular, and successful as a peace minister, Mr. Pitt had now to contend with a new and formidable hydra in the French revolution. The murder of the French king, and the ambitious views of the rulers of France, were productive of disputes with England, and war was declared in 1793. During the continuance of hostilities for eight years, in situations where all precedents were unavailing, and all the political principles of former times disregarded, the premier conducted the affairs of the nation with that vigour and manly energy which future historians will celebrate to his honour and glory. Amidst the political cares of the continent, his mighty mind planned in 1800 the union with Ireland, which though at first opposed upon national and constitutional grounds, was completed under his auspices, and promises to add strength, solidity, and effect to the power and prosperity of the sister islands. He soon after retired from the head of affairs, in consequence of disputes with respect to the catholic emancipation; but more probably to make room for an administration, which might, with more propriety, and greater probability of success, negotiate a peace with France. The insidious peace of Amiens, effected under the administration of Mr. Addington, met with the approbation of Mr. Pitt, as the most advantageous which the situation of the continent, and the gigantic power of France could allow, and in 1804 he was again replaced at the head of affairs. Difficulties, however, surrounded him on all sides; many of his old colleagues had joined the ranks of opposition, and not a few condemned the method by which he had regained his ascendancy in the king's councils, and it may be asserted that all the complicated machine of government was to be directed, in all its minute parts, by him alone. Unappalled by the dangers which threatened his country, and actively awake to resist all the attacks of parliamentary opposition, he formed that powerful confederacy with Russia and Austria, which, had it been better conducted by the generals of the belligerent powers, might have checked, if not totally crushed, the colossal influence of France. In the mean time, while public affairs assumed the most threatening aspect, a hereditary gout weakened the delicate constitution of the minister, and the seeds of the illness under which he laboured, in 1802, and which had never been completely eradicated, produced the most alarming debility in the nervous system. Excessive anxiety, application to business, and besides, a constant privation of rest, thus contributed to the general breaking up of his constitution, and the intelligence of the fatal disasters at Austerlitz, and the failure of his favourite plan for the deliverance of Europe from French tyranny, hastened his end. He expired at his house at Putney, Surrey, on the 23d Jan. 1806, and the last words which quivered on the dying lips of this most extraordinary and patriotic man were, Oh, my country! By a vote of the commons, in which it is painful to observe the names of several of his former friends among the 89 who opposed the manly and dignified motion of Mr. Lascelles, his remains were buried in Westminster abbey, by the side of his father, at the public expense, and with becoming funeral pomp; and the heart of every lover of virtue and patriotism must assent to the truth of the emphatical words which the herald pronounced after the corpse had descended to the tomb: non sibi sed patriæ vixit. By the same vote of the commons, the debts of the departed premier were discharged by the public, and it is not a small proof of his great disinterestedness and undeviating integrity, that, during a long administration of above 20 years, he not only did not accumulate riches, but died insolvent. To appreciate the character of so mighty a mind is no easy task. His history is the history of civilized nations; as his counsels directed or influenced every measure which was carried into execution in every corner of the habitable globe. To him particularly belonged constancy and steadiness of purpose and principle, a pride of superiority, arising from the consciousness of great talents and firm integrity; and when, therefore, he had fixed upon an end, he maintained his opinion against all obstacles. This firm adherence to principles which eventually might be erroneous, was indeed a foible; but it was the foible of a great genius and of a lofty mind. His eloquence, if it did not possess the vehemence of Fox, nor the brilliant splendour of Burke, was always correct, powerful, and convincing; he had a perfect command of language, and in the arrangement of his matter, he was natural and luminous; without art, without affectation. Thus elevated above the rest of the world in situation, in talents, and in character, it is not a matter of surprise that he had not only political but private detractors, and that at a period when obloquy is hurled against whatever is most dignified and sacred among mankind, his conduct was attributed to motives of pride, of ambition, and of tyranny. Envy, indeed, as one of his biographers observes, may revile, and self-interest may seek to blacken; but his fame, in spite of every effort to blast it, in spite of all the assaults of little and low minds, will flourish while this kingdom or its language shall last. No state chicanery, no narrow system of vicious polities sunk him to the level of the guilty great. He was noble, elevated, magnanimous in his plans; his object was England, his ambition was fame; an ambition that would have raised his country above all the world, and himself along with her glory. The penetration of his mind was sagacious, was infinite, and his schemes of government and policy were formed to affect not only his country, not the present age only, but Europe and the world, and to transmit the fruits of his administration, the labours of his mighty genius, to the admiration, and to the blessings of distant posterity.

PITACUS, a native of Mitylene, one of the seven wise men of Greece. He was at the head of the government of his country, and displayed great moderation. He died 579 B.C.

PIUS I. St. succeeded Hyginus as pope, 142, and suffered martyrdom 157. It is said, but not well supported, that he ordered the celebration of Easter to take place the Sunday after the 14th day of the March moon.

PIUS II. Æneas Sylvius Piccolomini. Vid. ÆNEAS SYLVIUS.

PIUS III. Francis Thodeschini, son of a sister of Pius II. was made archbishop of Vienna, and a cardinal by his uncle. He succeeded Alexander VI. in the papal chair; but when his virtues promised a happy reign he was suddenly snatched away, 21 days after his election, 13th Oct. 1503.

PIUS IV. John Angelo, cardinal de Medicis, brother of the famous Marquis de Margignan, and not of the Florence family, was born at Milan 1499. He was early distinguished by his merit, and employed by Clement VII. and his successors in several honourable embassies, and in 1549 he was created a cardinal by Julius III. He succeeded to the popedom on the death of Paul IV. 1559, and evinced his zeal for the church by his enmity against the Turks and against heretics. He re-established the council of Trent, and when it separated in 1563 he affirmed its decrees by a bull. A conspiracy formed against him by Benedict Accolti and others, in 1565, was discovered, and the conspirators punished. He died 9th Dec. 1565, aged 66.

PIUS V. Michael Ghisleri, was born at Bosco, in Tortona, 17th Jan. 1504, and embraced the Dominican order. He was made archbishop of Sutri by Paul IV. and afterwards appointed inquisitor general in the Milanese and in Lombardy, where his proceedings were often marked by cruelty and oppression. He was elected pope after Pius IV. 1566; but though in this new dignity he attempted to reform the morals of Rome and of his church, and to correct abuses, his measures frequently degenerated into severity, and rendered him unpopular among his subjects. His publication of the bull called In Cœna Domini, by which he attempted to enforce the power and superior jurisdiction of the papal see in temporal affairs, raised him many enemies. He joined his forces to those of the Spaniards and Venetians against the Turks, and under his auspices the famous battle of Lepanto was fought, 1571, in which the infidels were so dreadfully defeated. He died of the stone, 30th April, 1572, aged 68, and he was regarded as so formidable that the sultan Selim noticed his death by three days of public rejoicings. Some of his letters have been published.

PIUS VI. John Angelo Braschi, was born at Cesena, 27th Dec. 1717. He was patronised by Benedict XIV. who made him treasurer of the apostolical chamber, and he was raised to the rank of cardinal by Ganganelli, whom he succeeded on the papal throne, 1775. His reign was one of the longest, and likewise one of the most unfortunate in the Roman history, and some assert that in his pontificate was fully verified the Latin adage:

His government was marked by popular and useful measures; he redressed abuses, punished the peculation of his officers, and laboured successfully in completing the noble museum of the Vatican, begun by his predecessor, by the collection of vases, medals, statues, and monuments, which were dispersed through the ecclesiastical states. Of this valuable treasure a magnificent account with engravings has appeared in 6 vols. fol. From the arts Pius turned his attention to commerce; the port of Ancona was repaired and embellished, and the Pontine marshes were drained of their pestilential waters. This labour, which had engaged the attention of the ancient Romans, and had been attempted by Augustus and some of his successors, and by several popes, was regarded as an object of great public utility. To convert to purposes of agriculture and commerce the vast marshes which extend from the Appenines to the sea, and from Astura to Terracina and the Neapolitan frontiers, and to remove those noxious vapours which render the neighbouring lands unhealthy and dangerous to the inhabitants, was reserved in some degree for the perseverance of Pius. By yearly visiting the spot he gave vigour and encouragement to the work; canals were constructed to drain the superabundant marshes, the Appian way was repaired, or rather a new road was built 40 miles in length, overshadowed with rows of poplars, and houses were erected for the convenience of travellers. At Rome Pius adorned the city with a new church and some hospitals, and in the provinces his magnificence was equally displayed. In his character he was mild, and in his conduct hospitable, and Joseph II. of Germany, Paul of Russia, and other princes, were witnesses of his kindness and of his virtues. In ecclesiastical affairs, though he was successful against the innovations of Leopold in Tuscany in 1775, he found himself unable to stop the reforming hand of the German emperor. The suppression of monasteries, and the rejection of the papal superiority in Germany, alarmed the Roman see; and Pius repaired in person to Vienna; but though treated with deference and respect, the innovations of the imperial reformer could not be checked. Pius had fresh troubles to meet in Italy, and the court of Naples disputed his right of nomination to the sees of Naples and Potenza. The payment of a tribute, on the accession of the Neapolitan monarch to the throne, at last settled the dispute; but new quarrels arose with the Venetians and the court of Modena, when the French revolution began to engage the attention of Europe, and in its rapid vortex to drown all inferior considerations. Pius naturally disapproved of the conduct of the French reformers, who levelled their impious hands against all ecclesiastical establishments, and he embraced the cause of the allies. He received with kindness the banished priests, and this particularly drew upon him the vengeance of the French rulers. Bonaparte was directed to attack the Roman states, and after taking Urbino, Bologna, Ancona, &c. he checked his conquests, and offered peace to the sovereign pontiff, on condition of his paying a large sum of money, and of sending to Paris the choicest pieces in painting and sculpture preserved at Rome. A reconciliation thus tyrannically effected proved not of long duration. Basseville, the new French ambassador, behaved with such haughtiness that the indignant Romans assassinated him, 1793; and though the pope was incapable of preventing this horrid deed, yet his enemies easily persuaded themselves that he was privy to it. The subsequent death of Duphot, who in the midst of Rome, while he attempted to restore order and tranquillity, was stabbed fatally, called on the French government for severe measures. Rome was therefore taken by the orders of Bonaparte, and the captive pope dragged a prisoner from his palace, and conveyed amidst the insults of the French soldiery, first to Sienna, and afterwards across the Alps into France. At Briançon his presence converted the tumults and the ferocity of his oppressors into admiration and reverence, and at a moment when he expected to be murdered by them, he saw the enraged multitude suddenly moved with compassion, and fall down at his feet. From Briançon he passed on to Gap, Grenoble, Voiron, and to Valence, where he was permitted to rest. Here his sufferings were completed; after an illness of 11 days, from fatigue and old age, he died 29th Aug. 1798, aged 82. His remains were buried at Valence by order of Bonaparte; but afterwards they were removed to Rome in 1802, and entombed with great funeral pomp. This prelate, so well known by his misfortunes, was possessed of many virtues, and the humility, patience, and meekness with which he endured the indignities of his barbarous persecutors, entitled him to universal veneration.

PIVATI, John Francis, a Venetian lawyer, known for his laborious compilation of a general dictionary of arts and sciences, which appeared at Venice in 10 vols. fol. 1746.

Pix, Mary, daughter of Mr. Griffith, a clergyman, was born at Nettlebed, Oxfordshire, and married Mr. Pix. She wrote 10 plays, which possess little merit, and she died about 1720.

PIZARRO, Francis, the conqueror of Peru, was the illegitimate son of a gentleman by a woman of low condition, and born at Truxillo. Though thus obscurely born, and obliged to keep hogs for his support, he possessed an undaunted courage, and embarked for America with other adventurers. In 1524, fired with the love of glory, he united with Almagro and Lucque to go in quest of new undiscovered countries. After incredible hardships and unceasing perseverance he was enabled to penetrate into Peru, 1531, where he seized perfidiously the monarch Atahualpa, and afterwards cruelly and inhumanly put him to death. The possession of an opulent kingdom, and the servile submission of the inhabitants, did not inspire the Spaniards with the love of ease and tranquillity, but produced quarrels, and Almagro and Pizarro met in arms, 1538, to decide their superiority. Almagro was defeated and put to death; but the son and the friends of the fallen chief united against their oppressor, and Pizarro was assassinated in his palace, after making an obstinate resistance, 26th June, 1541. This bold adventurer, who knew not even how to read, was fully formed for command. He laid the foundation of the city of Lima, and might deserve the name of a hero, were not perfidy and cruelty indelible stains on his character.

Pizzi, Joachim, a native of Rome, educated among the Jesuits, and made in 1759 director of the academy of Arcades. He possessed genius as a poet, and vigour and correctness as a writer. His works are the Vision of Eden, a poem in four cantos—the Triumph of Poetry, a poem—Discourse on Tragic and Comic Poetry—Dissertation on Antique Cameo, &c. He died 1790, aged 74.

PLACCIUS, Vincent, an able philologer, born at Hamburgh 1642. He studied at Helmstadt and Leipsic, and after travelling over France and Italy, he was made professor of eloquence and morals in his native city, where he died, 1699, much respected and beloved. He published Theatrum Anonymorum, et Pseudonymorum, 2 vols. fol.—Liber de Juris Consulto Perito, Svo.—de Arte Excerptendi, &c. Svo.—Carmina Juvenilia, Svo.

PLACE, Francis, a Yorkshire gentleman, eminent as a painter and engraver. As he worked only for his amusement his pieces are scarce, but possess merit. His etchings and his mezzotinto prints were in great estimation, especially those of archbishop Stern, and of Henry Gyles, a glass painter in his neighbourhood. He died 1728.

PLACENTINUS, Peter, a German Dominican, author of "Pugna Porcorum," a poem of 360 verses, in which every word begins with a P, Antwerp, 1530. He wrote also a Latin History of the bishops of Tongres and Liege, and died at Maestricht, 1548.

PLACETTE, John de la, a protestant minister, born at Pontac, in Bearn, 1639. At the revocation of the edict of Nantes he retired to Denmark, and then to Holland, and settled at the Hague, and lastly at Utrecht, where he died, 1718. He wrote Moral Essays, 6 vols. 12mo.—Treatise on Pride, 8vo.—on Conscience, translated into English by Basil Kennet—on Good Works—on Restitution—Christian Reflections, &c. and a Treatise against Bayle on the Origin of Evil, and the Trinity.

PLANTIN, Christopher, an eminent printer, born near Tours. He settled at Antwerp, and though not a man of learning, he published the most correct and elegant editions of various authors. He acquired riches as well as fame by his profession, and was extremely liberal and humane. He died 1589, aged 65. His chief work is said to be a Polyglott Bible.

PLANUDES, Maximus, a monk of Constantinople in the fourth century. He was in the train of the imperial ambassador to Venice, and on his return was imprisoned in consequence of his strong partiality for the Latin church. He wrote a curious, but improbable Life of Æsop, and also a Greek Anthologia.

PLATER, George, was a judge of the court of appeals of Maryland, and after the révolution, governor of the state; under the old confederation he was a delegate to congress, and in 1788, was president of the convention of Maryland, which ratified the federal constitution. He died at Annapolis, Feb. 10th, 1792, aged 56.  L.

PLATINA, Bartholomew Sacchi, an learned Italian, born at Piedena, near Cremona, 1421. He abandoned the military life for the church, and going to Rome, by the friendship and protection of cardinal Bessarion, he obtained some preferment, and was appointed apostolical abbreviator. He was deprived of this office, which was abolished by the succeeding pope, Paul II. but when he respectfully complained of the treatment, as he had purchased the place, he was indignantly rejected by the sovereign pontiff, and even imprisoned and put to the rack. The next pope, Sixtus IV. made amends for his sufferings, and appointed him to be librarian to the Vatican. He died of the plague, 1481. He wrote the Lives of the Popes, printed first Venice, 1479, folio—History of Mantua—the Life of Nerio Cappani, and some other works, all in Latin, and collected in folio, 1752.

PLATO, a celebrated philosopher of Athens. He was the pupil of Socrates, after whose death he travelled into various countries, and then settled at Athens, where his lectures were attended by numerous and respectable auditors. After a life devoted to virtue and philosophy, he died at Athens, 348 B. C. aged 81. His writings are very valuable, as not only his language is very beautiful and correct, but his philosophy sublime, so that some writers have imagined he drew many of his opinions concerning the Supreme Being, from the writings of Moses, while he resided among the Egyptian priests.

PLAUTUS, Marcus Accius, a Roman comic poet of great celebrity. Only 19 of his plays are extant, which abound in humour and interest, though often expressed in coarse language. He died about 184 B. C.

PLAYFAIR, John, was born at Bervie, near Dundee, of which parish his father was minister, in 1749. He received his education at St. Andrews, and, in 1772, succeeded to his father's living; but resigned it some years afterwards, and went to Edinburgh, where he became professor of mathematics. When the royal society was established there, he was appointed one of the secretaries, and contributed many papers to the memoirs of that institution. In his latter years the professor applied to the study of geology, which he pursued with indefatigable ardour; and, in 1816, undertook a journey to the Alps, for the purpose of making observations on those mountains. He died at Edinburgh, July 20, 1819. His works are—1. Elements of Geometry, Svo. 2. Illustrations of the Huttonian Theory of the Earth. 3. A Letter to the Author of the Examination of Professor Stewart's Statement. 4. An edition of Euclid. 5. System of Geography, 5 vols. 4to. 6. Outlines of Philosophy, Svo.—W. B.

PLAYFORD, John, a stationer and seller of music books, &c. in Fleet-street, Loudon, was distinguished as a writer. He published an introduction to the skill of music, 1655, several times reprinted, and by other books he contributed much to the improvement of the printing of music. He also edited the psalms and hymns in metre, with their appropriate tunes, 8vo. airs and songs for the bass-viol, &c. He died 1693, aged 80, and was honoured with an elegy by Tate the poet laureate.

PLEMPIUS, Vopiscus Fortunatus, a native of Amsterdam, who took his medical degrees at Bologna, and practised in Holland. He was made professor of medicine at Louvain, where he died 12th Dec. 1671, aged 70. He was author of Ophthalmographia, or de Oculi Fabricâ, 4to.—de Togatorum Valetudine tuendâ—de Affectibus Capillorum et Unguium Naturâ—Tractatus de Peste—Autymus Coningius Peruviani Pulveris Defensor repulsus a Melippo Protymo, a refutation of the utility of the bark which was introduced by Coningius, the assumed name of the Jesuit, Fabri, and thus attacked by Plempius, under the appellation of Protymus.

PLESSIS RICHELIEU. Vid. RICHELIEU.

PLINY, Caius Secundus, the Elder, was a celebrated philosopher, born at Verona. He perished during an eruption of Vesuvius, while he approached too near to make observations on the awful phenomenon, A. D. 79. Of his works, which were numerous, only his Natural History remains, which is a valuable compilation of facts and observations, by the hand of a judicious master.

PLINY, Cæcilius Secundus, the Younger, was the nephew of the preceding. He studied under Quintilian, and enjoyed the friendship of Trajan, who made him consul. He was for some time governor of Bithynia, where he checked the persecution excited against the Christians. He died A. D. 113, universally respected. His letters, &c. are fine specimens of correct writing.

PLOT, Robert, an English philosopher and antiquary, born at Sutton Barn, Kent, 1641, and educated at Wye school in that county. In 1658, he entered at Magdalen hall, Oxford, where he took his master's degree, and afterwards removed to University college, where he took the degree of L.L. D. 1671. He was elected member of the Royal Society, and appointed one of its secretaries, and as such published the Philosophical Transactions from No. 143, to 166, inclusive. In 1683, he was nominated by Ashmole first keeper to his newly erected museum, and made also professor of chymistry, and in 1688, historiographer to the king. He was made in 1695, by the duke of Norfolk, Mowbray, herald extraordinary. He died of the stone, 30th April, 1696, at Borden, leaving two sons. Dr. Plot, whose chief delight was the advancement of natural history and antiquities, published the Natural Histories of Oxfordshire and Staffordshire, both in folio, as essays towards a Natural History of England—de Origine Fontium, &c.—an Account of Eldon Hole—several valuable papers in the Philosophical Transactions, &c. He left behind him several MSS. for the Histories of Kent, Middlesex, and London, which he intended to publish.

PLOTINUS, a Platonic philosopher, born at Nicopolis in Egypt. He settled at Rome, and died in Campania, 270, aged 66. His works were collected by his pupil Porphyry.

PLOWDEN, Edmund, an eminent lawyer, born in Shropshire, 1517. He was educated at Cambridge, but afterwards removed to Oxford, where he took his degrees in physic, and practised as a physician. He soon after abandoned physic for the law, entered at the Middle Temple, and was made a sergeant. As he was a Roman Catholic his preferments ceased on the accession of Elizabeth. He died 1584. His "Reports" are held in great esteem, and show great learning, judgment, and sagacity.

PLUCHE, Antony, a French writer, born at Rheims, 1668. He distinguished himself by his application, and at the recommendation of Rollin, was made tutor to the son of the intendant of Rouen, after which he went to Paris, and gave lectures on history and geography. He was presented in 1749, to the abbey of Valence St. Maur, and died of an apoplexy, 1761. His works are Spectacle de la Nature, 7 vols. 12mo. an excellent work, twice translated into English, and also into most European languages—Histoire du Ciel, 2 vols. 12mo. containing a Mythological History of the Heavens, also translated into English—la Méchanique des Langues, 12mo.—Harmoine des Pseaumes et de l'Evangile, 12mo.

PLUKENET, Leonard, a well-known English botanist, born 1642, and educated, as is conjectured, at Cambridge. He took his degrees in physic, but as he was without a patron, he had to struggle with numerous difficulties, till in his old age he was appointed by the queen superintendent of Hampton-court garden, and honoured with the title of Royal Professor of Botany. His great work is his "Phytographia," to the completion of which he devoted much of his time and of his money. He had correspondents for his botanical researches all over the world; but though he assisted Ray with liberal contributions, he differed much from Sloane and Petiver, and censured their labours with some asperity. He died about 1705. His Phytographia appeared in four parts, 1691-1696, containing 328 plates, 4to. He published besides, Almagestum Botanicum, 4to. 1696, containing 6000 species—Almagesti Botanici Mantissa, 4to. 1700, with 25 new plates—Amaltheum Botanicum, 1705, 4to. &c. His Herbarium contained 5000 plants, and is now in the British museum. His works were reprinted 1769, 4 vols. and in 1779, by Dr. Giseke of Hamburgh with a Linnean index.

PLUMIER, Charles, a famous French botanist, born at Marsilles, 1646. He was of the order of Minims, and studied mathematics at Toulouse under Maignan, but afterwards applied himself to botany and natural history. His reputation was now such that he was employed by Lewis XIV. to go to the West Indies in search of curious and medicinal plants. He performed three voyages for this laborious and useful object, and explored not only St. Domingo, but the neighbouring islands, and part of the continent. His zeal was honourably rewarded by a pension from the king, and the appointment of royal botanist. While at the request of M. Fagon, the king's physician, he meditated a fourth voyage in the cause of natural history, he was attacked by a pleurisy, as he waited for the ship near Cadiz, and died there, 1706. His works are valuable, Nova Plantarum Americanarum Genera, 4to.—Description of the Plants of America, folio.—Treatise on American Ferns, folio.—the Art of Turning, folio, with plates—Dissertations on Cochineal, in the Journal des Sçavans. Besides these he left 1400 drawings, which might make 10 volumes more.

PLUQUET, Francis Andrew, a native of Bayeux, who exchanged his canonry for the professorship of history in the university of Paris. He was an able lecturer and a diligent and elegant writer, and died of an apoplexy, 1790, aged 74. He wrote an Examination of Fatalism, 3 vols. 12mo.—a Dictionary of Heresies, 2 vols. 8vo.—the Classical Books of Chinese, 7 vols. 12mo.—Treatise on Luxury, 2 vols. 12mo.—a Treatise on Sociability, 2 vols. in which he establishes the natural propensity of man to kindness and religion, against the opinions of Hobbes.

PLUTARCH, a celebrated philosopher and historian of Cheronæa in Bœotia. He travelled over various countries to improve himself, and was honourably received by the emperor Trajan, who raised him to the office of consul. He died in his native town at an advanced age, A. D. 140. The best known and most valuable of his many works, is the Lives of Illustrious Men, a composition of great merit and singular interest.

PLUVINEL, Antony, grand equery and chamberlain to Henry IV. of France, and his ambassador to Holland, was born in Dauphiny, and died at Paris, 1620. He was the first who opened a riding school in France. He wrote "l'Art de monter à Cheval," the Art of Riding, with plates, folio.

POCAHONTAS, the daughter of Powhatan, Indian chief of Virginia, was born about the year 1595. She became warmly attached to the English, and rendered them on several occasions the most important services. When the savages had captured captain Smith, in 1607, and were in the act of putting him to death, she threw herself on him, and protecting him from the blow of the executioner, persuaded her father to spare his life. Two years after, at the hazard of her life, she revealed to Smith a plot the Indians had formed of exterminating the English, and saved them from destruction. In 1612, she was seized by captain Argal, and detained for the purpose of obtaining a favourable peace from her father, and while with the English received the offer of marriage from Thomas Rolfe, an Englishman of good character, to whom, by the consent of Powhatan, she was soon united. By that event she restored peace to the colony, and secured it for many years. In 1616, she accompanied her husband to England, and was received with attention at court. She there met with Smith, and displayed towards him much affection. She soon after died at Gravesend, when about to return to Virginia. She left one son, from whom descended several respectable families in Virginia.  L.

POСOCKE, Edward, a celebrated orientalist, born at Oxford, Nov. 8th, 1604. He was educated at Thame school, and at 14 entered at Magdalen hall, Oxford, from which, two years after, he removed to a scholarship at Corpus, and afterwards became a fellow of the college. He soon distinguished himself by his great knowledge of classical and oriental literature, and by the friendship of G. Vossius, and other learned men; and by the interest of Selden he obtained, when in orders, the place of chaplain to the English factory at Aleppo. He reached Aleppo in 1630, and devoted himself with unusual assiduity to the further acquisition of the oriental languages. He was, in 1631, employed by Laud to make a collection of such valuable and curious MSS. and of such coins as might enrich a university library; and in 1636 he was informed by that liberal patron that he was nominated by him to fill his newly founded Arabic professorship in Oxford. He returned in consequence to England, but afterwards he went to Constantinople, in company with Greaves, who was going to explore the antiquities of Egypt. He was invited by Laud in 1640 to return, and in his way through Paris, he became acquainted with Grotius, to whom he communicated his intention of translating his book, de Veritate Christ. Religionis, into Arabic, which the pious author heartily approved. When he reached England, he found his learned patron in the Tower, and his death and the consequent confusion of the nation, tended little to ensure him tranquillity in the prosecution of his studies. In 1643 he was presented by his college to the rectory of Childrey, Berkshire, where he retired to perform his ecclesiastical duties; but he was deprived of his professorship by the republican plunderers. His great merit, however, pleaded in his favour, he was in 1647 restored to his salary, and the next year nominated by the king, then a prisoner, professor of Hebrew and a canon of Christchurch, an appointment approved by the parliament, but rescinded when he refused to subscribe to the engagement. Though deprived of his canonry, he yet read lectures, and in 1652 assisted in preparing the edition of the Polyglott Bible. The restoration reinstated him in all his offices, and he soon after took his degree of D.D. but he was neglected among those who had by their services contributed most to the advancement of religion and learning in the kingdom. He died at Oxford, 10th Sept. 1691, aged 87, and was buried in the cathedral, where a monument records his merits. As a scholar and orientalist his abilities were most eminently displayed. His sole ambition was the advancement of oriental literature, to which he devoted himself with the most assiduous care. His works are Specimen Historiæ Arabum, 1648, much commended by Prideaux, Ockley, Selden, Reland, and others—Porta Mosis, or six prefatory Discourses of Moses Maimonides—Euty chius's Annals—Abul Feraji Historia Dynastarum, 4to.—Commentaries on Micah, Malachi, Hosea, and Joel, folio—St. Peter's second Epistle, the second and third of John, and that of Jude, translated into Syriac—Letters with several learned men, published by Twells, 2 vols. folio, 1740. Dr. Pococke was father of nine children. His eldest son Edward, rector of Minal, Wilts, published under his father's direction, an Arabic work, called Philosophus Autodidactus, sive Epistola Jaafar Ebn Tophail, &c. translated afterwards by Simon Ockley.

POCOCKE, Richard, a learned divine, related distantly to the celebrated orientalist. He was born 1704, at Southampton, where his father was master of the free-school, and he was educated at Corpus Christi, Oxford, where he took the degree of LL.D. 1733. He travelled into the East in 1737, and returned in 1742, and in 1744 was made precentor of Waterford. He accompanied as chaplain lord Chesterfield to Ireland, and was appointed by him archdeacon of Dublin, and under another viceroy, the duke of Devonshire, he was made bishop of Ossory, 1756. In 1765 he was translated to Elphin and Meath, and died the September of that same year, of a fit of apoplexy during his visitation. He published a most valuable and interesting account of his travels, under the title of "Observations on Egypt, Palestine, the Holy Land, Syria, Mesopotamia, Cyprus," &c. 3 vols. folio. He enriched also the British museum by the gift of various volumes of MSS. from 4311—4827.

POERSON, Charles Francis, a native of Paris, eminent as an historical and portrait painter. He was made director of the French academy of painting at Rome, and died 1725, aged 72. His father, who was a native of Lorraine, was also a good painter, and died 1660.

POGGIO BRACCIOLINI, John Francis, a learned and illustrious character born of a respectable family at Terranuova in Florence, 1380. He studied at Florence, where he learnt Latin under John of Ravenna, and Greek under Emanuel Chrysoloras, and applied also to the Hebrew, though some commentators assert that that language was not cultivated in Italy before the fifteenth century. He was for some time at Rome, where he held the place of writer of the apostolic letters for 10 years, and afterwards became secretary to the pope. In 1414 he attended the council of Constance, and directed all his attention to the recovery of classical authors from the wrecks of time; and to his indefatigable researches posterity is indebted for the preservation of Quintilian, Silius Italicus, Ammian Marcellinus, Lucretius, Tertullian, and other authors. He next extended his researches to England, and from London passed into Germany and Hungary, and on his return to Rome, married a lady of great beauty, and young, though he himself was 54. After continuing apostolic secretary under seven popes, during 40 years, he was prevailed upon, in 1453, to become secretary to the republic of Florence, and died in the neighbourhood, at an elegant villa, which he had built for his summer retreat, 1459, aged 79, leaving a widow and six children, five of whom were boys, distinguished afterwards for their abilities. The works of Poggio were a Latin History of Florence from 1350 to 1455, 4to.; Epistles; de Varietate Fortunæ; Funeral Orations; Facetiæ, or Witticisms, certainly unworthy of the author; a translation of Diodorus Siculus; of Xenophon's Cyropædia, &c. To Poggio literature is much indebted. He not only cultivated letters himself, but promoted their advancement. Erasmus has censured his private character, which certainly was not always free from blame; but Michiavel and others speak in the highest praise of his learning, and the disinterestedness of his conduct; and his unavailing interference in favour of the unforunfortunate Jerome of Prague at Constance, must be recorded with every mark of approbation. His son James, translated his Florentine history into Italian, and also Xenophon's Cyrus; and after maintaining a character worthy of his father, was put to death as concerned in the conspiracy of the Pazzi, in 1478.

POILLY, Francis, a French engraver born at Abbeville, 1622. He studied under Duret, and at Rome, and was made engraver to the French king, 1664. After enjoying great reputation as an excellent engraver, and a fair character, he died at Paris, 1693. His brother Nicolas, who died three years after him, possessed also merit as an engraver.

POINSINET, Anthony Alexander Henry, a dramatic writer, born at Fontainebleau. His pieces were acted, but have little to recommend them. He was fond of travelling, and unfortunately lost his life in the Gaudalquiver, where he was drowned during an excursion in Spain, 1769, aged 34.

POIRET, Peter, a mystic enthusiast, born at Metz, 1646, and educated at Basil. He became minister at Heidelberg and Answell, and by reading the works of Madame Bourignon, and other mystical writers, he became an infatuated enthusiast. He afterwards retired to Holland, and died at Reinsberg, May, 1719. He wrote the Divine Economy, 7 vols. 8vo. translated into English; Cogitationes Rationales de Deo, Animâ, et Malo; Solid Principles of Christian Religion; Peace of Good Souls, 12mo.; Theology of the Heart, 2 vols. 12mo.; de Eruditione Triplici, 2 vols. 4to.; Life of Madame Bourignon.

POIRIER, Germain, a native of Paris, who was of the order of the Benedictines of St. Maur, which he quitted in 1769. He was engaged as a coadjutor in the art of verifying dates, and he continued with Precieux the 11th volume of the historians of Gaul and France, begun by Bouquet. He was afterwards member of the national institute, and died at the beginning of 1803, aged 80.

Pois, Anthony le, a physician to Charles III. duke of Lorraine, was well skilled in the knowledge of antiquities. He wrote a valuable Discourse on Medals and Ancient Engravings, 4to. and died in his native town, Nancy, 1578.

Pois, Nicolas le, brother to the preceding, was eminent as a physician. His son Charles was also a physician in the household of the duke Henry II. and the father and the son, assuming in Latin the name of Pisoues, published some medical tracts, which were considered as so valuable, that Boerhaave republished them at Leyden, 1736, in 2 vols. 4to.

POISLE, John, a counsellor of the parliament of Paris, who acquired riches by means of bribery and corruption, which procured his disgrace, 1592. His son James, who died 1623, was author of some poetry.

POISSON, Nicolas Joseph, a priest of the oratory, admired for his eloquence, and made superior of the abbey of Vendome. He died at Lyons, 5th May, 1710, very old. He was the friend of Des Cartes, and was eminent as a philosopher. He wrote Delectus Auctorum Ecclesie Universalis, seu Gemma Conciliorum, 2 vols. folio; Remarks on Des Cartes's Discourses on Method, Mechanics, and Music; a treatise on Benefices; Account of his Travels in Italy; treatise on the Rites and Ceremonies of the Church, &c.

Poisson, Raymond, son of a mathematician at Paris, was patronised, after the early death of his father, by the duke of Crequi; but he quitted the profession of a courtier for the stage. He was afterwards noticed by Lewis XIV. and died at Paris, 1690, respected as one of the first comedians of the French stage. He wrote the Baron de la Crasse; the Good Soldier, comedies of one act, Lubin; the Fool of Quality, &c. published together at Paris in 2 vols. 12mo. 1743.

Poisson, Paul, son of the preceding, was eminent also as a comedian. He died at St. Germain-en-Laie, 1735, aged 77. His son Philip was likewise a comedian of celebrity, who died at Paris, 1743, aged 60. He was author of six comedies, published in 2 vols. 12mo.

POISSONNIER, Peter Isaac, a French physician, born at Dijon 5th July, 1720. He was one of the first who read chymical lectures at Paris; and he acquired such reputation as a medical man, that he was sent by the court, at the request of Elizabeth, empress of Russia, who wished for the advice of an eminent physician. On his return he was admitted into the academy of sciences, made first a physician to the army, &c. and obtained a pension of 12,000 livres. The revolution not only stripped him of his independence, but sent him with all his family into confinement; but he was restored to liberty after the fall of Robespierre, and died 1797, aged 79. He wrote treatises on the Means of rendering Sea Water potable; on the Fevers of St. Domingo; on the Diseases of Seamen, 2 vols. 8vo.; Abridgment of Anatomy, 2 vols. 12mo.; Course of Surgery, volume 5th and 6th, &c.

POITIERS, Diana de, dutchess of Valentinois, was born 31st of March, 1500. When her father, the count of St. Vallier, was condemned to lose his head for favouring the escape of the constable Bourbon, Diana obtained his pardon by throwing herself at the feet of Francis I. and, according to some, by yielding her person to the wishes of the monarch. After the death of her husband de Breze, grand seneschal of Normandy, she was seen and admired by Henry II. and though aged 40, she so captivated the heart of the young monarch, who was only 18, that till his death in 1559, she remained sole mistress not only of his affections, but of the kingdom. She died in retirement, 26th April, 1566, aged 66. To great personal charms she united unusual powers of mind, and commanding dignity of manners.

POIVRE, N. a native of Lyons, who embraced the ecclesiastical order, and went as missionary to China, where he travelled with the sagacity of a philosopher and a naturalist. On his return to Europe, the ship in which he was embarked was attacked by Barnett, the English admiral, and during the fight he lost his right arm, which was shot off by a canon ball, in consequence of which he renounced the ecclesiastical state. He was afterwards employed by the French East India company in 1743, to open an intercourse with Cochin-China, and in 1766 he was sent by the duke de Choiseul to the isles of France and Bourbon, with full powers to improve their commerce and agriculture. He there introduced the cultivation of various trees, especially the bread-fruit tree, the muscadine grape, the clove, &c. He returned to France, and died at Lyons, 6th Jan. 1786. He is author of the Voyage of a Philosopher, 12mo.—on the Dying of Silks—on the History and Manners of China—Orations, &c.

POLAN, Amand, a native of Oppaw in Silesia, professor of theology at Basil, where he died 17th July, 1610, aged 49. He wrote Commentaries on Ezekiel and Daniel, Dissertations, &c. and was distinguished as an able and learned protestant.

POLE, Reginald, cardinal and archbishop of Canterbury, was of royal descent, as being the son of lord Montague, the cousin of Henry VII. by Margaret the daughter of George duke of Clarence, the brother of Edward IV. He was born at Stoverton castle, Worcestershire, 1500, and after receiving instruction from the Carthusians, he entered at the age of 12, at Magdalen college, Oxford, where he had Linacre and Latimer for his tutors. He took his first degree at 15, and when admitted into orders he was made prebendary of Salisbury, and soon after dean of Exeter. Thus liberally patronised by the favour of his relation Henry VIII. he was, with a splendid allowance, permitted to go to Italy to finish his education, and in the universities of Padua, Venice, and Rome, he acquired distinction by the extent of his learning, his engaging manners, and exemplary piety. He returned in 1525 to England, and was received with great kindness by Henry; but the agitation of the divorce from Catherine soon after disturbed the harmony which subsisted between him and the court. Henry wished to add to the favourable opinion of foreign universities the assent of his respectable kinsman. Pole, however, refused to approve what his conscience condemned, and after withdrawing from the presence of the king, who at one time was so enraged that he seized his poignard to stab him, he obtained permission to travel. In Italy the English ecclesiastic found retirement and tranquillity in the bosom of his friends, and in his intercourse with learned societies; but Henry, incensed against the pope, not only divorced his queen to marry Ann Boleyn, but determined to shake off the Roman yoke, and relying on the affection of his subjects, declared himself supreme head of the church. To reconcile this to the feelings of the people, a book was written in its favour by Sampson, bishop of Chichester, and sent over to Italy for the approbation of Pole. Without immediately answering the king's request, Pole expressed soon after his sentiments in a little book called Pro Unitate Ecclesiasticâ, which, in maintaining the papal supremacy, highly offended Henry, and procured not only the withdrawing of all his pensions and his ecclesiastical revenues, but the passing of a bill of attainder against him. Stripped of his honours in England, Pole found protection and favour at Rome; he was created a cardinal, and sent as legate to France and Flanders, where, however, the intrigues of Henry were so powerful, and his influence so great, that he returned to Rome for safety. He next went as legate to the council of Trent, and maintained by his eloquence, as well as by his pen, the cause of the papal see. On the death of Paul III. 1549, Pole was twice elected by the cardinals to succeed to St. Peter's chair, but he rejected the proffered honour, and soon after retired to a monastery in Verona, where he continued till the death of Edward VI. On the accession of Mary, Pole was selected as the fittest legate to reconcile England to the holy see; and after he was informed that the bill of attainder which condemned him and set a price on his head was repealed, he returned to his native country. He appeared before the parliament, and easily prevailed upon them to be reconciled to the ceremonies of Rome, after the example of their queen; and after he had granted them absolution, he made his public entry into London, with all the solemnity of Italian pomp. But though invested with great authority as the legate of the pope, and the favourite of the queen, Pole did not assent at first to those violent measures which bigotry and persecution wished to follow. Mild by nature, and humane in his disposition, he preferred the arms of persuasion to the violence of authority; but his opposition was at last overpowered, and by the influence of the queen, some severe measures were adopted against the protestants, which reflect disgrace, not so much upon the heart as upon the accommodating conduct of the legate. His forbearance, indeed, had been such that he was accused to the pope as a heretic, and for a while his legatine powers were withdrawn from him; but the respectability of his character, and the good opinion of the queen, prevailed at Rome, and restored him to his office. On the death of Gardiner, whose violent measures he reprobated, he was confirmed by the pope in the see of Canterbury, to which he had before, on the expulsion of Cranmer, been elected; and to his other dignities was added the honour of being chancellor to both universities. He was attacked by a quartan ague which proved fatal, Nov. 18th, 1558, 16 hours after the death of his royal mistress, whose demise is said to have hastened his own. From Lambeth he was removed to Canterbury, where he was buried. If his attachment to the see of Rome had not been so bigoted and violent, Pole might have shone a very perfect character, as in learning, piety, eloquence, humility, and all the amiable virtues of private and of public life, no man was superior to him. Besides the tract already mentioned, he wrote two defences of it; one addressed to Henry, and the other to Edward VI. and several other pieces.

POLEMBERG, Cornelius, an eminent Dutch painter, born at Utrecht 1586. He went to Rome, where he studied with great success the manner and beauties of Raphael, and surpassed his contemporaries in the delicacy of his touches, and the elegance of his figures. His landscapes were also much esteemed. He was invited to England by Charles I. and painted here some valuable pieces; but he returned, during the civil troubles, to his native country, and died at Utrecht 1660, in great affluence and reputation.

POLEMON, a Greek philosopher, the disciple of Xenocrates. By the representation of his master, whose school he once entered in a state of intoxication, he was persuaded to reform his conduct, and he became a most temperate man, and a very intelligent instructor. He died B.C. 270.

POLENI, John Marquis, a native of Padua, eminent as a professor of astronomy and mathematics. He was in 1739 admitted into the academy of sciences at Paris, after obtaining three prizes from that respectable body, and he was also honoured with a seat in the London Royal Society, the Berlin, and other learned societies. His knowledge of hydraulics was such, that he was consulted by several states, and was appointed surveyor of the water works of the Venetian territories. He was also an able architect, and his opinion was solicited by pope Benedict XIV. about St. Peter's church at Rome. He was the friend and correspondent of all the great men of Europe, of Newton, Leibnitz, Cassini, the Bernouillis, &c. He was also well skilled in antiquarian knowledge, and published a supplement to the collections of Grævius and Gronovius, 5 vols. fol. 1737, Venice. He died at Padua 1761, aged 78.

POLI, Martin, a native of Lucca, who studied and professed chymistry at Rome. It is said that he discovered some powerful agent of destructive effect in military affairs, which he communicated to Lewis XIV. The monarch commended his ingenuity, and rewarded him liberally with a pension, and the title of engineer; but insisted that the secret should die with him, observing that the methods of destroying life, and increasing human miseries are already sufficiently numerous. This able man, who had been admitted associate in the academy of sciences, and was invited by the French king to settle at Paris, died there of a violent fever soon after his arrival 29th July, 1714, aged 52. He published Il Triomfo degli Acidi, an Apology for Acids, &c. 1706.

POLIDORO, Da Caravaggio, a painter so called from the village of Caravaggio near Milan, where he was born 1495. He was originally a day labourer to carry the stones and mortar for the masons in the buildings of the Vatican; but while he supplied materials for the fresco, his genius incited him to observe with accuracy, and to copy with success the figures described upon it. The first exertions of his pencil were so remarkably spirited that Raphael, astonished at his powers, encouraged him, and employed him among the other artists in the decorations of the Vatican; and not only that noble building, but many other edifices were ornamented by the labours of his genius. When Rome was besieged by the Spaniards he fled to Naples, and afterwards to Messina, where he was murdered by his servant, who had observed the great sums of money which he had drawn from the bank, with the intention of returning to Italy. He died 1543, aged 48. The murderer was discovered, and torn to pieces between four horses.

POLIER, Charles de, a native of Lausanne, educated at Gottingen. He was lieutenant in a Swiss regiment in France, but soon left the profession of arms for literature, and became tutor to lord Tyrone's children. He died at his patron's seat near Waterford, 1782, aged 29. He made some ingenious communications to the Manchester society, of which he was a member, and memoirs of him by Dr. Percival have appeared in their transactions.

POLIGNAC, Melchior de, a French cardinal, born of a noble family 1662. He studied at Paris, and was well versed in the philosophy of Aristotle, and afterwards embraced the doctrines of Des Cartes, both of which he ably defended. He accompanied cardinal de Bouillon to Rome, and was afterwards sent by Lewis XIV. as ambassador extraordinary to procure the succession to the crown of Poland in favour of the prince de Conti, upon John Sobieski's death. His ill success on this business produced his disgrace at court; but he was afterwards restored to favour, and sent to Rome, and in 1709 employed as one of the plenipotentiaries at the conferences at Gertruydenburg; and five years after he assisted at the settling the peace of Utrecht. Clement XI. raised him to the dignity of cardinal, and he resided at Rome under Lewis XV. as minister of France. In 1726 he was raised to the see of Auch, and 1732 made commander of the order of the Holy Ghost. He died at Paris 1741, aged 81. He was member of the French academies, and evinced his abilities by his Latin poem called Anti-Lucretius, seu de Deo et Naturâ, in nine books, inculcating doctrines exactly contrary to those of Lucretius.

POLINIÈRE, Peter, a native of Coulouce near Vire, who studied philosophy at the Harcourt college, Paris, where he took his degree of doctor in medicine. He was so well versed in philosophy, mathematics, and chymistry, that he was the first who read lectures on those abstruse sciences at Paris, where he had the king frequently among his auditors. He died suddenly at his house at Coulouce, 9th Feb. 1734, aged 63. He was a man of great learning, but little acquainted with the world, and more fond of his books and of retirement than of public life. He wrote Elements of Mathematics—treatise on experimental Philosophy, 2 vols. 12mo. 1741.

POLITI, Alexander, professor of rhetoric, philosophy, and divinity, at Genoa, was born at Florence, 1679. In 1733 he became professor of eloquence and Greek at Pisa, and died there, July 23, 1752, of an apoplexy. He is known for his edition of Eustathius's Commentary on Homer, with a Latin translation and notes, 5 vols. fol.—the Roman Martyrology, corrected in fol.—Orations in the Academy of Pisa, &c.

POLITIANO, Angelo, an ingenious Italian, born July, 1454, at Monte Pulciano, in Tuscany. His real name was Basso, or according to others Ambrogini. He learnt Greek under Andronicus of Thessalonica, and studied philosophy under Ficinus, and Argyropylos. He was noticed by the Medicean family, and was for some time proceptor to Lorenzo's children, and afterwards professor of Greek and Latin at Florence. He was the intimate friend of the learned men of the times, and especially of Picus, of Mirandula. He died 1494, and some have attributed his death to his great grief for the misfortunes of the Medicean family, who had been cruelly expelled from their country. Politiano was a man of great erudition, vast application, and a most sound judgment. As a poet his lines on the tournament of Julian de Medicis are much admired. He wrote, besides, the history of the Pazzi conspiracy—Miscellanea—some other poems, and a Latin translation of Herodian, so elegant and so spirited that it is doubted which is the more valuable, the original or the version—a treatise on Anger, &c. His works altogether were printed in 1550, 3 vols. 8vo. and 1553, folio, Basil. Though admired for his learning, wit, and vivacity, by Erasmus and others, Paul Jovius has described him as a malevolent satirist, who viewed the literary labours of others with mean jealousy, and with ferocious virulence resisted every criticism upon his own productions.

POLLIO, Caius Asinius, a Roman of great celebrity under Augustus. He was the friend of Mæcenas, of Virgil, and of Horace, and himself a man of learning. He died A.D. 4, aged 80.

POLLOCK, Thomas, was at the head of the administration in North Carolina, from the death of governor Hyde in 1712 till the arrival of his successor. He had been twenty years the deputy of lord Carteret or his father, and was much esteemed for his integrity. On the death of governor Eden he was again placed at the head of the government, but died soon after in 1722.

POLLUX, Julius, a native of Nancrates, in Egypt, in the reign of Commodus, author of Onomasticon, or Greek Vocabulary of great merit.

POLYENUS, a Macedonian, author of Stratagems in War, in the age of Antoninus and Verus, to whom the work is inscribed.

POLYBIUS, a Greek historian, of Megalopolis. He was the friend of the great Philopœmen, and distinguished himself as a soldier against the Romans in the Macedonian war. After the ruin of Macedonia, Polybius became the friend of the Romans and of Scipio, and wrote a valuable and interesting Universal History, of which only part remains. He died B.C. 121.

POLYCARP, St. a bishop of Smyrna, who suffered martyrdom, 166, aged 95. Au epistle from him to the Philippians is preserved.

POLYCLETUS, a sculptor of Sicily, of great celebrity. He was regarded as the first artist, and Phidias as the second, in Greece. He flourished B.C. 232.

POLYDORÉ VIRGIL, a native of Urbino, who came to England in the suite of Corneto, the papal legate. He so pleased Henry VIII. by his manners and his learning, that he detained him in England by giving him the archdeaconry of Wells, and prevailed upon him to employ his talents in a history of the country. He afterwards left England in consequence of the tyrannical conduct of Wolsey, who had imprisoned him one year for revenge, because his patron, Corneto, had solicited the see of York, and he retired to Italy, where he died, 1555. His works are the History of England to the end of the seventh Henry's reign, dedicated to Henry VIII. a work written in elegant Latin, but not very accurate as a history, edited at Basil, 1534, fol.—de Inventoribus Rerum, 12mo.—treatise on Prodiges, fol.—Corrections on Gildas—Collection of Proverbs.

POLYGNÔTUS, a Greek painter of Rhodes. His painting of the battle of Marathon was very celebrated.

POMBAL, Sebastian Joseph Carvalho, marquis of, a famous Portuguese minister, born at Soure, near Coimbra, 1699. He studied at Coimbra, and afterwards embraced a military life, which he quitted for retirement and a union with Donna Almadá, a rich and noble Spanish lady, who died 1739. He was in 1745 sent ambassador to Vienna, where he married the countess of Daun, related to the marshal of that name, and by means of this lady, who became a great favourite with the queen of Portugal, he rose to eminence in the state. On the succession of Joseph to the throne, 1750, Pombal was appointed secretary for foreign affairs, and he displayed his abilities by the wisdom of his administration, and the excellent regulations which he introduced for the promotion of the agriculture, the finances, and the marine of the kingdom. A haughtiness in his conduct, however, displeased some of the nobles, and a conspiracy was secretly formed against him and the king; but the discovery of it brought disgrace and death on the accomplices, and the Jesuits, who were concerned in the plot, were expelled from the kingdom. In the dreadful earthquake which destroyed Lisbon, 1755, Pombal showed great benevolence, and the most liberal patriotism, and by his means the city rose from her ruins with new splendour and increased magnificence. On Joseph's death, 1777, Pombal fell into disgrace and was banished to one of his estates, where he died, May, 1782, aged 85.

Though accused of avarice and pride, he possessed undoubtedly great talents. His memoirs appeared at Paris, 1783, in 4 vols. 12mo.

POMET, Peter, a wholesale druggist at Paris, superintendent of the materia medica in the king's gardens, of which he drew up an account. He acquired opulence, and also literary reputation by his works, especially his General History of Drugs, 1694, fol. republished by his son, 1735, 2 vols. 4to. He died 1699, aged 41.

POMÉY, Francis, a Jesuit of Lyons, known by his Pantheum Mysticum, translated into English by Andrew Tooke, as his own performance. He wrote, besides, a French and Latin Dictionary, 4to.—Flos Latinitatis—Libitina, or on the Funerals of the Ancients—Novus Rhetoricæ Candidatus, and died at Lyons, 1673, aged 55.

POMFRET, John, an English poet, born about 1667, at Luton, Bedfordshire, where his father was rector. He was educated at Cambridge, and when in orders obtained the living of Maldon, in Bedfordshire. In 1703 he came to London, for institution to a larger living, but found bishop Compton strongly prejudiced against him, for four lines in his poem called Choice, in which it was falsely said that he preferred a mistress to a wife, and before the prelate's scruples could be removed, the unfortunate candidate for his favour caught the small-pox, and died of it, aged 35. In his "Cruelty and Lust," he has introduced the character and conduct of Kirk with great effect and pathos. No poem, says Johnson, has been oftener perused than his Choice. He pleases many, and he who pleases must have merit. A volume of his poems appeared, 1699, and two other pieces were published after his death by Philaethes.

POMFADOUR, Jane Antoinette Poisson, marchioness of, the mistress of Lewis XV. was daughter of a financier, and married D'Etiole, nephew of Normand Tournemine. The licentious monarch first saw her while he was hunting in the forest of Senar, and from that time he made her his favourite, and raised her, in 1745, to the rank of a marchioness. She enjoyed great influence at court till her death, 1764, at the age of 44. The liberal manner with which she patronised the arts and literature, has in some degree blunted the shafts of criticism against the infamy of her life. Her memoirs have been published, 2 vols. 8vo. and also her letters, 3 vols. in which she is represented as having great influence in the politics of France, and especially in the war of 1756.

POMPEY, Cneius the Great, a celebrated Roman, who, after bearing the highest honours of the state, and distinguishing himself in war, formed the first triumvirate with J. Cæsar and Crassus. A union ill cemented was quickly broken, and war was declared between him and Cæsar. The battle of Pharsalia proved fatal to the cause of Pompey and of Rome, and the great fugitive, flying from his enemy, was basely murdered in Egypt by order of king Ptolemy, whom he had formerly established on the throne, B.C. 49.

POMPIGNAN, John James le Franc, marquis of, a French writer, born at Montauban, 1709. He was educated for the magistracy; but his genius led him to the cultivation of the muses, and his tragedy of Dido raised him to the rank of an able poet, little inferior to Racine. He became a member of the French academy in 1760, and he had the courage to pronounce, at his admission, a discourse in favour of Christianity, by proving that the man of religion and virtue is the only true philosopher, an oration which drew upon him the ridicule and satire of the profligate philosophers of the times; of Voltaire, Helvetius, and their infidel associates. This illiberal treatment drove him from Paris to his estate, where he spent the rest of his days in the labour of true philosophy and active religion, and died there, of an apoplexy, 1784, highly and deservedly respected. His works, consisting of dramatic pieces—moral discourses—sacred odes—an Imitation of the Georgics—Voyage de Languedoc—Eulogium on the duke of Burgundy, &c. were published in 6 vols. 8vo.

POMPIGNAN, John George le Franc de, a learned French prelate, brother to the preceding, born at Montauban, 22d Feb. 1715. He was, at the age of 29, made bishop of Puy, and afterwards translated to the see of Vienne. At the revolution he was deputy from Dauphiné to the constituent assembly, and became one of the ministry. The pope wrote to him, and called upon him to exert his authority and influence to prevent all the meditated innovations in the church. He died at Paris, 29th December, 1790. He was author of sixteen different works, the best known of which are Critical Essay on the Present State of the Republic of Letters—on the Secular Authority in Matters of Religion—Religion avenged on Incredulity by Incredulity itself—Skepticism convicted by the Prophecies—Letters from a Bishop, 2 vols.—Pastoral Letters—Defence of the Clergy of France in Religion, &c.

POMPONIUS, Peter, an Italian philosopher, born at Mantua, 1462. He was of a dwarfish stature, but possessed great genius, and taught philosophy with uncommon success at Padua and Bologna. His book "De Immortalitate Animæ," in 1516, occasioned a violent controversy, but while he maintained the immortality of the soul as a matter of faith, and not by the support of philosophical reasoning, he was, though patronised by Bembo, universally branded with the name of an atheist. His work, therefore, was condemned and publicly burnt. His philosophical works were printed at Venice, folio, 1525. He was three times married, and had only one daughter. He died 1525.

POMPONIUS LÆTUS, Julius, an eminent scholar, whose real name was Julio Sanseverino, born at Amendolara, in Calabria, 1425. He was well acquainted with Latin, though totally ignorant of Greek, but rather inclined to heathenism, since he is said to have dedicated altars to Romulus, and to have refused to read the Bible, for fear of acquiring a bad and corrupted taste. He was accused of conspiring against pope Paul II. and in consequence fled to Venice, but returned to Rome after that pontiff's death. It is said that before his death he became a sincere and penitent Christian. He died 1495. He wrote Abridgment of the Lives of the Cæsars, fol.—de Romanæ Urbis Vetustate, 4to.—De Mahumedis Exortu, fol.—De Sacerdotiis, Legibus, &c. 4to.—De Arte Grammaticâ—Vita Statii et Patris ejus—Editions of Sallust, Pliny, and Cicero—Commentaries on Virgil, Quintilian, Columella, though some consider these, from their Greek quotations, with which he was unacquainted, as the work of some other person.

PONA, John Baptist, author of Diatribe de Rebus Philosophicis, Venice, 1590—Latin poems—Il Tirreno, a pastoral, &c. was a native of Verona, who died there very young, 1588. His brother John was an eminent botanist at Verona, and wrote Plantæ quæ in Baldo Monte reperiantur, 4to. re-printed in De l'Ecluse's Historia Rariorum Stirpium—Del Vero Balsamo degli Antichi, 4to. Venice, 1623.

PONA, Francis, a physician of Verona, who died there, 1652, aged 58. He is author of Medicina Animæ, 4to.—Lucerna di Eureka Misoscola, 4to.—Saturnalia, 8vo.—L'Ormondo, a romance, 4to.—Messalina, a romance—Galeria delle Donne Celebri, 12mo.—L'Adamo, a poem—tragedies and comedies—Della Contraria Forza di due Bellicocchi, 4to.

POISS, John Francis de, a French ecclesiastic, of an illustrious family, born at Marly. He studied at Paris, and obtained a canonry at Chaumont, which he resigned to settle at Paris, to indulge his literary pursuits. He ably defended La Mothe against Mad. Dacier. He was a learned man, deformed in his person, but of the best character. He died at Chaumont, 1732, aged 49. He was author of a System of Education—Four Dissertations on Languages, &c. printed together, 12mo. 1738.

POYR, Lewis du, a Jesuit of Valladolid, whose meditations, written in Spanish, have been twice translated into French. He died 1624, aged 70.

PONT DE VESLE, Antony de Ferriol, count de, a comic writer, who loved retirement, but was drawn into public life by his uncle cardinal de Tencin. He was made governor of Pont de Vesle, and intendant general of marine, and died at Paris, 3d Sept. 1774, aged 77. He was author of the Complaisant, a comedy—the Coxcomb Punished a comedy—Sleep Walker, a farce—songs, and many other fugitive pieces. His uncle Ferriol, ambassador at Constantinople, published 100 engravings in folio, 1715, explanatory of the dress and manners of the Eastern nations, &c.

PONTANUS, John Jovian, a learned Italian, born at Cerreto, 1426. He was preceptor, and afterwards secretary to Alphonso, king of Arragon, whom by his influence he reconciled to his father Ferdinand. These services ought to have been rewarded, but Pontanus, finding himself neglected, inveighed in his Dialogue on Ingratitude, against the conduct of the prince, who nobly disregarded the satirical attack. He died 1503, aged 77. He wrote "the History of the wars of Ferdinand I. and John of Anjou," 4 vols. Svo. Basil, 1556. His other works, which are miscellaneous, and contain some licentious and indelicate poetry, appeared at Venice, 3 vols. 4to. His epitaph on himself has been imitated by Dr. Forster.

PONTANUS, or DUPONT, Peter, a grammarian of Bruges. Though he lost his sight at the age of three, he acquired great reputation as a teacher of belles lettres at Paris. He died at the end of the 16th century. He is author of a Treatise on Rhetoric, and on the art of making verses.

PONTANUS, James, a Jesuit of Brugg, in Bohemia, who taught belles lettres in Germany with great reputation, and died at Augsburg, 1626, aged 84. He wrote Institutiones Poeticæ, 8vo.—Commentaries on Ovid's Tristia et Epist. de Ponto—on Virgil—Translations from Greek authors, and other works in prose and verse.

PONTANUS, John Isaac, an author, born in Denmark, of Dutch parents. He became historiographer to the king of Denmark, and died at Harderwyck, where he had for some time taught medicine and mathematics, 1640, aged 69. He was author of Historia Urbis et Rerum Amstelodam. fol.—Itinerarium Galliarum Narbonens. 12mo.—Rerum Danicarum Historica cum Chorographiâ Regni Urbiumque Descriptione, fol. a valuable work—Disceptationes Chorographiæ de Rheni Divortii et Ostiis, et Accollis Populivæ adversus P. Cluverum, 8vo.—Observationes in Tractatum de Globis Cœlesti et Terr. Svo.—Discussiones Historiæ, 8vo. against Selden's Treatise on the Sea—Historia Geldricæ, fol. translated afterwards into Flemish—Origines Francicæ, 4to. a learned book—Historia Ulrica, fol.—the Life of Frederic II. of Denmark, &c.

PONTAS, John, a learned French ecclesiastic, who died at Paris, 27th April, 1728, aged 90. He was author of Scriptura Sacra ubique sibi constans—Dictionare des cas de Conscience, three vols. fol. and other spiritual works.

PONTCHASTEAU, Sebastian Joseph de Cambout, baron de, a French author, nearly related to Richelieu. He was born in 1634, and after travelling over Italy and Germany, he bid adieu to the world, and passed several years of his life engaged as the gardener of the Port Royal congregation. He afterwards retired to Rome, and then to Orval, and died at Paris, 27th June, 1699, aged 57. His acts of charity and devotion were very numerous and singular. He was author of Treatises on the Cultivation of Fruit-trees, 12mo.—on the Moral Practice of the Jesuits—Letter to Prefixe, &c.

PONTERA, Julian, a native of Pisa, professor of botany at Padua, and superintendent of the botanic garden there. He was member of the learned societies of Paris, and died 1757, aged 69, universally respected for his extensive knowledge of botany. He wrote Compendium Tabularum Botanicarum in quo Plantæ 272, in Italiâ nuper detectæ, recensentur, Patavii, 1718, 4to.—de Florum Naturâ, 4to.—Antiquitat. Latin. Græc. Enarrationes, &c.

PONTHIEU, Adelaide, a French lady, whose adventures during the crusades under St. Louis, have furnished a subject to Vignancourt for a romance, and to La Place for a tragedy, and to St. Marc for an opera.

PONTOPPIDAN, Eric, bishop of Bergen, in Norway, was author of a valuable History of the Reformation in Denmark, fol. and another of Norway, translated into English. He died about 1750. His uncle of the same name was a native of the island of Funen, and became bishop of Drontheim, where he died 1678, aged 62. He wrote a Danish grammar, much esteemed, and other learned works.

PONTORMO, James, a painter, who was born at Florence, and died there, 1556, aged 63. His early pieces displayed genius, and were admired by Raphael and Michael Angelo; but he afterwards abandoned the vigour and chaste style of his genius by imitating the cold taste of the German school. His last pieces are not so highly valued as the first.

POOL, Rachel Van, a native of Amsterdam, eminent as a painter of flowers, fruits, &c. She died 1750, aged 86. Her husband, Jurian Pool, was also an eminent artist in portraits, who died five years before her, aged 79.

POOLE, Matthew, an eminent nonconformist, born at York, 1624. He was educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree, and when ordained according to the tenets of the presbyterians, he was made minister of St. Michael le Quern, in London, from which he was ejected in 1662 for nonconformity. Among his other works he wrote with great zeal against the papists, and according to Titus Oates's deposition in 1679, he was on the list of those who were to be cut off. In consequence of this meditated violence he retired to Holland, and died at Amsterdam, Oct. 1679. He possessed great learning, and was indefatigable in his studious pursuits. Besides English Annotations on the Bible, completed after his death, in 2 vols. folio, and other things, he compiled that useful work, "Synopsis Criticorum Biblicorum," or Elucidations of Scripture by various hands, 5 vols. fol. 1669.

POPE, sir Thomas, a native of Deddington, Oxfordshire, educated at Eton, after which he studied the law. In 1536 he was appointed treasurer of the court of augmentations, and afterwards visiter of religious houses, and in 1540 he was knighted, and made master of the jewel office in the Tower. He has rendered himself celebrated as the munificent founder of Trinity college, Oxford, in 1554. He died in London four years after, aged 46, and his remains with those of his wife were interred in the chapel of his college. He was a man of high respectability, and the friend of the learned and the great. He was ordered by Henry VIII. to communicate to his friend sir Thomas More the mournful intelligence of his approaching execution.

POPE, Alexander, an illustrious English poet, born 8th June, 1688, in the Strand, where his father was a hatter. He learned writing by imitating printed books, and at eight years of age he was placed under the care of a priest named Taverner, under whom he learned the rudiments of Latin and Greek. He next was sent to a popish school near Winchester, and then removed to a seminary near Hyde-park corner. At the age of 12 he went to live with his parents at Binfield, in Windsor forest, and first discovered his taste for poetry by reading Ogilby's Virgil and Sandys's Ovid; but the writings of Spenser, Waller, and Dryden, now became his favourite employment. He early began to try his strength in poetry, and it is said that at the age of 10 he converted some of the stories of Homer into a play, which his school-fellows acted with the assistance of his master's gardener, who undertook the part of Ajax. His first regular composition was his Ode on Solitude; but his pastorals, begun in 1704, introduced him soon as a promising bard to the wits of the age, especially Wycherley and Walsh, who applauded the labours of the youth, and strongly recommended to him to study correctness. In 1704 he also wrote his first part of Windsor Forest, which was not completed till six years after, and inscribed to lord Lansdown. The Essay on Criticism appeared in 1708, and in this most incomparable performance, though not yet 20 years old, he evinced all the taste, the genius, and judgment of the most mature reflection, and the most consummate knowledge of human nature. The fame of the essay was soon surpassed by the Rape of the Lock, which was published in 1712. The poet chose for his subject the sportive conduct of lord Petre in cutting off a lock of Mrs. Fermor's hair; and he had the happiness, by the elegant and delicate effusions of his muse, and the creative powers of his imagination, to effect a reconciliation between the offended parties. The Temple of Fame next engaged the public attention, and in 1713 he published Proposals for a translation of Homer's Iliad by subscription. This was generously supported by the public, and the poet received from his subscribers 6000*l.* besides 1200*l.* which the bookseller Lintot gave him for the copy. Thus raised to independence by the efforts of his genius, Pope purchased a house at Twickenham, where he removed with his father and mother, 1715. In 1717 he published a collection of his poems; but in his edition of Shakspeare, which appeared in 1721, he proved to the world that he had consulted his private emolument more than his fame. The success with which the Iliad had been received, encouraged him to attempt the Odyssey with the assistance of Broome and Fenton, whose labours he rewarded with 500*l.* and he received the same honourable subscription as before, but only 600*l.* from the bookseller. In 1725, he joined Swift and Arbuthnot in writing some miscellanies, and in 1727 he published his Dunciad, with notes by Swift, under the name of Scriblerus. This singular poem owed its origin to the severe and illiberal remarks to which the poet had been exposed from the inferior scribblers of the day, and after long exhibiting patience, he revenged the attack by the keenest of satires. As a composition, the Dunciad is a work of great merit; and Cibber himself, the hero of the piece, bears the most manly testimony to the talents of his persecutor, by declaring that nothing was ever more perfect and finished in its kind than his poem. The principles, however, of the poet must be condemned; if it was justice to retort abuse on those who had offended him, it was the most illiberal and profligate conduct to hang up to immortal ignominy the characters of men of genius, talents, and respectability, who instead of censuring him had been loud in his praise. Lord Bolingbroke in 1729 entreated him to turn his thoughts to moral subjects, and this produced his Essay on Man; a work of acknowledged merit, containing a system of ethics in the Horatian way. In his ethic epistles, it is supposed that he reflected, in the character of Timon, on the duke of Chandos; and this propensity was unfortunately indulged in his satires, which he continued till 1739, and in which he censures in the severest language, persons of the highest rank and birth. A collection of his letters appeared in 1737, and the following year a translation of his Essay on Man, was published in France by Resnel, and at the same time a severe animadversion on it by Cronsaz, a German professor, who declared it nothing but a system of materialism. This publication was answered by Warburton, and appeared as a commentary on the republication of the poem in 1740. In 1742 the poet gave to the world a fourth book of his Dunciad, and prepared a more perfect and comprehensive edition of his works; but death stopped his hand. His constitutional attack of the headach was now increased by a dropsy in the breast, which baffled all relief, and he expired 30th May, 1744, aged 56. He made, by his will, Miss Blount heiress to his property during her life, and he bequeathed the property of all his works to his friend Warburton, who accordingly in 1751, published a complete edition of the whole, in 9 vols. 8vo. A very interesting Essay on his writings and genius appeared in 1756, and in 1782, by Dr. Warton, and it was again reprinted with a new edition of his works by the learned author in 1797. Though a catholic in religion, it is generally supposed that Pope was little more than a deist, as his Essay on Man fully justifies; yet in the latter part of his life, he attended the service of the English church. In his person he was little and somewhat crooked; but the powers of the mind compensated for all the defects of the body. He was capricious in his friendships; and though he was courted by men of rank and fashion, by lords Harcourt, Bolingbroke, and others distinguished for opulence, as well as celebrity and wit, yet he never forgot the homage which should be paid to the man of poetical eminence, and of acknowledged literary fame. His manners, as lord Orery has observed, were delicate, easy, and engaging; he treated his friends with a politeness that charmed, and a generosity that was much to his honour. Every guest was made happy within his doors; pleasure dwelt under his roof, and elegance presided at his table.

POPHAM, Sir John, an eminent English

lawyer, born at Huntworth, Somersetshire, 1531. He was of Baliol college, Oxford, and afterwards went to the Middle Temple, and rose to high honours in the law. He was solicitor and attorney-general, and in 1592 was made chief justice of the King's Bench. He was considered as a severe judge against robbers; but his strictness proved of service to the kingdom; and reduced the number of depredators. He died 1607, aged 76, and was buried at Wellington. He published Reports and Cases in Elizabeth's Reign, folio—Resolutions and Judgments, &c. 4to.

POPHAM, Sir Home Riggs, a naval officer and knight commander of the Bath, was born in Ireland in 1762. He rose to the rank of lieutenant in the American war, and after the peace went to India, where he commanded a country-ship and discovered a passage for navigation at Pulo Penang. In 1794 he rendered such service to the duke of York in Holland as to be appointed to the rank of master and commander, and shortly after attained that of post captain. He was next employed in the Baltic, where the emperor of Russia gave him the cross of Malta. In 1800 he was appointed to a command in the East Indies, and in 1803 he entered the Red Sea, where he settled advantageous terms of commerce for the English merchants. On his return home, however, his conduct was rigorously examined, and the most unfavourable report of it was made to the house of commons; from which he was effectually cleared on farther inquiry. He was afterwards engaged in the expedition against Buenos Ayres; but though successful, he was brought to a court-martial, and censured for it when the administration by whose orders he acted could no longer protect him. After the last peace he obtained the appointment of commander-in-chief on the Jamaica station, from whence he had but just returned, when death closed his services at Cheltenham, Sept. 13th, 1820. Sir Home published—"A Statement of the Treatment experienced by him since his return from the Red Sea," and "A Description of Prince of Wales's Island."

PORDAGE, John, an English enthusiast, during the civil wars. He was for some time vicar of St. Laurence's, Reading, but deprived by the Berkshire commissioners on an accusation of magic. He afterwards practised medicine, and acquired celebrity as an astrologer, well versed in the abstruse science of alchemy. He was author of Manifest Innocence, in answer to Fowler's Dæmonium Meridianum, and of some other mystical treatises of little merit. He died about 1670.

PORDENONE, John Anthony Licinio, a painter, born in the village of Pordenone, near Udino, 1484. He studied attentively the works of Giorgione, and by his abilities deserved to be called the rival of the great Titian. He was for some time at Genoa, under the patronage of Doria, and then went to Venice, and to Ferrara, where he died 1540, it is said by the effects of poison, administered by some painters jealous of his fame. He was knighted for his services by Charles V. His nephew, called the younger Pordenone, born at Venice, studied under him, and became also eminent. He died at Augsburg, 1570.

POREE, Charles, a French Jesuit, born near Caen in Normandy, 1675. He acquired reputation as professor of belles lettres, rhetoric, and theology at Caen, and afterwards in the college of Louis the Great at Paris. He died 1741, at Paris. He wrote comedies and tragedies in Latin—Orations, 3 vols.—poems, &c.—His brother, Charles Gabriel, was of the society of the oratory, and canon of Bayeux cathedral, and died at his cure of Louvigny, near Caen, 1770, aged 85. He was author of la Mandarinade, or Histoire du Mandarinat de l'Abbe de St. Martin, 3 vols. 12mo.—Letters on burying in Churches, &c.

PORPHYRY, a Platonic philosopher of Tyre, who wrote a violent book against the Scriptures, which was publicly burnt by order of Theodosius the Great. He wrote besides various treatises, and died at the end of Dioclesian's reign.—There was a poet of that name in the reign of Constantine.

PORSENNA, king of Etruria, supported the cause of the exiled Tarquin against the Romans, and laid siege to Rome. His measures proved unsuccessful against the valour of Rome.

PORTA, Joseph, a native of Castel-Nuovo, known as a painter. He took the name of his master Salviati, and acquired celebrity by his pieces in oil and in fresco. He wrote also some mathematical treatises, which, it is said, he afterwards destroyed. He died at Venice 1585, aged 50.

PORTA, John Baptist, a Neapolitan, eminent for his learning, and his knowledge of mathematics, medicine, and natural history. As he admitted a society of learned friends into his house, he was accused of magical incantations, and exposed to the censures of the court of Rome. He died 1515, aged 70. He invented the Camera Obscura, improved afterwards by Gravesande, and formed the plan of an Encyclopedia. He wrote a Latin treatise on Natural Magic, 8vo.—another on Physiognomy, mixed with Astrology, &c.—de Occultis Literarum Notis—Physiognomica, seu Methodus cognoscendi ex Inspectione vires Abitas cujusque Rei, folio—de Distillationibus, 4to. &c.

PORTA, Simon, or PORTIUS, a Neapolitan, the disciple of Pomponatius. He distinguished himself by his learning, and became professor of philosophy at Pisa, and then retired to Naples, where he died, 1554, aged 57. He is author of treatises de Mente Humana—de Voluptate et Doloro—de Coloribus Oculorum, 4to.—de Rerum Naturalium Principiis Libri Duo—Opus Physiologicum, 4to.—de Conflagratione Agri Puteolani, 4to.

PORTE, Joseph de la, a native of Beaufort, who died at Paris, Dec. 1779, aged 61. He was for some time among the Jesuits, but quitted their society for a literary residence at Paris. He published the Antiquary, a comedy of no great merit, and afterwards was engaged in a periodical work, called Observations on Modern Literature, which ended in the ninth volume. Afterwards he assisted Freron in the 40 first volumes of the Literary Year, and he published separately the Literary Observer. He next was engaged in the publication of the School of Literature, 2 vols. 12mo.—Dramatic Anecdotes, 3 vols. 8vo.—Literary History of French Ladies, 5 vols. 8vo.—the French Traveller, twenty-four vols. 12mo.—Pensées de Massillon, &c.

PORTE, Peter de la, a domestic in the service of Ann of Austria, and of Lewis XIV. He was concerned in the intrigues of the French court, and fell under the displeasure of cardinal Mazarin, who sent him to the Bastille. He died at Paris, 13th Sept. 1680, aged 77. His memoirs were published at Geneva, 1756, in 12mo.

PORTER, Francis, a native of Meath in Ireland, who was educated in France, and was admitted into the order of the Recollets, and was afterwards divinity professor in the convent of Isidorus at Rome, where James II. gave him the title of his historiographer. He published Securis Evangelica ad Hæresis Radicis posita—Palinodia Religionis prætense Reformatae—Compendium Annalium Ecclesiasticorum regni Hiberniæ, 4to.—Systema Decretorum Dogmatic. ab initio nascentis Eccles. per summ. Pontific. Concil. Generalia et Particul. hue usque editorum 1698. He died at Rome 7th April, 1702.

PORTES, Philip des, a French poet, born at Chartres 1546. He greatly improved the French language, and was liberally rewarded for his poetical works. Henry III. bestowed on him 10,000 crowns, Charles IX. gave him 800 crowns of gold for a poem, and admiral de Joyeuse conferred on him an abbey for a sonnet. Though in high favour with the court, and promoted to various benefices, he yet refused a bishopric. He was an eminent friend to learned men. He obtained latterly the friendship of Henry IV. and died 1606. He wrote a translation of the Psalms—Imitations of Ariosto—Christian poems—the Amours of Hippolytus and Diana—Sonnets—Elegies, &c.

PORTUS, Francis, a native of Candia, educated at the court of Hercules II. of Ferrara, after whose death he retired to Geneva. He taught at Ferrara, and afterwards at Geneva the Greek language, and at Geneva embraced the protestant tenets. He died 1581, aged 70. He wrote Additions to Constantine's Greek Lexicon, folio—Commentaries on Pindar, Thucydides, Longinus, Xenophon, and other Greek authors. His son Æmilius was also an able Grecian, and published Dictionarium Ionicum et Doricum, Græco-Latinum, 2 vols. 8vo.—a translation of Suidas, and other learned works. He was professor of Greek at Lausanne and Heidelberg.

PORUS, king of India, is celebrated in history for the bold resistance which he opposed to the invasion of Alexander the Great, and the noble answer he made when asked how he wished to be treated.

POSIDONIUS, an astronomer of Alexandria, who called the circumference of the earth 30,000 furlongs.—A stoic philosopher of Rhodes, B. C. 30.

POSSEVIN, Antony, a Jesuit, born at Mantua 1533. He distinguished himself as a preacher, and was employed by pope Gregory XIII. in embassies to Poland, Sweden, Germany, and other courts. He died at Ferrara, 26th Feb. 1611, aged 78. He wrote Bibliotheca Selecta de Ratione Studiorum, 2 vols. folio—a Latin Description of Muscovy, folio—Miles Christianus—Apparatus Acer, 2 vols. folio—Confutatio Ministrorum Transilvaniæ et Fr. Davidis de Trinitate, &c.—He had a nephew of his name, physician at Mantua, who wrote Gonzagarum Mantuæ et Montis Serrati Ducum Historia, 1623, 4to.

POST, Francis, an eminent painter, born at Haerlem, where he also died 1680. He was in 1647 in the West Indies, and employed his pencil most successfully in delineating the beauties and the scenery of that quarter of the globe.

POSTEL, William, a French visionary, born at Doleric in Normandy, 1510. At the age of eight he lost both his parents by the plague, and had now to struggle with poverty, and a supercilious world. By persevering assiduity, however, he not only gained his livelihood, but improved his mind by study, and going to Paris, he became the assistant and the companion of some students in the college of St. Barbe. His merits at last became known to Francis I.

who sent him to the East to collect curious MSS. At his return he was rewarded with the place of professor royal of mathematics and languages, with a good salary; but his strong attachment to the chancellor Poyet proved fatal to his happiness; and by the influence of the queen of Navarre, he was deprived of his literary honours, and banished from France. Now a fugitive, he wandered from Vienna to Rome, where he became a Jesuit, and afterwards retired to Venice, where he was imprisoned. When liberated, he again came to Paris, and then to Vienna, where he obtained a professorship; but afterwards he made his peace with his French persecutors, and was restored to his chair for a while, till another fit of madness and eccentricity drove him away to die a penitent fanatic in a monastery, where he expired, 6th Sept. 1581, aged 71. Though wild and extravagant in his conduct, he was a man of deep erudition, and of extensive information, so that his lectures were attended by the most numerous and respectable audiences. His opinions were at times as extravagant as his conduct. It was not only at Rome that he exposed himself to persecution, for asserting that general councils were superior to the pope, but at Venice he formed a ridiculous attachment to Joan, an old maid, in whom he pretended that the redemption of women, hitherto imperfect, was now accomplished. His works are 26 in number, on curious and strange subjects, the best known of which are, Clavis Absconditorum à Constitutione Mundi, 12mo. 1547—History of the Gauls—Description of the Holy Land—de Phœnicum Literis—de Originibus Gentium—Alcorani et Evangelii Concordia, 8vo.—de Linguae Hebraicæ. Excellentiâ—de Ultimo Judicio, &c.—de Tribus Impostoribus, &c. attributed by some to him.

POSTHUMUS, Mar. Cass. Latienus, a Roman general made emperor after Valerian's death, 261. His valour and virtues promised happiness to Rome, when he was murdered with his son by his rebellious soldiers, 267.

POSTLETHWAYTE, Malachi, the learned author of the English Commercial Dictionary, 2 vols. fol. a work of great merit and utility, was a London merchant, and died 1767.

POTAMON, a philosopher of Alexandria in the age of Augustus, was chief of the Eclectic sect.

POTANON, an orator of Lesbos, whose panegyric on Tiberius was much admired, though too full of flattery.

POTE, Joseph, an English bookseller and printer, settled at Eton, where he died 1787. He published an interesting History of Windsor castle, and of its antiquities, and of St. George's college and chapel, &c.

POTEMKIN, Gregory Alexander, a Russian prince descended from a Polish family, and born at Smolensko in 1736. He was an ensign in the horse-guards when his person first attracted the notice of Catherine, and he rapidly rose to the envied situation of favourite, and of war minister. He suggested to his imperial mistress the necessity of seizing upon the Crimea, and by his advice the foundations of Cherson were laid in 1778 on the banks of the Nieper, and a new city suddenly arose, important for its maritime situation, and well protected by a population of above 40,000 inhabitants. In the enjoyment of the favours of the empress, Potemkin sighed for new distinctions, and to obtain the ribband of St. George, which was bestowed only on victorious generals, he persuaded his mistress to declare war against the Turks 1787, and he took the field in person at the head of 150,000 men. In the midst of the winter he laid siege to Oczakow, which he took by assault, and delivered up to the plunder of his licentious troops, who sacrificed to their fury upwards of 25,000 men. Thus victorious he was received by Catherine with unusual pomp; the most splendid presents were lavished upon him, and he was better enabled to indulge that fondness for luxury and debauched intemperance which covered his table with the choicest dainties, and the rarest fruits at the most extravagant expense. He attended afterwards the congress of Yassi, which was to cement a reconciliation between the Russians and the Turks; but his intemperance here brought on indisposition, and as he wished to remove to the more salubrious air of Nicolaeff his distemper grew so violent, that he alighted from his carriage by the way, and expired suddenly under a tree, 14th Oct. 1791, aged 55. His remains were conveyed to Cherson, and buried by order of the empress under a magnificent mausoleum. Potemkin in his character was violent, haughty, and tyrannical; not only the courtiers of Catherine felt the overbearing power of this guilty favourite, but even foreign ambassadors were treated with studied disdain and ceremonious superiority. His intemperance at table has been mentioned as so extraordinary, that it is said he generally devoured a whole goose, or a ham for his breakfast, with a copious draught of wine, and feasted the rest of the day with equal voracity. It is reported that not satisfied with the pompous title of chief of the Cossacks, he aspired to the dignity of duke of Courland, and to the throne of Poland, and in the midst of his elevation there were not some wanting who expected that at the head of the Russian armies he would declare himself independent, or presume to dethrone his benefactress.

POTENGER, John, son of the master of Winchester school, was born at Winchester, July 21st, 1647. He was of Corpus Christi college, Oxford, where he took his bachelor's degree, and then entered at the Temple, and was called to the bar. He married the daughter of Sir John Ernle, chancellor of the exchequer, and died comptroller of the pipe office. He died Dec. 18th, 1733, and was buried in the parish of Highworth, Wilts. He wrote a Pastoral Reflection on Death, a poem—the Life of Agricola, from Tacitus—poems, epistles, discourses, &c.

POTER, Paul, a native of Enckuysen, in Holland, eminent as a painter. His landscapes, farms, cattle, &c. are much admired, and it is said that he was superior to all other artists, in throwing, with effect, the rays of the meridian sun upon the various rural objects of his pieces. He died at Amsterdam 1654, aged 29.

POTT, Percival, a very able surgeon, born in Thread-needle-street, London, Dec. 1713. Though he might have obtained preferment in the church, by means of his patron, bishop Wilcox, he chose the profession of a surgeon, and under the judicious directions of Mr. Nourse, soon distinguished himself. In 1745 he was elected surgeon of Bartholomew hospital, and by sound judgment, attention, and experience, he was enabled to introduce a mild and rational mode of practice in the treatment of his patients. In 1764 he was made fellow of the Royal Society, and the next year he attracted the public attention by his lectures, and then removed from Watling-street to Lincoln's Inn, and in 1777, to Hanover square. After a long life, devoted to the service of mankind, universally respected and admired, he died Dec. 1788, in consequence of a cold which he caught in visiting a country patient. This worthy man advanced the science of surgery, not only by the result of long experience, but by the invention of several surgical instruments, and by the publication of some valuable treatises. The chief of his works are, a Treatise on the Hernia—on the Wounds of the Head—Observations on the Fistula Lacrymalis—Remarks on the Hydrocele—on the Cataract, &c. all of which have been collected and published 1790, in 3 vols. 8vo. by his son-in-law Mr. Earle.

POTT, John Henry, a learned German chymist, author of a treatise De Sulphuribus Metallorum, 1738, 4to.—Observationes circa Sal, 1741, 2 vols. 4to. and other works, in high reputation.

POTT, John, succeeded West, in the administration of the government of Virginia in 1628, and continued in office until the arrival of Sir John Harvey, in 1629. During this period the assembly was twice convened, and many regulations adopted for the defence of the colony. He was a member of the council under the provisional government constituted by the king, in 1625, and is styled by Burk a doctor in physic.

POTTER, Christopher, an English divine, born in Westmoreland, 1591. He was educated at Queen's college, Oxford, where he took his degrees, and became fellow, and also succeeded his uncle, Dr. Barnaby Potter, 1626, as provost. He published a sermon, preached at his uncle's consecration as bishop of Carlisle, 1628, and he himself was made dean of Worcester, 1635, and in 1640, vice-chancellor of Oxford. He signalized himself by his loyalty during the civil wars, and sent his plate to the king, saying that he wished rather to drink like Diogenes in the palm of his hand, than that his majesty should want. In Jan. 1646, he was nominated to the deanery of Durham; but he died in his college the following March, and before he was installed. He was a learned and exemplary character. He wrote besides some tracts on predestination against the Calvinists.

POTTER, John, primate of England, was born at Wakefield, Yorkshire, 1674. He was educated at University college, Oxford, and at the age of 19, began to distinguish himself as an able Grecian, and acute critic, by his publication of Variantes Lectiones ad Plutarchi Librum de audiendis, &c. He was, in 1694, chosen fellow of Lincoln college, where he became an eminent and popular tutor. He was in 1704, made chaplain to archbishop Tenison, and went in consequence to reside at Lambeth. In 1708 he was appointed canon of Christ church, and regius divinity professor, and in 1715, was raised to the see of Oxford. In 1737 he succeeded Wake, at Canterbury, and after supporting this high office with becoming dignity, died 1747. In his private character, it is said, that he was haughty, and to prove this, it is mentioned that he disinherited his son for marrying below his rank. He published Antiquities of Greece, 2 vols. 8vo. which have passed through several editions—an Edition of Lycophron, folio, much valued—Discourse on Church Government—Edition of Clemens Alexandrinus, &c. His theological works, charges, &c. were edited, 3 vols. 8vo. Oxford, 1753.

POTTER, Francis, an English divine born in Wiltshire, and educated at Oxford. He succeeded his father as minister of Kilmington 1637, and was admitted member of the Royal Society in consequence of his presenting a curious hydraulic machine to that learned body. He was equally eminent as a painter; but his Explication of the Number 666, in the Apocalypse, 4to. Oxford, 1642, does not reflect much on his sense or genius as a commentator. He died blind, 1678.

POTTER, Robert, a learned divine, was born in Norfolk in 1721, and educated at Emanuel-college, Cambridge, where he took his bachelor's degree in 1741. His first preferment was the vicarage of Scarning in Norfolk, where he wrote several ingenious poems in imitation of Pope, which were published in one volume, octavo, in 1774. In 1777 appeared his translation of Æschylus, with notes, 4to.; reprinted in 1779, in 2 vols. 8vo. In 1781 came out the first volume of his translation of Euripides, and the second volume in the following year. In 1788 he printed his Sophocles, for which his old school-fellow, lord Thurlow, gave him a prebend in the church of Norwich; and bishop Bagot presented him to the vicarages of Lowestoft and Kessingland. He died at Lowestoft in 1804. Besides the above works, Mr. Potter wrote "Observations on the Poor Laws;" an "Answer to Dr. Johnson's Lives of the Poets;" "A Translation of the Oracle concerning Babylon," &c.—W. B.

POUCHARD, Julian, a native of Lower Normandy, who was engaged in the direction of the Journal des Sçavans, and was also professor of Greek in the royal college at Paris. He wrote a discourse on the Antiquity of the Egyptians—another on the Liberalities of the Romans, &c. and died 1705, aged 49.

POUGET, Francis Amé, a French divine, born at Montpellier, 1666. He was priest of the oratory, doctor of the Sorbonne, regent of an ecclesiastical school at Montpellier, vicar of St. Roche, Paris, and died at the convent of St. Magloire, 1723. He was an able theologian, and is said to have proved his powers by the penitence and conversion of La Fontaine. He wrote a "Catechism of Montpellier, or a Body of Divinity," 5 vols. 12mo. afterwards translated into Latin, in 2 vols. fol.—Christian Instructions on the Duties of the Knights of Malta, 12mo. &c.

POULLE, Lewis, preacher to the king, and abbot of Nogent, died at Avignon, his native place, 8th Nov. 1781, aged 79. Besides eloquence, which he possessed in the highest degree, he was also eminently known as a poet, and he obtained the poetical prize at Toulouse, in 1732 and 1733. His sermons were very popular, and it is remarkable that he never committed them to paper, but retained them in his memory, and at last, after the lapse of forty years, he was with difficulty prevailed upon by his friends, to favour the public with discourses, which had charmed and consoled the most numerous audiences. They appeared in 2 vols. 12mo. 1778.

POUPART, Francis, a native of Mans, who studied anatomy and philosophy at Paris, and took his degree of M. D. at Rheims. He wrote a Dissertation on the Leech, in the Journal des Sçavans—a Memoir on Hermaphrodite Insects—History of the Formica-Leo, and Formica-Pulex, besides other valuable tracts, inserted in the memoirs of the academy of sciences, of which he was a member. Though in narrow circumstances, he maintained his character of gayety, good humour, and modesty. He died Oct. 1709, aged 48.

POURBUS, Peter and Francis, father and son, two eminent Flemish painters. The father was born at Gonde, and died at Antwerp, 1583. The son was born at Bruges, and died at Paris, 1622. The landscapes and animals of the father were much admired; but the son was superior in his portraits and historical pieces.

POURCHOT, Edme, a native of Pouilly, near Auxerre, who became professor of philosophy in the college of the Grassins, and then of that of Mazarin, at Paris. He was a man of great information, and intimate with Racine, Despreaux, Mabillon, Montfaucon, and the other learned men of his time. He wrote Institutiones Philosophicæ, edited a fourth time in 4to. 1744, and 5 vols. 12mo. and also other works, and died at Paris, 22d June, 1734, aged 83.

POURFOUR, Francis, a physician, who died at Paris, his native place, 1741, aged 77. He is author of three letters on a New System of the Brain, 4to.; Dissertation on the New Method of Operating for the Cataract, 12mo.; on the Diseases of the Eyes, 4to. in three letters, &c. He was also a most skilful herbalist, and after his death, which happened at Paris, 18th June, 1741, in his 77th year, there was found among his papers a valuable MS. herbal, of 30 folio vols. of which the plants had been carefully prepared by himself.

POUSSIN, Nicolas, an eminent French painter, born at Andely, in Normandy, 1594. He studied at Paris, and in his 30th year passed to Rome; but scarce able to maintain himself by his pencil, till his genius burst through the clouds of prejudice, and established his character as a great and sublime artist. He devoted much of his time to the contemplation of the sculptured heroes of ancient Rome, and her various relics of antiquity; and thence arose that exactness in the manners and customs, the times and places, which he every where mingles with elegance of form, correctness and variety of proportions, and interesting air, and boldness of feature. His fame was so great, that Lewis XIII. sent him an invitation which he could not refuse; but though he was flattered, and lodged in the Thuilleries, he sighed for the classic retreats of his favourite Rome, and at last returned there, and died there of a paralytic stroke, 1665. His chief works in France were, the Lord's Supper; the Labours of Hercules, for the Louvre, which he did not complete, in consequence of the satirical remarks made by Vouet and his pupils, upon him.

POUSSIN, Gaspar, a painter. His real name was Dughet, but he assumed that of Poussin, when that celebrated artist married his sister. His landscapes are much admired, and as he studied with unusual attention the various views of nature, it is to his highest credit that he has been enabled to convey his observations into his pieces. His land storms have particular expression; but his figures are said to want dignity. He is mentioned by Mason, as uniting in his pieces the style of his brother-in-law, and of Claude Lorraine. He died 1675, though some place his death in 1663, at the age of about 63.

POWEL, David, a learned Welchman, born in Denbighshire, 1552. He was educated at Oxford, and on the foundation of Jesus college there, he became D. D. in 1583. He was vicar of Ruabon, Denbighshire, and had some other preferment in the church of St. Asaph. He died 1590, and was buried in his own church. He published Caradoc's History of Cambria, with annotations, 4to. 1584; Annotationes in Itinerarium Cambriæ per Sylv. Geraldum, 1585; Annotationes in Cambriæ Descript. per Gerald.; De Britannicâ Historiâ recte Intelligendâ; Pont. Virunnii Historia Britannica.

POWELL, William Samuel, an able divine, born at Colchester, 27th Sept. 1717. He was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, 1740, and master, 1765, after promoting its interests as an active tutor. He was also archdeacon of Colchester, and rector of Freshwater in the Isle of Wight, and died Jan. 19th, 1775. He published a well-known sermon on subscribing to the 39 articles, and other excellent discourses.

POWELL, George, an actor, considered for some time as the successful rival of Betterton, till his irregularities and his propensity to drinking ruined him in the public opinion. Colley Cibber compares him to Wilks. He died 1714. He wrote Alphonso, a tragedy, and other dramatic pieces. His great character was Alexander.

who frequently walked from London to York in a short period of time, with great ease. Though high wagers depended upon his exertions, and though he betted much upon himself, yet he died poor, in 1793, aged 59. He was then an under clerk in an attorney's office.

POWATAN, father of Pocahontas, and emperor of the Indians in Virginia when the English made their first settlement in 1607, was the most powerful of the Indian kings, swaying the sceptre over thirty nations. He was remarkable for the vigour of his body and the energy of his mind; also equally eminent for skill in intrigue, courage in battle, equanimity in victory, and fortitude in the hour of adversity. He commanded the highest respect from his subjects, and lived, for a savage, in great dignity and splendour. He was always attended by a guard of forty warriors, and watched by a sentry at night. He was hostile to the English, and came near effecting their destruction repeatedly; but on the marriage of his daughter to Rolfe, he became friendly, and remained at peace. He died soon after hearing of the death of his daughter.

POWALL, Thomas, an English writer, born in Lincolnshire. He went early to America, and obtained the government of New-Jersey, and afterwards that of Massachusetts, which he exchanged, in 1760, for that of South Carolina. During the American war he returned to England, and was made comptroller general of the expenditure, &c. of the army in Germany, and was also elected member of the commons in three parliaments. He afterwards retired from public business for the pursuit of literary labours, and died at Bath, much respected, 1795, aged 73. He was a man of great information, and well skilled in antiquities, and contributed much to the memoirs of the Antiquarian Society, of which he was a member. He wrote Memoirs on Drainage and Navigation; Letter to Adam Smith on his Wealth of Nations; Treatise on Antiquities; Memorials to the Sovereigns of Europe; Memorial to the Sovereigns of America; the Right, Interest, &c. of Government concerning East India Affairs; Topographical Description of Part of North America; Description of Antiquities in the Provincia Romana of Gaul; Intellectual Physics; Essay on the Nature of Being; Treatise on Old Age, &c.

POYET, William, a native of Angers, who was patronised by Louisa the mother of Francis I. and became at last chancellor of France, 1538. He for a while maintained his power by flattery, but the displeasure of the queen of Navarre and of the dutchess d'Etampes, the king's mistress, hastened his disgrace, and he was in 1545, deprived of all his honours by a decree of the parliament of Paris, and confined in the tower of Bourges. He died 1548, aged 74.

POYNINGS, sir Edward, a gentleman of Kent, who recommended himself to the favour of Henry VII. by whom he was sent to Ireland. In this new government he displayed great courage, firmness, and wisdom: the rebellions of lord Desmond and Kildare were overpowered, a parliament was called, and salutary laws were enacted. In the next reign Poyning was made a privy counsellor, and appointed governor of Tour-nay, in Flanders.

POZZO, Andrew, a native of Trent, eminent as a painter and architect. Some of his pictures adorned the church of St. Ignatius at Rome. He wrote 2 vols. on perspective, with little judgment. He died 1709, aged 67.

POZZO, Modesta. Vid. FONTE MODERATA.

PRADON, Nicolas, a French poet, who affected to be the rival of Racine. Through prejudice and party, his Hippolytus and Phædra, for a time balanced the merits and the popularity of that great poet; but his presumption and ignorance have been severely censured by Boileau. He was born at Rouen, and died at Paris, 1698. His works were printed, 1744, in 2 vols. 12mo.

PRATT, Samuel Jackson, a miscellaneous writer, was born at St. Ives, in Hunting-donshire, in 1749. He went on the stage early in life; but failing in that line, he became an itinerant lecturer, and next a bookseller at Bath, where he published several poems, and novels under the name of Courtney Melmoth. The principal of his poems were, the tears of Genius on the Death of Goldsmith; a sentimental piece, entitled Sympathy; and Landscapes in verse. His best novels were, Liberal Opinions, 5 vols.; Emma Corbett, 3 vols.; the Pupil of Pleasure, 2 vols.; and Family Secrets, 5 vols.; Besides these works, he published Gleanings, or Travels Abroad and in England, 3 vols. 8vo. He also wrote the fair Circassian, a tragedy, and some other works. He died at Birmingham in 1814.—W. B.

PRATT, Charles, earl of Camden, third son of sir John Pratt, chief justice of the king's bench, was born 1713. From Eton and from King's college, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree, he entered at the Inner Temple, and studied assiduously the law. His merits, however, remained buried in obscurity, till called forth by the protection of Henley and of Mr. Pitt; and when the former was made chancellor, in 1757, he obtained the office of attorney general for his friend. In 1762, he was raised to the dignity of chief justice of the common pleas, and it was in this office that he gained such deserved popularity, when after a patient hearing of arguments on both sides, he pronounced the detention of Mr. Wilkes illegal, against the opinion and the wishes of government. This impartial conduct procured for him the thanks and the freedom of the city of London in a gold box: his picture was placed in Guildhall as an honourable testimony of his virtues, and various cities in the kingdom re-echoed the sentiments of the capital. In 1765, he was raised to the peerage, and in 1766, advanced to the seals, but his opinion on the Middlesex election was so opposite to the views of the ministry that he was stripped of his honours, though he had the satisfaction to see some of his colleagues proud to share his disgrace. In the American war he reprobated the violent measures pursued by lord North, and in the case of the libel laws he wished to give greater power to the deliberation of jurymen. In 1782, he was appointed president of the council; and though the next year he resigned for a little time, he continued in the honourable office till his death. This venerable character died 18th April, 1794.

PRATT, Benjamin, chief justice of New-York, was a native of Massachusetts, born about the year 1710, and educated at Harvard college, where he was graduated in 1737. He studied law, and entered on the practice in Boston, where he soon became one of the most conspicuous in learning and eloquence. He possessed an understanding of great energy and clearness, a splendid fancy, a philosophical accuracy of thought, and great independence of feeling. From eminence at the bar he soon rose to political distinction, and was a bold and ardent friend of freedom. He was much esteemed by governor Pownall, and lost his popularity in Boston by proposing, for the accommodation of that governor on his leaving the province, that a public ship should be allowed to convey him to England. Soon after, however, by the influence of Pownall, he was appointed chief justice of New-York, and gained the highest reputation in discharging the duties of the office. He died on the 5th of January, 1763, in the fifty-fourth year of his age. Judge Pratt wrote poetry of a very respectable character, and made an extensive collection of materials for a history of New-England, which his early death prevented his completing.  L.

PRAXAGORAS, a Greek historian of Athens. He wrote a History of Athens—of Constantine—and of Alexander, about 345 A. D.

PRAXEAS, author of a heresy in the second century, maintained that there is but one person in the trinity, the same which suffered on the cross.

PRAXITELES, a Grecian sculptor, B. C. 364. His statues of Venus and Phyrne were much admired.

PREBLE, Edward, captain in the navy of the United States, was born at Falmouth, now Portland, Maine, August 15th, 1761. After having made several voyages as a sailor, he, in 1779, entered the navy as midshipman, and not long after became a lieutenant in a sloop of war, commanded by captain Little, where he distinguished himself by capturing, with a small party, a British vessel at Penobscot. After the peace of 1783, he was employed in merchant vessels, till 1798, when he was appointed to the command of the brig Pickering, and soon after to that of the Essex, in which he made a voyage as a convoy to Batavia. In 1803, he was intrusted with the command of a fleet sent to act against the Barbary states. By his skilful and vigorous exertions he soon procured a peace from the emperor of Morocco, and repeatedly attacked Tripoli with considerable success, injuring the batteries, and destroying several vessels. He was superseded in the command in September, 1804, and returned to the United States, greatly applauded for his bravery and success. His conduct commanded high respect, also, in Europe. The pope remarked that he did more toward humbling these barbarians, than all the states of Europe had ever done. His health began to decline in 1806, and on the 25th of August, 1807, he died, in the forty-sixth year of his age.  L.

PREMONTVAL, Peter le Guay de, member of the academy of sciences at Berlin, was born at Charenton, 1716. He wrote Monogamia, or a Tract on single Marriage. 3 vols. 8vo.—Preservative against the Corruption of French Language in Germany, 8vo.—the Mind of Fontenelle, 12mo.—Thoughts on Liberty—Memoirs on the Berlin Academy. He inclined to the doctrines of Socinus and Epicurus, and of fortuitous creation. He died at Berlin, 1767.

PRESTON, Thomas, fellow of King's College, Cambridge, was doctor of civil law, and master of Trinity hall in Elizabeth's reign. When the queen visited the university, 1564, he played with such success in the Latin tragedy of Dido, that her majesty settled a pension of 20*l.* on him. He wrote some dramatic pieces.

PRESTON, John, master of Emanuel college, Cambridge, was an able writer in favour of the Puritans. He died 1623.

PRESTRE LE. Vid. VAUBAN.

PRETI, Jerome, a native of Tuscany, distinguished as a poet. He died at Barcelona 1626. His elegant poems were published 1666, in 12mo.

PREVILLE, Peter Lewis Dubus de, an eminent French actor. He was intended by his parents for the ecclesiastical profession; but for some childish misconduct, he left his father's house, and after working for a little time with some masons, he joined himself to a company of strolling players. From Lyons, where he first gained popularity, he came to Paris, and in his exhibition before the royal family, he so much pleased the king, Lewis XV. that he was made one of the comedians of the court. He withdrew from the stage in 1785, but again reappeared in 1792, in support of his profession, which had suffered by the revolution. He afterwards retired to the house of his daughter at Beauvais, where he died blind in 1800. As an actor he possessed great powers, he could adopt the manners and expressions of every age and profession, and after exciting the loudest laughter, he has been known to rouse the deepest compassion, and to draw tears from his auditors.

PREVOT D'EXILES, Antony Francis, a French writer, born at Hesdin in the province of Artois, 1697. He was educated among the Jesuits, but relinquished their society for the army, and afterwards retired among the Benedictines of St. Maur. The love of pleasure and of the world, however, prevailed upon him again to violate his vows, and fly from the monastery. He went to Holland, where he formed a connexion with a woman of some merit and beauty, and with her visited England 1733, and the following year returned to France. Under the patronage of Conti he promised himself a peaceful old age; but a fatal accident terminated his days. On the 23d Nov. 1763, he was found in an apoplectic fit in the forest of Chantilly, and a surgeon, supposing him dead, opened his body. The beginning of the operation restored the fallen man to his senses, but too late, as the vital parts had been lacerated. He is known as the author of translations of Clarissa Harlowe, and of sir Charles Grandison into French, besides which he wrote Memoirs of a Man of Quality, in 6 vols. a romance of some merit—History of Cleveland, natural son of Cromwell, 6 vols.—Pro and Con., a periodical journal, continued in 20 vols. in which he censured with too much freedom the works of his cotemporaries—the Dean of Coleraine, a novel—a General History of Voyages—History of Margaret of Anjou, 2 vols. 12mo. and other works.

PRICEUS or PRICE, John, an Englishman who resided in Paris, but returned to England in 1646, which he left in consequence of the civil wars. He afterwards settled at Florence, where he became a Roman Catholic, and was made keeper of the medals to the grand duke, and Greek professor. He died at Rome 1676, aged 76.

He wrote notes on the Psalms—on St. Matthew—on the Acts—on Apuleius, 1650, &c. in which he evinced extensive erudition and great taste.

PRICE, Sir John, a gentleman of Brecknockshire, who was employed in surveying the monasteries which were doomed to dissolution at the reformation. He was well skilled in antiquities, and wrote a defence of British History in answer to Polydore Virgil, published by his son Richard, 1573. He died about 1553.

PRICE, Richard, an eminent dissenting minister and able political writer, born about 1723 in Glamorganshire. He was educated for the ministry among the dissenters, and began early to preach at Newington, Middlesex, and afterwards removed to Hackney. In 1764, he was elected fellow of the Royal Society, and some years after obtained the degree of D.D. from a Scotch university. In 1772, he commenced author by his appeal to the public on the national debt, and in 1776, during the party disputes which attended the beginning of the American war, he published his famous observations on the nature of civil government. This work, which did not pass without censure from various writers, acquired great popularity, and procured for its author the thanks of the common council of London that year. As preacher at the meeting-house in the Old Jewry, he delivered a discourse in 1789, which was afterwards made public. In this sermon "on the Love of Our Country," he enlarged on the French revolution with party prejudices, and with democratic zeal, and asserted the right of the people to cashier their governors for misconduct; but whatever may be the opinions of politicians on popular subjects, it must reflect disgrace on the man who, assuming the character of a Christian minister, rejoices at the misfortunes of fallen greatness, and triumphs on the ruins of a throne. These allusions to the fate of the French monarch were read and commented upon by Mr. Burke with the noble indignation of offended virtue; but the pamphlets which have appeared in consequence of this controversy, though numerous, deserve now little the notice of the world, only so far as they recommend the cultivation of benevolence and charity among men, and loyal attachment to that government which protects equally the person and the property of all its subjects. Dr. Price died 19th March, 1791. As a political writer he carried his ideas of equality and liberty much farther than the vices and passions of men will with safety allow. As a calculator on political questions he was eminently distinguished. His works are four dissertations on Providence and Prayer, on the Evidences of a Future State, on the Importance of Christianity—a Review of the Principal Questions and Difficulties in Morals, 8vo.—Observations on Reversional Payments, Annuities, &c. 2 vols. 8vo.—Discussion of the Doctrines of Materialism and Necessity, in a Correspondence with Dr. Priestley, 8vo.—Essay on the Population of England and Wales, 8vo.—a volume of sermons on various occasional subjects. Mrs. Chapone has described him, in her miscellanies, as a very amiable man in private life.

PRICHARD, Rees, a native of Llandovery, in Caermarthenshire, educated at St. John's college, Oxford. He wrote some poetical pieces, which are still read with fond partiality by the Welch, and died 1644, vicar of his native village, rector of Llamedy, chancellor of St. David's, and prebendary of Brecon.

PRIDEAUX, John, an English prelate, born at Stowford, Devonshire, 1578. His parents were very poor, and when disappointed as candidate for the clerkship of Ugborough church, near Harford, he travelled on foot to Oxford, and from the mean occupation of a helper in the kitchen of Exeter college, he rose to be one of its most respectable fellows, and in 1612, was elected the rector of the society. In 1615 he was made regius professor of divinity, and canon of Christ church, and afterwards served the office of vice chancellor, and in 1641, was raised to the see of Worcester. The troubles of the state exposed him to great persecution for his loyalty, so that he died poor, of a fever, at the house of his son-in-law, Dr. H. Sutton, at Breton, Worcestershire, 1650. He wrote various works in Latin, besides orations, lectures, and Fasciculus Controversiarum Theologicarum.

PRIDEAUX, Humphrey, an eminent divine, born at Padstow, Cornwall, 3d May, 1648. He was educated under Busby, at Westminster, and entered at Christ church, Oxford, 1668; and in 1676, when he took his master's degree, he published his Marmora Oxoniensia, &c. in fol. a work of some merit, which explained more fully than Selden's account, the Arundelian marbles. This publication recommended him to the patronage of Finch, lord Nottingham, the chancellor, who gave him the living of St. Clement's in Oxford, and afterwards added a prebend in the church of Norwich, in 1681. He refused, in 1691, the Hebrew professorship at Oxford, of which he afterwards repented; but in 1702 he was promoted to the deanery of Norwich. He was unfortunately afflicted with the stone, for which he was cut in 1712; but so unskilfully was the operation performed, that he was afterwards obliged to void his urine through the orifice by which the stone had been extracted. This disagreeable accident disabled him from appearing in the pulpit; but his hours were devoted to the public service, and he then wrote his connections of the Old and New Testament, 2 vols. folio, and 4 vols. 8vo. a work of great merit and utility, which has been translated into various languages, and often edited. This worthy character, amiable in private life, and respectable as an intelligent and learned author, died 1st Nov. 1724. He wrote besides, the Right of Tithes; Directions for Churchwardens; some pamphlets; sermons, and a life of Mahomet, of which three editions were sold in one year, as part of a larger work on the Saracen Empire, a design which he abandoned.

PRIE, N. de Bertolet, marchioness de, an intriguing female, who on her return from Turin, where her husband the marquis de Prie was ambassador from France, became the favourite of Bourbon the prime minister. After dispensing for some time the favours of the court in the most capricious manner, she was exiled to a country seat by the cardinal de Fleury; and the disgrace had such effect upon her mind that she soon after died of a broken heart, 1727, aged 29.

PRIESTLEY, Joseph, an English philosopher and dissenting divine, born at Fieldhead, Yorkshire, 1733. He was educated at Daventry, under Dr. Ashworth, for the ministry among the dissenters, and at the proper age he took care of a congregation at Needham market, Suffolk, and afterwards at Nantwich, Cheshire. He became in 1761, professor of belles lettres in the Warrington academy, and after seven years residence there he removed to Leeds, and two years after accepted the office of librarian and philosophical companion to the earl of Shelburne. In this retreat the philosopher devoted himself laboriously to metaphysical and theological studies, and published various works, and when at last he separated from his noble patron, he retired with an annual pension of 150*l.* to settle at Birmingham as pastor to a unitarian congregation, in 1780. While here usefully employed in advancing the cause of philosophy, and too often engaged in theological disputes, he became the victim of popular fury, and the conduct of some of his neighbours in celebrating the anniversary of the French revolution in 1791, with more intemperance than became Englishmen and loyal subjects, excited a dreadful riot. Not only the meeting-houses were destroyed on this melancholy occasion, but among others Dr. Priestley's house, library, manuscripts, and philosophical apparatus, were totally consumed, and though he recovered a compensation by suing the county, he quitted this scene of prejudice and unpopularity. After residing some time at London and Hackney, where he preached to the congregation over which his friend Price once presided, he deterained to quit his native country, and seek a more peaceful retreat in America, where some of his family were already settled. He left England in 1794, and fixed his residence at Northumberland, in Pennsylvania, where he died in 1804. His writings were very numerous, and he long attracted the public notice, not only by discoveries in philosophy, but by the boldness of his theological opinions. Had he confined his studies merely to philosophical pursuits, his name would have descended to posterity with greater lustre; but he who attempts innovations in government and religion for singularity, and to excite popular prejudices, must be little entitled to the applauses of the world. His chief publications are, an Examination of Dr. Reid's Work on the Human Mind, Dr. Beattie's on Truth, and Dr. Osborne's on Common Sense, 1755; Disquisition on Matter and Spirit, in which he denied the soul's immateriality, 1777; Experiments and Observations on various kinds of Air, 2 vols. 8vo. and other learned and valuable communications to the philo-sophical transactions; Letters to Bishop Newcome on the Duration of Christ's Ministry; History of the Corruptions of Christianity, 2 vols. 8vo. a work of singular character, which brought on a controversy with Dr. Horsley, and also excited the animadversion of the monthly reviewers and other writers; History of Early Opinions concerning the person of Christ, &c. He also published charts of History and Biography; History of Electricity; History and Present State of Discoveries relating to Vision, Light, and Colours; Lectures on the Theory and History of Language, and on the principles of Oratory and Criticism, &c. He at one time adopted the doctrine of philosophical necessity, in which Dr. Price ably opposed him; and in America he defended his Socinian principles with great warmth in a controversy with Dr. Linn, of Philadelphia. His discoveries and improvements in the knowledge of chymistry were very great and important; but he lived to see the general explosion of the doctrine of phlogiston, which he had so zealously established, and so pertinaciously defended. From his extensive information as a philosopher, he had correspondents in every part of the world, and was member not only of the London Society, but of other learned bodies in the two continents.

PRIEUR, Philip, a native of Normandy, professor of belles lettres in Paris university, and author of Dissertatio de Literis Canoniciis, 8vo. &c. He also edited Cyprian, Arnobius, Minutius Felix, &c. fol. and died 1680.

PRIMATICCIO, Francesco, a noble Bolognese, known as a painter and architect. He was patronised by Francis I. king of France, and as commissary general of the Royal buildings, he improved the taste of the nation in the arts. He died at Paris, much respected, 1570, aged 80.

PRIMEROSE, Gilbert, a Scotch divine, minister of the French church in London, chaplain to James I. and canon of Windsor. He was made D.D. at Oxford by royal mandamus, and died 1642. He is the author of Jacob's Vow in opposition to the vows of monks and friars, in French, 4 vols. 4to.—the Trumpet of Zion, in 18 sermons, and other theological works. His son James was a physician, who for some time practised at Paris, and afterwards settled in Yorkshire. He wrote several treatises de Mulierum Morbis, 4to.—de Circulatione Sanguinis—Enchiridion Medico-Practicum—Ars Pharmaceutica—de Vulgi Erroribus in Medicina, 8vo. translated into French by Ro-tagny, and into English by Dr. Wittie, 1651, 8vo.—Academia Mons-peliensis Descripta, &c.

PRINCE DE BEAUMONT, Mad. le, a French lady, born at Rouen. She was long engaged in education in England, and by her various popular publications rendered instruction pleasing and delightful to her youthful readers. Her pieces are le Magasin des Enfans—des Adolescentes—l'Education complete—and other works, all of which are highly interesting, and promote the cause of morality and virtue. She died 1780.

PRINCE, John, a native of Axminster, Devon, educated at Brazen Nose, Oxford. He became curate of Bideford, and afterwards obtained St. Martin's, Exeter, the vicarage of Totness, and then Berry Pomeroy, where he died 1720. He is author of the Worthies of Devon, fol. a work of merit, now scarce—Humble Defence of the Exeter bill, &c.—Letters to a Young Divine—sermons and tracts, &c.

PRINCE, Thomas, governor of Plymouth colony, New-England, was a native of England, and came over to Plymouth in 1621. He was for many years an assistant, and was chosen governor in 1634 and 1638, and again in 1657, from which time he held the office till his death. He was happily qualified for the station by great integrity and piety. He was zealously opposed to those whom he deemed heretical, but did much service to the colony by promoting the employment of educated clergymen, in place of lay preachers, whom many were desirous of introducing into the churches, and also by strenuously encouraging the establishment of grammar-schools. He died in 1673, in the 73d year of his age.  L.

where he was invited to settle, but he preferred to return to America. Soon after his arrival at Boston in 1718 he was ordained pastor of the Old South church in that town, and laboured there with great popularity and usefulness till his death in 1758. He possessed a fine mind, and had enriched it with an extent of learning which had been seldom equalled in New-England. He published a valuable Chronological History of New-England, and made large collections for a civil and religious history of it in manuscripts and books, many of which unhappily were destroyed during the war of the revolution.

PRINGLE, Sir John, an eminent physician, born in Roxburghshire, 10th April, 1707. He studied medicine at Edinburgh, and afterwards completed his education under Boerhaave at Leyden, where he took his medical degrees. He was in 1742 appointed physician to the army in Flanders, and he attended the forces of the duke of Cumberland to the battle of Culloden, after which he settled in London, and was made physician to the queen in 1761. His practice was great, and his reputation such that he was created a baronet in 1766, and elected president of the Royal Society, from 1772 to 1778, and physician to the king. This respectable man died in London, 18th Jan. 1782. He is author of Observations on the Diseases of the Army, 8vo.—Memoirs on Septic and Antiseptic Substances, 8vo. for which he received the gold medal of the Royal Society—Observations on the Treatment of Fevers in Hospitals and Prisons—Anniversary Discourses before the Royal Society.

PRIOLO, Benjamin, author of a good Latin History of France, from the death of Lewis XIII. 1643, to 1664, was born of a noble family at Venice, 1602. After studying at Orthez, Montauban, and at Leyden, under Heinsius and Vossius, he visited Paris, and afterwards Padua, and at last became the friend and the associate of the duke de Rohan. After his patron's death, 1638, he retired to Geneva, and afterwards was engaged in various negotiations in favour of the French court. He died of an apoplexy at Lyons, 1667, as he was going on a secret embassy to Venice. The best edition of his history is that of Leipsic, 1686, 8vo.

PRIOR, Matthew, an English poet of celebrity. He was born 21st July, 1664, in London, where his father was a joiner. After his father's death, his uncle, a vintner near Charing-cross, took care of him, and sent him to Westminster school, with the intention of bringing him up to his business; but while he pursued occasionally his studies he was fortunately called to settle a dispute on a passage in Horace, by some company in his uncle's house, and lord

Dorset was so pleased with his abilities and ingenuity that he liberally patronised him. He was therefore sent to St. John's college, Cambridge, of which he soon became fellow; and the application which he bestowed on learning advanced him still more in the good opinion of his patron and of his friends. In 1686 he joined his friend Mr. Montague, afterwards lord Halifax, in ridiculing the Hind and Panther of Dryden, in the story of the country and city mouse, and at the revolution, when his poetical merits became publicly known, he was introduced by lord Dorset to king William, and employed about the court. In 1690 he was secretary to the plenipotentiaries at the Hague, and the king, sensible of his merits, kept him about his person, as gentleman of his bedchamber. He was afterwards secretary of the negotiations at Ryswick in 1697, and also principal secretary of state in Ireland, and the next year he went as secretary to the embassy in France. In 1700 he was one of the lords commissioners of trade and plantations, and obtaining a seat in parliament for East Grinstead, he voted for the impeachment of the lords who had advised the partition treaty. Though he celebrated the illustrious deeds of the English at the battle of Blenheim, yet he was an advocate for peace, and in 1711 he was sent by queen Anne to France as ambassador plenipotentiary. He continued in that character even after the accession of George I. but he was accused by the parliament, and committed to close custody; yet, though exempted from the act of grace passed in 1707, he was liberated from confinement, and no charge laid against him. He retired from public life to his seat, Down-hall, Essex, engaged solely in literary pursuits. He was employed for some time on a history of his own time, but he was suddenly carried off by a fever, Sept. 18, 1721, in his 58th year, at Wimple, the seat of lord Oxford. He was buried in Westminster abbey, and a monument, for which he laid apart 500*l.* was erected over him, with an elegant inscription by Freind, the master of Westminster school. The History of his own Time appeared after his own death; but though said to be published from his papers, was evidently a spurious composition. The poems of Prior are chiefly on light subjects, but written with elegance, ease, and spirit. His Solomon on the Vanity of the World, was inscribed to his early patron, lord Dorset. His works have appeared in various editions. He continued till his death fellow of St. John's college, and when censured by his friends for keeping so small an income, when he was the favourite of the court, he replied that what he had besides was precarious, but that his fellowship would always be bread and cheese to him. When shown with great pomp and parade the apartments and curiosities of Versailles, in which the victories of Lewis XIV. were described, and asked whether king William's victories were so represented in his palaces, he nobly answered, "no, the monuments of my master's actions are to be seen every where but in his own house."

PRISCIANUS, a famous grammarian of Casarea, A. D. 525.

PRISCILLIAN, a Spaniard, who became the chief of a sect in the fourth century. He was beheaded 384. He favoured the errors of the Gnostics and the Manichees.

PRITZ, or PRITIUS, John George, a protestant divine, born at Leipsic 1662. He was professor of divinity at Gripswalde, and died much beloved, as one of the ministers of Frankfort, 24th Aug. 1732. He published an Introduction to the New Testament, 8vo.—de Immortalitate Hominis—an edition of Macarius's works—Milton's Letters—an edition of the Greek Testament, &c.

PROBUS, M. Aurel. Valer. a general, made emperor of Rome at the death of Tacitus, 276. He was successful against the Goths and other barbarians; but at last was murdered by his own soldiers, 282. He was a prince of great worth, and deservedly beloved by his subjects.

PROCACCINI, Camillo, a painter of Bologna. In his last supper, preserved in Genoa cathedral, the figures are represented larger than life, and with the most striking effect. He died 1626, aged 50. His brother Julius, who also died in 1626, was an artist of great genius and superior celebrity. This family produced several men of eminence in painting.

PROCLUS, a Platonic philosopher of Lycia, who attacked the Christian religion with great acrimony. He died about 485.

PROCLUS, St. the disciple of Chrysostom, and patriarch of Constantinople, died 447, author of some theological works.

PROCOPIUS, a Cilician, the relation of Julian. After the death of the next emperor, Jovian, he retired among the barbarians, but afterwards returned to Constantinople, during the absence of Valens, and proclaimed himself emperor, 365. He was defeated and beheaded the next year.

PROCOPIUS, a Greek historian, patronised by Belisarius and by Justinian. He was author of a History of the Wars of the Goths, Persians, and Gauls, &c.

PROCOPIUS, a Greek sophist of Gaza, A. D. 560. Author of Commentaries on the books of Kings, the Chronicles, Isaiah, &c.

PRODICUS, a sophist of Cos, about 396 B. C. He taught at Athens, where Socrates, Euripides, &c. attended his lectures.

PRONAPIDES, a Greek poet, said to have been the master of the great Homer, and to have taught his countrymen to write from the left to the right.

PROPERTIUS, Sextus Aurelius, a Roman poet of merit, contemporary with Tibollus, Ovid, and Mecenas. He died about 19 B. C.

PROSPER, St. a Christian writer of the fifth century, the disciple of Augustine. Though dissipated in the beginning of life, he reformed his manners, and became an able advocate of the faith, and died about 463.

PROTAGORAS, a Greek philosopher of Abdera. He was banished from Athens for supporting atheism. He died in Sicily about 400 B. C.

PROTOGENES, a painter of Rhodes, spared and patronised by Demetrius at the siege of the place about 300 B. C.

PROVENZALE, Marcello, an Italian, eminent as a painter in mosaic. His pieces were much admired. He died 1639, aged 64.

PRUDENTIUS, Aur. Clement. a native of Saragossa, in Spain. He was distinguished as an advocate, a soldier, a magistrate, and a poet. His Latin poems were edited by Elzevir, with Heinsius's notes, 1667.

PRUSIAS, a king of Bithynia, at whose court Annibal took refuge. When he seemed inclined to betray the illustrious fugitive, Annibal destroyed himself. Prusias was put to death by his subjects, B. C. 149.

PRYNNE, William, an English lawyer, distinguished during the civil wars. He was born at Swanswick, Somersetshire, 1600, and educated at Bath grammar-school, and Oriel college, Oxford, from whence he removed to Lincoln's-inn, 1620. His Histriomastix, or Discourse on Stage Plays, in 1632, was noticed by the court, as it was supposed to throw reflections on the queen, and the author was condemned by the star-chamber to be pilloried, to pay a fine of 5000*l.* and to lose his ears. This severity did not check his pen, he wrote other books, which satirically reflected on the conduct of Laud, and for this offence he was in 1637, again brought before the star-chamber, and condemned to be pilloried, fined 5000*l.* to lose the remainder of his ears, to have S. L. schismatical levellor, branded on both his cheeks, and to be imprisoned for life. He was, pursuant to the sentence, confined in Mount Orgueil castle in Jersey; but in 1640 he was set at liberty by the Commons, and he returned to London in triumph. He was member for Newport, in Cornwall, in the long parliament, and was one of the visitors at Oxford in 1647. He was a violent enemy to Laud, and was the chief manager of his trial; but he attacked with equal violence the independents, and did not spare their leader Cromwell, by whom he was imprisoned in Dunster castle, Somersetshire. He was restored to his seat in parliament when the recall of Charles II. took place, and sat afterwards for Bath. At the restoration he was made keeper of the records in the Tower, with a salary of 500*l.* per annum, and died at Lincoln's-inn, 24th Oct. 1669. He wrote a great number of books, chiefly on politics and religion, the best known of which are, his History of Laud, folio—the Lives of John—Henry III.—and Edward I.—Records, 3 vols. fol. &c.

PRZIFCOVIUS, Samuel, a Socinian writer, expelled, 1658, from Poland with his partisans on account of his opinions. He retired to Prussia, and died there 1670, aged 80. His works, which are all on theological subjects, appeared in one vol. fol. 1692.

PSALMANAZAR, George, an extraordinary character, whose real name and birthplace are unknown, though he is supposed to be a native of France. With an excellent education, obtained in some of the colleges of the Jesuits, he began at an early age to impose upon the world, first in the habit of a pilgrim, and afterwards in the character of a native of Formosa. He travelled from Germany to Liege, pretending to be a Japanese converted to Christianity; but afterwards he professed himself to be a heathen, and by the assiduity and zeal of the chaplain of brigadier Lauder's regiment, stationed at Sluys, he was admitted into the pale of the Christian church, and was baptized. The conversion of so able and so extraordinary a man, procured an easy introduction to Compton, the bishop of London, and Psalmanazar was taken into his house, and patronised as a deserving character. He was prevailed on to translate the church catechism into the Formosan language, and he also composed a grammar of that language; and though there were some who suspected the imposition, yet he was generally considered by the learned as a man of superior abilities, and a great prodigy. He afterwards published his History of Formosa, which quickly passed through two editions; and that greater confidence might be placed in his narrations, he accustomed himself to feed on raw flesh, roots, and herbs. Some absurdities, however, were discovered in his history, and at last, after living some years on the credulity of the public, he confessed himself an impostor, and declared his sorrow for the impropriety of his conduct. Though thus disgraced and abandoned by his former patrons, yet he found sufficient means to subsist by his pen; he undertook a share in the Universal History, and displayed in the execution great abilities. He lived many years after in an exemplary manner, and died 1763, fully sensible, and sorry for the vile imposition which he had practised.

PSAMMENITUS, a king of Egypt after Amasis, B.C. 525. He was defeated by Cambyses, and put to death six months after.

PSAMMETICUS, a king of Egypt, who shared the sovereign power with 11 other princes. When exiled by his royal associates, he returned, and with the assistance of the Greeks defeated them, and made himself sole monarch. He died 616 B.C.

PSELLUS, Michael Constantius, a Greek writer, who flourished about 1105, and was tutor to Michael, son of the emperor Constantine Dumas. He was a good scholar, and wrote comments on 24 of Menander's plays extant in his time. He wrote besides, de quatuor Mathematicis Scientiis, 1556, 8vo.—de Lapidum Virtutibus, 8vo.—de Operatione Dæmonum, 8vo.—de Victus Ratione, 8vo.—Synopsis Legum, Versibus Græcis edita.

PTOLEMY LAGUS, or SOTER, was the son of Arsinoe, the mistress of Philip of Macedonia, and he became one of the generals and favourites of Alexander the Great. On the hero's death he obtained Egypt as his share of the spoils, and founded there a kingdom, and made Alexandria his capital. He patronised learning and the arts, and died B.C. 285.

PTOLEMY PHILADELPHUS, son of the preceding, was like his father a zealous patron of learned men, and of commerce among his subjects. He died B.C. 246.

PTOLEMY EVERGETES, son and successor of Philadelphus, was a mild and benevolent prince. He conquered Syria and Cilicia, and died B.C. 221.

PTOLEMY PHILOPATER, son of Evergetes, was cruel in his behaviour to the Jews, whom afterwards he favoured. He died B.C. 204.

PTOLEMY EPIPHANES, succeeded his father Philopater, and was poisoned by his successor Philometor, 180 B.C.

PTOLEMY PHILOMETOR, the murderer of the preceding, was slain in a battle against Alexander Bala of Syria, B.C. 146.

PTOLEMY PHYSCON, succeeded Philometor, his brother, and proved tyrannical towards his subjects. He died 116 B.C.

PTOLEMY LATHYRUS, succeeded his father, Physcon, but was banished to Cyprus by his mother, who placed his brother Alexander on the throne. He regained his power after his brother's death, and died B.C. 81.

PTOLEMY AULETES, illegitimate son and successor of Lathyrus, maintained his power by an alliance with the Romans. He died B.C. 51.

PTOLEMY DIONYSIUS, son of Auletes, married his sister Cleopatra, and became the murderer of his benefactor Pompey. He was drowned in the Nile, B.C. 46.

PTOLEMY, Claudius, a mathematician, born at Pelusium, 138. His geography, in which he places the earth in the centre of the universe, is a valuable work.

PUBLIUS SYRUS, a Syrian slave, who was set at liberty by his master, and distinguished himself at Rome as a poet, 44 B.C. His moral sentences are excellent.

PUCCI, Francis, a noble Florentine, who left the popish tenets for the protestant, but afterwards returned at Prague to his ancient principles. He travelled through Poland, and with new inconsistency again embraced the protestant faith, for which he was seized at Strasburg, and hurried to Rome, and burnt as a heretic, 1600. In a book inscribed to pope Clement VIII. 1592, he supported the opinion that Christ by his death had made sufficient atonement for the sins of mankind.

PUFFENDORF, Samuel de, a famous civilian and historian, born 1631, at Flet, near Chemnitz, in Upper Saxony, where his father was minister. He studied at Grim and Leipsic, and Jena, and by his great application qualified himself to become an active and distinguished counsellor in some German court. He was advised by his brother to seek for preferment and honour out of his country, and in consequence he accepted the place of tutor to the son of M. Coyet, a noble Swede, who was ambassador at the court of Denmark. War between the two countries, however, obscured his pleasing prospects; he was seized with all the retinue of the Swedish ambassador, and imprisoned, and during the tedious hours of his confinement for eight long months, he digested in his mind observations on what he had read in Grotius's book, de Jure Belli et Pacis, and Hobbes's work, and afterwards published it at the Hague, 1660, by the title of Elementorum Jurisprudentiæ Universalis Libri duo, and this gave rise to his excellent treatise de Jure Naturæ et Gentium. His literary reputation now procured him the appointment of professor of the law of nature and of nations at Heidelberg, on the presentation of the elector palatine, and in 1670 he was honourably invited by Charles XI. of Sweden, to be professor in the newly founded university of Lunden. His fame continued to increase as a writer, and as a professor, and he was nominated historiographer and counsellor to the king, and raised to the dignity of a Swedish baron. He was afterwards in 1688 invited to Berlin in the most liberal manner, with the distinction of historiographer and counsellor, by the elector of Brandenburg, to write the life of the elector, William the Great.

and he died there 1694, of a mortification in one of his toes, in consequence of cutting the nail. This most enlightened philosopher wrote various works, the most known of which are History of Sweden, from 1628 to 1654—History of Charles Gustavus, 2 vols. folio—History of the elector William, 2 vols. folio—A Historical and Political Description of the Papal State—Introduction to the History of the principal European States, 8vo.—a treatise on the Law of Nature and Nations, 2 vols. 4to.—Opuscula Juvenilia, &c.

PUGATSCHOFF, Yemelka, a Cossack, who, after serving against the Prussians and the Turks, deserted from the army, and after spending some time among some Polish hermits, appeared in Russia, and laid claim to the crown as the real Peter III. He met with some success, and might have seized Moscow; but at last the cruelties which he exercised upon the inhabitants of the places where he passed, revolted even his own followers against him, and he was delivered up to the officers of Catherine. He was conveyed in an iron cage to Moscow, where he was beheaded 21st Jan. 1775, and in his last moments he showed as much weakness as he had displayed vigour and intrepidity at the head of his desperate adherents.

PUGET, Peter, a French painter born at Marseilles 1623. His talents were equally eminent as a sculptor, and an architect, and his Milo, Crotona, and Perseus, and Andromeda, in the park at Versailles, are pleasing proofs of the power of his chisel. Several of his paintings are preserved at Aix, Toulon, Marseilles, and in the south of France. He died 1694.

PULASKI, Count, brigadier general in the army of the American revolution, was a Pole of distinguished birth, courage, and patriotism. He made great efforts to restore his country to freedom and independence, but without success. In 1771 with a few accomplices he seized king Stanislaus, and carried him prisoner from his palace through a numerous body of guards, but he soon escaped and declared Pulaski an outlaw. He left his native country, and soon after came to the United States, and offered his services against the British. He was appointed a brigadier general, and raised a corps of cavalry of several hundred, with which he served some time with the northern army, and afterwards with the southern. He was mortally wounded in the attack on Savannah on the 9th of October, 1779, and died two days after. Congress voted to erect a monument to his memory.  L.

PULCHERIA, St. daughter of Arcadius, ascended the throne with her brother Theodosius the younger, and at his death in 450, she married Marcianus. She was great patroness of learned men, and in her conduct very devout and exemplary. She assembled the council of Chæcedon, 451, and died three years after.

PULCI, Lewis, an Italian poet of merit, born of a noble family at Florence, Dec. 3d, 1431. He was the friend of Lorenzo de Medici. His chief work is Morgante Maggiore, an epic romance, which though compared by some to the compositions of Tasso and Ariosto, has been rightly considered by others as a vulgar and profane work, which unites the most solemn and serious subjects with the burlesque and comic. He wrote besides a poem on a tournament at Florence, 1468, called Giostra di Lorenzo de Medici, and some sonnets. He died about 1487. His brothers Luke and Bernard were also known as the successful votaries of the muses.

PULIGO, or PUGLIO, Dominico, a native of Florence, distinguished as a portrait painter. He died 1527, aged 52.

PULMANNUS, Theodore, properly POELMAN, a Dutch commentator, born at Cranenburgh in the dutchy of Cleves, 1510. From a fuller he became a scholar, and an able critic, and at the press of Plantin superintended the publication of some valuable editions of Virgil, Lucan, Horace, Juvenal, Terence, Ausonius, and other authors. He died at Saamanea about 1580.

PULTENEY, William, earl of Bath, was born of an ancient and opulent family. 1682. He was early elected into the House of Commons, and was an able and eloquent opposer of the ministry in queen Anne's reign. At the accession of George I. he was made secretary at war; but after some years of co-operation with sir Robert Walpole, he disagreed with him, and warmly opposed his measures for advancing the interests of Hanover at the expense of England. Difference of opinion produced altercation, and altercation hatred, so that Walpole's measures were opposed with personal virulence, and the king at last struck off the name of Pulteney from the list of privy counsellors, and put him out of the commission for the peace. These violent steps increased the opposition, and the popularity of Pulteney, and his sarcasms and his attacks were pointed with the most powerful effect against the minister, who often declared that he dreaded his tongue more than another man's sword. At last opposition prevailed, Walpole was disgraced in 1741, and Pulteney rose in his seat, and was restored to the privy council, and made earl of Bath; but when he got into place he lost his popularity, and afterwards despised that good public opinion which he could not procure. He died 8th June, 1764, and without issue. He was concerned in the "Craftsman," and wrote some political pamphlets.

PULTENEY, Richard, a native of Loughborough, Leicestershire, who after practising as an apothecary at Leicester took his medical degrees at Edinburgh, 1764. He was patronised by his relation the earl of Bath, and settled at Blandford, Dorsetshire, where he acquired great reputation in his profession. He was fellow of the Royal Society, and other learned bodies, and died 1801, aged 71. He is author of a General View of the Life and Writings of Linnæus, 1781—Historical and Biographical Sketches of the Progress of Botany in England, 2 vols. 8vo. and he made besides valuable communications to the History of Leicestershire by Mr. Nichols, and to that of Dorsetshire by Hutchins, newly edited by Gough; but he particularly contributed to the pages of the Gentleman's Magazine, which he enriched by various dissertations and papers on antiquities, and especially on history, a science to which he was very partial, and which he had studied with great skill and attention. An Account of his Life has been published by Dr. Maton in 4to.

PUNTORMO, Giacomo, an Italian painter, the pupil of Leonard de Vinci, and Andrea del Sarto. His pieces, which are much admired, are generally on sacred subjects. He died 1558, aged 61.

PURBACH, George, a learned German, born at Purbach. He was eminent as a divine and philosopher, and particularly applied himself to astronomy, in which science he made several observations, and for the improvement of which he invented some instruments, and calculated useful tables. He translated Ptolemy's Almagest, and died at Vienna, 1462, aged 39.

PURCELL, Henry, a celebrated musical composer, born in 1658. His abilities were early displayed, so that at the age of 18 he was appointed organist of Westminster, and in 1682 he was made one of the organists of the chapel royal. He soon distinguished himself by the publication of some sonatas, and anthems, and divided equally his services between the church and the theatre. Dryden, some of whose poetry he set to music, has highly complimented his powers, and from the superior style of his church music, he deserved the greatest encomiums. He died of a consumptive disorder, 21st Nov. 1695, leaving a wife and children not amply provided for. He was buried in Westminster abbey, and his early death was seriously lamented. His works were published by subscription, under the title of Orpheus Britannicus, 1698, and dedicated to his patroness lady Howard. His brother Daniel, a famous punster, was organist of Magdalen college, Oxford, and of St. Andrew's, Holborn.

PURITAS, Samuel, an able divine, born

Thaxstead, Essex, 1577, and educated at Cambridge. He obtained in 1604 the vicarage of Eastwood, Essex, which he intrusted to the care of his brother, to prosecute with greater facility his studies in London. He obtained afterwards the living of St. Martin's, Ludgate, London, and was also chaplain to archbishop Abbot. He died about 1623. His great work was "his Pilgrimage, or Relations of the World, and the Religions observed in all ages, &c." 5 vols. folio. These are a valuable compilation.

PURVER, Antony, an extraordinary character, born at Up-Hursborn, Hants, 1702. His parents were quakers; but though he was taught only to read and write, he applied himself with such assiduity that he was well versed in the most difficult parts of arithmetic, and had such a retentive memory, that, when young, in 12 hours he could repeat 12 of the longest and most difficult chapters in the Bible. He was apprenticed to a shoemaker, but still turned his thoughts to learning, and acquired such a knowledge of the learned languages, that he began to translate the Bible from the original text. To maintain himself he kept school at his native village, and at Trenchay, Gloucestershire, where he married, and afterwards settled at Andover, where he completed, in 1764, his translation of the Old and New Testament, a most laborious work, the fruit of 30 years' application. It appeared in 2 vols. folio, by the generosity of his friend Dr. Fothergill, who gave him 1000*l.* towards his expenses, and though it is occasionally deficient in judgment and taste, it yet possesses great and pleasing simplicity, as being very literal. As a preacher among the quakers, Purver was highly respected. He died at Andover, 1777, and was buried there in the ground of the quakers' meeting.

PUTEANUS, Erycius, properly VANDEPUTTE, an eminent scholar born at Venlo, Guelderland, 1574. He studied at Dort, Cologne, Louvain, and afterwards at Padua, and in 1601, was chosen professor of eloquence at Milan. His reputation as a teacher was so great that the king of Spain appointed him his historiographer, and the Romans enrolled him in the number of their patricians. In 1601 he was appointed to succeed his master, the celebrated Justus Lipsius, in the professor's chair at Louvain, and was further honoured with the title of governor of the castle there. He died at Louvain 1646. He wrote several works on literary and political subjects, the best known of which is his Statera Belli et Pacis, the balance of peace and war, 1633, during a negotiation between the Spanish monarch and the United Provinces. His works form 5 vols. folio.

PUTNAM, Israel, major-general in the army of the United States, was born at Salem, Massachusetts, the 7th of January, 1718. He possessed a mind of great vigour, but had not the advantages of a thorough education. In 1739 he removed to Pomfret, Connecticut, and employed himself in agriculture. He there gave an example of the singular courage, which characterized him as a military officer, by descending at the most imminent hazard of his life into a cavern, and shooting a wolf which he and his neighbours had driven thither. During the war of 1755 with the French he commanded a company, and was engaged in several contests with the enemy, in which he displayed the most adventurous bravery and great skill. In 1756 he fell with his party into an ambuscade, and was taken prisoner, and subjected to the most cruel tortures by the savages. He was released in 1759, and at the conclusion of the war, returned to his farm. He served in the expedition against Cuba in 1762, as lieutenant-colonel, and in 1764 as colonel under general Bradstreet in the campaign against the savages. Soon after the battle at Lexington he joined the army at Cambridge at the head of a regiment, and was not long after appointed major-general, and signalized himself at the battle of Bunker's Hill. On the arrival of general Washington he was given the command of the reserve. In 1776 he was despatched to New-York to complete its fortification begun by general Lee, and afterwards sent to Philadelphia to fortify that city. During the winter of 1777 he was stationed with a small body at Princeton, and in the spring was appointed to a separate command at the Highlands, where he continued most of the time till the close of 1779, when he was seized with a paralytic affection, and disqualified for further service. He died the 29th of May, 1790. He possessed an excellent judgment, great enterprise, the most intrepid courage, and ardent patriotism; and was justly considered one of the most efficient of the American officers. ☞ I.

PURSCIUS, Elias, an eminent grammarian born at Antwerp, 1580. He published Sallust with notes and fragments, besides a collection of 33 old grammarians, and died at Stade 1606.

PUY, Peter de, a learned Frenchman, author of some valuable political works on the salique law, and other antiquarian subjects. He was born at Paris, and died 1652, aged 69, universally lamented. Voltaire as well as De Thou speaks highly of his abilities.

PUY SEGUR, James de Chastenet, lord of, a celebrated general, born of a noble family at Armagnac, 1600. He served his country 43 years, and though present at 120 sieges, and 30 battles, in which he be-lived with activity and courage, he was never wounded. He died at his castle of Bernouille, near Guise, 1682. His memoirs, extending from 1617 to 1658, have appeared in 2 vols. 12mo. and are written with boldness and truth. His son James was marshal of France, and author of a work on the Military Art, in folio, and two vols. 4to. 1748. He died 1743, aged 88.

PRLE, Thomas, M.A. an eminent divine, born at Stodey near Holt, Norfolk, 1674. He was educated at Caius college, Cambridge, and then became minister of King's Lynn, where he distinguished himself as a good preacher, and as an exemplary man. He engaged warmly in the Bangorian controversy, and for his services he was made prebendary of Salisbury, by Dr. Hoadly, and two of his sons also were presented to prebends in the church of Winchester. His paraphrase on the Acts, and all the epistles, is an excellent work, often reprinted. He published besides 3 vols. of sermons. This excellent character died at Eynn, 1757.

PYM, John, a celebrated republican, member of Parliament for Tavistock. He distinguished himself by his virulence against the unfortunate Charles, and acquired such power and influence among his partisans, that he was called king Pym. He died 1643 of an imposthume in his bowels.

PYNAKER, Adam, a landscape painter, born at Pynaker, near Delft, in Holland, 1621. He improved himself at Rome, and acquired great celebrity by the excellence and correctness of his pieces, especially his cabinet pictures. He died 1673.

PYRRHO, a Greek philosopher, founder of the sect of Sceptics, who doubted of every thing. He died about 300 B.C.

PYRRHUS, a king of Epirus, celebrated in history as the friend and ally of the Tarentines in their war against the Romans. He afterwards made war against Sicily and against Sparta, and was killed at Argos by a tile thrown down upon his head by a woman, B.C. 272.

PYTHAGORAS, a celebrated philosopher, born at Samos. After visiting Egypt and other places to improve his knowledge, and cultivate his mind, he settled at Crotona in Italy, where he established a famous school. He also reformed the effeminate manners of the Crotonians, and rendered infinite service to mankind, by the wisdom, prudence, and virtues, with which he inspired his numerous pupils. He was well acquainted with the true system of the universe, as he placed the sun in the centre. He was the author of the absurd doctrine of the transmigration of souls, and forbade the eating of animal flesh. He died about 490 B.C.

PYTHEAS, a Greek philosopher, in the age of Aristotle. His discoveries about the different length of the days in various climates, appeared astonishing to the philosophers of his age.

PYTHEUS, a rhetorician of Athens, known as the rival of the great Demosthenes.

QUA

QUADRATUS, St. a disciple of the apostles, and the learned author of an apology for the Christians, a valuable work, which he himself presented to the emperor Adrian. Some suppose him to be the angel or bishop of Philadelphia mentioned in the Apocalypse, and it is asserted that he was made bishop of Athens about 126. Only fragments of his apology remain.

QUADRIO, Francis Xavier, a Jesuit, born 2d Dec. 1695, in the Valteline. He was of a melancholy turn of mind, and retired to Zurich, where, with the consent of the pope, he became a secular priest. He died at Milan, 21st Nov. 1756. He is author of a treatise on Italian poetry, under the name of Joseph Mary Andrucci—History of Poetry, 2 vols.—Historical Dissertations on Rhetia and the Valteline, 3 vols. 4to. 1755.

QUAINI, Lewis, a native of Bologna known as a painter. He assisted his master Cignari in some of his most celebrated works, and died 1717, aged 74.

QUARLES, Francis, an English poet born at Steward's in the parish of Rumford, Essex, 1592. He was educated at Christ college, Cambridge, and then entered at Lincoln's inn, and was afterwards cup-bearer to Elizabeth, daughter of James I. electress Palatine, and queen of Bohemia. He was next secretary to archbishop Usher in Ireland, and was a great sufferer in the Irish rebellion. He did not meet that friendly reception in England which his loyalty deserved, and it is said that the loss of his valuable MSS. preyed deeply upon his mind, and hastened his death, which happened 1644. He was eminent as a poet, and in no case, says Langbaine, offended in his writings against the high duties he owed to God, to his neighbour, and to himself. He wrote some theatrical pieces, but the best known of his works are his Emblems.

Meditations, and Hieroglyphics. Some have imagined that Pope was much indebted to his writings. He was father of 18 children by his first wife, and one of his sons, John, became known as a poet, and particularly as an active royalist in the king's army. He died of the plague in London, 1665, aged 41.

QUATROMANI, Sertorio, a native of Cosenza in Naples. He obtained admission into the Vatican by means of his friend Paul Manutius, and in this valuable library he devoted himself with indefatigable diligence to the study of Greek literature. His great abilities recommended him to the notice of the duke of Nocera, in whose service he was for some time employed. He, after his patron's death, went into the family of the prince of Stigliano, but soon left him, and died 1606, aged 65. He was in his temper capricious and haughty, easily offended at trifles, and censorious on the faults of others. He, however, possessed learning and information, and his translation of the Æneid into Italian verse is held in estimation. His other works have been collected in 1714, in 8vo. containing Latin and Italian verses, letters, &c.

QUELLIN, Erasmus, a painter of Antwerp, the disciple and successful imitator of Rubens. He died 1678, aged 71. His son John Erasmus was also distinguished as a good artist, and some of his pieces adorn the churches of Antwerp. He died at Antwerp, 1715, aged 85.

QUENSTEDT, John Andrew, a Lutheran divine, author of a Latin account of learned men from Adam to 1600, 4to.—Sculptura Veterum, 8vo. his best work—a System of Divinity, according to the Confession of Augsburg, 4 vols. folio, and some other works. He was born at Quedlinburg, and died 22d May, 1688, aged 71.

QUENTAL, Bartholomew du, a native of the Azores, distinguished for his piety and learning. He became confessor to the king of Portugal, and refused a bishopric, that he might with greater ardour devote himself to preaching, and to the more laborious works of charity. He died 20th Dec. 1698, aged 72. Clement XI. gave him the appellation of the Venerable. He wrote Meditations, &c.—Sermons in Portuguese, &c.

QUERENGI, Anthony, an Italian poet, born at Padua, 1546. He was in the service of the popes, and was secretary to the sacred college. He died at Rome, 1st Sept. 1633. His Latin poems, and some Italian poetry, were published at Rome, 1616 and 1629.

QUERLON, Anne Gabriel Meusnier de, an eminent scholar, born at Nantes, 15th April, 1702. For 22 years he published a periodical paper for Brittany, and other prints, and had also some share in the Journal

Encyclopedique. He died April, 1786, universally regretted. His chief works are Les Impostures Innocentes, a little entertaining novel—Collection Historique—Marsy's Latin Poem on Painting, translated into French—Editions of Lucretius, with notes—also of Phædrus, and of Aæcreon.

QUERNO, Camillo, an Italian poet, born at Monopolis, in Naples. He carried his poem, called Alexiada, containing 20,000 lines, to Leo X. who honoured him with his friendship, and made him his buffoon, 1514. After the taking of Rome, he retired to Naples, and died in the hospital there, about 1528.

QUESNAY, Francis, an eminent French physician, born at Ecquevilli, 1694. Though the son of an obscure labourer, he rose to reputation in his profession, and became first physician to the king of France, member of the academy of sciences at Paris, and of the London Royal Society. He had an early taste for agriculture, and was a leading man in the society of Economists. He died Dec. 1774. His works are Observations on Bleeding, 12mo.—Essay on Animal Economy, 3 vols. 12mo.—the Art of Healing by Bleeding—Treatise on Continued Fevers, 2 vols. 12mo.—on Gangrene, 12mo.—on Suppuration—Physiocratia, &c. besides an elegant poem, called the Farm House.

QUESNE, Abraham, marquis du, a native of Normandy, who entered into the naval service of France, under his father, and soon distinguished himself. He was, in 1637, at the attack of the Isles of St. Margaret, and the next year he greatly contributed to the defeat of the Spanish fleet at Cattari. He afterwards signalized his valour before Tarragona, Barcelona, and before Cadiz, and in 1644 he went into the service of Sweden, and was particularly instrumental in the defeat of the Danish fleet. He was recalled home in 1647, and intrusted with a squadron in the Mediterranean, and he next obliged Bourdeaux, which had revolted, to surrender, and afterwards, in 1676, in three engagements, defeated the combined fleets of Holland and Spain, under Ruyter, near Sicily. It was on this memorable occasion that the following verses were written, alluding to the defeat and the death of the great Ruyter, who perished in the second engagement:

*Terrui in oceano jam solo nomine classes,
Ter nunc in Siculo territus ipse rui.
Si vera inversum quondam dedit ominanomen,
Nunc Rui-ter nomen verius omen habet.*

He next carried the terror of his arms against Algiers and Genoa, and every where commanded respect and submission. This gallant officer was deservedly ennobled by the French king. He died at Paris, 2d Feb. 1688, aged 78, leaving four sons.

QUESNEL, Pasquier, a doctor of the Sorbonne, and priest of the oratory, born at Paris, 1634. In 1675 he published at Paris the works of St. Leo, 2 vols. 4to. and as his notes defended the ancient Gallican church, against the opinions of the Roman pontiffs, the work was condemned at Rome, and the author, in 1685, retired, through fear of persecution, to Brussels. He published in 1687, his Moral Reflections on the New Testament; but though he seemed strongly to favour the Jansenists, the work was well received, and became very popular, on account of the meekness and philanthropy of his sentiments; but the work, though thus publicly countenanced, and even commended by pope Clement XI. was soon after attacked by the Jesuits, and condemned, for reasons of state, even by the pope himself, who issued against it his famous bull, called Unigenitus. By the influence of the Jesuits, Quesnel was seized and imprisoned; but, by means of a Spanish gentleman, who secretly espoused his cause, he escaped, and reached Amsterdam, where he died 1719. He was author of various works, but chiefly on polemical subjects. The author of the History of the Jesuits, was also a Quesnel, Peter, and he died at the Hague, 1774.

QUESNOY, Francis, a native of Brussels, eminent as a sculptor. His works, chiefly bas-reliefs in bronze, ivory, marble, or wax, possess great elegance, beauty, and character. They generally represent children, bacchanals, &c. and are much sought after. He died at Leghorn, 1644, aged 42. His brother Jerome, who died at Ghent, 1654, was also an eminent sculptor.

QUEVEDO DE VILLEGAS, Francisco de, a Spanish author, born at Madrid, 1570. He possessed great powers of writing in verse as well as prose, and on subjects of wit, of morality, and of science, showed himself correct, judicious, and enlightened. His works were published by Gonzales de Salas, under the title of Parnasso Espagnol, in 3 vols. 4to. His "Visions," a prose work, have been indifferently translated into English, from a French version, and some others of his works have also appeared in an English dress. His satire was so keen, and so imprudently used, that he rendered count d'Olivares, the prime minister, his enemy, and in consequence of this, was imprisoned, till the fall of the royal favourite. He died 1645, or, according to some, 1647.

QUIEN DE LA NEUFVILLE, James le, a French author, born at Paris, 1647. He was successively an officer in the French guards, an advocate at the bar, and lastly a literary character. His General History of Portugal, 2 vols. 4to. procured his admission into the academy of Inscriptions at Paris. He afterwards published a Treatise on the Use of Posts among the Ancients and Moderns, 12mo. 1734, which was so well received that it gained him the office of director of the posts of French Flanders. In 1713 he went with the French ambassador to Portugal, and was received with great kindness by the court, and rewarded with a pension. Out of gratitude to the monarch, he determined to continue his History of Portugal, which had concluded in 1531, at the death of Emanuel I.; but excessive application brought on disease. He died at Lisbon, 20th May, 1728, aged 81, leaving two sons.

QUIEN, Michael de, a French Dominican, born at Bologne, 1661. He was an able scholar, and well versed in oriental literature. He published Panoplia contra Schisma Græcorum, 4to.—Nullity of the English Ordinations, against Courayer—Oriens Christianus in quatuor Patriarchatus digestus in quo exhibentur Ecclesie, Patriarchæ, cæterique Præsides Orientis, 3 vols. folio—Defence of the Hebrew Text against Perron, besides an edition of John Damascenus, 2 vols. fol. He died at Paris, 1733.

QUILLET, Claudius, a French writer, born at Chinon, in Touraine, 1602. He studied physic, and practised for some years; but his views were changed by his interference with the affair of the nuns of Loudun, who were said to be possessed of the devil. He ridiculed the measures which were pursued there by the secret intrigues of Richelieu; and in consequence of this he fled to Rome, for fear of persecution. He became, at Rome, acquainted with d'Étrées, the French ambassador, who made him his secretary; and there he wrote his famous poem called "Callipædia," on the Art of having fine Children, in which he reflected with satirical severity on cardinal Mazarine. The cardinal, instead of persecuting the author, made him his friend, and gave him an abbey, and Quillet, in gratitude, when he published the second edition of his poem, erased the offensive parts, and dedicated it to his noble patron. This well-known poem is divided into four books, and is written in elegant poetry, and contains many very beautiful passages. The work, however, though defended by Bayle and de la Monnoye, as containing only the language of a man who wrote like a physician, has been deservedly censured by Baillet, as abounding in description both indelicate and licentious. The Callipædia has been translated into English by Rowe. He wrote, besides, two other short Latin poems. He died 1661, aged 59, and left his papers, with 500 crowns, to Menage, for the printing of his Henriade, a Latin poem, in honour of Henry IV.

QUIN, James, a celebrated actor, born in King-street, Covent Garden, 24th Feb. 1693, and descended from a respectable family in Ireland. He was intended for the bar; but in consequence of the law-suits which took place after his father's death, he had little left to depend upon; and therefore turned his thoughts to the stage. After performing inferior parts on the Dublin theatre, he came to London, and engaged himself with the managers of Drury-lane, and two years after, 1717, he removed to Rich's theatre, Lincoln's Inn Fields. The following year he had an unpleasant dispute with Bowen, a fellow actor, at a tavern, and in consequence they fought, and Bowen died some time after of his wounds. In this unfortunate dispute, for which Quin was tried, and found guilty of manslaughter, it does not appear that his conduct was very blamable, as Bowen was the aggressor; and therefore he suffered little diminution of the public favour. In 1732 Quin, who was now become a popular performer, removed, with the Lincoln's Inn Fields company, to Covent Garden, which was opened on the 7th Dec. for their reception; but two years after, he quitted it for Drury-lane. In this theatre he continued a favourite actor till 1742, when he returned again to his old friend Rich, at Covent Garden. At this time he had to struggle against the rising fame of young Garrick, of whom he said sarcastically, that he was a new religion, and that, as Whitefield, he was followed for a time, but that people would all come to church again. In this, however, he was disappointed; Garrick, contrary to his expectations, rose to high and deserved reputation; but the two rival heroes, who now divided the applauses of the town, were prevailed upon to act together in the Fair Penitent. Their appearance on the stage together was received with loud and reiterated plaudits, and each performed with admirable success, and fully supported his former claims to superior eminence. In 1751 Quin retired from the stage to Bath, though, in a few instances, he afterwards appeared in the character of Falstaff, for the benefit of his theatrical friends; and the 19th March, 1753, was the last time of his acting, when, in compliment to his abilities, the price of admission to the pit and boxes was raised to five shillings. This respectable actor died at Bath, of a fever, 21st Jan. 1766, aged 73. His greatest characters were Cato, Othello, Richard III. &c. He was, in consequence of his merit, patronised by Frederic, prince of Wales, and he had the honour to teach his children a correct mode of pronunciation and delivery. When he was informed of the graceful and dignified manner in which the present king pronounced his first speech, at the meeting of parliament, the veteran performer exclaimed, with eager exultation, "It was I who taught the boy." In his character, Quin was a man of strong sense; his wit was pointed, often coarse, and in his temper he was occasionally violent, but not devoid of the noblest feelings of human nature. When Thomson, the author of the Seasons, was arrested, Quin, who knew him only by character, nobly stepped forth, and liberated the poet from the spunging-house by paying the debt and the costs. He was, at times, intemperate in the use of the bottle, and some pleasant stories are related of his character as an epicure.

QUINAULT, Philip, a celebrated French poet, born at Paris 1635. His first theatrical piece, called "Les Sœurs Rivaies," a comedy, appeared before the public when he was only 18, and his future years were, with equal diligence and good success, devoted to the muses. His marriage with a rich widow set him above dependence, and he afterwards became auditor of accounts. Though satirised by Boileau, he was commended by his contemporaries; and Voltaire has observed of him, that artless and inimitable strokes of nature frequently appear with interesting charms in his writings. His works consist of 16 dramatic pieces, which have all appeared on the stage, besides operas, which were set to music by the famous Lully. His works were published at Paris, with his life prefixed, in 5 vols. 12mo. 1778. He was member of the French academy, and of that of inscriptions, and died at Paris, 1688.

QUINCY, John, author of a Dictionary of Physic, 8vo.—a Universal Dispensatory, 8vo.—Chymical Pharmacopœia, 4to. besides a Translation of Sanctorius's Aphorisms, and other valuable works; was a physician of high reputation, who practised with success in London, and died there, 1723.

QUINCY, Edmund, agent for Massachusetts at the court of Great Britain, was born at Braintree, October 21st, 1681, and graduated at Harvard college in 1699. In 1718 he was appointed a judge of the supreme court, and held a seat for a long time in the house of representatives, and in his majesty's council. In 1737 he was selected as an agent to the British court to procure a decision of the controversy respecting the boundary line between Massachusetts and New Hampshire, and died while in London, on the 23d of February, 1738, in his fifty-seventh year. The general court testified the high respect in which they held him, by erecting a monument to his memory in Bunhill Fields, on which they commemorate him as distinguished for talents, learning, piety, and uprightness, and ability in discharging the various public duties to which he had been called.

QUINCY, Josiah, jun. a distinguished lawyer, orator, and patriot, of Boston, Massachusetts, was born in that place in 1743, and educated at Harvard college, where he was graduated in 1763. He early became eminent in the practice of law, from superior talents as a speaker, and extremely popular for his courage and zeal in the cause of liberty. In 1774 he took a voyage to Europe for the benefit of his health, and to advocate the cause of the colonies. He died on his return on the 25th of April, 1775, the day the vessel arrived in the harbour of Cape Ann. His eminent talents, and zealous attachment to the cause of freedom, as well as his amiable and interesting manners, made his death a subject of universal lamentation.

QUINTILIAN, Marcus Fabius, a Roman orator and critic of great celebrity. He was intimate with Pliny, and patronised by the emperors, and he established a school of rhetoric at Rome, where he died about 60 A.D. His Institutiones Oratoricæ are well known, edited by Burman, 4 vols. 4to. Leyden, 1724.

QUINTINIE, John de la, a famous French gardener, born at Poitiers 1676. He studied philosophy and the law, and was admitted an advocate at Paris. After practising with great reputation, he devoted himself totally to agricultural pursuits, and enlarged his knowledge of that pleasing science by travelling into Italy, and by visiting England. He received liberal offers from Charles II. to settle in England; but he preferred the service of his king, and was appointed director general of the fruit and kitchen gardens of Lewis XIV. He died at Paris, after 1700, universally regretted. He published, in 2 vols. 4to. "Directions for the Management of Fruit and Kitchen Gardens," which have been adopted throughout Europe.

QUIRINI, Angelo Maria, a Venetian cardinal, born 1680, or, according to others, 1684. He was admitted among the Benedictines at Florence, and after storing his mind, with astonishing application, he began, in 1710, to travel over Germany, Holland, England, and France; and every where received distinguishing marks of respect and esteem. Thus noticed and honoured by the friendship of Basnage, Gronovius, Kuster, Bentley, Newton, Burnet, Cave, Potter, Fenelon, Montfaucon, and other learned characters, he returned to Italy, and was raised to the dignity of cardinal, and of archbishop, by Benedict XIII. This amiable man, equally respected by protestants and catholics, for his liberality and benevolence, as well as for his learning, died in the beginning of Jan. 1755, of an apoplexy. His works are numerous and respectable, the best known of which are Primordia Corcyræ, ex Antiquissimis Monumentis Illustrata, 4to.—Veterum Brixia Episcoporum Vitæ—Specimen Variæ Litteraturæ quæ in Brixia, ejusque Ditione, Typographiæ in Cunabula florebat, 4to.—Enchiridion Græcorum—Gesta et Epistolæ Franc. Barbari—De Mosaicæ Historiæ præstantiâ, &c. His valuable library was presented to the pope, to adorn the Vatican.

QUIROS, Fernand de, a Spanish navigator, who, under the patronage of Philip III. discovered the Society Islands, and other places in the great Pacific Ocean, in 1605.

QUISTORP, John, a Lutheran divine, author of Commentaries on St. Paul's Epistles; Articuli Formulæ Concordiæ Illustrati; Manuductio ad Studium Theologicum. He was the friend of the great Grotius, and attended him during his last illness. He died at Rostock, his native place, 1646, aged 62.

RABAN-MAUR, Magnentius, a native of Fulda, of noble birth. He studied at Fulda, and afterwards at Tours, under Alcuinus, and on his return home he was elected abbot of Fulda. He was made archbishop of Mayence in 847, and afterwards engaged in a controversy with Gotescalc, whose doctrines he condemned, and whose person he delivered up to Hincmar, archbishop of Rheims. He died at Winsel, 856, aged 68. His works, which are numerous, and on theological subjects, were published at Cologne, 1627, in 6 vols. folio.

RABAUD ST. ETINNE, John Paul, a protestant minister, born at Nismes, from which place he was sent as deputy to the constituent assembly. He possessed eloquence and address; but though deluded by the factious spirit of the times, he resumed his moderation in the convention, and spoke with boldness against the punishment of Lewis XVI. These sentiments marked him for death under the sanguinary Robespierre, and though he escaped to Bourdeaux, he was, two months after, seized and brought to Paris, where, the day after, he was guillotined, 28th July, 1793, aged 50. He was a man of learning and information, and published a Letter on the Life and Writings of Gebelin, 8vo.; Letters on the Primitive History of Greece, 8vo.; Considerations on the Interest of the Tiers Etat.; Pieces on the Revolution, &c.

RABEL, John, a native of Fleury, eminent among French portrait painters. He died 1603.

RABELAIS, Francis, a celebrated wit, born 1483, at Chinon, in Touraine, where his father was an apothecary. He was admitted among the Franciscans at Poitou; but he excited the envy of the fraternity, on account of the application with which he studied literature, and especially Greek, then regarded as a barbarous language. An intrigue exposed him to fresh insults, and he escaped at last from persecution, and was permitted by pope Clement VII. to renounce the order of Franciscans, and to enter into the society of the Benedictines, whom also he soon after left. He next settled at Montpellier, and took his degrees in medicine, and became a popular professor. When du Prat the chancellor, abolished the privileges of Montpellier university, that learned body deputed their professor to go to Paris, and his eloquence and arguments proved so powerful that the decree was reversed, and Rabelais's successful interference was ever after commemorated by investing, in the robe which he wore, all future candidates for academical honours. He quitted Montpellier in 1532, for Lyons; but in 1534, followed du Bellay, bishop of Paris, to Rome, as his physician, and six months after, returned to France, and obtained from the Roman pontiff, the privilege, though now a layman, of holding ecclesiastical benefices. In consequence of this he obtained the abbey of St. Maur, near Paris, and died 1553. His chief work is the "History of Gargantua and Pantagruel," a satirical romance against priests, popes, fools, and knaves, which, though praised by some as a magazine of wit, learning, and science, may be considered as a bold, unintelligible rhapsody, wild and irregular, and disgraced by profane allusions, coarse raiillery, obscene and vulgar jests. He wrote, besides, some medical works, and other tracts, the whole of which have been published in 5 vols. 8vo. 1715, and in 1741, 3 vols. 4to. The works have appeared in an English dress twice, by Motteaux, 1708, and latterly by Ozell, 5 vols. 12mo. Rabelais was universally acknowledged as a man who possessed great brilliancy of wit, and smartness of repartee.

RABIRIUS, a Latin poet, who celebrated the victory of Augustus over Antony's forces at Actium. There was an architect of that name in Domitian's reign.

RABURN, William, governor of Georgia, was born in Halifax county, North Carolina, April 8th, 1771, and removed to Georgia at the age of fifteen, where with few advantages of education, he rose by his superior mental powers, industry, and exemplary moral and religious deportment, to the highest honours of the state. After having been a judge of the inferior court and member of the assembly and senate, he was in 1817 elected governor. The second year of his administration was memorable for the Seminole war on the frontiers of Georgia and the neighbouring Spanish territory. He held the office till his death, October 23d, 1819.  L.

RABUTIN. Vid. BUSSY.

RACAN, Honorat de Bueil, marquis of, a French poet, born at Roche Racan, in Touraine, 1589. He wrote pastorals, sacred odes, letters, and memoirs of his friend Malherbe, of whom he learnt the art of poetry, and though not a first-rate poet, deserved to be highly commended by Boileau and by Menage. He was one of the first members of the French academy, and died 1670. His works were edited 1660, 8vo. and 1720, 2 vols. 12mo.

RACCHETTI, Bernard, an Italian painter. His views of perspective and architecture were highly finished. He died 1702, aged 63.

RACINE, John, an illustrious French poet, born at Ferté-Milon, 1639. He was educated at Port Royal, where his abilities began to unfold themselves by the most rapid progress in the attainment of the Greek and Latin, and by an excessive fondness for the sublime compositions of Euripides and Sophocles. He afterwards went to Paris, and was one of those who employed their muse in celebrating the king's marriage; and so successful and popular was his Nymphé de la Seine, on this occasion, that the courtiers were full of his praises, and the monarch settled on him a pension for the rest of his life. Thus distinguished he began to turn his thoughts to higher subjects, and in 1666, he produced his Alexandra. About this time he was engaged in a controversy with Nicole, of the Port Royal, who had inveighed against romance and dramatic writers, and denominated them poisoners not of bodies, but of souls, and in consequence of this attack, produced two spirited pamphlets. In 1668, he produced his "Plaideurs," a comedy, and Andromache, a tragedy; and in 1670 appeared Britannicus, Berenice in 1671, Bajazet in 1672, Mithridates in 1673, Iphigenia in 1675, and Phædra in 1677. These were represented with increased applause; but such is the envy which generally attends greatness and superior merit, that a cabal was raised against the poet, and Pradon, a writer of little capacity, was prevailed upon to produce a Phædra to oppose the noble composition of Racine. This treatment hurt the feelings of the poet, and with a mind strongly alive to the violence of persecution, he formed a design of becoming a Carthusian friar. He had formerly worn the ecclesiastical habit at the Port Royal, but his confessor in this instance, with commendable sincerity, expostulated with him, and prevailed upon him to marry, and thus instead of bidding adieu to the world, to become one of its most useful and honourable members. He followed the advice, and was thus a father of seven children; but superstitiously credulous, he determined never to write for the theatre, and to complete his full atonement before the church, he was reconciled to the gentlemen of the Port Royal, and all those whom satire, ill language, or jocularly had made his enemies. In spite, however, of his pious resolutions, he was prevailed upon by Mad. Maintenon to write a sacred tragedy to be acted by her young ladies at St. Cyr., and this produced Esther, and afterwards Athalie, which last was, when after his death introduced on the public theatre, rewarded with the most unbounded applause. He was in 1673 admitted member of the French academy, and in 1677 he was employed with Boileau his friend to write the history of Lewis XIV.; but the efforts of these two great geniuses proved abortive, and the work was never completed. Racine afterwards drew up the History of the Port Royal, 2 vols. 12mo. in an elegant and pleasing manner. His excessive sensibility at last proved the cause of his death. He wrote a memorial on the Miseries of the Poor, which he lent to Mad. Maintenon, but it fell accidentally into the hands of the king, who expressed his indignation at the presumption of the poet. Racine heard of the royal displeasure, and was so terrified that he fell into a fever, and though the king was very kindly inquisitive after his welfare, the disorder at last proved fatal. He died 1699, and was buried in the Port Royal monastery. A pension was honourably settled by the king on his family. He wrote besides, Canticles or Hymns, for the use of St. Cyr—Letters and Epigrams, &c. He has often been compared to Corneille, and on them Perrault observes, that if Corneille surpassed Racine in heroic sentiments, and the grand character of his personages, he was inferior to him in moving the passions, and in purity of language. His works appeared at London, 2 vols. 4to. 1723.

RACINE, Lewis, son of the poet, was honoured, though an ecclesiastic, with a civil appointment, by cardinal Fleury. He died 1763, aged 71. He was himself a poet of considerable merit, and besides poems, wrote Reflections on Poetry—the Life of his Father, 2 vols. 1747—a prose translation of Milton's Paradise Lost, and other works.

RACK, Edmund, a native of Ellingham, Norfolk, who from a spinning boy, became the menial servant, and afterwards the apprentice and journeyman of a woollen draper. The little opportunities which were allowed him for improvement were usefully and laboriously employed, and in 1758 he settled at Bradford, Essex, in business for himself, and afterwards retired to Bath, master of an honourable competency. He here established the agricultural society, to which he became secretary, though a quaker. He wrote the ruins of an Ancient Cathedral, a poem, 1768—a volume of poems, 1775—Mentor's Letters, 1777—Poems and Essays 1781. He also contributed materially to Collinson's History of Somersetshire, and died 1787, aged 52.

RACLE, Leonard, an architect, born at Dijon. By study and application he emerged from obscurity and acquired distinction. He joined the Reyssouze to the Saone, built the harbour of Versoix, and in 1786 obtained the prize of the Toulouse academy, by his memoir on the erection of an iron bridge of a single arch of 400 feet span. He was the friend of Voltaire and built his house at Ferney. He declined the liberal offers of Catherine of Russia, and preferred the honours of his native country. He died at Pont-de-Vaux 1792. He wrote besides Memoirs on the Property of the Cycloid—on regulating the Course of the Rhone and the Ain, &c.

RADCLIFFE, Alexander, an officer of the army, better known as a poet. He travestied Ovid's Epistles, and wrote besides other works of low humour, such as News from Hell—the Sword's Farewell, &c. He died at London about 1700.

RADCLIFFE, John, a celebrated physician, born at Wakefield, Yorkshire, 1650. From the school of his native town he came to University college, Oxford; but not finding, as he expected, a vacant fellowship, he removed to Lincoln, where he became fellow. He took his master's degree in 1672, and then laboriously devoted himself to the study of medicine, botany, and chymistry. In 1675 he took the degree of M. B. and began to practise with increasing reputation. In 1677, he resigned his fellowship in consequence of a quarrel with the rector of the college, upon whom he had imprudently been severe in the criticisms of his gayer hours, and in 1682, he took his degree of M.D. and two years after removed to London. Here his reputation had preceded him, he quickly became the most popular practitioner of the town, and added to his other honours the title of physician to the princess Anne of Denmark. In 1693, his marriage with the daughter of a rich citizen was prevented by the discovery of the incontinence of the fair one, and this so irritated the disappointed lover, that he ever after spoke with indifference and even contempt of the sex. When called in 1699, to attend king William, his rough address proved very offensive to the court. The king showing him his swollen ancles, asked his opinion; I would not, answered the blunt physician, have your majesty's two legs for your three kingdoms. Though discarded from the court, he found his practice undiminished in the town; but his popularity created him enemies, and while his opinion was consulted above that of others, his medical opponents censured him as an adventurous empiric, whom success and not merit had raised to eminence. On the last illness of queen Anne, it is said by some of his biographers that he refused to visit her, though requested by the privy council; but it seems by his own statement, that he was never solicited to attend, and that the unpopularity which consequently awaited him on the occasion of the queen's death, and the attempts to censure him in the house of commons were totally unmerited. He died Nov. 1st, 1714, aged 64, three months after the queen; and it is said that the public odium which was heaped on him in consequence of the charge of disrespect and obstinacy towards his sovereign, hastened his death. He was buried in St. Mary's church, Oxford, with great solemnity. In his character and conduct Radcliffe was violent, fickle, and avaricious. His maxim to make a fortune was to use all mankind ill; but though he practised in some degree what he taught, it has been observed, that Mead, who followed a contrary rule, obtained much greater opulence. The vast bulk of his fortune was left to charitable purposes; besides creating two travelling fellowships in University college, Oxford, he left ample provision for the erecting of an infirmary, and of a splendid library in his favourite city, which bear his name. The library, in the erection of which above 40,000*l.* were expended, was finished in 1747, and opened 12th April, 1749, with great academical pomp. Dr. Radcliffe was chosen member of parliament for Buckingham the year before his death.

RADÉGONDE, St. daughter of Bertarius, king of Thuringia, renounced, at the age of 10, paganism for the Christian faith, by the direction of Clotaire, who afterwards married her. She united to personal charms the most amiable virtues of private life; but such was her attachment to religious duties, that she obtained from her husband, six years after her marriage, the permission of retiring from the world and of devoting herself to the seclusion of a monastery. She died 13th Aug. 587, aged 68, at the abbey of St. Croix, after performing acts of the greatest charity and most exemplary devotion.

RADÉMAKER, Gerard, a painter of Amsterdam, whose pieces of architecture and perspective were much admired. He died 1711, aged 38. His relation Abraham excelled in landscape painting, and died at Haerlem 1735, aged 60.

RAGOTZKI, Francis Leopold, prince of Transylvania, was imprisoned at Neustadt in 1701, on suspicion of attempts to make the Hungarians revolt against the emperor, he, however, escaped soon after, and from Poland repaired to Hungary, where he joined the disaffected, and was declared chief of the insurgents. Success emboldened him, and when degraded by the imperial court, and condemned to lose his head, he caused himself to be proclaimed protector of Hungary and prince of Transylvania. In 1713, when peace was restored, he retired to France, and from thence went to Constantinople, where the Turks paid great deference to him. He died at Rodosto on the sea of Marmora, 8th April, 1735, aged 56. His Memoirs on the Revolutions of Hungary, in 2 vols. 4to. or six in 12mo. are interesting; but the Testament Politique et Moral, which passes under his name, is supposed to be a fictitious publication.

RAGUEAU, Francis, a professor of jurisprudence at Bourges, author of a Commentary on the Customs of Berri; and of an account of the Royal Rights. He died 1605.

RAGUENET, Francis, a learned ecclesiastic of Rouen, who obtained the prize of eloquence in the French academy, 1689, on the subject of the dignity and merit of martyrdom. His parallel of the Italian and French music and operas, in which he allows the superiority to the Italians, occasioned a long paper war between him and Frenuse. He died in a good old age, 1722. He wrote besides, the Monuments of Rome, or a Description of the Finest Works of Painting, Sculpture, &c. of Rome, with Observations, 12mo.; History of Oliver Cromwell, 4to.; History of the Ancient Testament; History of Turenne, 12mo. &c.

RAIKES, Robert, a printer and philanthropist, was born at Gloucester in 1735. He was educated at Cambridge, and afterwards succeeded his father in the printing business, which he carried on with credit and advantage. In 1781, he planned the institution of Sunday-schools, in conjunction with the Rev. Mr. Stock. Mr. Raikes died at Gloucester, in 1811.—W. E.

RAINALDI, Oderic, a priest of the oratory, who died about 1670. He published a Continuation of Baronius, in 9 vols. fol. from 1199, to 1567.

RAINAUD, Theophilus, a Jesuit, born at Sospello in Nice, 1583. He was engaged in teaching belles lettres and theology among the Jesuits, and died at Lyons 31st October, 1663, aged 80. Though learned and well informed, he was singular and capricious in his conduct, and his writings are often obscure and uninteresting. His works appeared at Lyons, 1665, in 20 vols. fol.

RAINE, Matthew, a divine, was born in 1760, and educated first under his father, who was a clergyman, at Hackforth, in Yorkshire; and next at the Charter-house, from whence he was elected to Trinity-college, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. In 1791 he was appointed master of the Charter-house school. In 1798 he took his doctor's degree; and in 1809 was elected preacher of Gray's Inn. He died in 1810. Dr. Raine published only two sermons.—W. B.

RAINOLDS, John, an English divine, born at Pinto, Devonshire, 1549. He was of Merton college, Oxford, and afterwards removed to Corpus Christi, where he became fellow. In 1598, he was made dean of Lincoln, but the next year exchanged it for the presidency of his college. He was offered a bishopric by Elizabeth, but modestly refused it. He died 1607. He was a man of such learning, that he was called a living library, &c. His private character was exemplary for piety and every virtue. He was one of those divines employed in the translation of the Bible under James I. He wrote besides Censura Librorum Apocryphorum Vet. Testamenti; Apologia Thesium de Sacra Script. et Eccles.; de Romanæ Eccles.; Idolat. in Cultu Sanctorum, &c. He had a brother William, originally of New college, who turned papist, and became Hebrew professor of the English college at Rheims. He was author of Calvino-Turcismus, 8vo.; a Defence of the Rhemish Translation of the New Testament, &c. and died at Antwerp, 1594.

RALEIGH, sir Walter, an illustrious Englishman, born at Hayes, in the parish of Budley, Devonshire, 1552. He was for some time at Oriol college, Oxford; but the pursuits of ambition, and an active life, were more congenial to his feelings than academical labours. In 1569, he accompanied the gentlemen volunteers whom Elizabeth sent to France to support the protestants, and there he continued for nearly six years. Though afterwards he resided in the Middle Temple, he paid no attention to the law, but, in 1578, embarked for the Netherlands with the troops sent against the Spaniards, and the next year he went with his half-brother, sir Humphrey Gilbert, on an expedition to discover and colonize some part of North America. The plan did not succeed, and, in 1580, he engaged as captain in the wars of Ireland, and became one of the commissioners for the government of Munster in lord Ormond's absence. On his return to England he became a favourite of the court, by his polite attention and gallantry to the queen. Walking in the number of her attendants, he extricated her from a dirty part of the road which she was afraid to cross, by spreading his new plush cloak on the ground, over which she gently trod and passed clean and dry. This courtesy gained him the queen's favour, and he gradually rose to places of honour and distinction. In 1583, he sailed again with his brother Gilbert in an expedition to Newfoundland; but though his companions were attacked by a contagious disease, and his brother was drowned on his return, he still was animated with the desire of new discoveries. In 1514, therefore, he obtained letters patent, and sailed to America, where he discovered Wigandacoa, which was called Virginia, in honour of his virgin mistress, and in this country he afterwards in a second and third voyage settled flourishing colonies. He had been chosen member of parliament for Devonshire in 1584, and knighted, and now the favour of the queen appointed him seneschal of Cornwall, and warden of the Stannaries; but the wish to improve navigation by the discovery of the northwest passage, and by visiting distant countries, was still the ruling object of his ambition. A fourth and a fifth expedition were fitted out to Virginia; and if he had done no other service to the nation, his recommendation of tobacco, which he first introduced into the country from Virginia, would in a commercial point of view have procured him high distinction. In 1588, his courage was eminently displayed against the Spanish armada, to the destruction of which he ably contributed, and the following year he was employed with a fleet in the restoration of Don Antonio, the expelled king of Portugal. In 1592, he was at the head of the expedition sent to attack the Spaniards at Panama, and on his return he became an active and eloquent speaker in the house of commons; but he incurred the displeasure of the clergy, and the public odium, by accepting the grant of the manor of Sherborne, which formerly belonged to the see of Salisbury. Though stigmatised by his enemies with the name of atheist, it appears, however, that he was a zealous asserter of God and of his providence. In 1593, he highly offended the queen by an amour with one of her maids of honour, daughter of Sir Nicholas Throgmorton; but after being imprisoned for several months, he made due reparation for his violation of decorum by marrying the lady, with whom he lived in the enjoyment of uninterrupted domestic harmony. He engaged, in 1595, in the discovery and conquest of Guiana, in South America, and after storming the city of St. Joseph, and taking the Spanish governor prisoner, he returned to England. He was afterwards employed against Cadiz, and then became active in his opposition to Essex, and greatly contributed to the defeat of his treasonable designs; but on the death of the queen his happiness was at an end. On the accession of James, Raleigh was not only stripped of his honours, but tried and condemned for high treason, on charges not only frivolous, but oppressive and arbitrary. Though reprieved he remained for several years a prisoner in the Tower, while his estates were lavished on Car, the royal favourite. During his long captivity, which was soothed by the attentions of his wife, the heroic prisoner devoted himself to literary pursuits, and wrote some valuable works, among which is his History of the World, of which the first volume appeared in 1614, folio. In 1616, after a confinement of nearly thirteen years, this illustrious character was permitted to leave his prison, and James, as if pretending first to discover his merits, sent him on an expedition to explore the golden mines of Guiana. The affair proved unfortunate: sir Walter lost his eldest son, who was killed by the Spaniards at St. Thomas, and after destroying the town, which was burnt against his orders, he returned home to meet the most cruel and arbitrary treatment. Incensed at his conduct, the Spaniards were loud in their complaints by Gundamor their ambassador, and James ordered Raleigh to be seized. Though no blame could attach to him for his conduct in Guiana, the king, determined on his punishment, ordered his execution on his former attainder. In vain the unfortunate leader pleaded in his defence, and asserted that his life could not be taken away in consequence of a sentence passed fifteen years before, and which had been revoked, since in his late expedition the king had granted him power of life and death over his crew. Nothing, however, availed; and the pusillanimous James, either to please the vindictive Spaniards, or to gratify his own personal enmity, assented to his death, and thus brought eternal disgrace upon his otherwise illustrious reign. This injured hero was beheaded in old palace yard, 29th Oct. 1618, and suffered with great magnanimity. His body was interred in St. Margaret's, Westminster, but his head was preserved for several years in his family. Without hesitation, sir Walter must be pronounced one of the greatest and most useful characters of those times. His perseverance in making discoveries and in visiting foreign countries first inspired the nation with that ardour after maritime distinction, which has since not only increased its commerce and prosperity, but raised its glory to the most exalted rank. He was distinguished not only as a bold navigator and a valiant leader, but as an able negotiator; and as a man of letters, his valuable works, composed in the obscurity of a dungeon, on subjects of history, politics, geography, and philosophy, as well as some respectable poetical pieces, will transmit his name with honour to the most distant posterity. His son Carew, who was born in the tower, was author of some sonnets, and he wrote also a Defence of his Father against the Attacks of James Howell. He was made governor of Jersey in 1659, and died 1666.

RALPH, James, a miscellaneous writer, originally a schoolmaster at Philadelphia. He came to London in the beginning of the second George's reign, and wrote himself to notice. His "Night," a poem, and some theatrical pieces, were received with applause. His History of England possesses merit, and some of his political pamphlets for a time enjoyed popularity. He died of the gout, January 24th, 1762, at Chiswick. He was one of the heroes of Pope's Dunciad.

RAMAZZINI, Bernardin, an Italian physician, born at Capri, near Modena, 1633. He studied and took his degrees at Parma, and after visiting Rome, settled at Modena, where he became medical professor, and practised with great success. In 1700, he removed to Padua, and though blind, discharged the duties of professor with great applause. He died 1714, upon his birthday, 5th Nov. aged 81. His works appeared at London, 1716, in 4to.

RAMEAU, John Philip, a celebrated musician, born at Dijon, 25th Sept. 1683. He at first travelled over the country with a strolling company, and afterwards was made organist of Clermont cathedral in Auvergne. He now studied the principles of his art with great success, and produced his Treatise on Harmony, and his new System of Music. In 1750, he gave to the public his famous "Demonstration of the Principles of Harmony," in which he makes the whole depend on a single and clear principle, the fundamental base; and for this excellent work he has been deservedly called the Newton of that science. He was made manager of the opera at Paris, and for his great merit appointed composer to Lewis XV. and by him honoured with the order of St. Michael, and raised to the rank of nobility. He died at Paris, Sept. 12, 1764. He was a man of exemplary character, a good husband, and a benevolent neighbour. As a theorist he is deservedly admired by Handel, but as a composer, some dispute his merit.

RAMELLI, Felix, a native of Asti, who though an ecclesiastic, became an eminent painter, and was highly honoured at the court of the king of Sardinia for the excellence of his highly finished miniature portraits. He died 1740, aged 74.

RAMSAY, Andrew Michael, called also the chevalier Ramsay, was a Scotchman, born at Ayr, 9th June, 1686. He studied at Edinburgh, and was tutor to lord Wemyss's son at St. Andrew's, and afterwards travelled to Leyden, where the conversation of Poiret, the mystic divine, shook his religious principles. In 1710, he visited the celebrated Fenelon, at Cambrai, and became by his persuasion a convert to the catholic faith, and in consequence of this connexion, obtained the place of tutor to the duke of Chateau Thierry, and to the prince of Turenne, and was made knight of St. Lazarus. He was afterwards at Rome, engaged in the education of the children of the pretender, called there, James III. but soon after returned to Scotland, where he was favourably received. In 1730, he was honoured by the university of Oxford with a doctor's degree, and afterwards returned to France, and died in the service of his patron, the duke of Turenne, at St. Germain-en-laie, 6th May, 1743. He wrote Discourse sur la Poesi Epique; la Vie de Fenelon, in return for the influence of the learned prelate in his conversion; Essay sur le Gouvernement Civil; les Voyages de Cyrus, the best of his works; Histoire de M. de Turenne; la Psychometre, or Reflections on lord Shaftesbury's Characteristics; besides a Plan of Education and Philosophical Principles of Natural and Revealed Religion, 2 vols. 4to. and smaller pieces.

RAMSAY, Charles Lewis, a Scotchman, author of a Treatise on Short-hand writing, dedicated to Lewis XIV. and translated into French, Paris, 1681.

RAMSAY, Allan, a Scotch poet, born at Peebles, 1696. He was originally a barber at Edinburgh; but possessing emulation, and a strong genius, he devoted himself to the muses, and was honoured with the patronage of the great and learned. Of all his poems the most deservedly known is his "Gentle Shepherd," a pastoral comedy, which was first acted at Edinburgh, 1719, and which for merit, simplicity, and elegance, is most universally admired. For some time the poet kept a bookseller's shop, but retired in his old age, and died a private man, 1763, aged 67. His poems form 2 vols. 4to. and his songs 4 vols.

RAMSAY, David, M. D. the historian, was born in Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, April 2d, 1749, of intelligent and pious parents, who gave him a religious education. He early exhibited a superiority of talent, and made uncommon proficiency in his studies, both at school and at college. He was graduated at Princeton in 1765. After two years devoted to general literature, he commenced the study of medicine at Philadelphia, and received a diploma of Bachelor of Physic, from the Medical college of that city in 1772, with the highest reputation for talents and learning. After practising medicine a short time in Maryland, he went, in 1773, to Charleston, South Carolina, where he soon rose to eminence in the profession, and enjoyed extensive employment. At the commencement of the war of the revolution he took a decided and active part in the cause of freedom, and contributed much to its promotion by his exertions in the legislature of South Carolina, of which he was a member during the whole war; and in the army, where he served for some time as a surgeon, as well as by his conversation and numerous publications in the papers. He was one of the privy council for some time, and was banished, with others, by Cornwallis to St. Augustine, where he remained eleven months. On his return he exhibited his moderation and wisdom by opposing the acts of the legislature confiscating the estates of the royalists. In 1782, he was elected to a seat in congress, and was a conspicuous member of that body. He was again elected in 1785, and chosen president, pro tempore, during the illness of Hancock, and discharged the duties of that station through the year. In 1786, he resumed his profession, and was distinguished for an assiduous attention to its duties, and for skill. He was a rigid disciple of doctor Rush. During the progress of the revolution, doctor Ramsay employed himself in collecting materials for a history of that event; and his great impartiality, his fine memory, which retained whatever came within his observation, and his extensive intercourse with many of the principal persons, both of the army and national legislature, eminently qualified him for that task. He gave his History of the Revolution in South Carolina to the public in 1785, a work characterized, like all his others, by vigorous thought, neatness of style, judiciousness, and fidelity. In 1790, he published a History of the American Revolution; in 1801, a Life of Washington; and in 1808, a History of South Carolina. He also wrote a Universal History, and a History of the United States up to the year 1808, which have been published since his death. He was distinguished through the whole course of his life by great enterprise, industry, and perseverance. The chief defect in his character was a want of judgment in affairs foreign to his profession, which led him into fallacious schemes of acquiring wealth and promoting the public good, and involved him in disappointments and losses. He was eminently philanthropic and pious, engaged with ardour in every plan to advance the well-being of mankind, and exhibited a bright example of the Christian virtues. He died on the 7th of May, 1815, of a wound received in the street from a maniac.  L.

RAMSAY, Martha L. wife of the preceding, was the daughter of Henry Laurens, president of congress, and born in Charleston, South Carolina, Nov. 3d, 1759. She possessed a superior mind, and early became distinguished for her attainments in knowledge, and for piety. On the commencement of the American revolution in 1775, she left America, and resided in England and France till 1785, when she returned to Charleston, and was married to Doctor Ramsay in January, 1787. Her death took place on the 10th of June, 1811. Her superior sense and excellence of character rendered her an object of universal esteem. A memoir of her life was published by Doctor Ramsay.  L.

RAMSDEN, Jesse, a native of Halifax, Yorkshire, son of a clothier. In 1751, at the age of 21, he abandoned his father's business, and came to London to be an engraver, and then applied himself to the making of mathematical instruments, in which he showed great skill and ingenuity. He was admitted fellow of the Royal Society, 1786. His improvements in the theodolite, the barometer, Hadley's quadrant, and other mathematical and optical instruments, were very important to science, and he acquired no little celebrity from his astronomical apparatus and quadrants.

RAMUS, Peter, a learned Frenchman, born at Vermandois, in Picardy, 1515. Though of a respectable family, his parents were poor; but such was his devotion to literature, that rather than abandon it, he was content to attend the college of Navarre at Paris in the humble character of a servant. Assiduity, however, overcame every difficulty, and when a candidate for his master's degree, he boldly attacked the prejudices of the times, by assuming for his thesis that all that Aristotle had written was false. This kindled a violent disturbance in the university of Paris, where Aristotle's works were regarded as the effusion of more than human powers, and the young professor was not only accused of intentions of sapping religion, but he was forbidden to teach philosophy; and that his disgrace might be more publicly known, the sentence was published in every street in Paris, and his person and character exposed to ridicule on the stage. He, however, was gradually restored to public favour, and in 1551, was made Royal professor of philosophy and eloquence; but the Sorbonne viewed with a jealous eye his elevation, and when he attempted an innovation in the pronunciation of Latin, by pronouncing Quisquis with the sound of the Q, and not Kiskis, as in the old way, he was exposed to great virulence, till the matter being referred to a court of justice, was dismissed, and every person allowed to pronounce his words as he pleased. When Ramus deserted the catholic religion for the protestant, he exposed himself to fresh persecutions, and was in consequence driven from his professorship; but though afterwards restored for a while to favour, he found himself still attacked by new injuries, and at last fell by the hands of the assassins in the massacre of St. Bartholomew, 1572. His body, after being, it is said, thrown out of a window, having the bowels dispersed about the streets, was dragged with every species of ignominy by his Aristotelian adversaries, and thrown into the Seine. He wrote various learned works, the best known of which are Treatises on Arithmetic and Geometry; de Militiâ Cæsaris; de Moribus Veterum Gallorum; Grammars in Latin, French, and Greek, &c. As a scholar and mathematician he was very respectable; and his followers, called Ramists, for a while became very numerous in England and Scotland, and particularly in Germany.

RAMUSIO, John Baptist, secretary of the council of 10 in the Venetian republic, died at Padua, 1557, aged 72. He was author of a Treatise de Nili Incremento; a Collection of Maritime Voyages, in 3 vols. fol. in Italian. He was for some time ambassador from Venice to France, Rome, and Switzerland.

RANC, John, a native of Montpellier, admired as a painter. He was a great favourite in Spain, and was chief painter to the king. He died at Madrid, 1735.

RANCE, Armand John le Boutillier de, a French ecclesiastic, born at Paris, 9th Jan. 1626. He was so well skilled in Grecian literature that at the age of 13 he published an edition of Anacreon with notes; but after taking orders, and being presented to some abbeys, he gave way to his licentious inclinations, and became an abandoned sensualist. Returning once from a distant voyage, he entered privately the apartments of his mistress, but instead of finding the usual caresses of affection, he saw her head in a platter, cut off, because a small leaden coffin could not contain the length of her dead body. This sudden shocking sight operated so powerfully upon his feelings, that he retired to a monastery, and devoted the rest of life to reform and improve the monks of la Trappe. He died there in the midst of his society, 26th Oct. 1700, much and deservedly respected. He published a translation of the works of Dorothee, 8vo.; Explanation of St. Benedict's Rules; Instructions and Maxims; Moral Reflections on the Four Gospels, in 4 vols. &c.

RANDOLPH, Thomas, a native of Kent, educated at Christ-church, and made master of Broadgate-hall, Oxford, 1549. He was disgraced by Mary on account of his religion, but his abilities as a negotiator were employed by Elizabeth in France, Russia, and Scotland, and he was knighted for his services, and made chamberlain of the exchequer and master of the posts. He died 1590, aged 60. He wrote an Account of his Embassy in Russia, 1568, inserted in Hakluyt's Voyages; Letters, Instructions, &c.

RANDOLPH, Thomas, an English poet, born at Newnham, Northamptonshire, 1605 where his father was steward to lord Zouch. He was educated at Westminster school and Trinity college, Cambridge, where he became fellow. He possessed great genius, but unfortunately was too much addicted to pleasure, and thus shortened his life. He was the friend and favourite of Ben Jonson, who often called him his son, and in his poems he displayed all the vivacity of a genuine wit. He died 1634, when not yet 30. His works, among which is the "Muse's Looking-Glass," a superior comedy, and three other dramatic pieces, were collected by his brother Robert, of which the fourth edition appeared in 1664. Robert himself was a poet, and was of Christ-church, Oxford, and became rector of Donington, Lincolnshire, where he died 1671, aged 60.

RANDOLPH, Edward, an agent sent from Great Britain to ascertain the state of the New-England colonies, and who gave them great trouble by his hostility to their interests. He came to Boston in 1676, and was the principal means of depriving Massachusetts of her charter. He was a conspicuous character during the government of sir Edmund Andross, and was imprisoned with him in 1689 as a traitor. He was, however, released, and went to the West Indies, where he died. He was violent in his prejudices, arbitrary, unjust, and implacable in enmity to the colonies.

RANDOLPH, Peyton, first president of the American congress, was a native of Virginia, and one of the most distinguished lawyers and patriots of that state. He was as early as 1756 appointed king's attorney for that colony, and held the office for many years. In 1766 he was elected speaker of the house of burgesses, and in 1773 a member of the committee of correspondence. The following year he was appointed a delegate to the congress which assembled at Philadelphia, and was elected its president, and also presided in the congress of 1775, till obliged to return to Virginia, when Hancock was chosen his successor. He soon resumed his seat in congress, but died suddenly on the 22d of Oct. 1775, aged 52.

RANDOLPH, Edmund, governor of Virginia, was the son of John Randolph, attorney-general of that colony before the revolution. He was an eminent lawyer, and a warm friend of the revolution. After having held several honourable stations in the state he was in 1779 elected to a seat in congress, and held it till 1782. In 1787 he was a member of the convention which formed the federal constitution, but voted against its adoption. The next year he was chosen governor of Virginia, and in 1789 was appointed attorney-general of the United States, and in 1794 secretary of state, but engaged in an intrigue with the French minister, by which he lost the confidence of the cabinet, and resigned in August, 1795. He died Sept. 12:h, 1813.

RANNEQUIN, N. a celebrated engineer, born at Liege, 1648, and known for the machine of Marly, which raised water to the top of a hill 502 feet above its level, and with such power that not less than 5258 tons are forced up every 24 hours. This able man died 1708.

RANS, Bertrand de, a native of Rheims, who, after living in deep solitude as a hermit in the forests of Parthenay and Tournay, imposed himself in 1226 upon the credulity of the people as the emperor Baldwin I. of Constantinople, who about 20 years before had been defeated by the Bulgarians, and put to death. Though the daughter of Baldwin, who was governess of Flanders, discovered his artifice, the imposture prevailed, and Rans was acknowledged by the Flemish nobility as their lawful sovereign. At last deception ceased, and the usurper, when tortured, confessed his guilt, and was hanged at Lisle.

RANTZAN, Josias, a noble native of Holstein, who left the Danish service for the French, and was made marshal of the kingdom by Lewis XIII. He was wounded and lost an eye 1636 at Dole, and afterwards lost an arm, a leg, and one of his ears. In 1645 he became a protestant, and died five years after in prison. He is chiefly known as the active instrument by whom the protestant religion was established in Denmark.

RAOUX, John, a native of Montpellier, eminent as a painter of historical pieces, and of portraits. He was of the Paris academy of painting, and died at Paris, 1734, aged 57.

RAPHAEL, d'Arezzo, a native of Arezzo, the pupil of Zuccherro, admired as a historical and portrait painter. He died 1580, aged 28.

RAPHAEL, Sanzio, an illustrious painter, born at Urbino, on Good Friday, 1483. His father was a painter, and under him and Perugino he first began to cultivate his talents, after which he visited Sienna, and Florence, to see the incomparable works of Leonardo da Vinci, and Michael Angelo. By studying thus the best masters, he soon rose to eminence and reputation, and merited the appellation of the divine Raphael. He also excelled as an architect, and was employed by Leo X. in the building of St. Peter's at Rome, and he enjoyed the patronage and esteem not only of the popes, but of Francis I. of France, and of other princes. He unfortunately was too much given to licentious pleasures, which at last hurried him to an untimely grave, on his birthday, 1520. He was buried in the Rotunda at Rome, where these two lines by Bembo mark his tomb:

Ille hic est Raphael, timuit quo sospite vinci Rerum magna parens, et moriente mori.

He surpassed, says a connoisseur, all modern painters, because he possessed more of the excellent parts of painting, and above all he possessed the graces in so advantageous a manner, that he has never since been equalled by any other.

RAPHELENGIUS, Francis, a learned Fleming. He studied the oriental languages at Paris, and was Greek professor at Cambridge. He was afterwards corrector of the press to Christopher Plantin, whose daughter he married, and he was concerned in the publication of the famous Antwerp Hebrew Bible, printed 1571. He was afterwards professor of Hebrew and Arabic at Leyden, and died there 20th July, 1597. His works besides are, a Hebrew Grammar—an Arabic Lexicon—a Chaldee Lexicon, &c.

RAPIN, Nicholas, a French poet, born at Fontenai-le-Comté, Poitou. He was the favourite of Henry III. by whom he was made provost of Paris, from which he was expelled by the league, but afterwards restored by Henry IV. His works, which were elegantly written, consisted of odes, epigrams, and elegies. He attempted to banish rhyme from the French poetry, and to write after the Greek and Latin metre. He died 1609. His poems are among the Delices des Poetes Latins de France.

RAPIN, Renatus, a learned Jesuit, born at Tours, 1621. He taught for nine years polite literature with success, and wrote Latin with great elegance. His poem on Gardens, in four books, has been translated into English by Evelyn, and also by Gardiner. This and his other poems, consisting of odes, sacred eclogues, &c. were published 2 vols. 12mo. 1681. His treatises on Polite Literature were translated from the French into English, by B. Kennet, 2 vols. 8vo. They contain well-written comparisons between Demosthenes and Cicero on eloquence, between Homer and Virgil, &c. and are intended to restore good taste and polite studies in France. He died at Paris, 1687.

RAPIN DE THOYRAS, Paul de, a Frenchman, known as an eminent historian, born at Castres, Languedoc, 1661, and descended from an ancient family in Savoy. He studied at Puy-laurens and Saumur, and then, after the example of his father, who was an advocate of respectability, he applied himself to the law. He afterwards abandoned the law for the profession of arms, but on the revocation of the edict of Nantes he left France, and came to England in 1686; but after a short stay in London he went to Holland, where he enlisted in a company of French volunteers. He accompanied William III. into England, and served in the army in Ireland, and was at the battle of the Boyne, and the siege of Limerick, where he was wounded. In 1693 he became tutor to the son of the earl of Portland, with a pension of 100*l.* from the king, and the promise of greater patronage, which he never received. He travelled over Europe with his pupil, and married at the Hague, where he settled for some time. In 1707 he retired to Wezel, in the dutchy of Cleves, with his family, and there devoted himself for 17 years to the completion of his History of England. His health suffered by his great application, and the attack of a fever carried him to his grave after a week's illness, 1725. He left one son and six daughters. He published before his death 8 vols. 4to. of his history, to the death of Charles I. and two more were added in 1724. This history has been translated by Tindal, and published in 8vo. and in folio, with a continuation to 1760, and notes, and also by J. Kelly, in 2 vols. folio. As a historian, Rapin has his admirers and detractors, and while admired by some for moderation, he is charged by others with tediousness and obscurity. Voltaire has said of him, that he was the author of the best and most impartial history of England that had hitherto appeared.

RASLES, Sebastian, a French Jesuit missionary among the Indians, who came to Quebec in 1689. After spending several years in the interior he went to Norridgewock, on the Kenebeck river, where he resided twenty-six years till his death. He was an implacable enemy to the English, and excited the Indians to rob and destroy them. In 1724 a party from New-Hampshire attacked the village, and killed him and many of the Indians. He was in his sixty-seventh year. He possessed a vigorous mind and extensive learning, was an accomplished Latin scholar, and an impressive preacher. He had acquired great influence over the Indians, and made himself familiar with their language, of which he wrote a dictionary, which is preserved in the library of Harvard college. [L.]

RASTAL, John, an eminent printer, born in London, and educated at Oxford. He wrote a Description of Europe, Asia, and Africa, in the form of a drama, with cuts—and also Canones Astrologici—Dialogues concerning Purgatory—Rules of a good Life—Anglorum Regum Chronicum—Apology against John Fryth, &c. He married a sister of the great sir Thomas More, and died 1536. His son William was one of the justices of the King's Bench under Mary, and at her death retired to Louvain. He published a Chronological Table from the Conqueror—the Chartuary, 1580—Terms of the English Law—Collection of Statutes—the Life of sir Thomas More, &c.

RATER, Anthony, an eminent architect of Lyons. His abilities were employed in beautifying and adding to the conveniences of his native city; but he had the misfortune before his death to see his fellow-citizens proscribed, and the places which he had embellished laid in ashes by the murderous hands of the revolutionary anarchists. He died at Miribel, near Lyons, 4th Aug. 1794, aged 65.

RATRANUS, a monk of the abbey of Corbie, in the ninth century. He published two books on predestination, against Hincmar, archbishop of Rheims, which are inserted in the Vindiciæ Predestinationis, 2 vols. 4to. He wrote besides, treatises on the Conception of Christ—and on Transubstantiation, a work much quoted by the Calvinists.

RATTE, Stephen Hyacinth de, an astronomer, was born at Montpellier in 1722. He was secretary to the Academy of Sciences in his native city, and published two volumes of its memoirs; but was prevented from continuing the collection by the Revolution. He was also counsellor of the court of aids; and when the National Institute was formed he was chosen an associate. He died in 1805. His observations have been published by Flauguergues.—W.B.

RAVAILLAC, Francis, a native of Angoulême, who took the habit of the Feuillans, a society from which he was soon after expelled on account of his irregularities. The excesses and the fanatical discourses of the advocates of the league had so deranged his understanding, that he formed a most inveterate hatred against Henry IV. and determined to cut him off. Full of melancholy fury he came to Paris, and for some days followed the monarch to commit his horrid purpose. On the fatal 14th May, 1610, when the royal carriage was stopped in the street by some wagons, the murderer raised himself upon the wheels of the chariot, and with two blows stabbed the monarch to the heart. He was seized by the duke of Epemon, and condemned to be torn to pieces by four horses. The dreadful sentence was executed the following 27th May, and he declared to the last that he had no accomplices in the cruel deed.

RAVENNAS, Agnellus, or Andreas, author of a crude history of the bishops of Ravenna, of which he was a native. He was abbot of a monastery there, and died before the middle of the ninth century.

RAVESTEN, John, a Dutch painter, born at the Hague about 1560. His portraits were much admired. There were two others of his name, Hubert, born at Dordrecht, 1647, whose fairs, markets, &c. were in high esteem, and Nicholas, born at Bommel, in 1661, who chiefly excelled in portraits and in historical pieces.

RAVIUS, Christian, a native of Berlin, who travelled into the East, where he learned the Persian, Turkish, and Arabian languages, and collected valuable MSS. On his return to Europe he became professor of oriental languages at Utrecht, afterwards at Kiel, and at Frankfurt on the Maine, where he died 21st June, 1667, aged 64. He was also one of the learned correspondents of queen Christina. He wrote a Plan of Hebrew Orthography and Etymology—a Grammar, Hebrew, Chaldaic, Syriac, Arabic, Samaritan, and English, London, 8vo.—a Latin translation from the Arabic of Apollonius Pergæus. His son John was librarian to the elector of Brandenburg, and was author of a Commentary on Cornel. Nepos—of Military Aphorisms—and other works.

RAULIN, Joseph, physician to the French king, and member of several learned societies, died at Paris, 12th April, 1784, aged 76. He published treatises on Diseases occasioned by Variations of the Atmosphere; on the Vapours in Females, on the Fluor Albus; on the Preservation of Infants; on Diseases in Lying-in-Women; Pulmonary Consumption; Comparison of the Mineral Waters of France and Germany, &c. There was an ecclesiastic of that name, John, who died at Cluni, 1514, aged 71. He wrote sermons in a weak style—Another, John Facond, who was a Spaniard, in the 17th century, and wrote an Ecclesiastical History of Malabar, 4to.

RAUWOLF. Vid. RAWWOLF.

RAWLET, John, B.D. an English divine, lecturer of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, a place which he refused to quit for the living of Coleshill, Warwickshire. He wrote the Christian Monitor, an excellent book often edited; and a treatise on Sacramental Covenanting, and died 1686, aged 44.

RAWLEY, William, D.D. chaplain to Charles I. and II. and also to the great Bacon, and the editor of his works, was born at Norwich, 1588. He was educated at Benet's college, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow, and in 1616 obtained the rectory of Landbeach, near Cambridge, from which he was expelled during the rebellion, but replaced at the restoration. He died there 18th June, 1667.

RAWLINS, Thomas, engraver of the mint during the reign of the second Charles, was author of three dramatic pieces, Rebellion; Tom Essence; and Tunbridge Wells, and died 1670.

RAWLINSON, Thomas, knt. descended of an ancient family in Lancashire, was born at London, March, 1647. He was sheriff, and in 1706 lord mayor of the city, and he rendered his name memorable by repairing and beautifying the Guildhall. He died 2d Nov. 1705. He was father of 15 children by his wife, Mary, daughter of Richard Taylor, Esq.

RAWLINSON, Thomas, a judicious collector of books, and a liberal patron of learning, and of learned men. While in Gray's-inn he had four chambers filled with his valuable collections, and he removed to London-house, Aldersgate-street, which, though once the palace of a bishop, could scarce contain the number of his books. He died there 6th Aug. 1725, aged 44. His library was disposed of by auction after his death, and his MSS. took 16 days in the sale, and the books a much greater portion of time. Addison alluded satirically to him in the 158th number of the Tatler, under the character of Tom Folio.

RAWLINSON, Richard, fourth son of Sir Thomas, was an eminent antiquary, educated at St. John's college, Oxford, where he took, by diploma, the degree of LL.D. in 1719. This indefatigable man made a collection for the enlargement of A. Wood's Historia et Antiquitates Oxon. and for the continuation of the Athenæ Oxoniensis, and History of Oxford, and he assisted liberally his contemporary antiquaries in the completion of their works. He also published a translation of Fresnoy's New Method of studying History, &c. 2 vols. 8vo.; and the English Typographer, &c. 8vo. He also founded in 1750 an Anglo-Saxon professorship at Oxford, and bequeathed to the university all his books, papers, MSS. seals, and curious and valuable collections. He died at Islington, 6th April, 1755. He was also a great benefactor to Hertford college, and particularly to St. John's college, to which he left an estate worth 700*l.* per annum. His heart, according to his direction, was placed in a beautiful urn against the wall of St. John's chapel, and his body deposited in a vault in St. Giles's church, Oxford. In his right hand was placed the head of counsellor Layer, which he had purchased for a large sum, when it had been blown off from Temple Bar, where, after his execution for treason, it had been placed, 1722. Dr. Rawlinson's printed books were sold in 1756. The sale lasted 50 days, and that of the pamphlets 10 days more.

RAWLINSON, Christopher, eminent for his knowledge of Saxon and Northern literature, was born at Springfield, Essex, 13th June, 1677, of an ancient family, situated at Clarkhill, Lancashire. He was educated at Queen's college, Oxford, and published, whilst there, an edition of Alfred's Saxon Translation of Boethius de Consolatione Philosophiæ, 8vo. He left a valuable collection of MSS. respecting the counties of Westmoreland and Cumberland. He died 8th Jan. 1732-3, aged 55, and was buried in the abbey church of St. Alban's.

RAWWOLF, Leonard, a native of Augsburg, who, in pursuit of botanical knowledge, travelled into Syria, Judea, Arabia, and other Eastern countries, where he obtained a great number of curious plants. On his return to Europe, 1576, he removed to Lintz, and gained some reputation as a medical practitioner, and was made physician to the archdukes of Austria. He died 1606. His Travels were published at Frankfort, 1582, in 4to. which were translated into English by Staphrost, 1693, and afterwards by Mr. Ray. The catalogue of his plants was published by J. F. Gronovius, at Leyden, 1755, under the name of Flora Orientalis, 8vo.

RAY, or WRAY, John, an eminent English naturalist, born at Black Notley, near Braintree, Essex, 1628. Though but the son of a blacksmith, he was well educated at Braintree school, and in 1644, he entered at Catherine-hall, Cambridge, from which two years after he removed to Trinity college, where he obtained a fellowship. As he distinguished himself in the university by his application, he was in 1651 made Greek lecturer of his college, and two years after mathematical reader, and in 1655 humanity reader. Not only, however, the business of the college commanded his attention, but he devoted himself particularly to botany and the universal history of nature, and in 1660, published a catalogue of the Cambridge plants. To enlarge his knowledge of plants, he travelled over the greater part of England, Wales, and Scotland, and in these journeys was generally accompanied by his pupil and friend, Mr. Willoughby, by Sir Philip Skipton, and Mr. P. Courthope. At the restoration he took orders, but two years after he resigned his fellowship, as he refused to subscribe against the solemn league and covenant. In 1663, he embarked about the continent, where he continued about three years with his learned pupil, in pursuit of botanical knowledge, of which he published an account in 1673. In 1667 he was elected fellow of the Royal Society, and contributed much by his valuable communications to the philosophical transactions. In 1672 he lost his worthy friend

Willoughby, and the following year he married the daughter of Mr. Oakley, of Launton, Oxon, though nearly 24 years younger than himself. After superintending for some time the education of his friend Mr. Willoughby's children at Middleton-hall, he removed to Sutton Colfield, and then to Falborne-hall, Essex, and in 1679 settled in his native place, where he died 17th Jan. 1704-5. As a botanist, Ray has acquired great and deserved celebrity, and his writings are held in high estimation. To strong benevolence of heart he added great humility of mind and modesty of manners, and in his character he was so amiable that those who knew him respected him, not so much for his literary acquirements as from personal friendship. The best known of his works are the Wisdom of God manifested in the Works of the Creation, 8vo. edited three times—three Discourses on the Primitive Chaos, the Creation, Deluge, and Conflagration of the World, 8vo.—Synopsis Methodica Animalium, Quadrupedum, Avium, et Piscium—Rawolf's Travels into the East translated, 8vo.—Persuasive to a Holy Life, 8vo.—Collection of English Proverbs, often reprinted, 8vo.—Catalogue of English Plants—Nomenclator Classicus, for the use of his friend's sons—Observations, Topographical, Moral, &c. in foreign Countries—Discourse on Seeds and the Differences of Plants—Methodus Plantarum Nova—Historia Plantarum Generalis—Fasciculus Stirpium Britannicarum—Synopsis Methodica, &c. He also assisted Mr. Willoughby in his History of Birds, Fishes, &c. and after his death, his History of Insects appeared in 4to. under the care of Dr. Derham—and also a collection of Philosophical Letters, between him and his friends, 8vo.—and his Select Remains were published in 1760, 8vo. by Mr. Scott.

RAY, Benjamin, an ingenious and learned man, but very ignorant of the world. He was born at Spalding in Lincolnshire, and educated there and at St. John's college, Cambridge. When in orders, he became curate of Surfleet, and of Cowbitt. He wrote an Account of a Water Spout Observed in Deepingfen, inserted in the philosophical transactions. He wrote other things, never printed. He died at Spalding, 1760.

RAYMOND, Robert, lord, a learned lawyer, raised to the office of chief justice of the King's Bench. He wrote Reports, &c. held in high reputation, and died 1733.

RAYNAL, William Francis, a distinguished French historian, born at St. Genies, in Rouergue, 1718. He early entered among the Jesuits, and became a popular preacher, but his love of liberty and independence was too great to continue in the confinement of a cloister, and he left the society, in 1748, and settled at Paris. Here determined to support himself by his pen, he wrote Literary Anecdotes, 3 vols. and Memoirs of Ninon de L'Enclos, and was engaged in the Mercur de France; but as he had greater partiality for commercial occupations, he devoted himself more closely to that subject, and in 1770, published his History, Philosophical and Political, of the Establishment, and of the Commerce of the Europeans in the East and West Indies. This work was received with general approbation; but while the style and the language were admired, his calculations were discovered to be erroneous, his principles suspicious, and his conclusions false. To correct and improve, therefore, a composition which embraced so many concerns of policy and commerce, he travelled over France, Holland, and England, in pursuit of information, and of well-attested facts. His reputation was such, that in England, the speaker of the commons observing him among the spectators, suspended the business of the house, till he had seen the historian placed in a more commodious seat. On his return he published a new edition of his work at Geneva, in 10 vols. 8vo.; but though corrected in some parts, his severe language against governments drew upon him the censure of the parliament of Paris, and not only his history was burnt with ignominy, but his person was ordered to be seized. He was, however, allowed sufficient time to make his escape, and he went to reside in Germany, and received marks of favour and protection from the king of Prussia, and from the empress of Russia, though he had spoken of them with sarcastic indifference. In 1788 he returned to Paris, and viewing the rapid progress of the constituent assembly, in the destruction of whatever was venerable and useful in the French monarchy, he had the boldness in 1791, to address a letter to that body, and in firm and energetic language, he censured the imprudence of their proceedings. This magnanimous appeal to the sense of the legislators was ridiculed as the effusion of dotage; but it proved too prophetic of the calamities which followed. Displeased with the tumults of the capital, the venerable philosopher retired to Passy, where he expired 6th March, 1796, aged 84. Though the favourite of great men, and of princes, he died in poverty, and the only property found belonging to him, was an assignat of fifty livres, worth not three pence in ready money. His reputation, nevertheless, will be immortal, and though he is to be censured for his opinions, which are often licentious and skeptical, his writings possess vigour, clearness, and elegance, and exhibit the nervous powers of an ardent imagination, and the striking features of a rapid invention. He published besides, a History of the Stadtholderate, 2 vols.—History of the English Parliament, 2 vols. 12mo.—Historical Anecdotes from the Age of Charles V. 3 vols. 12mo.—History of the Divorce of Henry VIII.—Ecole Militaire—Historical Memoirs of Europe—History the Revolutions of the English American Colonies, 2 vols. It is said, that he had written besides, a History of the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, which he partly destroyed during the reign of the sanguinary Robespierre.

RAYNARD, Theophilus, a native of Sospello, in Nice, who became a Jesuit, and professor of belles lettres and theology in the society. He died at Lyons, 31st Oct. 1663, aged 80. He wrote Tables for Sacred and Profane History, &c. His works form 20 vols. fol. printed Lyons, 1665.

RAYSSIGUIER, N. a French dramatic writer, whose Aminta, Astrea, &c. were represented on the Paris theatres between 1730 and 1735, with some applause.

READ, Alexander, an eminent Scotch physician, created by royal mandate, M.D. in the university of Oxford, 1620. He wrote some valuable works on medical and anatomical subjects, and died 1680.

READ, John, a lawyer of Boston, Massachusetts, distinguished for genius, learning, wit, patriotism, eloquence, and integrity, was graduated at Harvard college in 1697. He studied divinity, and preached for some time with popularity, but at length left that profession for the law, and soon became eminent in the practice. He first reduced the redundant and obscure phraseology of the English deeds of conveyance to the simple form now in use. He held a conspicuous place for some time also in the house of representatives and council. He died at an advanced age in 1749, after having been long and justly regarded as one of the greatest and most useful lawyers his country had produced.  L.

READ, George, one of the signers of the declaration of American independence, was born in Cecil county, in the province of Maryland, 1734. His father John Read, came from Dublin, in Ireland, and settled in that neighbourhood. George was the eldest of six sons. After his birth his father removed to New Castle county, on Delaware. He was intended by his parents, from an early age, for a learned profession, and was carefully educated with that view. He was first placed at an Academy at Chester, Pennsylvania, where he commenced, and pursued to a considerable extent, the study of the classics. He was thence removed to New London, and put under the care of the Rev. Dr. Allison, one of the most accomplished classical scholars then in America. Here Charles Thompson, afterwards secretary of congress, Hugh Williamson, member of congress from North Carolina, the Rev. Dr. Ewing, provost of the University of Pennsylvania, and a number of other persons, who were afterwards distinguished men, were his fellow-students. After quitting the academy Mr. Read studied law with John Morlan, an eminent lawyer in Philadelphia; was admitted to the bar at the age of nineteen; commenced the practice of this profession at New Castle in 1754; was made attorney-general of the three lower counties on Delaware in 1763, and held the office until he was made a delegate to congress in 1775. In July, 1776, he was a member of that venerable assembly and put his name to that memorable instrument by which the independence of his country was proclaimed. Mr. Read filled a variety of honourable stations, legislative and judicial, in the state of Delaware, in which he resided. After the adoption of the federal constitution, he was chosen a member of the senate of the United States, from Delaware. He continued to occupy this place, until he was appointed chief justice of the supreme court of that state, in which office he remained until his death in 1798. Mr. Read was eminent as a lawyer of deep research, and was not a little distinguished for his dignified appearance, his polished manners, his domestic virtues, and his uniform patriotism, and public usefulness.  L.

REAL, Cæsar Richard de St. a French writer, born at Chamberri. He came early to France, and afterwards visited England. After living some time at Paris, he returned to Chamberri, and died there, 1692, very old and poor. He possessed great abilities, and was well acquainted with history and literature. He wrote Discourses on History; Don Carlos, a historical novel; Account of the Conspiracy of the Spaniards against the Venetian republic; the Life of our Saviour; Discourses on Valour; treatise on Criticism; Apostacy of Geneva, &c. all which were published together, in 5 vols. 4to. 1722, at the Hague, and also at Paris, 1745, with his letters to Atticus.

REAL, Gaspar de, seigneur de Curban, author of a valuable work on the science of government, in 8 vols. 4to. was born at Sisteron, and died at Paris, 8th Feb. 1752, aged 70. His nephew, the abbé, was also born at Sisteron, and died 1774, aged 73, author of a Dissertation on the Name of the Royal Families of France and Spain, 1762, in 12mo.

REAUMUR, René Anthony Ferchault sieur de, a French philosopher, born at Rochelle, of a good family, 1683. He studied philosophy at Poitiers, and the law at Bourges; but his inclinations led him particularly to the pursuits of mathematics and physics, and for that purpose he removed to Paris. His high reputation as a philosopher, procured him a seat in the academy of sciences at Paris, 1708, and he repaid the honour by contributing largely to their memoirs. He died in 1757, in consequence of a fall. His works were very ingenious, and therefore much admired. The best is his History of Insects, 6 vols. 4to. besides a History of the rivers of France, &c.

REBOULT, Simon, a native of Avignon. He was brought up among the Jesuits, but left them on account of bad health, and afterwards married. He was author of Histoire des Filles de l'Enfance, 2 vols. 12mo.—Memoires du Chevalier de Forbin, 2 vols.—Histoire de Louis XIV. 3 vols. 4to.—Histoire de Clement XI. 2 vols. 4to. &c. He died at Paris, 1742, aged 65.

RECORDE, Robert, an English mathematician, who sometimes practised as physician. He is the first English writer on Algebra. He died in the King's Bench prison, 1558.

REDE, William, bishop of Chichester, in 1369, was eminent as a mathematician, and built the first library of Merton college, where he had been brought up, and also Amberley castle.

REDI, Francis, an Italian physician, born at Arezzo, 1626. He studied at Florence, and then at Pisa, where he became doctor of philosophy and medicine. Though in great reputation as the physician of Ferdinand II. duke of Tuscany, he devoted much of his time to literature, and assisted greatly in the compilation of the Crusca dictionary. He published Experiments on the Generation of Animals, 4to.; Observations on Vipers; Experiments on Natural Curiosities brought from India, 4to. &c. He was not only a learned man, but the liberal patron of learning. He was found dead in his bed, 1697.

REDI, Thomas, a Florentine painter of eminence, whose pieces are chiefly preserved in the churches of Tuscany. He died 1728, aged 63.

REDMAN, John, M.D. first president of the college of physicians in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, was born in that city in 1722. After having studied medicine and practised a short time in that place, he went to Bermuda and resided several years. He then went to Europe, and spent some time at Edinburgh, Paris, and Leyden, in perfecting his knowledge of medicine. He at length returned to America, and settled in his native city, where he soon became greatly distinguished, and was elected president of the college of physicians. He was eminent for piety and benevolence also, as well as professional skill. He died March 19th, 1808, in the eighty-seventh year of his age.

Jersey, in 1757. At the commencement of the war of the revolution he engaged with zeal in the cause of his country, and was chosen in 1774 one of the committee of correspondence of Philadelphia, and afterwards president of the convention. In 1775 he repaired to the camp at Cambridge, and was appointed an aid by Washington, and in the following year adjutant-general. In 1776 his confidence in the success of the colonies was almost dissipated by the disasters which befell them, and he was on the point of relinquishing the service, but the return of success revived his courage, and he continued firm and zealous in the cause. In 1778, when he was a member of the congress, the British commissioners attempted by bribery to procure his influence to obtain a reconciliation of the colonies to the parent country, but he rejected their proposals with becoming firmness and dignity, replying, "That he was not worth purchasing, but such as he was, the king of Great Britain was not rich enough to do it." In October, 1778, he was elected president of Pennsylvania, and retained the office till his death on the 5th of March, 1781.

REED, Isaac, an ingenious writer, was born in London in 1742. He was brought up to the conveyancing business; but relinquished it for literary pursuits, though he retained his chambers in Staple's Inn, where he collected a large and curious library. In 1768 he published the poems of lady Mary Wortley Montague; in 1773 he edited the Seatonian prize poems; in 1780 he revised and enlarged Dodsley's old plays; in 1782 he published the Biographia Dramatica, 2 vols.; in 1783, four volumes of humorous pieces, under the title of the "Repository;" and in 1785 an edition of Shakspeare, in 10 vols., which he extended, afterwards, to 21 vols. Mr. Reed was for many years editor and one of the proprietors of the European Magazine. He died Jan. 5, 1807, and was buried at Amwell. The sale of his library took up thirty-nine days, and produced four thousand pounds.—W. B.

REESE, Thomas, D.D. a presbyterian clergyman, who was born in Pennsylvania, in 1742, and graduated at Princeton college, in 1768. He studied theology, and settled as the pastor of the church of Salem, in South Carolina. He pursued his studies with an ardour which injured his health, and finally destroyed his life in 1796. He left behind him the character of a distinguished scholar, an able preacher, and an eminently pious man. His chief publication was an "Essay on the Influence of Religion on Civil Society."

Connecticut, was born at Brook-Haven, Long-Island, in 1744, graduated at the college at Princeton, New-Jersey, in 1763. After spending some time at that seminary as a tutor, he established himself as a lawyer at Litchfield, Connecticut, and soon became one of the most eminent in the profession. He was for many years a judge of the supreme court of that state, and for a considerable period chief justice. He founded the law school at Litchfield, and was for nearly thirty years the principal instructor in that distinguished institution. He was eminent for ingenuousness, simplicity of manners, uprightness, and piety, and held the first rank among his professional cotemporaries in energy of talents, and extent of legal attainments, and in the esteem and confidence of his fellow-citizens.

REGA, Henry Joseph, professor of medicine, and physician at Louvain, was author of various treatises of merit, on his profession. De Urinis Tractatus duo—Sympathia, seu de Consensu Partium Humani Corpor. 12mo.—Accurata Methodus mendiendi per Aphorismos Proposita, 4to.—Dissertatio Medica de Aquis Mineral. Fontis Marimont. &c. He died at Louvain, 1754, aged 64.

REGIONTANUS, an eminent astronomer, whose real name was John Mullerus, born at Konigsberg, Franconia, 1436. He studied at Leipsic, and then removed to Vienna, where he was the pupil, and afterwards the successor of the famous Purbachius, the professor. To be able to read Ptolemy, he travelled in the suite of cardinal Bessarion to Italy, and began to learn Greek under Beza, and after visiting the universities of that country, and making a valuable collection of MSS. he returned to Vienna. He was afterwards employed at Buda, to make a library for Corvinus, king of Hungary, and in 1471, he settled at Nuremberg. In 1474 he went to Rome to assist pope Sixtus IV. in the reformation of the calendar, and for his services, was named by him archbishop of Ratisbon, but died at Rome, 1476, of the plague, or, as some assert, by poison, administered by the sons of his enemy Trapezentius. As an astronomer and mathematician, in the dawning of that science, he was very respectable.

REGIS, Peter Sylvian, a French philosopher, born at Agenois, 1632. He studied at Cahors, under the Jesuits; but the lectures of Rohault determined him to leave divinity for the study of philosophy. He went in 1665, to Toulouse, and there acquired great reputation as a lecturer on the new philosophy introduced by Des Cartes, and in 1670 he removed to Paris, where he was attended by such numerous audiences, that the followers of the old doctrines prevailed upon the archbishop of Paris to silence this bold and eloquent innovator. He was a member of the academy of sciences, and died 1707. He wrote System of Philosophy, 3 vols. 4to.—Use of Reason and Faith, 4to.—an Answer to Huet's Censura Philosophiæ Cartesianæ, &c. These works, though once popular, and written with plausibility, have long since ceased to interest the public in consequence of the new lights thrown on the walks of philosophy.

REGIUS, Urban, or LE ROY, was born at Langenargen. He studied at Lindaw, Friburg, Basil, and Ingoldstadt, and distinguished himself so much by his literary talents, that he received from the hands of the emperor Maximilian, the poetical and oratorical crown. He was afterwards made professor of poetry and rhetoric; but being a convert to Luther's opinions, he went to settle at Augsburg, where he established a reformed church. He died suddenly at Zell, 1541. His works are contained in 3 vols. folio.

REGNARD, John Francis, next to Moliere, the best comic writer in France, was born at Paris, 1647. He early indulged his passion for travelling; but in passing from Italy to Marseilles, the ship in which he embarked was taken by pirates, and carried to Algiers. Now doomed to slavery, he gained the good graces of his master by his skill in making ragouts, and thus he became a useful man in the kitchen; but an amour brought on new difficulties and dangers. He was discovered, and had no choice, but either to turn Mahometan, or to be burnt alive. The French consul, however, extricated him from his situation, by ransom, and sent him back to his country. In 1681 he resumed his travels, and visited Flanders, Holland, and Sweden, and extended his excursions to Lapland, as far as the borders of the Icy Sea. He returned through Poland and Vienna, and after three years' absence, settled at Paris, and ardently devoted himself to the muses. He was made treasurer of France, and lieutenant of the waters and forests, and in the midst of independence, led the life of a voluptuary. He died at Dourdan, near Paris, it is said, of chagrin, 1709. His dramatic pieces have been published in 5 vols. 12mo.

REGNAULT, Noel, a learned Jesuit, born at Arras. He wrote Philosophical Conversations, 3 vols. 12mo.—System of Logic, 12mo.—Origin of the Old and New Philosophy, 3 vols.—Mathematical Conversations, 3 vols. He died 1762, aged 79.

REGNIER, Mathurin, a French poet, born at Chartres, 1573. He was canon of Chartres, and held other benefices, besides a pension from Henry IV.; but though an ecclesiastic, he greatly disgraced himself by his debaucheries, and brought on premature old age. He was patronised by cardinal Joyeuse, and died at Rouen, 1613. He was the first French satirist, and in his own way, was equal to his able successor Boileau. Juvenal and Persius were his models, but he painted vice sometimes in language offensive to modesty. Seventeen of his satires, and other poems, appeared at Rouen, 1614. The best edition is that of London, 1729, 4to. by Brossete, and that of Paris, 1746, 12mo.

REGNIER DES MARETS, Seraphin, a French writer, born at Paris, 1632. He went in 1662, as secretary to his patron, the duke de Crequi, ambassador to Rome, and in consequence of some elegant Italian sonnets, obtained a seat in the Crusca academy. In 1684 he became secretary to the French academy, in the room of Mezeray, and died 1713, prior of Grammont, and an abbot. He published a French Grammar—an Italian translation of Anacreon—Poems in French, Latin, Spanish, and Italian—History of the Disputes of France with the court of Rome, &c. besides a translation of Homer's Battle of the Frogs and Mice, finished at the age of 15. Voltaire says of him, that he did great service to the French language.

REGULUS, Marcus Attilius, a Roman general, who went to Africa to carry war against Carthage. His rapid successes were checked by the arrival of Xantippus, and Regulus, defeated and taken prisoner, was sent by the Carthaginians to Rome, to induce his countrymen to make peace. He dissuaded the Romans from accepting the offer, and on his return to Carthage, was cruelly put to death, B.C. 251.

REID, Thomas, an able Scotch divine, educated at Glasgow. He took his doctor's degree there, and was appointed professor of moral philosophy. He wrote Inquiry into the Human Mind—and essays on the Intellectual and Active Powers of Man, works of great merit, but very abstruse. He died 1796, aged 87. An account of his life has been given by Stewart.

REIHING, James, a native of Augsburg, who after violently opposing the tenets of Luther, at last embraced them with unusual warmth, and obtained the chair of professor of theology at Tubingen. As he married, the catholics ascribed his conversion to his attachment to the female sex. He died 1628, aged 48. His works are all controversial.

REINBECK, John Gustavus, a protestant minister of the churches of Werder and Villeneuve, and afterwards of Cologne, and confessor to the queen and princess royal of Prussia. He was born at Zell, and died at Berlin 1741, aged 53. He was author of treatises on Redemption—on Marriage—Considerations on the Augsburg Confession—sermons in several vols.—metaphysical works, &c.

REINECCIUS, Reinier, professor of belles lettres at Frankfort and Helmstadt, where he died 1593. He was a native of Steinheim, and wrote Methodus legendi Historiam, fol.—Historia Julia, 3 vols. fol.—Chronicon Microsolymitanum, 4to.—Historia Orientalis, 4to.

REINER, Wenceslaus Laurence, a painter of Prague, whose landscapes and battles were finished in a very striking style. He died 1743, aged 57.

REINESIUS, Thomas, a learned native of Gotha, in Thuringia, who studied medicine, and practised at Altenburg, where he became burgo-master. He was afterwards counsellor to the elector of Saxony, and then retired to Leipsic, where he died 1667, aged 80. He was also an elegant scholar and philologist, and published besides medical treatises, Variarum Lectionum Libri tres, 4to.; Syntagma Inscriptionum Antiquarum, 2 vols. folio; some letters and lectures, &c.

REINHOLD, ERASMUS, an eminent astronomer and mathematician, born at Salfeldt, Thuringia, 11th Oct. 1511. He studied and was also professor at Wittemberg, and died 19th Feb. 1553. He published an edition of Pinbadius's Theoria Planetarum; Ptolemy's Almagest, and other astronomical works. His son of the same name was also eminent as a mathematician and physician.

REISK, John, author of treatises on the Horns of Ammon; on the Oracles of the Sibyls; on the Abasuerus of Esther; on Job's Malady; on the Images of J. C.; on Glossopetres, &c. was rector of the college of Wolfenbuttel, and died 1701, aged 60.

REISKE, John James, an eminent critic, born in the duchy of Anhalt, 1706. He studied at Leipsic, and by application surmounted the difficulties which arise from narrow fortune, and the want of powerful patrons. He afterwards went to Leyden, where he resided eight years, till the severity of his remarks on Burman's Petronius excited a cabal against him, which obliged him to return to Leipsic. In 1758, he was placed above independence by being appointed rector of the academy of Leipsic, and his classical reputation was increased by his marriage, in 1764, with Ernestina Christina Muller, a lady of great talents, well versed in literature, and well qualified to assist and cheer his literary labours. He died 1774. He published Animadversiones in Auctores Græcos, 5 vols. a valuable work; an edition of the Greek Orators, 12 vols. 8vo. which were completed by his widow ; Dionysius of Halicarnassus, 7 vols ; Plutarch's Works, in 9 vols. ; Theocritus, &c.

RELAND, Hadrian, a learned orientalist, born at Ryp, North Holland, July 17th, 1676. He studied at Amsterdam, and made such progress in the Hebrew, Syriac, Chaldee, and Arabic, and in polite literature there and at Utrecht, under Grævius, and Leusden, that at the age of 22 he was offered a professorship at Linden, which, however, his father would not permit him to accept. In 1699 he accepted the professorship of philosophy at Harderwick, and two years after removed to the chair of oriental languages at Utrecht. This learned and amiable man died of the smallpox at Utrecht, 5th Feb. 1718. His chief works are Palæstina Monumentis vet. Illustrata, 2 vols. 4to. ; Dissertations on the Medals of the Ancient Hebrews, 3 vols. 12mo. ; Introduction to Hebrew Grammar ; Antiquitates Sacræ Veterum Hebræorum ; de Religione Mahomedicâ, 8vo. ; de Spoliis Templi Hierosolymit. in arcu Titiano Romæ conspicuis ; Epictetus, a new edition ; Dissertationes Tredecim on some curious subjects, &c. these works are all in elegant Latin. His brother Peter collected the Fasti Consulares, 8vo.

REMBRANDT, Van Rein, a celebrated Flemish painter, son of a miller, born on the banks of the Rhine near Leyden, 1606. His education was so neglected that he scarce knew how to read, but nature supplied all the deficiencies of art, and gave him a genius with which he soared to fame, affluence, and immortality. His manner was entirely his own, and his knowledge of the chiaro oscuro was particularly correct. His chief aim was to imitate living nature, and he here succeeded to an admirable degree. He was singular in his conduct, he was fond of low company, and in his appearance was slovenly. He died at Amsterdam, 1668, or as some say 1678. When once told that his grounds were dark, he replied that he was a painter, not a dier. He engraved some pieces after his own designs, and with great judgment.

REMI or REMIGIUS, St. archbishop of Rheims, is known as the prelate who converted Clovis to Christianity and baptized him. He died before 535. The letters published under his name are spurious. Another, almoner to the emperor Lothaire, became archbishop of Lyons, 854. He presided at the council of Valencia, and was also present in other ecclesiastical synods. He died 875, author of a tract in support of St. Augustine's doctrine of predestination. Another professor in the university of Paris, author of a commentary on the Psalms, &c. He died about 993.

REMI, Joseph Honoré, a native of Remiremont, who was advocate in the parliament of Paris. He lost his eyesight at the age of eight by the smallpox, but recovered it six years after. He acquired celebrity by his learning, and was author of Cosmopolisma—Days, a burlesque, in opposition to Young's Night Thoughts—la Code des François, 2 vols. 12mo.—Eloge on the chancellor de l'Hopital, a valuable work, crowned by the French academy, though censured by the Sorbonne—cloques on Moliere, Colbert, Fenelon, besides several articles of jurisprudence in the New Encyclopaedia.

REMIGIO FLORENTINO, author of Reflections on the History of Guiciardini—of Italian poems—of translations of Corn. Nepos—of Amnians Marcellinus, and of Fazello's History of Sicily, was a learned Dominican of Florence, who died 1580, aged 62.

RENAUDOT, Eusebius, grandson of the preceding, was born at Paris, 1646. He was educated by the Jesuits, and acquired great knowledge of oriental literature. In 1700, he went with cardinal Noailles to Rome, and received from Clement XI. high marks of attention, and the priory of Fossay in Brittany. He was also honourably received by the grand duke of Tuscany, and admitted member of the Crusca academy. Some of his learned dissertations are published in the memoirs of the academy of inscriptions, of which he was a member, as also of other learned societies. He died at Paris, 1720, highly respected for his learning and piety. He prevented, says Voltaire, the publication of Bayle's dictionary in France. His works are, a Continuation of Nicole's Book on the Perpetuity of Faith, 2 vols. 4to.; Historia Patriarcharum Alexandrinorum, Jacobitarum, &c. 4to.; Relations on the Indies and China, from the Arabic; Collection of Ancient Oriental Liturgies, 2 vols. 4to.; Athanasius's Life, from the Arabic, &c.

RENELL, Thomas, a native of Chudleigh, Devon, who acquired some reputation as a limner. He was educated at Exeter, and after studying painting in London, he settled in his native county, and died at Dartmouth, 1788, aged 70. He also wrote some poetical pieces of considerable merit.

REPTON, Humphrey, an ingenious gentleman, was born at Bury St. Edmund's, in Suffolk, in 1752. He accompanied Mr. Wyndham to Ireland in 1783, and for a short time held a lucrative situation in the castle of Dublin; but when his friend quitted that kingdom, Mr. Repton also returned to England. He now directed his attention to drawing, architecture, and particularly ornamental gardening, in which last line he obtained considerable employment. He died in 1818, leaving several sons, one of whom married a daughter of lord Eldon. Mr. Repton published some books on miscellaneous subjects; but his principal works are on landscape gardening.—W. B.

RESENIUS, Peter John, counsellor and professor of moral philosophy at Copenhagen, was born there 1625. He studied at Leyden, and afterwards travelled over France, Spain, and Italy, and was made counsellor at Padua. He was, on his return home, promoted to offices of trust and honour, and ennobled. He died 1688. He published Jus. Aulicum Norvegicum, 4to.; an Icelandic Dictionary, 4to.; an edition of Edda Islandorum, Danice et Latine, 4to.; translated by Mallet in his Introduction to the History of Denmark.

RESSIUS, Rutger, a learned Greek professor of Louvaine, highly commended by Erasmus. He was born near Liege, and died 1545. He edited the Aphorisms of Hippocrates; the Laws of Plato; Theophilus's Institutions of the Greek Law, 1536.

RESTAUT, Peter, a native of Beauvais, distinguished by his learning and integrity. He became advocate in the king's council, and died at Paris, universally respected, 14th Feb. 1764, aged 70. He published Principes Generaux et Raisonnés de la Grammaire Française, 12mo. a most valuable work, and other works.

RESTOUT, John, a native of Rouen, eminent as a painter. He became painter to the king, member and president of the academy of painting, and died 1768, aged 76. His best pieces are Alpheus saved in the arms of Diana, the triumph of Bacchus, painted for the king of Prussia, and the destruction of the palace of Armida. His son John Bernard, became also known as a painter. He studied at Rome, and was member of the French academy of painting. He died 1797. His best pieces are Anacreon with a cup in his hand, Jupiter and Mercury entertained by Philemon and Baucis, &c.

RETZ, John Francis Paul de Gondy, cardinal de. Vid. GONDY.

ROUCHLIN, JOHN, a learned German, who greatly contributed to the revival of literature, born at Pforzheim, 1455. He studied at Paris and Basil, and took the degree of doctor of laws at Orleans, 1479. Both at Basil and at Orleans he acquired great reputation as a scholar, and as professor of Greek and Latin. He accompanied the count of Wirtemberg to Italy, and when he came to Rome he was persuaded by the learned of that place to alter his German name, which signifies Smoke, into the more dignified corresponding Greek word Capnion. He was afterwards sent by the court of Wirtemberg as ambassador to the emperor Frederic III. by whom he was honourably received; but after the death of his patron, he retired to Worms, till again employed in negotiations at Rome by the elector Palatine. He died at Ingoldstadt, 1522, universally respected for his learning, and regarded as the first scholar who introduced the study of the Hebrew among modern Christians. He wrote de Arte Cabalisticâ, fol. 1517, and the celebrated "Epistolæ Obscurorum Virorum," according to some authors.

REYET, Edward, a writer in the reign of Charles II. author of "Town Shifts," a comedy of some merit, and said to have been written in a fortnight.

REVELEY, Willey, an English architect of merit, who studied under Sir William Chambers. He was with the Athenian Stuart in Greece, and edited his works on the antiquities and history of that country. The new church of Southampton is a specimen of his architectural skill. He died 1799.

REUVEN, Peter, a Dutch painter, who was employed in decorating the palace of Hoo in Holland, which he executed with great taste and elegance. He died 1718, aged 68.

REY, William, a native of Guillotiere, near Lyons, eminent as a physician. He wrote Dissertations on Delirium; on the Plague; on a White Negro, &c. and died 10th Feb. 1756, aged 69.

REYHER, Samuel, a native of Schlessingen in Henneberg, professor of mathematics and jurisprudence at Kiel, and counsellor of state to the duke of Saxe Gotha. He wrote Mathesis Biblica; a Dissertation on the Inscription on the cross of Jesus Christ, and on the Hour of his Crucifixion; and translated Euclid into German. He died at Kiel, 22d Nov. 1714, aged 79.

REYLOF, Oliver, a native of Ghent, eminent as a Latin poet. He wrote Poematum Libri. 3. et Dissertationes de Piscibus; Opera Poetica, &c. and died 13th April, 1742, aged 72.

REYNA, Cassiodorus, a Spaniard, who after great labour translated the Bible into the Spanish language, 1569.

REYNEAU, Charles René, an eminent mathematician, born at Brissac in Anjou, 1650. He taught philosophy at Pezenas and Toulon, and in 1683 was promoted to the mathematical chair at Angers. He published Analysis demonstrata, 2 vols. 4to. a popular work, in which he attempted to reduce to a body the theories of Newton, Des Cartes, Leibnitz, &c. He was member of the French academy, and distinguished himself further by the publication of "Science du Calcul des Grands," 2 vols. 4to. and a Tract on Logic, 12mo. He died 1728, universally esteemed.

REYNER, Edward, author of Precepts of Christian Practice; Vindication of Human Learning and Universities, was a native of Yorkshire, and educated and graduated at Cambridge. He settled at Lincoln, 1627, but was ejected from his living for nonconformity at the restoration, and died soon after. His son John was born at Lincoln, and became fellow of Emanuel college, Cambridge. He took orders, but was deprived for nonconformity, after which he studied physic, and practised at Nottingham, where he died young. He wrote some things of considerable merit.

REYNOLDS, Edward, a native of Southampton, educated at Merton college, Oxford, and appointed rector of Braynton, Northamptonshire, and preacher of Lincoln's Inn. Though he favoured the ruling party in the civil wars, and was a member of the Westminster assembly, and one of the presbyterian ministers at the Savoy conference, yet he became bishop of Norwich, to the great offence and indignation of his dissenting brethren. He died 1676, aged 81. He was in his opinions a strong Calvinist. His works, all on theological subjects, have appeared in one fol. vol.

REYNOLDS, Sir Joshua, a celebrated painter, born 16th July, 1723, at Plympton, Devonshire, where his father, a clergyman, was master of the grammar-school. He had very early a strong partiality for painting; but being intended for the church, he was sent to Oxford, where he took the degree of bachelor of arts. Nothing, however, seemed so congenial to his taste as painting, and his father indulged him, and placed him in London under the care of Hudson, after which, about 1749, he travelled into Italy. Here he continued two years in company with Mr. afterwards lord Keppel, and after improving himself in the Italian school, and copying the best productions of Roman genius, he returned to England. His first production which attracted notice, was a portrait of his friend Keppel, and other pieces equally correct, and equally finished, continued to command the public attention, and to rank him among the greatest artists of the age. But though portrait painting was the fashion of the times, the young artist did not neglect historical subjects, but acquired from these more solid fame. On the establishment of the academy of painting, sculpture, and architecture, in 1769, none seemed more entitled to the honourable office of president than Reynolds, and he accordingly was appointed, and received the dignity of knighthood on the occasion. But not only as a painter the name of Reynolds must stand respectable, but also as a literary character, and as the active promoter of the literary club, which was established in 1764, and which had among its illustrious members the names of Johnson, Burke, Garrick, Douglas, Goldsmith, the Whartons, Windham, &c. He furnished some valuable annotations to his friend Mason, when he published, in 1782, a translation of Dufresnoy's Art of Painting; and he also contributed much to the illustrations of Shakespeare's text by his curious and original remarks. In the academic lectures which he delivered, sir Joshua displayed not only great taste and a perfect acquaintance with his profession, but strong powers of language, sound judgment, an elegant style, and luminous order. His merits did not pass unrewarded; he was created doctor of laws by the universities of Dublin and Oxford, and was honoured with the friendship of the greatest men of the age, at home and abroad. The last portrait which he painted was that of Mr. Fox, which displayed to the last period of life the strong powers of his genius and elegant taste. He resigned the chair of president of the Royal academy, and died 23d Feb. 1792, aged 69. His remains were deposited in St. Paul's cathedral, and while his obscurities were graced with the attendance of men of rank, of genius, and learning, the shops through the streets were shut up, so that the funeral of a private man engaged the attention of the public, and for a while suspended the busy concerns of the first commercial city in the world. As sir Joshua left no children, he bequeathed the best part of his property to his niece Miss Palmer, since married to lord Inchiquin, now marquis Thomond.

REYNOLDS, John, governor of Georgia, was the first who held that office after the resignation by the trustees of their charter to the king. He was an officer in the navy at the time of his appointment in 1754. In 1757, governor Ellis succeeded him, and Reynolds returned to England.  L.

REYRAC, Francis Philip de Laurens de, canon of Chancelade, minister of St. Mac-lon of Orleans, and member of the academy of inscriptions and belles lettres, was born at Longueville, Limousin, 1734, and died at Orleans, 21st Dec. 1782, aged 49. He was not only a learned, but an amiable character. He wrote an Hymn to the Sun, in poetic prose; Idylls, also in prose; Sacred poems, 8vo.; Manuale Clericorum, &c.

REYS, Antony dos, author of Latin poems; Life of Ferdinand de Menaza, in Latin; Introduction to a Collection of Portuguese Poets, and an edition of a Corpus Illustrium Poetarum Lusitanorum qui Latine scripserunt, 7 vols. 4to. was a native of Peres, and died at Lisbon, 1738, aged 48. He was chronologer of Portugal, and an ecclesiastic; but he refused to be raised to a bishopric, satisfied with retirement and privacy.

RHADAMISTUS, son of Pharamanes, king of Iberia, married Zenobia, the daughter of Mithridates, and was put to death, A.D. 52.

RHAZIS, Mohammed Ebn Zacharia Abubetrial, a learned Arabian physician, born at Rhei in Chorosana, 852. He was for some time corrector of the press to Frobenius at Basil, and thus became acquainted with Erasmus, whose life he wrote.

RHENFERD, James, a native of Mulheim, professor of oriental languages and divinity at Francker, died 1712, aged 58, author of various treatises of little merit.

RHESE, John David, a native of Anglesea, educated at Christ-church. He went in 1555 to Italy, and took there his degree of M. D. He was so conversant in the Italian language, that he was appointed moderator of the school of Pistoia. On his return home he practised physic at Brecknock, and died there, 1603, aged 75. He wrote de Italicæ Linguae Pronunciatione; Cambro-Britannicæ, Cymeræcæve Linguae Institutiones, et Erudimenta, &c.

RHETICUS, George Joachim, a German astronomer, born at Faldkirk, Tyrol. He was mathematical professor at Wittemberg, and afterwards assisted the great Copernicus in his calculations. He was afterwards professor in Poland, and at Cassaria in Hungary, where he died, 1576, aged 62. He published Narratio de Libris Revolutione Copernici, &c.

RHODIGINUS, Ludovicus Cælius, author of Antiquæ Lectiones, Basil, 1566, and other works, was born at Rovigo in the state of Venice, and died at Padua, where he taught the classics 1525, aged 75.

RHODIUS, John, author of Notes on Scribonius Largus; Three Lectures on Medical Observations; and a Treatise on Artificial Baths, was an eminent physician, born at Copenhagen. He died at Padua, 1659, aged 72.

RHODIUS, Ambrose, professor of physic and mathematics at Anglo in Norway, was a native of Wittemberg. During the civil dissensions which prevailed in Norway he was seized and cruelly sent to prison, where he died, 1633, aged 56. He was author of a Treatise on the Transmigration of the Soul, and other works.

RHODOMAN, Laurentius, author of Historiæ Sacræ, 4to.; of a Latin Translation of Diodorus Siculus; of Quintus Calaber, &c. was born at Sassoverl, Upper Saxony, and died historical professor at Wittemberg, 1606, aged 60.

RHOTENAMER, John, an eminent painter, born at Munich, 1564. He fixed his residence at Venice, and studied the manner of Tintoret. His colours are very brilliant. His best piece was the banquet of the Gods and nymphs dancing. The time of his death is unknown.

RIBADENEIRA, Peter, a Spanish Jesuit of Toledo, elegant as a writer, but superstitious in the extreme. He studied at Paris and Padua, and was professor of rhetoric at Palermo. He died at Madrid, 1611, aged 84. He was author of Lives of Saints, folio, 1616, of Ignatius Loyola, of Francis Borgia, of Lainez, and Salmeron, &c.; a Treatise on the Schism of England; the Prince; the Library of the Jesuits, 8vo. &c.

RIBERA, Anastasius Pantaleon de, the Scarron of Spain, was born at Madrid, and became in consequence of his wit a great favourite at the court of Philip IV. His poems were all on ludicrous subjects, and appeared at Madrid, 1648. A Jesuit of that name died professor at Salamanca, 1591. He wrote Commentaries on the Minor Prophets, fol.; on St. John's Gospel; the Epistle to the Hebrews; and the Apocalypse.

RICARD, John Marie, an advocate of the parliament of Paris, who died 1678, aged 56. He wrote some things on his profession.

RICARD, Dominic, a native of Toulouse who settled at Paris, where he devoted himself to literature. Between 1783 and 1796, he translated the works of Plutarch in 17 vols. 12mo. in a manner elegant, correct, and faithful, and wrote the Sphere, a poem, in eight cantos, with learned and curious notes. This benevolent ecclesiastic died at Paris, Jan. 1803, aged 63.

RICAUT, or RYCAUT, sir Paul, an English writer, the tenth son of sir Peter Ricaut, knight. He travelled over Europe, Asia, and Africa, and in 1661, accompanied lord Winchelsea, the ambassador at the Ottoman court as secretary, and while there he wrote "the Present State of the Ottoman Porte, in three books," printed 1670, folio. He was afterwards consul at Smyrna for 11 years, and during his residence there wrote the State of the Greek and Armenian Churches, published 1679. In 1685, he went with lord Clarendon, the viceroy of Ireland, as secretary for the provinces of Leinster and Connaught, and he was, in 1688, knighted by James II. and made judge of the Irish court of admiralty. He went afterwards as resident for king William in the Hanse towns, and after 10 years absence returned to England in 1700, and died that same year. He wrote besides a Continuation of Knolles's History of the Turks, fol.; a Continuation of Platina's Lives of the Popes, fol.; Vegra's Commentaries of Peru translated, fol.; the Spanish Critic, 8vo.

RICCATI, Vincent, a Jesuit, born at Castel Franco in the Trevisa. He was professor of mathematics at Bologna till the suppression of his order, after which he retired to his native town, where he died 1775, aged 65. He wrote some mathematical works, the best known of which is his treatise on the Integral Calculus, 3 vols. 4to. &c.

Ricci, Matthew, a Jesuit, born at Macerata, 1552. He went to India, and after finishing his studies at Goa, he was sent as missionary to China. With difficulty he reached Peking, where his mathematical knowledge recommended him to the notice of the emperor, for whom he formed a geographical map, in which out of flattery he placed China in the middle of the earth. He conducted himself with such address that he obtained leave to build a church at Peking. He died there 1610, aged 58. He wrote Lettres Edifiantes; Memoirs of China, &c.

Ricci, Michael Angelo, a cardinal, born at Rome. He was an able mathematician, and was patronised by Innocent II. who raised him to the purple 1681. His treatise de Maximis et Minimis, is a valuable performance. He died 21st May, 1652, aged 63.

Ricci, Lawrence, a native of Florence, of illustrious birth. He embraced the order of the Jesuits, which was suppressed while he was general. He was imprisoned in the castle of St. Angelo by pope Clement XIV. and obliged to write a circular letter to his order to announce their final suppression. He died in his confinement, 24th Nov. 1775, aged 72. He wrote a memoir which appeared after his death, in which he protested against the violence offered to the Jesuits, and declared that they had committed nothing which deserved such harsh treatment.

Ricci, Sebastian, an Italian painter, born at Belluno near Venice. He distinguished himself greatly by his pieces, and was received with much applause in Germany, France, and England. He died at Venice 1734. His nephew Mark was eminent also as a landscape and historical painter, and died 1730.

Riccio, Dominic, an eminent painter, born at Verona. The gathering of the Manna forms the subject of one of his admired pieces in the church of Verona. He died 1517, aged 23.

Riccioli, John Baptista, an Italian astronomer, born at Ferrara, and educated among the Jesuits, of whose society he became a member. He taught rhetoric, philosophy, &c. at Parma and Bononia, but chiefly devoted himself to mathematics and astronomy, and died 1671, aged 73. His best known works are, Geographiæ, and Hydrographiæ, lib. 12, 1672; Chronologia Reformata, fol; Astronomia Vetus, 2 vols. fol.; Astronomia Reformata, fol.

Riccoboni, Lewis, a native of Modena, who distinguished himself on the Italian theatre, and in 1716, came to France with his wife and his son, where he acquired equal celebrity. He abandoned the stage in 1729, in consequence of religious scruples, and died 1753, aged 79. He wrote several comedies, some of which were received with great applause, Thoughts on Declamation; Discourse on the Reformation of the Theatre, 12mo.; Observations on Comedy, and on Moliere's Genius; History of the Italian Theatre, 8vo.; Reflections on the Theatres of Europe, 8vo. His second wife Mary Laboras de Mezieres was a native of Paris, who acquired reputation as an actress in the Italian theatre.

which she quitted 1761. She was a woman of great sensibility, elegant taste, and vast information. She wrote several romances, which possess merit, besides letters and other miscellanies. She died in great distress 6th Dec. 1792, aged 68. His son Antony Francis, by his first wife, was born at Mantua. He was on the stage in the Italian theatre at Paris, from 1726 to 1750, and played with success. He wrote some pieces, some of which are still in MS. but his Art du Theatre in Svo. 1750, possesses great merit, and is still read with satisfaction. He died 15th May, 1772, aged 65.

RICHARD I. king of England, surnamed Cœur de Lion, succeeded his father, Henry II. 1189. The beginning of his reign was disgraced by the massacre of the Jews, and by the plunder of their property, not only in London, where their appearance at the coronation had excited the indignation of the populace, but at York, and other places. In 1190, Richard, instead of establishing order and tranquillity in his dominions, set sail with Philip Augustus of France for the Holy Land. Though, however, dissension between these monarchs partly defeated the purpose of the enterprise, and caused the return of Philip to France, Richard led his army against the infidels, defeated Saladin in a battle at Casarea, and then concluding a truce with him, embarked for Europe. In his return he was shipwrecked on the Venetian shores, and as he passed in disguise through Germany, he was seized by Leopold, duke of Austria, and delivered to the emperor Henry VI. and cruelly doomed to the horrors of captivity. His retreat was discovered by the fidelity of his friend Blondel, and by the eager loyalty of his subjects, and for a large ransom, he was restored to liberty, and landed at Sandwich 1194. To give greater dignity to his return, he was crowned a second time, and soon after marched against Philip Augustus, who had not only excited John against his absent brother, but had seized part of his continental dominions in Normandy. Though a peace was made in 1196, Richard three years after renewed the war, and while besieging Chalus, in the Limousin, he received a mortal wound from an arrow. He died 6th April, 1199, aged 42. Though he pardoned the man who had shot him, his generals after his death ordered the unhappy wretch to be flayed alive. Though brave, Richard was haughty and avaricious, and it was said of him that he would have sold even London if he could have found a purchaser.

RICHARD II. son of Edward, prince of Wales, succeeded his grandfather, Edward III. on the English throne, 1377. The severity of some taxes imposed by the parliament, raised discontent among the people, and an armed multitude, headed by Wat Tyler, appeared in Smithfield in defiance of the government. Richard, though but 15, boldly rode up to meet the insurgents, and when the lord mayor, Walworth, who attended him, had with the blow of his mace struck dead the chief of the rebels, the young king called out to the multitude, who prepared by acts of violence to avenge the death of their leader, "what, my lieges, will you kill your king, follow me, I will be your leader." The appeal was successful, and the people returned to their duty; but though their grievances were redressed, after the punishment of a few violent leaders, still by degrees acts of oppression were permitted to prevail. Afterwards Richard made war against France and Scotland, but his administration revolted some of the nobles, and at last Henry, duke of Lancaster, his cousin, offended with the tyranny of his conduct, took up arms against him. The king, abandoned by his subjects, threw himself on the mercy of his victorious enemy, and begged only for life and a pension. He was afterwards deposed by the parliament, and on the breaking out of an insurrection in his favour, eight murderers entered his apartments at Pontefract castle, determined to take away his life. The unhappy man wrested a battle-axe from one of the assassins, and after laying four dead at his feet, perished by the repeated blows of the others 1400.

RICHARD III. duke of Gloucester, and brother of Edward IV. was a monster of iniquity. He caused his infant nephews, Edward V. and Richard, duke of York, to be murdered in the Tower, and then procured his own nomination to the crown, 1483. Soon after he had to defend himself against Buckingham, who had supported him in his crimes; but he triumphed, and beheaded his enemy. He was less fortunate against Henry, earl of Richmond, who had invaded the kingdom. The rival armies met in Bosworth field, and after performing prodigies of valour, Richard fell, covered with wounds, and left his victorious antagonist in possession of the throne, 22d Aug. 1485. This worthless monarch was said to have been deformed from his birth, but some modern historians deny the fact. Though a tyrant and a hypocrite he possessed great courage, and for firmness of mind had few equals.

RICHARD I. surnamed the Fearless, succeeded his father William as duke of Normandy, 942. His territories were invaded by Louis IV. of France, and by Otho of Germany; but his rights were defended by the valour of his subjects, and the aid of the king of Denmark and the count of Paris. He died at Fecamp, 996, aged 64.

RICHARD II. surnamed the Good, succeeded his father Richard I. as duke of Normandy. He was much engaged in war with his neighbours, and died 1027.

RICHARD, Thomas, a Benedictine monk in the abbey of Tavistock, who translated into English verse the five books of Boethius's Consolations of Philosophy. This work was printed in Tavistock abbey, 1525.

RICHARD, Martin, a native of Antwerp, born with only a left arm. Though thus helpless by nature, he became a painter of eminence, and produced pieces which merited the high praises of Vandyke. He died 1636, aged 45. His brother David, though an inferior artist, possessed merit as a painter.

RICHARD DE ST. VICTOR, a Scotchman, who was prior of St. Victor's monastery at Paris, where he died 1173. He wrote several tracts on Theology, collected together in 2 vols. fol. Rouen, 1650.

RICHARD, N. a native of Dundalk, in Ireland, who studied at Oxford, and became archbishop of Armagh, 1347. He died universally respected, 1359. He wrote sermons, besides tracts, &c.

RICHARD, John, an ecclesiastic, born at Paris. He died there 1586, aged 65. He wrote some theological works, &c.

RICHARD, René, a French ecclesiastic, of the congregation of the oratory. He died 21st Aug. 1727, aged 73, dean of St. Opportune, at Paris. He wrote a parallel between Cardinals Richelieu and Mazarin—Christian Maxims, &c.

RICHARD, Charles Louis, a Benedictine, born at Blainville, in Lorraine, 1711. He wrote sermons, 4 vols.—Dictionary of Ecclesiastical Knowledge, six vols. fol.—Analysis of General Councils, 5 vols. 4to. &c. and died at the close of the 18th century.

RICHARDS, Nathaniel, a dramatic writer in the reign of Charles I. He was educated at Caius college, Cambridge, where he took his bachelor's degree, 1634. His poems, sacred and satirical, including Mesalina, a tragedy, &c. appeared 1645.

RICHARDS, James, missionary in Ceylon, was born at Abington, Massachusetts, February 23d, 1784, and graduated at William's college in 1809. He studied theology at the seminary at Andover, Massachusetts, and medicine at the medical school in Philadelphia. He was one of the mission sent by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions to Ceylon, and embarked for that island in October, 1815. Soon after his arrival there he was seized with a pulmonary complaint, which suspended his labours as a missionary, and at length terminated in his death on the 3d of August, 1822.

RICHARDSON, John, a native of Cheshire, educated at Oxford, and afterwards incorporated at Dublin. He became bishop of Ardagh, in Ireland; but left the country during the rebellion, and came to London. He died 1654. He is author of Observations on Ezekiel, &c. fol.

RICHARDSON, Jonathan, an English portrait painter, born about 1665. He was originally apprenticed to a scrivener, but afterwards became the pupil of Riley, whose niece he married. He acquired reputation and independence, though some speak of the merits of his pencil with indifference, and died May 25th, 1745. He published, in 1719, an Essay on the whole Art of Criticism, as it relates to painting, and an account of some statues, bas-reliefs, &c. in which he was assisted by his son. These united labours afterwards produced notes and remarks on Milton's Paradise Lost. As the father had observed, that in classical literature he had looked at it through his son, the sportive pencil of Hogarth represented him as peeping at a Virgil on a shelf, through a telescope, with which his son was perforated.

RICHARDSON, Joseph, a native of Hexham, Northumberland, who entered at St. John's college, Cambridge, in 1774, and afterwards studied the law at the Middle Temple, and was called to the bar. He wrote Criticisms on the Rolliad and Probationary Odes, for the Laureatship, in which he censured with broad satire the great public characters of the times—the Fugitive, a comedy, performed with some applause, &c. He was for some time in parliament, on the interest of the duke of Northumberland; but did not distinguish himself as an orator, either at the bar, or in the house of commons. He died 1803.

RICHARDSON, Samuel, an eminent novel writer, son of a farmer in Derbyshire, and born 1689. His education was very confined; but though he imbibed in his youth no knowledge of the learned languages, his natural good sense and reflection supplied all deficiencies of art. In 1706 he was bound apprentice to Mr. Wilde, of Stationers' hall, and afterwards he worked as compositor, and corrector of the press, till, on taking his freedom, he hired a house in one of the courts of Fleet-street, from which he removed to Salisbury-square. He was in 1723 engaged with the duke of Wharton in the publication of the True Briton; but as the work was violently severe against the government, he stopped at the sixth number. He next was concerned with the Daily Journal, and afterwards with the Daily Gazetteer, and at last, by the friendship of Onslow, the speaker, he obtained the lucrative office of printer of the Journals of the house of commons. In 1754 he was elected master of the company of Stationers, and in 1760 he purchased a moiety of the patent of law printer to the king, which he conducted with Miss Lin-tot, afterwards the wife of sir H. Fletcher. In 1740 he appeared before the public as the author of Pamela, or Virtue Rewarded, a novel, which was universally read, and universally approved; and afterwards he produced Clarissa Harlowe, and then Sir Charles Grandison. Of these two last performances, the former is regarded by the generality of critics as superior to the other; but in all his works the author has presented to his reader a most interesting and accurate picture of human nature. His wish was to benefit mankind, and with all the treasures of a benevolent heart, he drew scenes which gave virtue the noblest of her attractions, and vice the most horrid and disgusting of its deformities. These works were particularly popular, and the author was every where regarded as a man of the most virtuous sentiments, of the most amiable modesty, and possessed of the most dignified powers of the imagination. By the creative faculties of his mind Richardson thus raised himself to celebrity and opulence; but his elevation was still adorned by all the humble virtues which rejoice in the opportunity of doing good, and of disseminating blessings wherever human nature is capable of improvement. Richardson generally retired from his town house on the Saturday, to his villa at North End, Hammersmith, and afterwards to Parsons' Green, where he resided till the Monday, and was visited by persons of rank, literary fame, and splendid talents. Sedulous in business, he acquired property and independence; but in the midst of the consequence of wealth, and the flattery of admiring friends, he was the kind master and the hospitable friend, and never forgot to add exemplary conduct to religious appearances, and sincere devotion to pious exhortations. This worthy and amiable man, who was honoured with the friendship or favourable good opinion of every person of talents, of virtue, and of rank, in his time, was afflicted in the last part of life with a paralytic disorder, which proved fatal, 4th July, 1761, in his 72d year. He was buried by the side of his first wife, in St. Bride's church. He was twice married; by his first wife, daughter of Mr. Wilde, printer, he had five sons and one daughter, who all died young, and by the second, who survived him, daughter of Mr. Leake, bookseller of Bath, he had a son and five daughters, of whom only four daughters survived him. Besides his excellent novels, he published a volume of familiar letters, for the use of young people—Æsop's Fables, with reflections—a paper, No. 97, in the Rambler—Negotiation of sir Thomas Roe, ambassador to the Porte, &c. A well-written account of his life has appeared in 1804, by Mrs. Barbauld, prefixed to an edition of his Corres- pondence with Eminent Persons, a publication which, while it sets the character of Richardson in an amiable light, shows that his correspondents sought to gain his good opinion by the incense of flattery, of praise, and adulation.

RICHARDSON, William, a native of Scotland, who became a student of the university of Glasgow in 1758. On completing his education, and taking his master's degree, he was appointed tutor to a nobleman, whom he accompanied to Russia. After his return he was elected professor of humanity, or classical literature, at Glasgow, which chair he filled with reputation above forty years. He died in 1814. Mr. Richardson published "Essays on the Dramatic Characters of Shakspeare," and some other works.—W. B.

RICHELET, Cæsar Peter, a French writer, born at Chemnon, in Champagne. He was the author of a useful dictionary of the French language, full, however, of satirical reflections and obscenities, in 4to. Geneva, afterwards enlarged to two volumes folio, 1721, Lyons, and again 3 vols. fol. Lyons, 1755. He also translated Vega's Conquest of Florida, and wrote a dictionary of Rhymes, and other critical works. He died 1698.

RICHELIEU, Armand du Plessis de, a celebrated statesman in France, born of noble parentage at the castle of Richelieu, 5th September, 1585. He studied at the Sorbonne, and at Rome, and in 1607 was made bishop of Lucon. On his return to Paris, he became the favourite of Mary de Medicis, to whom he was appointed almoner, and he soon was made secretary of state. The death of marshal d'Ancre, however, his friend and protector, checked his ambition, and he retired with the queen mother to Blois; but soon again to be restored to favour. By intrigue he effected a reconciliation between the queen and her son Lewis XIII. and in 1624 he was placed in the difficult office of prime minister of France, and afterwards of superintendent of navigation and commerce. Naturally bold, and fond of war, the new minister, who had been raised to the dignity of cardinal, determined to reduce Rochelle, whose protection of the protestants was offensive to the nation, and whose independence and naval power seemed a disgrace to the greatness of France. After a vigorous siege, during a year, Rochelle opened her gates to the conqueror, 28th Oct. 1628, and proud of his conquest, the minister advanced to the subjugation of the protestants in other parts of the kingdom. He next attacked Savoy, and after taking Pignerol and Casal, he returned to Paris, to conquer the intrigues of his enemies, and to restore himself to the undisputed favour of the king. By his power, Gaston, the king's brother, was banished, and Mary de Medicis, the queen, to whom he owed his elevation, was sent to end her life in melancholy exile at Cologne, and while all France was submissively obedient to his nod, the neighbouring kingdoms were, by his intrigues, torn by dissensions, secretly agitated by fears, or openly threatened by insurrections. Yet while engaged in establishing his own power, he did not forget to consolidate the prosperity of the people; and while he persecuted, and cruelly punished his enemies and his rivals, he did not neglect the glory of France. He erected the French academy, rebuilt the Sorbourn, founded the royal printing-house, and established the botanical garden, with a munificence worthy not merely the minister, but the monarch of a great kingdom. He was liberal in his patronage to men of letters; but as he had a poetical turn, he was unfortunately jealous of the celebrity of the Cid of Corneille, and employed some of the literary hirelings of the court to depreciate the merits of the immortal bard. He died 4th December, 1642, aged 58. In his character Richelieu united all the abilities, and the ambition of a great man; but little of the virtues of a good man; and while he patronised the arts and sciences, and extended protection to literature and industry, it might proceed not from the motives of a generous mind, but the ostentatious wish of being surrounded by men whose works and gratitude can confer immortality. Besides the dignity of cardinal conferred on him by Gregory XV. he was created duke and peer of France, and enjoyed all the favours which the partiality of the king, and the adulation of the nation could bestow on him. He wrote Political Testament, 2 volumes 8vo.—Methods of Controversies concerning Points of Faith—Defence of the Catholic Faith—Christian Instruction—Perfection of a Christian—a Curious Journal—letters, relations, &c. His life has been written by J. Le Clerc, 5 vols. 12mo. 1753.

RICHER, Edmund, a native of Chaource, in Langres. He possessed great powers of mind, and a lively imagination, and he embraced with unusual ardour, the party of the League, whose conduct he ably defended with his pen. He took his degrees in theology at Paris, and in 1611, wrote against the Dominicans, and asserted the superiority of general councils over the pope. This drew upon him the censures of the pope's legate, though he was defended by the parliament of Paris, and at last he was dismissed from the office of syndic in the university, and afterwards imprisoned, and obliged by the virulence of his enemies, to make a public recantation of his opinions. These proceedings injured his constitution, and hastened his death, which happened 25th November, 1631, aged 72. His other works are Vindiciæ Doctrinæ Majorum de Auctoritate Ecclesiæ in Rebus Fidei et Morum, 4to.; de Potestate Ecclesiæ in Rebus Temporalibus, 4to.; History of General Councils, 3 vols. 4to.; Obstetrix Animorum, 4to. &c.

RICHER, John, a bookseller of Paris, who died 1665. He is known as the first compiler of the Mercurie François.

RICHER, Henry, a native of Lougueil, in Caux. He was intended for the law; but he preferred literature, and settled at Paris, where he died, 12th March, 1748, aged 63. He translated into verse Virgil's Eclagues; a Collection of Fables; Life of Mæcenas, with notes; Sabinus and Coriolanus, two tragedies.

RICHER D'AUBE, Francis, a native of Rouen, author of an Essay on the Principles of Right and Morals, 4to. He died at Paris, Oct. 1752, aged 63.

RICHER, N. a French philosopher, who first observed the shortening of the pendulum, while at Cayenne, 1672. This singular discovery, in the hands of Newton and Huygens, led to the most astonishing truths.

RICIMER, a Roman patrician, who acquired such power as a general, that he put down the emperors, and introduced revolutions into the state, as he pleased. He put to death Majorian, and raised to the throne in his room, Libius Severus, 461, and he afterwards bravely repelled the Vandals of Africa, who attacked the dominions of his master. After the death of Severus, Anthemius was made emperor, and Ricimer married his daughter, but soon after dethroned him.

RICIUS, Paul, a converted Jew, professor of philosophy at Pavia. He was afterwards physician to the emperor Maximilian, and was highly esteemed by Erasmus, and other learned men. He had a controversy with Eccius, and supported that the celestial bodies are animated. His works are, De Cœlesti Agricultura, fol.; Talmudica Commentariola, 4to.; De LXXIII. Mosaicæ Sanctionis Edictis, 4to.

RICOBONI, Antony, a learned native of Rovigo. He was professor of eloquence at Padua, and died there, 1599, aged 58. He wrote in elegant Latin, Historical Commentaries; Treatise on Rhetoric, 8vo.; History of Padua University; Commentaries on Aristotle's and Cicero's Works, &c.

RIDER, William, author of a History of England; a Commentary on the Bible; and other popular works, was lecturer of St. Vedast, Fosterlane, and for several years under-master of St. Paul's school. He died 1785.

RIDGELY, Thomas, a dissenting divine, born in London, 1670. He was for seven-ral years minister of a congregation near Blackfriars, and afterwards kept an academy, near Aldermanbury. He died in Moorfields, 1737. He wrote a Commentary on the Assembly's larger Catechism, 2 vols. folio.

RIDLEY, Nicolas, an eminent bishop and martyr, born of an ancient family in Tyndale, Northumberland, 1500. He was educated at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and Pembroke-hall, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. His abilities were such that he was invited to University college, Oxford, but declined the liberal offer, and went for three years to travel on the continent. On his return to Cambridge, he distinguished himself by his application, and by his zeal in favour of the reformation. By the friendship of his patron Cranmer, he obtained the vicarage of Herne, in Kent, and afterwards was chosen master of Pembroke-hall, and nominated chaplain to the king. During the royal visitation in the north of the kingdom, he attended the visitors and preached to the people, and explained with eloquence and ability the true principles of religion. In 1547 he was appointed bishop of Rochester, and three years after, on Bonner's expulsion from the see of London, he was placed in his room, where he behaved with tenderness and affectionate attention to the mother and relatives of his predecessor. He was very instrumental in settling the articles of religion, the liturgy, and the homilies, and by his influence with the king he procured the establishment of those noble foundations, Christ's hospital, St. Thomas's, Southwark, St. Bartholomew's, and Bridewell. The share which he bore in the labours of the reformation, marked him as an object of hatred under Mary, and particularly the zeal with which he embraced the cause of the unfortunate Jane Grey. He was ordered to dispute on theological subjects at Oxford with some popish bishops; and when he refused to recant the principles which he had advanced, he was cruelly sentenced to the stake. He suffered this inhuman treatment with great resignation, and was burnt near the corner of Baliol college, with his friend, the venerable Latimer, 1555. He was author of a treatise against transubstantiation, and some of his letters and sermons were afterwards published. An interesting account of his life and labours was published by his descendant, Gloster Ridley.

RIDLEY, Thomas, a native of Ely, of the same family as the preceding. He received his education at Eton, and King's college, Cambridge, and then applied himself to the study of the civil law. His abilities recommended him to the court; he was knighted, made master in chancery, and afterwards vicar general to the archbishop of Canterbury. He was author of a View of the Civil and Ecclesiastical Law, and died 1626.

RIDLEY, Gloster, an eminent divine, born at sea in 1702, in the Gloster Indian, from which circumstance he received his Christian name. He was educated at Winchester school, and became fellow of New college, Oxford, where he took the degree of B.C.L. 1789. He had a great partiality for the stage in his younger years, and wrote, with some friends, a tragedy, in four acts, and to this partiality may be attributed the eloquence and graceful delivery which he displayed in the pulpit. He obtained the living of Westow, Norfolk, and the donative of Poplar, in Middlesex; and after some years spent in the peaceful obscurity of a country curacy, he was at last, in 1768, in consequence of his able labours, presented to a golden prebend in Salisbury, by archbishop Secker, who also conferred on him the degree of LL.D. He died 3d Nov. 1774, and had his virtues recorded in an epitaph by the learned Dr. Lowth. He left a widow and four daughters. He had lost two sons early; one, Thomas, by the smallpox, at Madras, and James, the other, when he began to distinguish himself as an author. He published the Life of bishop Ridley, from whom he was descended—Sermons at Lady Moyer's Lectures—Melampus, a poem—two tragedies, never printed—Review of Philips's Life of cardinal Pole—Psyche, a poem, &c.—His son James was author of the Tales of the Genii, 2 vols. a book much admired—James Lovegrove, a novel, &c. He was minister of Romford, Essex, and had been educated at Winchester and New college, Oxford.

RIDOLFI, Claudio, a painter of Verona, whose historical pieces and portraits were much admired. He died 1644, aged 84.

RIDPATH, George, a native of Stirling-shire, educated at Edinburgh. For his attachment to Protestantism, and for boldly opposing the second James in his religious innovations, he fled from Scotland; but afterwards returned at the revolution, and was one of the clerks of session. He died 1717, aged 54. He translated Craig's Scotland's Sovereignty.

RIEDEL, John Herman, baron de, a learned German, author of Travels in Greece. He was in the service of the Prussian court, and resided as ambassador at Vienna, where he died 1785, aged 45.

RIEGLES, M. a native of Denmark, who published a valuable history of his country. He was governor of the king's pages at Copenhagen, and died 1802, aged 74.

RIELEY, Henry, author of the "Anatomy of the Brain, &c." published 1695, was fellow of the college of physicians.

RIENZI, Nicolas Gabrini de. a remarkable character in the 14th century, who, though but the son of a miller, or a common vintner at Rome, raised himself to the sovereign power. By education and labour he polished and improved a mind naturally strong, fervent, and ambitious, and in reading the historians of ancient Rome, he flattered himself that he should one day restore the glories and the liberties of his country. By his assiduity and demeanour he became so popular, that he was one of the deputies sent to Avignon, to solicit pope Clement VI. to come and fix his residence at Rome; and though the embassy did not succeed, Rienzi had the satisfaction of gaining the pontiff's favour and protection. He returned to Rome as apostolic notary, and by degrees gained to his party the common people of Rome, and many of the nobles. Inveighing with bitterness against the debaucheries of the great, and painting in the most striking colours, the ancient glories and the present decay of Rome, he persuaded his friends and followers that he was able to restore their country to its former dignity. Surrounded by those who were necessary to his views, he ascended the capitol, and after haranguing the people with the permission of the papal vicar, he raised up the ensigns of liberty, and promised to the Romans that he would reward their obedience to the laws by the grandeur and the powerful influence of their forefathers. Declared sovereign of Rome, he had the address to obtain the pope's approbation to his measures, and to conciliate his protection; but though he for a while commanded the respect of the Romans, envy attended him, and enemies arose determined to effect his downfall. While he reprobated the conduct of the nobles, he himself was guilty of excesses, and the obscure plebeian, raised to sovereignty, not only feasted with all the luxury of the monarch, but acted frequently in a capricious and oppressive manner. After enjoying absolute power for six months, under the title of tribune of Rome, he was forced to fly by the nobles, and being seized by his enemies, was sent to the pope at Avignon, and thrown into a dungeon. Innocent VI. the successor of Clement, knew, however, the influence of his prisoner, and he drew him from his confinement, where he had pined away three years, and sent him to Rome with the title of governor and senator, hoping that by his gratitude he might defeat the schemes and insurrections of those petty tyrants who harassed and distracted the state. Rienzi again raised himself, over the opposition of his enemies, to power; but success again made him violent and resentful, and four months after his second elevation, during a tumult excited by some conspirators, a dagger was aimed at his heart, which deprived him of life, 8th Oct. 1354. Such was the tragical end of this ambitious demagogue, who, by his abilities, for a while restored plenty, justice, and liberty to the degenerate Romans, and not only filled all Europe with the fame of his wisdom and exploits, but commanded the respect and submission of foreign potentates. Petrarch, who witnessed his elevation, speaks with raptures of his conduct, and recalling to mind the splendid achievements of Rome, compares him to the immortal Brutus.

RIGALTUS, Nicolas, an ingenious Frenchman, born at Paris, 1577. He was brought up by the Jesuits, and applied himself to the law, which, however, he soon relinquished for polite literature. He soon recommended himself to the notice of the learned, particularly Thuanus, and he was appointed king's librarian after the departure of Isaac Casaubon to reside in England. He was also made by the king procurer general of the court of Nancy, and counsellor of the parliament of Metz. He died 1654. His works are, excellent editions of Cyprian, Tertullian, and Minutius Felix, with valuable notes—Continuation of Thuanus's History—de Verbis in Novellis Constitutionibus post Justinianum Glossarium, 4to. Diatribes de Juvenalis Satiria—Fusus Parasyticum—Auctores Finium Regundorum—de Modo Fœnori Proposito, &c.

RIGAUD, Hyacinth, a painter, born at Perpignan, 1663, and called for his excellence the French Vandyke. He was ennobled by his countrymen, and also by Lewis XV. and made director of the academy of painting. His draperies were much admired. He died 1743.

RILEY, John, a London painter, who after the death of sir Peter Lely, acquired high reputation and much opulence for his portraits. He died 1691, aged 45.

RIMINALDI, Orazio, a native of Pisa, eminent as an historical painter. He died 1638, aged 40.

RINCON, Antonio del, a Spanish painter, born at Guadalaxara. His pieces are much admired in Spain. He died 1500.

RINUCCINI, Octavio, an Italian poet, born at Florence. He went to France in the retinue of Mary de Medicis, and was said to be the inventor of the opera, which, however, some attribute to Emilio del Cavabero of Rome. His poetry as well as his operas are highly and deservedly admired. He died 1621, at Florence, where his works were published.

RIOIAN, John, a physician at Paris, born at Amiens. He defended the doctrine of Hippocrates against the modern chymists, and wrote various works on anatomy and medicine, printed together, Paris, 1610, fol. He was a man of great erudition, and died 18th Oct. 1605. His son John was also a physician of eminence, and professor of anatomy and botany. He wrote Comparatio Veteris Medicinæ cum Nova, 12mo.—Schola Anatomica, 8vo. reprinted in folio with additions—Gigantomachia, 8vo. in consequence of the pretended discovery of the skeleton of a giant—Gigantologia, 8vo.

RIPLEY, George, an English mathematician, canon of Bridlington, Yorkshire, and author of Compound of Alchymy, &c.—Aurum Potabile, or the Universal Medicine. He died 1490.

RIPPERDA, John William, baron de, a native of Groningen, of illustrious family, who, after serving the States General as colonel of infantry, was sent as ambassador to Spain. His conduct was so pleasing to Philip V. that he settled at Madrid, and was employed on affairs of importance, and was created a duke and peer of the kingdom, and intrusted with the departments of marine, war, and finance. These offices were too high for his abilities, and he was disgraced, and afterwards sent to the prison of Segovia; but he escaped to Portugal, and after passing through England, he landed in Holland, where he was persuaded by the ambassador of Morocco to go and settle in Africa. At Morocco he became a great favourite with the emperor, and professed the religion of Mahomet. To render himself still more popular, and to acquire authority, he pretended to establish a religion which embraced all the tenets of the Christian, Judaic, and Mahometan doctrines; but these measures at last created him enemies, and he fled from Morocco to Tetuan, where he died Nov. 1747. His two sons were drowned in coming from Spain to England.

RISBECK, Gaspard, a German writer, born near Mayence. An ardent imagination and the love of independence hurried him into extravagance, and at last, while he despised all political and civil employments, he found himself poor and without resources. He then entered into the service of a bookseller, and afterwards travelled, and then settled at Zurich, and next at Arau, where he died 3d Feb. 1786, aged 36, a victim to melancholy and affected misanthropy. He wrote Travels through Germany—and a History of Germany.

RISDON, Tristram, author of a History of Devonshire, which has been published in a mutilated form, 1714, 2 vols. 8vo. was a native of Winscott, Devon. and was educated at Oxford. He died at Winscott, 1640, aged 60. The topographical part of his history was edited separately, 1735, 4to.

RISLEY, Thomas, a puritan divine. He was born near Warrington, Lancashire, and became fellow of Pembroke college, Oxford, but in 1662 he was ejected for non-conformity. He then became preacher to a dissenting congregation, and died 1716, aged 86. He wrote a treatise on Family Religion, 8vo. &c.

RITSON, Joseph, a native of Stockton on Tees, who became a conveyancer in Gray's inn, and afterwards purchased the office of high bailiff of the Savoy in 1785. He studied antiquities, and published observations on Shakspeare's editions by Johnson and Stevens, Criticisms on Malone's edition; Descent of the English Crown; Observations on Warton's History of English Poetry; English Anthology; Collection of English Songs, 3 vols.; and of Scotch Songs, 2 vols.; Bibliographia Poetica; Metrical Romances, 3 vols.; Treatise on Abstinence from Animal Food, &c. Though a man of learning and information, he adopted a most singular and capricious form of Orthography, and in his temper was violent and overbearing. He died 1803, aged 51.

RITTENHOUSE, David, a native of Philadelphia, who, from a clock-maker, became an eminent astronomer. He pursued his astronomical studies while engaged in the business of his farm; but was so respectable a philosopher, that he succeeded Franklin as president of the American philosophical society. He made observations on the transit of Venus over the sun's disc in 1769, with great accuracy, at the request of the American philosophers, and deserved the esteem of the learned of both continents. He died 1796, aged 64. Several of his communications appear in the American transactions.

This eminent mathematician was born at Germantown, Pennsylvania, April 8th, 1732. His ancestors were emigrants from Holland. He was employed during the early part of his life in agriculture, and occupied himself habitually at that period with mathematical studies. While residing with his father he made himself master of Newton's Principia, by an English translation, and also discovered the science of fluxions, of which he for a long time supposed himself to be the first inventor. His constitution being too feeble for an agricultural life, he became a clock and mathematical instrument-maker, and without the aid of an instructor, produced work superior to that of the foreign artists. He also contrived and erected an orrery, much more complete than any which had been before constructed. In 1770 he removed to Philadelphia, and employed himself in his trade. He was elected a member of the philosophical society of that city, and one of the number appointed to observe the transit of Venus in 1769, an account of which he communicated to the society. His excitement was so great on perceiving the contact of the planet with the sun, at the moment predicted, that he fainted. He was one of the commissioners employed to determine the boundary line between Pennsylvania and Virginia, and between New York and Massachusetts. He held the office of treasurer of Pennsylvania from 1777 to 1789. In 1791 he was chosen president of the philosophical society, and held the place till his death. He was also in 1792 appointed director of the United States mint, and continued in the office till 1795, when ill health induced him to resign. His mathematical talents were of the highest order; and had it been his lot to have had the advantages of education which the great European mathematicians enjoyed, he would undoubtedly have been excelled by none of them in the extent of his discoveries, and lustre of his fame. ☞ L.

RITTERSHUSIUS, Conradus, a learned civilian, born at Brunswick, Sept. 25th, 1560. He studied at Helmstadt, and afterwards became professor of law at Altorf, where he continued to reside till his death, 1613, though he had the most liberal invitations from German and Dutch universities. He edited Oppian's Cynegeticon, and some other works. His son George wrote the life of his father, and his son Nicolas was afterwards professor of law at Altorf, and published Genealogiæ Imperatorum, Regum, Ducum, Comitum, &c. 7 vols folio. He died 1670.

RIVALZ, Anthony, a native of Toulouse. He studied painting under his father, and afterwards improved himself at Rome, and obtained a prize from St. Luke's academy. His portraits and historical pieces were much admired. He died 1735, aged 68.

RIVARD, Francis, a native of Neufchateau, in Lorraine, eminently known as a mathematical professor at Beauvais. He published several valuable treatises on geometry, &c. and died at Paris, 5th April, 1778, aged 81.—Another of his name, Denis, was an eminent surgeon at Neufchateau, and very skilful in cutting for the stone. He died 17th March, 1746.

RIVAROL, Anthony de, a French writer, born at Bagnols, in Languedoc, 17th April, 1757. He settled at Paris, and became the friend of the learned, of Voltaire, d'Alembert, and Buffon. He married early an English woman, but this union was unfortunate. On the breaking out of the revolution he retired to Germany, and lived for some time at Hamburgh and at Berlin, where he was honoured by the notice of the royal family, and where he died 11th April, 1801. He was a man of great information and some genius. He published the Universality of the French Language, which obtained the prize of the Berlin academy, 1784; Hell, translated from Dante; Letters on Religion and Morality; a little Almanac of great Men, a satire; Letters to the French Nobility, 1792, 8vo.; La Fayette's Political Life; Prospectus of a New Dictionary of the French Language; a Discourse on the Intellectual and Moral Facul- ties of Man, 4to.; poems. His life was published in 1802, 2 vols. 12mo.

RIVET DE LA GRANGE, Anthony, a learned Benedictine of Poitou. His History of France, 9 vols. 4to. employed 30 years of his life in the composition. He died 1749, aged 66.

RIVIERE, Henry Francis de la, a native of Paris, who embraced the profession of arms, and afterwards privately married the daughter of the count of Bussi-Rabutin, who was widow of the marquis of Coligni. This union was displeasing to her father, and produced not only a paper war, but a law-suit; but though the rights of the husband were established, the fickle fair refused to live with him. In consequence of this he retired to the seclusion of a monastic life in the oratory at Paris, where he died 1743, aged 94. He was author of Letters, 2 vols. 12mo. &c. His wife wrote also some letters, &c. which possess elegance of diction and interest.

RIVINUS, Andrew, a native of Halle, in Saxony, whose real name was Barchmann. He was a physician, and became professor of poetry and philosophy at Leipsic, and died 4th April, 1656, aged 56. His works are, Remarks on Ancient Christian Poets; Dissertations on Literary subjects, published under the title of Philo-Physiologica, 4to.; Veterum Scriptorum de Medicinâ Collectanea, 8vo.; Mysteria Medico-Physica, 12mo. &c.

RIVINUS, Augustus Quirinus, a professor of medicine at Leipsic, who died there 1722, aged 70, respected as an able practitioner and botanist. He wrote Introductio in Rem Herbariam, folio, with plates; Ordo Plantarum quæ sunt Flore Irregulari monopetalæ, tetrapetalæ, pentapetalæ, fol. with figures; Censura Medicamentorum Officialium, 4to.; Dissertationes Medicinæ, 4to.; Manuductio ad Chymiam Pharmaceuticam, 8vo.; Notitia Morborum.

Rizzio, David, or Rizzi, an Italian musician, born at Turin. He came in the retinue of the Piedmontese ambassador to the court of Scotland, and as his abilities were very great as a musician and a singer, he became a favourite with queen Mary, who placed him near her person, and made him her secretary for foreign languages. His influence with his mistress, as well as his religion, proved highly offensive to the Scotch nobles, and especially to Darnley, her husband, who headed a conspiracy against him, and despatched the unfortunate favourite, with 56 wounds, in the queen's presence, 1566. It is said that Rizzio's musical powers were exerted to polish and refine the Scotch airs, and to infuse into them that sweetness which is still so much admired.

was a weak prince, under whose reign the two empires of Trebizond and Thessalonica were established. He died of grief, 1228, because his wife had been mutilated by a private gentleman of Burgundy, to whom she had been formerly betrothed, and who revenged this insult to his affection by cutting her lips and her nose.

ROBERT, elector palatine, was chosen emperor, 1400. He alienated the affections of the German princes to his government by his attachment to the anti-pope Gregory XII. and died 18th May, 1410, aged 58, at a moment when a powerful combination had been formed to deprive him of the crown.

ROBERT, king of France, surnamed the Wise or the Devout, succeeded his father, Hugh Capet, 996. He married Bertha, daughter of Conrad, king of Burgundy; but as she was his cousin, this union was annulled by the pope, Gregory V. and the monarch afterwards took for his second wife Constance, daughter of the count of Arles and Provence. He refused the crown of the empire and of Italy, better satisfied to reign over his native dominions, where he laboured earnestly for the happiness of his people. He died at Melun, 20th July, 1031, aged 60, much respected.

ROBERT of France, count d'Artois, brother of St. Louis, refused the empire of Germany offered to his ambition by pope Gregory IX. and he accompanied his brother to the Holy Land. He behaved with great valour at the battle of Massourah, 9th Feb. 1250; but being too eager in pursuit of the flying enemy, he was attacked with stones and perished.

ROBERT, count d'Artois, son of the preceding, was called the Good or the Noble. He was a very brave prince, and distinguished himself greatly in the African expedition, 1270, against the Arragonois in Sicily, 1289, against the English near Bayonne, and the Flemings at Furnes. He was killed in a battle with the Flemings near Courtrai, 1302.

ROBERT of Anjou, succeeded his father, Charles the lame, on the throne of Naples, 1309. He supported the papal power against the encroachments of the emperors, and died 19th Jan. 1343, aged 64, universally respected by his subjects and by foreign nations.

ROBERT the Magnificent, duke of Normandy, succeeded his brother Richard, 1028. In 1035 he undertook a pilgrimage on foot to the Holy Land, and on his return was poisoned at Nicæa, in Bithynia. He was succeeded by his natural son William, better known as the Conqueror.

ROBERT, surnamed Short Shanks, was son of William the Conqueror, and obtained for his inheritance the dukedom of Normandy. He was in the holy wars, where he behaved with great valour; but on his return he found himself stripped of the throne of England, which belonged to him, and afterwards he lost Normandy, and being made prisoner by his brother Henry, remained in long and cruel captivity till his death in 1134.

ROBERT BRUCE, a Scotch nobleman, who disputed the crown with John Baliol. The influence of Edward I. of England, prevailed in favour of his rival; but after his deposition, though watched by the English, he escaped from his retirement, and appearing in the midst of his countrymen, he was unanimously elected king. He maintained his elevation by valour, and defeated the English at the famous battle of Bannockburn, 1314. Peace was afterwards re-established between the two kingdoms, and Robert devoted himself to advance the happiness and the prosperity of his subjects. He died 1329, and desired that his heart might be conveyed to Jerusalem, and buried in the holy sepulchre. He was succeeded by David II.

ROBERT, Nicholas, a native of Langres, eminent as a painter, in the service of Gaston, duke of Orleans. His birds and plants, painted chiefly on vellum, were deservedly admired. He died 1684, aged 74.

ROBERT DE VAUGONDY, N. a French geographer, born at Paris. His Atlas, in 108 maps, is well known. He wrote Abridgment of the Different Systems of the World; Introduction to Geography; Sacred Geography, &c. and died at Paris, 1766, aged 78.

ROBERTS, Barré Charles, was the son of Edward Roberts, esq. deputy clerk of the pells of the exchequer, and born in Westminster, March 13, 1789. He was educated first at Chiswick, and next under Mr. Goodenough, at Ealing, where he remained six years, during which he became an excellent classical scholar. His favourite study, however, was history; in his application to which he became particularly partial to numismatics; on which subject he wrote several articles in the Gentleman's Magazine. In 1805 he went to Christ church, Oxford, where he obtained a studentship, and took his first degree; but died of a consumption, Jan. 1, 1810. In 1814 his "Letters and Miscellaneous Papers" were printed, with a memoir, in 4to.—W. B.

ROBERTS, Peter, a learned divine, was born in North Wales, and educated at Trinity-college, Dublin, where he took the degree of master of arts. On entering into orders he was presented by the bishop of St. Asaph to the rectory of Halkin, in the county of Flint, where he died in 1819. His works are—1. Observations on the Principles of Christian Morality. 2. Christianity vindicated against Volney. 3. Harmony of the Epistles. 4. Sketch of the early History of the Cymri, or ancient Britons. 5. View of the Policy of the Church of Rome. 6. Chronicle of the Kings of Britain. 7. Cambrian Popular Antiquities.—W. B.

ROBERTELLO, Francis, author of some commentaries on the Greek and Latin poets, and other works; was professor of rhetoric and philosophy at Padua, where he died, 1567.

ROBERTSON, William, an eminent divine, born in Dublin, 16th Oct. 1705. From Dublin he went to Glasgow university where he distinguished himself as a zealous defender of the rights of the students to elect their rector, in which cause after much trouble and great obloquy he at last succeeded. His conduct on this occasion recommended him to the notice of lord King, bishop Hoadly, and other leading characters, and he afterwards took orders and went to settle in Ireland, as rector of Ravelin, in the county of Carlow. Other preferments followed, and he acquired some distinction among the clergy by freeing his parishioners from tithes, and by defending in pamphlets his conduct. Thus popular, and in the way of procuring higher ecclesiastical honours, he happened to read "Free and Candid Disquisitions," which totally changed his ideas with respect to his profession, and at last induced him in 1764 to resign all his preferments. About 1766 he returned to London, and was complimented in consequence of his "Apology of his Faith and Conduct," by his alma mater of Glasgow, with the degree of D.D. In 1768 he was appointed by the company of Merchant-tailors master of Woolverhampton free-school. He died there 20th May, 1783, and was buried in the church-yard of the new church.

ROBERTSON, George, a landscape painter, born in London. He travelled over Italy under the patronage of Mr. Beckford, and greatly improved himself there. He afterwards went to Jamaica, of which island he published six beautiful views, and on his return to London he taught young ladies for his subsistence. His trees, and particularly his leaves, are much admired. His beauties resembled much those of Salvator Rosa. He died 1788.

ROBERTSON, Joseph, a native of Knipe, Westmoreland, educated at Appleby school, which he quitted in 1746 to enter at Queen's college, Oxford, where he took his degrees. When in orders he obtained Herriard vicarage, Hants, and in 1770 was presented to Sutton rectory, in Essex, and nine years after to Horncastle vicarage, in Lincolnshire. He possessed eminent literary talents, and from 1764 to 1785 supported by his able criticisms the character of the Critical Review. He was also author of a small volume called Introduction to the Study of Polite Literature, 1782, and in 1785 he published his valuable essay on Punctuation, and three years after his dissertation on the Parisian Chronicle, which excited some controversy. His translation of Telemachus, with the author's life, and learned notes, appeared in 1795, and in 1798 an Essay on the Education of Young Ladies. His Essay on the Nature of English verse was published 1799, and he died 1802.

ROBERTSON, William, a celebrated historian, born in Scotland, 1721. He was educated at Edinburgh university, and from his earliest years evinced the most laudable application, and the strongest wishes of distinguishing himself in literature. His first and greatest work, the History of Charles V. was followed by the History of Scotland, in which he laboured earnestly to vindicate the character of the unfortunate Mary. His next work was the History of America, which is unfinished, and afterwards he published a disquisition concerning India. These popular compositions did not pass to the perusal of the public unrewarded. The author was made principal of the university of Edinburgh, historiographer to the king for Scotland, one of his majesty's chaplains for Scotland, and one of the ministers of the Old Gray-friars church, Edinburgh, and he might have risen to higher honours if he had been willing to remove from Scotland into the English church. As a preacher zealous, active, and pious, he acquired no less fame than as an elegant, well-informed, and luminous historian. His learning and abilities have conferred immortal honour, not only on the university over which he presided with such dignity, but on the whole kingdom; and the History of Charles V. will be read to the latest times with increasing approbation. This worthy man left two sons and three daughters, and died universally and most deservedly esteemed, at Grangehouse, Edinburgh, June, 1793. His works have passed through several editions. He published besides a sermon before the Scotch society for promoting Christian knowledge.

ROBERVAL, Gilles Personne, sieur de, author of a treatise on Mechanics, inserted in the Harmony of father Mersennus, and of an edition of Aristarchus Samius, was a native of Roberval in Beauvais. He was professor of mathematics at Paris, and in his philosophical inquiries had some disputes with Des Cartes. He died 27th Oct. 1675, aged 73.

ROBESPIERRE, Maximilian Isidore, a sanguinary demagogue during the French revolution. He was born at Arras of poor parents, 1759, and was educated at the expense of the bishop of the diocess. After studying at Paris he applied himself to the law, and in 1784 obtained the prize of the academy of Metz, by his discourse on the disgrace which attends the relations of criminals. At the meeting of the constituent assembly he obtained a seat, and began now to distinguish himself more by the originality of his observations, than his eloquence. Though not visibly engaged in the atrocious scenes of the 20th of June, of the 10th August, and of September, he was anxious to reap the fruit of those bloody transactions, and when admitted into the convention he artfully employed his influence, and the darkest intrigues to render his opponents unpopular, and to lead them to the scaffold. With the criminal wish of being declared dictator, he hastened the destruction of the unfortunate Louis, and persecuted his innocent family, and after making Danton, Hebert, and others the guilty ministers of his atrocious deeds he prevailed upon the intimidated convention to send them to the guillotine. France was now filled with denunciations, in every province, and in every town tribunals were erected, which condemned alike the innocent and the guilty, and no man could, with safety, intrust his secrets, or his life into the hands of his parent, his neighbour, or his friend. Suspicious, timid, and irresolute, the tyrant yet had sufficient art to interpret the machinations formed against his power as treason against the republic, and to sacrifice his personal enemies, and his public rivals as the most abandoned and perfidious citizens of France. Proscription thus followed proscription, and every day the streets of Paris exhibited the melancholy procession of wretched victims dragged to the scaffold, on the accusation of persons whom they had never known, and for crimes which they never had meditated. If he had known how to spare, Robespierre might have longer continued to direct the government of France, but his cowardly conduct in sacrificing those who were ready to be his associates and ministers in the vilest deeds, at last roused the courage of a few, who suspected that they were next marked for destruction. The tyrant and his two accomplices Couthon, and St. Just, were suddenly impeached in the convention, and "down with the tyrant," were the only exclamations which were heard on all sides when these bloody assassins attempted to ascend the tribune to defend themselves. In vain the commune of Paris took up arms against the convention to protect its accused leaders, Robespierre was conducted as a criminal, fearful and suppliant, and no longer haughty and ferocious, to the Hotel-de-Ville, where a gend'arme, discovering him in the midst of the uproar and confusion, concealed in an obscure corner, fired a pistol at him and broke to pieces his lower jaw. Extended on a table, in the severest agonies, yet without uttering a groan, the tyrant viewed in silence the preparations made for his punishment. On the morrow, 28th July, 1794, at four in the evening he was carried with 22 of his accomplices, amidst the groans, the hisses, and the rejoicings of the populace, to that scaffold where he had made to bleed so many thousand innocent victims. Such was the influence of this sanguinary monster, that France forgot her religion and her honour at his command; but after he had seen the altars insulted, the churches thrown down, and public worship abolished, he claimed the merit of restoring to the Supreme Being some share in the government of the universe, and he appeared in the name of the convention, as the priest and founder of a new religion, and decreed with great solemnity that a god existed in the world.

ROBIN-HOOD, the leader of a band of robbers, who issued out from the recesses of Sherwood forest, Nottinghamshire, and spread terror and confusion over the kingdom. This formidable body of depredators, over which presided Little John, as second in command, continued their plundering life with success and with little opposition from the year 1189 to 1247. Some authors have asserted that Robin-Hood was no other but Robert earl of Huntingdon, whom the malice of his enemies banished from the favour of the first Richard.

ROBINS, Benjamin, an eminent mathematician, born at Bath, 1707. His parents were quakers, and possessed of little property, yet he received some instruction, which, by severe application he greatly improved. His knowledge of mathematics was such that he was recommended to Dr. Pemberton, and went to live in London, as mathematical teacher. Here, besides his professional engagements, he devoted much time in perusing the works of the most celebrated mathematicians in ancient and modern times; and as proof of his abilities he published in the Philosophical Transactions, 1727, a demonstration of the last proposition of Newton's treatise on Quadratures. The next year he attacked in the present state of the republic of letters, Bernouilli's dissertation in support of Leibnitz's Opinion of the Force of Bodies in motion. After bestowing much attention on gunnery, and visiting some of the best fortified places in Flanders, he engaged in a controversy against Dr. Berkley's Analyst on the Fluxionary Method, and published in 1735, a discourse concerning the nature and certainty of Sir I. Newton's Method of Fluxions, and of prime and ultimate ratios. He afterwards defended Sir Isaac against Baxter, and printed Remarks on Euler's Treatise of Motion, &c. In 1739 he published three political pamphlets, which attracted much of the public attention, and in 1742, appeared his New Principles of Gunnery, a work of merit, and the result of his own laborious experiments; in 1748, lord Anson's Voyage round the World was published, and though it appeared under the name of Walter, the chaplain of the centurion, it is clearly ascertained that the whole work was written by Robins, from the materials furnished by the journals, and the observations of the reverend gentleman. He afterwards wrote an apology for the unfortunate affair of Preston-pans, in favour of Sir John Cope, and by the protection of lord Anson, he was employed in superintending the improvements made in Greenwich observatory. His reputation was now such that he was offered to go to Paris as commissioner, to settle the boundaries of Acadia, or to proceed to the East Indies as general engineer of the company, in visiting and repairing their forts, and he accepted this last honourable appointment. He reached India in 1750, and immediately formed plans for the improvement of the forts of Madras, and of St. David; but unfortunately did not live to see them carried into execution. The climate proved unfavourable to his constitution, and a gradual consumption proved fatal, 29th July, 1751. He left the publication of his works to his friends, Martin Folkes, and James Wilson, and they appeared in 2 vols. 8vo. 1761.

ROBINSON, Robert, a native of Swaffham, Norfolk. He was well educated at the public grammar-school of his native town; but the indigence of his parents was ill calculated to support further expenses at the university, and, therefore, he was apprenticed to a hair-dresser. Instead of shaving, and of combing wigs with diligence he paid more attention to books, and by the preaching of Whitfield, he became a convert to methodism. With enthusiasm he now embraced the tenets of Calvin, which he soon after exchanged for those of the baptists, and then settled at Cambridge, where his abilities and eloquence were exerted with great success in his appeals to crowded audiences. The respectable character which he here supported, endeared him not only to the inhabitants of Cambridge, but to some of the learned in the university, and his Plea of the Divinity of Christ, when published, proved to the world that he was not destitute of talents, nor of the powers of argumentation. He was, in 1785, invited to preach to the baptists in London; but after some trials, he preferred his farm at Chesterton, near Cambridge, and the approbation of his neighbours, to the uncertain profits of a residence in the metropolis. He died in the summer of 1790, at Birmingham, where he had gone on a visit to Dr. Priestley, aged 55. He published besides a translation of Saurin's Sermons, 4 vols. 8vo.—an Essay on the Composition of a Sermon—a History of Baptism, &c. In the latter part of life he was a Socinian. It is said that when at Cambridge he was offered honourable preferment if he would enter into the church, which he modestly declined.

ROBINSON, Tancred, fellow of the Royal Society and of the college of physicians, was an able physician. He wrote some ingenious papers on Natural History, and also medical books, and died 1748, advanced in life.

ROBINSON, Mary, known for her genius and misfortunes, was born at Bristol where her father, of the name of Darby, an American, was captain of a ship. After receiving her education under the able care of Hannah More, and her sisters, she married at the early age of 15, a Mr. Robinson, an attorney, and this connexion proved the source of much misery. Her husband was unfortunate and extravagant, and after accompanying him to a jail, she turned her thoughts to the stage for support. As her person was pleasing, and her abilities very respectable, she appeared with credit in the characters of Juliet, Ophelia, Rosalind, Imogen, Viola, &c. Whilst thus rising in the public estimation, and under the patronage of Garrick, she unfortunately attracted, in the character of Perdita, the attention of the prince of W. and those who ought to have defended his virtue, became the criminal encouragers of a licentious amour, which this frail woman had not the prudence to withstand. She left the stage for the guilty protection of her Florizel; but, such is the fate of illicit love, she soon became indifferent in the eyes of the once enraptured prince. Thus cut off from the protection of a husband, from whom she had separated, and lost to virtue and to honour, she became for support the degraded mistress of profligate men. She fell a victim to a violent rheumatism, and died at the end of 1800, aged 42, and was buried in Old Windsor church-yard, where some elegant lines from the pen of Mr. Pratt, mark her untimely tomb. She wrote a number of poetical trifles under the name of Laura Maria—Vaftenza, a Romance—poems, 2 vols. 8vo.—Nobody, an unsuccessful farce—and memoirs of her life have appeared under the care of her daughter.

ROBINSON, Richard, a native of Yorkshire, educated at Westminster school, from which he was elected to Christ church, Oxford. He was made prebendary of York, and vicar of Aldborough, by archbishop Blackburne, to whom he was chaplain, and in 1751 he went as chaplain to the duke of Dorset in Ireland, and obtained the bishopric of Killala. In 1759 he was translated to Leighlin and Ferns, two years after to Kildare, and in 1765 to the primacy of Armagh, and in 1777 he was created a peer of Ireland, by the title of baron Rokeby. He employed the munificent patronage which he possessed in the most liberal manner, and not only built an elegant palace at Armagh, which he adorned with an observatory, but he founded a school, and built four new churches. He died 10th Oct. 1794.

ROBINSON, Moses, governor of Vermont, succeeded Mr. Chittenden in 1789. He was afterwards a representative from that state, and a member of the senate of the United States under the administration of president Adams. He was one of the minority who were opposed to the ratification of Jay's treaty. He died at Bennington, May 26th, 1813, aged 72.  L.

ROBINSON, Jonathan, brother of the preceding, was appointed chief justice of Vermont in 1801, in the place of judge Smith, resigned, and in 1806 succeeded Mr. Smith as senator in congress. He died at Bennington, November 3d, 1819, aged 64.  L.

ROBINSON, John, minister of the English church in Holland, to which the first settlers of New-England belonged, was born in Great Britain in 1575, and educated at Cambridge. He for some time held a benefice in the established church, but in 1602 became pastor of a dissenting congregation in the north of England, and in consequence of persecution went with them to Holland in 1608. After a short residence at Amsterdam they removed to Leyden. His talents and reputation were such that he held a public disputation with Episcopius in 1613. A part of his church emigrated to Plymouth in 1620, and it was his intention to follow them with the remainder, but his sudden death, March 1st, 1625, prevented. He was distinguished for learning, liberality, and piety.  L.

ROBINSON, John, a Scotchman, who became director of the marine cadet academy at Cronstadt, in Russia, and on his return to Scotland was made professor of chymistry at Glasgow. He afterwards became professor of natural philosophy at Edinburgh, where he was honoured with the degree of LL.D. Besides elements of mechanical philosophy, and some articles in the Encyclopædia Britannica, he published, in 1797, Proofs of a Conspiracy, a work which, together with that of the abbé Baruel on the same subject, produced a great sensation in Europe, and in tracing the various causes of the French revolution, proved that it proceeded from a conspiracy among the illuminati of France and Germany, for the destruction of all society, of morality, and religion, in the world. Dr. Robison died at Edinburgh 1805.

ROCHEFORT, William de, author of a Translation of Sophocles—of a refutation of M. Rabaud's System of Nature—of Ulysses, Antigone, and Electra, three tragedies—of a Critical History of the Opinions of the Ancients on Happiness, &c. was a native of Lyons, and member of the academy of inscriptions and belles lettres at Paris. He died 1788, universally and deservedly respected.

ROCHEFOUCAULT, Francis, duke of, a French nobleman of celebrity, born 1613. He distinguished himself in the wars of la Fronde, and for some time was deprived of sight by the blow of a musket. He is known as the author of Memoirs of the Regency of Anne of Austria, 2 vols. 12mo.—and “Maximes, or Sentences,” which, says Voltaire, have contributed, more than any other performance, to form the taste of the French nation. His Memoirs, adds that author, are read, but the Maxims are learnt by heart. He died 1680.

ROCHESTER, John Wilmot, earl of, a celebrated wit at the court of the second Charles, born April, 1648. He was well educated at Burford school, and then entered at Wadham college, Oxford, and afterwards travelled over France and Italy. He was in 1665 in the action at Bergen, under lord Sandwich, when an attack was made on the Dutch fleet that had taken shelter there, and he was in another engagement, in both of which he displayed great intrepidity and coolness, though his courage was afterwards called in question for refusing to fight a duel with lord Mulgrave. The excellent qualities of his mind were, however, ruined by the dissipation of the court, and so fond of intemperance and of voluptuous indulgence did he gradually show himself, that he was the greatest libertine of the age, and was, for five years, as he confessed to Dr. Burnet, in a continual state of intoxication. This gross sensuality, accompanied with the greatest contempt of decency and of religion, was sometimes chequered by fits of study and literature; but unfortunately the elegant powers of language and of poetry which he possessed were prostituted to the most lascivious and disgusting subjects. Thus devoted to low gratifications, the lamp of life was soon extinguished, and at the age of 31 he found all the debilities and the rapid decay of extreme old age. Sickness at last brought on reflection, and in a moment of contrition he sent for Dr. Burnet, to whom he opened his heart, and the alarming state of his conscience, and after living an atheist and a libertine, he prepared himself to die a good Christian and a sincere penitent. That his contrition was from the heart, the most scrupulous may be convinced from the account of his last moments, by his spiritual guide, Burnet. He expired 29th July, 1680, leaving a son behind him, who died the next year, and three daughters. The writings of this licentious nobleman have, unfortunately for religion and morality, been too much and too extensively dispersed, and not, perhaps, with the antidote which his contrition and a death-bed repentance should convey to the profligate mind. Many of the obscene writings of the times have no doubt been attributed to him which he never wrote; and the advocates of lewdness and seduction have taken advantage of his infamous celebrity too often to shelter their poisonous productions under his name. Besides his licentious poems, he wrote a tragedy, called Valentinian, and a speech, delivered in the character of a mountebank, a profession which for some time he followed with great success in Tower-street. His wit rendered him a cheerful companion, and at the court he was regarded as lively and facetious, full of mirth, repartee, and extravagance.

ROCHON DE CHABANNES, Mark Anthony James, a French dramatic writer, who died at Paris in the spring of 1800, aged 70. Some of his operas met with great success on the French theatre. Besides his plays, which are collected in 2 vols. 8vo. he wrote la Noblesse Oisive, and other works.

RODGERS, John, D.D. minister of New-York, was born at Boston, Massachusetts, August 5th, 1727. His parents removed while he was young to Philadelphia, and gave him a classical education. He early became pious by the instrumentality of Mr. Whitefield, and in 1747 was licensed to preach, and after having spent some time as a missionary in Virginia and Maryland, was settled in St. George's, Delaware, on the 19th of March, 1749, where he continued to labour with popularity and usefulness until 1765. In July of that year he removed to New-York, and became collegiate pastor of the Wall-street presbyterian church, at that time the only church of that denomination in that city. He continued in that station, labouring with exemplary diligence in the duties of his office, and enjoying in an unusual degree the affection of his people and the respect of his fellow-labourers in the gospel, till the close of his life. He died on the 7th of May, 1811, in the eighty-fourth year of his age, and the sixty-third of his ministry.

RODNEY, George Brydges lord, a brave English admiral, son of a naval officer, of a Somersetshire family, was born about 1718. He was early engaged in the naval service of his country, and in 1751 was promoted to the rank of commodore, and in 1759 employed, as admiral, to bombard Havre de Grace. In 1761 he was sent against Martinico, and for his great services in that expedition was made knight of the bath. The return of peace, and interference in a severely disputed election at Northampton, rendered his pecuniary resources very scanty, and he fled to France to escape the importunities of his creditors. His distresses were seen by the French government, and very liberal offers were made to him to enter into the service of the king of France, a proposal which he rejected with becoming indignation. This noble conduct was not, however, buried in oblivion. It was honourably mentioned by M. Sartine, the French minister to the English government, and Rodney, at the invitation of lord Sandwich, returned to serve his country. He was immediately placed at the head of a fleet, and had the good fortune, in 1780, to capture a Spanish convoy near Cadiz, and a few weeks after to defeat the squadron of admiral Langara, by the capture of five ships of the line. This great success was the prelude of new victories. In 1781 he took St. Eustathius from the Dutch, and on the 12th April, 1782, he obtained a complete triumph over de Grasse's fleet in the West Indies, by the sinking of one ship and the capture of five others. For these glorious services he was raised to the peerage, and had a pension of 2000*l.* a year settled upon him, and every other demonstration of respect and gratitude was shown by a nation which so well knows how to reward her brave defenders and her heroic chiefs. Lord Rodney died 1792.

RODOLPH, duke of Swabia, husband to Matilda, sister of the emperor Henry IV. was elected king of Germany, 1077, by some of the German insurgents. After doubtful battles, he was at last defeated at Wolkshheim, and perished in the field.

RODOLPH I. of Hapsburg, surnamed the Clement, was elected emperor of Germany 1273. Though he refused to go to Rome to be crowned by the pope, he made a treaty of alliance with him. He made war against Ottocar, king of Bohemia, and obtained with victory the cession of Austria, Styria, and Carniola. This disgrace, and the doing of homage to the conqueror, disgusted Ottocar, and by the advice of his queen he renewed the war, and was defeated and slain at the battle of Marckfield, near Vienna, 26th Aug. 1278. The emperor died at Gemersheim, 30th Sept. 1291, aged 73.

RODOLPH II. son of Maximilian II. was born at Vienna 1552. He was made king of Hungary 1572, of Bohemia and of the Romans 1575, and the following year elected emperor on his father's death. He was an irresolute and unfortunate monarch, his dominions were invaded by the Turks, and he showed neither spirit nor courage to repress the attack, and when his brother Matthias revolted from him he yielded up to him, with little opposition, the kingdoms of Bohemia and Hungary. He was very superstitious, and though he patronised learned men, he had the weakness to listen to the suggestions of astrologers. He died unmarried, 20th Jan. 1612, aged 60.

ROE, sir Thomas, an eminent statesman, born at Low Layton, Essex, 1580. He resided for about two years at Magdalen college, Oxford, and then studied at one of the inns of court. He was knighted by James, 1604, and 1614 went as ambassador to the court of the Great Mogul, where he continued four years. In 1621 he went as ambassador to the Grand Signior, and remained there till 1628. During his residence abroad, not only the commercial interests of his country were his chief concern, but also literature, and he made a most valuable collection of MSS. in the Greek and Oriental languages, which at his return he presented to the Bodleian library. He brought also, as a present from Cyril, patriarch of Constantinople, to Charles I. the famous Alexandrian MS. of the Greek Bible, since transcribed and published by Dr. Grabe. In 1629 he successfully negotiated a peace between the kings of Sweden and Poland, and in that embassy gained the confidence and friendship of the great Gustavus Adolphus, whom he advised to make a descent on Germany to restore the freedom of the empire, which he actually effected. In 1640 sir Thomas was elected member for Oxford, and afterwards went again as ambassador to Ratisbon, in favour of the king of Bohemia's son. At his return he was made chancellor of the garter, and privy counsellor. He died 1664, no doubt broken in heart to see the disastrous affairs of the times. His curious account of his negotiations, &c. at the Porte was published 1740. There are besides published of his, Speeches in Parliament—a Discourse on the Spanish King's Seizure of the Valteline, &c.

ROEMER, Olaus, a Danish astronomer, born at Arhusen, in Jutland, 1644, and educated at Copenhagen. He accompanied back to Paris Picard, who had been sent by the French king to make observations in the North, and so great did his knowledge of mathematics appear, that he was appointed to instruct the dauphin. After 10 years' residence at Paris he was, in 1681, recalled back to Copenhagen by Christian V. and made professor of astronomy there. His abilities were employed in reforming the coin of the kingdom, and in measuring the roads. He died at Copenhagen 1710, leaving no literary work behind him. Some of his observations were published by his pupil Horrebow in 1735, under the title of Basis Astronomiæ. 4to. His observations on light were noticed and applauded as correct by the great Newton.

ROENTGEN, N. a German artist, born at Neuwied. His great talents were employed and liberally rewarded by the empress Catharine of Russia, and the palace of Petersburg still exhibits the beautiful monuments of his genius and workmanship. He died at the end of the 18th century.

ROEPFEL, Conrad, a painter, born at the Hague. He died 1748, aged 71. His fruit-trees and flowers were much admired.

ROESTRAETEN, Peter, a native of Haerlem, 1698, eminent as a portrait painter. He was also very successful in his representations of musical instruments, of vases, shells, agates, &c.

ROGER, first king of Sicily, conquered Apulia, Calabria, and Naples, and by embracing the party of the antipope Anacletus he strengthened his power. He took Innocent II. prisoner, and restored him to liberty only upon his confirming his dominions in Italy. He afterwards made war against the Eastern empire, and after plundering Athens, Corinth, Negropont, &c. and advancing to the gates of Constantinople, he returned to Sicily loaded with booty. He died 1154, aged 58.

ROGER, Charles, an eminent printer at Paris in the 16th century. He edited several valuable books.

ROGER, Joseph Louis, a physician of Strasburg, who died 1761. He published Latin dissertations on the palpitation of muscular fibres, &c.

ROGER, prior of Hexham, was, about 1138, author of a History of the Campaign of the Scotch Army under king David, when the famous battle of the standard was fought.

ROGERS, Woods, an English navigator, known for his expedition against the Spanish settlements in the South seas, in a small ship of war from Bristol. He returned to his country 1711, after surrounding the globe, and published an account of his voyage. He died 1732. His works have appeared in French, 3 vols. 12mo.

ROGERS, John, an English divine, educated at Cambridge. He was for some time chaplain to the English factory at Antwerp, and on the succession of Edward VI. he returned home and obtained a prebend of St. Paul's church. As he was an eloquent and zealous preacher, he was marked for persecution in Mary's reign, and was the first who suffered martyrdom at the stake in Smithfield, 1555. He had assisted Coverdale and Tindal in translating the Bible into English.

ROGERS, John, an able divine, born 1679, at Ensham, Oxfordshire, where his father was vicar. He was educated at New college school, and became fellow of Corpus Christi, and in 1712, went to London as lecturer of St. Clement Danes. He obtained in 1716, the rectory of Wrington, Somersetshire, and about that time married lord Coleraine's sister. He engaged in 1719, in the Bangorian controversy, and he acquired on that occasion so much credit by his discourse on the visible and invisible church of Christ, that the university of Oxford conferred upon him the degree of D.D. in 1721. He obtained a canonry, and the office of subdean, in the cathedral of Wells, and in 1728, when he wished for the retirement of a country life, he was promoted to the living of St. Giles, Cripplegate, London. He died six months after, May 1st, 1729. He was buried in Ensham church, where a handsome monument records his virtues. After his death, were published 4 vols. of his sermons—a Persuasive to Conformity, addressed to Dissenters, &c. He wrote besides, a Defence of Christianity against Collins's Scheme of Literal Prophecy, &c.

ROGERS, John, president of Harvard college, was born at Assington, England, and came with his father to Massachusetts in early life. He was educated at Harvard, where he was graduated in 1649. He studied theology, and preached some time, but at length became a physician. He was elected successor of president Oakes, in 1682, and installed in August, of the next year, but died suddenly in 1684, on the 2d of July, the day after commencement.

ROGHMAN, Roland, a native of Amsterdam, distinguished as a landscape painter. He died 1686, aged 89.

ROHAN, Henry duke of, a peer of France, prince of Leon, born at Blein castle in Brittany, 1579. He gained the friendship of Henry IV. by his bravery at the siege of Amiens, and afterwards distinguished himself at the head of the Huguenots, for whom he obtained a very advantageous peace with Lewis XIII. From France he passed into the service of Venice, and was made general-in-chief of the armies of that republic against the imperialists. He was then recalled by Lewis XIII. and his abilities were employed in negotiation as well as in war, but the jealousy of Richelieu drove him to Geneva. From Geneva he went to join the arms of his friend the duke of Saxe Weimar against the imperialists, and was fatally wounded in battle, and died six weeks after, 13th April, 1638. His memoirs of the political affairs of France, &c. from 1610, to 1629, in 2 vols. 12mo. are much admired. He wrote besides, the Interest of Princes, printed Cologne, 1666, 12mo.—on the Government of the 13 Cantons—an Abridgment of Caesar's Commentaries, &c. His sister Anne possessed merit as a Hebrew scholar, and as the writer of some excellent verses.

ROHAULT, James, a French philosopher, born at Amiens 1620. He studied at Paris, and was well versed in the philosophy of the ancients, but attached himself most zealously to the popular doctrines of Des Cartes, and wrote an account of them under the title of "Physics." This work, written in French, was translated into Latin by Dr. Samuel Clarke, and adapted to the system of Newton's philosophy, and it has also appeared in English, 2 vols. 8vo. He wrote besides Elements of Mathematics—treatise of Mechanics, &c. and died 1675, respected as a man of learning and probity.

ROLAND DE LA PLATIERE, J. M. a native of Villefranche near Lyons. As he was the youngest of five brothers, who, though of respectable family, were left poor and early orphans, he determined to quit his native town in quest of his fortune, and at the age of nineteen, not to enter into the ecclesiastical profession, he left home and travelled on foot to Nantes. Here he was dissuaded from going to the East Indies on account of the bad state of his health, and therefore he removed to Rouen, where he had the good fortune to be noticed, and to find his knowledge of commerce and political economy rewarded by the appointment of inspector general at Amiens, and afterwards at Lyons. His travels in Switzerland, Italy, and other countries, tended to enlarge his understanding, and to render him known as an able and well-informed writer. His Memoirs on the Rearing of Cattle, and the Preparing of Wool, 4to.—his Art on the Printing of Woollen, and Cotton Stuffs—and his Letters from Sicily, Switzerland, Malta, and Italy, were read with avidity and with interest, and therefore at the revolution he was easily selected as one of the deputies from Lyons. His abilities recommended him to the court, and he became one of the ministers of Lewis XVI. but instead of conciliating the good opinion of his master, he offended his feelings by his republican conduct, his coarse affected manners, and the singularity of his dress. Though driven from the ministry by the monarch, he was restored by the voice of the people; but whilst he laboured for the establishment of liberty, he often permitted those excesses which proved so fatal to the dearest interests of France. He resisted, indeed, with manly indignation the violence of faction, and wished to repress the massacres of September, but in vain. The popular fury was too strong to permit a man of independent spirit to continue long in power, and when the fall of Brissot and of the Girondists was determined, Roland saw his fate decreed in theirs, and he escaped from Paris at the moment when his person was going to be seized. He retired to Rouen, where he might have concealed his misfortunes; but when he heard that his wife had perished on the scaffold he resolved not to survive her, and going about four leagues from Rouen on the Paris road, he stabbed himself to the heart, 15th Nov. 1793. He wrote besides, a dictionary of manufactures and the arts depending upon them, 3 vols. 4to. &c.

ROLAND, Mary Jane Philipon, wife of the preceding, was born at Paris 1754, and received from her father, who was an engraver of merit, an excellent education. Early devoted to books, she acquired a very extensive knowledge of the arts, and became known for her wit and learning. At the age of twenty-five she married Roland, though much older than herself, and when he was raised to consequence in the revolution, she lent all the resources of her mind to assist him, and often wrote the despatches and letters which were to issue from his hands. Her house was the receptacle of the learned, the powerful, and the intriguing, and she was the soul of the party, and secretly guided many of the public measures which were proposed in the convention. Her influence escaped not, however, without envy, and when accused, she appeared before the convention, and cleared herself with all the graceful energy of innocence. When her husband was proscribed, she hoped to be permitted to remain secure at Paris; but in vain, she was soon after seized and sent to prison, and after five months confinement she was dragged to the scaffold, as the active accomplice of the Girondists. She was guillotined 8th November, 1793, aged 41, and as she expired she exclaimed, O liberty, what crimes are committed in thy name. Her works consist of tracts on melancholy, morality, friendship, Socrates, &c. besides memoirs which she wrote during her captivity, and in which she gave an interesting history, or appeal to posterity, about her husband, his conduct, his ministry, and their private life. She also published an account of her travels in England and Switzerland, two places where she imbibed true principles of liberty and government. In her character she was an amiable woman, but unfortunately her partiality for republican liberty tinctured her conduct with an affectation of Roman virtues and ancient forms. Respectable in private life, and followed as a woman of superior information and great talents of mind, she might at any other period have most powerfully contributed by her example and by her writings to the recommendation of virtue, and to the happiness of mankind.

ROLAND D'ERCEVILLE, B. G. president of the parliament of Paris, was a learned and popular character, but all his merits could not save him from the revolutionary tribunal. He was guillotined 20th April, 1794, aged 64. He wrote a Letter on the Authority of the States of France, 12mo.—Discourse on the Jesuits—Plan of Education, &c.

ROLE, Michael, a French mathematician, born at Ambert in Auvergne, 1652. He for some time maintained himself by writing for an attorney; but by attending mathematical lectures became himself a popular lecturer, and afterwards a respected member of the academy of sciences. He wrote a treatise on Algebra—Methods of resolving undetermined Questions in Algebra, &c. and died 1719.

ROLLIN, Charles, an eminent French writer, born at Paris 30th January, 1661. He was intended for the business of his father, a master cutler, but his genius was happily discovered by a Benedictine, and he was permitted to study in the college of Plessis, where his abilities soon procured him the appellation of the Divine. He succeeded his beloved master, Hersan, in 1687, as professor of rhetoric and eloquence, and in 1694 he was appointed rector of the university. In these important offices he distinguished himself by his zeal for the improvement of his pupils and the honour of learning, and by his example and attention the Greek language was cultivated with great attention, and emulation introduced among the students. In 1699 he was made coadjutor to the college of Beauvais, which his reputation soon rendered popular, respectable, and flourishing; but in 1712, the disputes between the Jesuits and Jansenists proved fatal to his repose. By the influence of Tellier, the king's confessor, the tool of the Jesuits, he was driven from his appointments and retired to privacy. In 1720 he was chosen again rector by the university of Paris; but two months after the election was annulled by a lettre de cachet, and from that time Rollin devoted himself in retirement to the composition of his excellent works. His valuable publications are, an edition of Quintilian, 2 vols.—treatise on Studying and Teaching the Belles Lettres, 4 vols.—Ancient History of the Egyptians, Carthaginians, Babylonians, &c. 13 vols.—the Roman History from the Foundation of the City to the Battle of Actium, completed to the time of Constantine by his pupil Crevier, and published in 16 vols. 12mo.—Miscellaneous Discourses, Lectures, &c. This learned man was as amiable in private life as he was respected in public; pious, benevolent, and humane, the friend of virtue, morality, and religion. So highly respected was he among his countrymen, that the poet Rousseau ventured from his banishment in disguise to Paris to see and converse with the venerable professor.

Voltaire has deservedly passed high eulogiums on his merits as a historian, and called his Ancient History the best compilation in any language, correct, eloquent, and pleasing. He died 14th Sept. 1741.

ROLLIUS, Reinhold Henry, a German philologist, author of two Latin works containing the lives of philosophers, poets, historians, orators, &c. published 1709.

ROLLO, A Norwegian chieftain, driven from his country by the king of Denmark. He landed in Normandy, of which he obtained the sovereignty by the permission of Charles the Simple, 912, who gave him his daughter Giselle in marriage. He on this occasion became a convert to Christianity, and took upon him the title of duke of Normandy. He was the ancestor of William the Conqueror, and died about 932.

ROLLOCK, Robert, a native of Stirlingshire, educated at St. Leonard's college, St. Andrews, where he took his master's degree, 1532. On the foundation of Edinburgh university by James VI. in 1587, he was appointed first principal and divinity professor, though not more than 28 years of age. His great application and sedentary life brought on the stone and gravel, of which he died 1601, aged 41. His Commentaries on the Ephesians—the Revelations—St. John's Gospel—and Daniel, in Latin, have been much admired. He wrote some sermons besides.

ROMAINE, William, an English divine, born at Hartlepool, Durham, 1714. He entered at Hertford college, Oxford, and afterwards removed to Christ-church, where he took his degrees in arts, and entered into orders. For some years he was a popular preacher before the university; but the love of singularity, and a propensity to the doctrines of Calvin, prevailed upon him to seek for distinction in the applause of a London audience. He was elected lecturer of St. Dunstan in the West 1749, to which was afterwards added the offices of morning preacher at St. George's, Hanover square, and of astronomical professor of Gresham college, which he soon resigned. He was in 1764 appointed rector of St. Ann's, Blackfriars, and when not engaged in the itinerant labours of the ministry, he continued to collect there and at St. Dunstan's, those numerous congregations which admired the vehemence of methodistical effusions, and the familiar addresses of a vociferous preacher. He published various sermons and tracts which have been edited in 8 vols. 8vo. and he also edited in 1749 Calasio's Concordance to the Hebrew Bible, 4 vols. folio, in which he made some unpardonable alterations in favour of the then prevalent doctrine of Hutchinson. He died 1795. His life has been published by Cadogan.

ROMANELLI, John Francis, a painter, born at Viterbo. He was the pupil of Cortona, and was patronised by the pope, and elected head of the academy of St. Luke. His abilities were noticed by Mazarine, and recommended to the French king, who created him knight of St. Michael; but he preferred a residence in his native country, where he died 1662, aged 45. His historical pieces are much admired. His son Urban was also eminent as a painter, and died 1682, aged 44.

ROMANO, Julio, an Italian painter, born at Rome 1492. He was the pupil and the friend of Raphael, and was made the heir of that illustrious artist. He was patronised by Leo X. and by Clement VII. and afterwards met with great encouragement at Mantua, under the marquis Frederic Gonzagas. He died 1546. He was distinguished in architecture as well as painting. His learning gave him great advantage over contemporary artists, and he derived, from the study of the ancients, that judgment and taste which he displayed in the ancient edifices, porticos, vestibules, and theatres introduced into his pieces. The best of his pieces are said to be the fall of the giants, and the battles of Constantine.

ROMANUS I. emperor of the East, surnamed Lecapenus, was a native of Armenia, and was raised to distinction, from the obscurity of a common soldier, by saving the life of the emperor Basil in a battle against the Saracens. By marrying his daughter, Constantine X. cemented the union which existed between them, and he then raised him as his associate on the throne, 919. In his elevation Romanus displayed great powers of mind; he defeated the Muscovites and the Turks, and to superior military talents he joined the milder virtues of humanity and benevolence. When he wished to restore greater powers in the empire to his son-in-law, Constantine, he was driven by the jealousy of his own son Stephen, into a monastery, where he died 948.

ROMANUS II. the Younger, was son of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, whom he succeeded 959. He was an effeminate and worthless prince; he drove his mother Helena from the palace, and obliged his sisters to prostitute themselves, and he destroyed himself by his intemperance and debauchery, 963. During his short reign Phocas, his general, was successful against the Saracens in Candia.

ROMANUS III. son of Leo, the imperial general, obtained the crown by marrying Zoe, the daughter of Constantine the Younger, 1028. His indolence, and the success of the Saracens, who seized upon Syria, offended his subjects, and his wife having fallen in love with Michael, the treasurer of the empire, determined to depose her husband, and raised her favourite to the throne in his stead. Romanus was therefore poisoned, and afterwards strangled, April, 1034.

ROMANUS IV. surnamed Diogenes, by marrying Eudoxia, the widow of Constantine Ducas, ascended the throne of Constantinople. He marched against the Turks, and defeated them; but in 1071 he was unfortunately taken prisoner by Asan, the enemy's general, who, instead of insulting his misfortunes, generously set him at liberty. On his return he found the throne usurped by Michael, the son of his predecessor, and in a subsequent battle, he was defeated by his rival, who cruelly ordered his eyes to be put out. Romanus died in consequence of the operation, Oct. 1071.

ROMANZOFF, N. marshal de, a distinguished Russian general. He defeated the Turks, 1770, at the battle of the Pruth, and then at Kagoul, where 100,000 of the enemy were left on the field; and thus, by his extraordinary successes, he contributed to the enlargement of the Russian dominions, and to the free navigation of the Black Sea, and of the Dardanelles. He received with modesty the presents and the honours which the gratitude of Catherine heaped upon him, and afterwards went with Paul, the grand duke, to the court of Berlin, where Frederic the Great received him with every mark of esteem and respect. In the war of 1787, he refused to share the command with the favourite Potemkin, and was permitted on account of his great age, to retire from the service, and he died soon after, universally respected as one of the greatest warriors of the age.

ROMBOUTS, Theodore, a painter of Antwerp, the pupil of Jansens. He was very successful in historical subjects, but particularly excelled in the representation of low scenes, ale-houses, markets, musicians, &c. He had the vanity to oppose his productions to the labours of his contemporary Rubens, and by this comparison in some degree robbed his pieces of the merit which they, uncompar'd with others, possessed. He died 1637, aged 40.

ROME DE L'ISLE, John Baptist, a native of Gray in Franche Comté, who from his birth devoted himself to observations on mineralogy and natural history. He possessed great abilities, but in his opinions differed from other mineralogists, and thus gave rise to opposition. He published among other works, Crystallography, 4 vols. 8vo.; Exterior Characters of Minerals, 8vo.; Metrology, 8vo.; Letters to Bertrand on the Polype of Fresh Water, 12mo. &c. He died at Paris, 10th March, 1790.

ROMEYN, Theodoricus, D.D. professor of theology in the Reformed Dutch Church, was born at Hackensack, New-Jersey, January 12th, 1744, and educated at the college at Princeton, in that state, where he was graduated in 1765. He was settled in the ministry, in his native town in 1766, and continued there till 1784, when he accepted the care of a church in Schenectady, New-York. His death took place in 1804. He was twice offered the presidency of Queen's college, New-Jersey, and was for a considerable time a professor of theology in the Reformed Dutch Church. He was a man of extensive learning, and one of its most active patrons. It was chiefly by his efforts that Union college was instituted at Schenectady, not long after his removal there. He was distinguished for piety, was an eloquent preacher, and enjoyed in a high degree the respect and esteem of his contemporaries.

ROMILLY, John, an ingenious mechanic and clock-maker, born at Geneva. He presented to Lewis XV. a watch, which went a whole year without winding. He died at Paris, 16th Feb. 1796, aged 82. He wrote all the articles on clock-making in the Encyclopedia, and published besides a Letter against the Possibility of Perpetual Motion. He also established the Journal de Paris, 1st Jan. 1777. His son, John Edme, was a Calvinistic minister at Geneva and London, and published 3 volumes of Discourses. He was the friend of d'Alembert, Voltaire, and J. J. Rousseau, and died in 1779.

ROMILLY, Sir Samuel, an eminent lawyer, was the son of a jeweller, in Frith-street, Westminster, and born there March 1st, 1757. His education was private and contracted; after which he became a clerk in an attorney's office, but left that situation to study in one of the inns of court. In 1783 he was called to the bar; and for several years confined his practice to draughts in equity. At length he rose to distinction in the court of chancery; and in the last administration of Mr. Fox, was made solicitor-general, when he received the honour of knighthood. When the party to whom he was attached went out of office, he also retired; but still continued in parliament, where he displayed great powers in debate. He exerted himself in endeavouring to effect a revision of the criminal code, with a view to the limitation of capital punishments to a few heinous offences; on which subject he published an able pamphlet; as he also did another against the erection of the office of vice-chancellor. The death of this eminent man was melancholy. Shocked at the loss of his lady, who died of a dropsy in the Isle of Wight, he became delirious, and destroyed himself, Nov. 2d, 1818.—W. B.

ROMNEY, George, an eminent painter, born of obscure parents in Lancashire. He, from his youth, devoted himself to painting, which he improved under the care of an itinerant painter. When he first came to London, he presented his death of general Wolfe to the public, and it not only obtained the second prize of the exhibition, but ensured him public notice, with a handsome price. Eager to improve himself, he determined to visit Italy by means of the little property which he had already saved by his pencil, and on his return from the continent, he was received with the distinction due to an able and ingenious artist. His portraits were much admired, and his historical pieces also possessed great merit. He died at Kendal in 1802.

ROMULUS, son of Rhea Sylvia, daughter of Numitor, king of Alba, laid the foundations of Rome, 753 B. C. and died after a reign of 38 years.

RONCALLI, Christofano, called also Pomeraneo, from the place of his birth, excelled as a historical painter. He was the pupil of Circignano, and died 1626.

RONDELET, William, a native of Montpellier, who studied anatomy with great success, and acquired celebrity as a physician. He wrote a Latin treatise on Fishes, 2 vols. folio—and various tracts on medicine, published, 8vo. 1628. He died at Realmont, 18th July, 1566, aged 59, in consequence of eating figs to excess.

RONSARD, Peter de, a French poet, of a noble family, born at Vendomois, 1524. He studied at Paris, and became page to the duke of Orleans, and afterwards was for two years in the service of James V. of Scotland. On his return to France, he was engaged in negotiations, and at the same time devoted much of his time to literature and poetry. He was the favourite of Henry II. of France, and his four successors, and though a layman, obtained some ecclesiastical dignities in commendam, especially St. Cosmas priory, near Tours, where he died 1585. His poetry was much admired in France, so that he obtained in that age the honourable appellation of the poet of France. His genius was certainly great, and his conceptions sublime, yet he was deficient in judgment. His works consist of hymns, odes, elegies, sonnets, &c. but in his amorous poetry he does not always adhere to that delicacy of expression which virtue approves.

RONSIN, Charles Philip, a native of Soissons. The French revolution opened a scene for the display of the impetuous passions and bold designs of his character, and by the influence of his friends Danton and Marat, he was soon promoted to the office of war minister, and then to the command of the revolutionary army. In La Vendée, and at Meaux his steps were traced by all the horrors of open murder and secret assassination, but on his return to Paris, he was soon marked for destruction when he attempted to raise the power of the communes above the convention. He was guillotined 24th March, 1794, aged 42, and met death with an undaunted countenance. He was the author of some tragedies, Lewis XII.—Arenophile, &c. which, though acted, possess not much merit.

ROODSEUS, John Albert, a native of Hoorn in Holland, eminent as a portrait painter, whose pieces were highly finished and delicately coloured. He died 1674, aged 59.

ROOKE, Sir George, a brave admiral, born of a respectable family in Kent, 1650. He was educated for a learned profession, but his father yielded at last to his wish to serve in the navy, and in this favourite employment he soon distinguished himself. His most glorious exploits were in saving the Smyrna fleet from a French squadron, in taking the almost impregnable fortress of Gibraltar, 1703, in destroying the French ships at the battle of La Hogue, in the affair of Malaga, and at the glorious action before Vigo. His brilliant services, though acknowledged with gratitude by William, were disregarded by the whig party, which swayed the kingdom in Anne's reign, and the gallant admiral, because he voted in the House of Commons against the ministry, was considered as no longer fit to serve his country, and retired, neglected, to his seat in Kent, where he died 24th Jan. 1708-9. He was buried in Canterbury cathedral. His fortune was very moderate, and he truly said, in making his will, "the little I leave was honestly gotten, never cost a sailor a tear, or the nation a farthing."

ROOKE, Laurence, an English astronomer and geometrician, born at Deptford in Kent, 1623, and educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge, from which, after taking the degree of M.A. he removed 1650 to Wadham college, Oxford. In 1652, he was chosen astronomical professor at Gresham college, which he exchanged three years after for the chair of geometry. He was one of the first members of the Royal society, to whose formation he greatly and zealously contributed. He died at Gresham college, 1662. His works are Observations on Comets—Methods of Observing Eclipses of the Moon—Observations on the Eclipses of Jupiter's Satellites—Directions to Seamen going to the Indies.

ROOME, Edward, a political writer, appointed solicitor to the treasury, 1729. He wrote some satirical papers called Pasquin, in which he abused Pope, and the offended poet in return gave him a conspicuous place in his Dunciad. He died 10th Dec. 1729, and after his death appeared "the Jovial Crew," a play, acted with some degree of success.

ROORE, James, a native of Antwerp, who distinguished himself as an historical painter, and died 1747, aged 61.

ROOS, John Hendrick, a citizen of Ottenburg, born 1631, eminent as a painter. His portraits, and particularly his landscapes, were admired. Theodore, his brother, was also a good artist, and died 1698. His son Philip was equally celebrated, and another son, who died 1731, aged 72, also inherited the abilities of the family as a superior artist.

ROOT, Jesse, chief justice of Connecticut, was graduated at New-Jersey college in 1756. In 1776, he was elected a delegate from Connecticut to congress, and again in 1778, and continued in the station until 1783. In 1777, he was a short time in the army at Peekskill, and held the rank of colonel. In 1789, he was appointed a judge of the supreme Court of Connecticut, and in 1798, chief justice. He continued in this office until 1807, after which he was a member of the legislature, and in 1808, one of the electors of president and vice president. He died at Coventry, April 5, 1822, aged 85. Judge Root was a member of the American academy, and of the Connecticut academy of arts and sciences. He published in 1798, Reports of Cases adjudged in the court of Errors of Connecticut, from July 1789, to June 1793, and a second volume in 1802.  L.

ROQUE, John de la, member of the academy of belles lettres at Marseilles, wrote a Voyage into Arabia Felix, 12mo.; into Palestine; into Syria and Mount Libanus, and assisted his brother Anthony in the composition of the Mercure de France. He died at Paris, 8th December, 1745, aged 84. Anthony, who wrote Medea and Jason; and Theone, two tragedies, died at Paris, 1744, aged 72.

RORENMULLER, John George, a German divine and critic, was born in 1736 at Ummersstadt in the county of Hildburghausen. In 1773 he was appointed to the divinity professorship at Erlangen, whence he removed in 1783 to Giessen and in 1785 to Leipsic, where he principally contributed to the foundation of a free-school, and died in 1815. He published—1. Scholia on the New Testament. 2. Historia et Facta interpretationis librorum Sacrorum. 3. Sermons.—W. B.

ROSA, Alba Cariera, a Venetian lady, celebrated for her talents in crayon painting and miniatures. Her great correctness, delicacy, and judgment, have been long and deservedly admired. She died 1755, aged 85.

ROSA, Salvator, a painter. Vid. SALVATOR.

ROSAMOND, daughter of Walter de

Clifford, lord Hereford, is celebrated in history as the fair mistress of the second Henry. To conceal this amour from his jealous queen, Henry, it is said, removed the frail beauty to a labyrinth in Woodstock park, where, however, his wife discovered her and obliged her to take poison. Some authors declare that the fair Rosamond died at Godstow nunnery, near Oxford, and that she was buried there. She had two sons by Henry, William, surnamed Longsword, and Jeffery, afterwards archbishop of York.

Roscius, Quintus, a celebrated Roman actor. He was a native of Gaul, and came to Rome, where he became acquainted with Cicero, and the other great men of the age, and acquired such high celebrity as a dramatic performer, that he was allowed a public salary. He died about 61 B. C.

ROSCOMON, Wentworth Dillon, earl of, an English poet, born in Ireland, 1633. He was brought up in England, but the commotions of the times, and the impeachment of his uncle, lord Strafford, drove him from the country to Caen, where he finished his education under the great Bochart. He afterwards travelled to Italy, and at the restoration came to England, where he was honourably received by Charles II. and made captain of the band of pensioners. He nearly ruined himself by gaming, and by the vicious indulgences prevalent at a corrupted court; but when master of horse to the dutchess of York, he prudently married Frances, daughter of lord Burlington, widow of colonel Courtney, and then began to devote himself to literature and poetry, and to plan, with Dryden, a design to fix and refine the English language. He died of the gout, which was improperly treated by a French empiric, 17th Jan. 1684, and was buried in Westminster abbey. His poems are few, and of those the best are, his Essay on translated Verse; and his translation of Horace's Art of Poetry. Though perhaps not a sublime poet, he certainly is a correct one, and he has the singular merit of being the only moral writer in Charles's days.

ROSE, George, a statesman, was the son of an episcopal clergyman at Brechin, in the shire of Angus, and born there June 11, 1744. He was brought up under an uncle, who kept a school near London, after which he went into the navy, and became a purser; but, by the interest of the earl of Marchmont, he was taken from thence, and made keeper of the records in the exchequer. Here his talents for business were soon discovered, and he was appointed to superintend the publication of the Domesday Book; after which he was employed to complete the journals of the Lords, in 31 vols. folio. From this period his advancement was rapid, and his ser-VICES were duly appreciated, and engaged by almost every administration. Mr. Pitt, in particular, placed unbounded confidence in his judgment on subjects of trade and finance; and when that great man returned to power, after the short peace, Mr. Rose was made president of the board of trade, and treasurer of the navy. On the death of Mr. Pitt, another change occurred; but when the administration, formed by lord Grenville, retired, Mr. Rose resumed his former station, and continued in it till his death, which happened at Cuffnells, his seat in Hampshire, Jan. 13, 1818. He published—1. A Report on the Records, fol. 2. A brief Examination into the Increase of the Revenues, Commerce, and Navigation, of Great Britain. 3. A Pamphlet on Friendly Societies. 4. Considerations on the Debt due by the Civil List. 5. Observations on the Poor Laws. 6. Observations on the Historical Work of the late Right Hon. Charles James Fox, with a narrative of the events which occurred in the Enterprize of the Earl of Argyle, in 1685, by Sir Patrick Hume, 4to. 7. A Letter to Lord Melville, relative to the creation of a naval arsenal at Northfleet. 8. Observations respecting the Public Expenditure, and the influence of the Crown. 9. A Speech delivered in the House of Commons on the Report of the Bullion Committee. 10. A Speech relative to the Corn Laws. Mr. Rose presented to the late King a manuscript translation of the History of Poland, which is in the Royal library.—W. B.

ROSE, Samuel, a lawyer, was born in 1767, at Chiswick, where he was educated under his father Dr. William Rose, who conducted an academy there many years. He next went to Glasgow, where he gained several prizes; after which he attended the courts of law at Edinburgh, and in 1786, entered himself a student of Lincoln's Inn. In 1796, he was called to the bar. He died of a consumption in 1804. Mr. Rose wrote the Life of Goldsmith, and edited Comyns's Reports, and Digest.—W. B.

ROSEWELL, Thomas, a native of Somersetshire, educated at Oxford, and ejected in 1662 from his living of Strode for non-conformity. He afterwards became eminent among the dissenters; but in 1684 he was accused of high treason, because, in his discourse addressed to his congregation at Rotherhithe, he had spoken with contempt and ridicule of the king's pretensions to cure scrophulous disorders. On this slight accusation, he was tried and condemned, but pardoned by Charles II. He died 1691, aged 61.

ROSNUS, John, a learned German, born at Eisenac, Thuringia, 1550. He was educated at Jena, and in 1592, became preacher of the cathedral of Naumberg in Saxony, where he died of the plague, 1626. The best known of his works is Romanorum Antiquitatum Libri decem, a most valuable composition, of which the best editions are those of Amsterdam, 1685, 4to. and of Utrecht, 1701, 4to. He wrote besides, de Præcis Romanis Gentibus, &c.

ROSOI, Barnaby Firmin du, a French writer, born at Paris, 1745. He solicited the public attention by various dramatic pieces, which, though acted with applause, possess little merit. He was also author of a romance—the Annals of Toulouse, &c. but though a voluminous writer, he yet continued poor. At the revolution he distinguished himself in favour of the unfortunate monarch, by the publication of his gazette, called l'Ami du Roi, and in consequence of the unyielding independence of his principles, he was marked for death. In his last moments he wished to benefit mankind by soliciting that his blood might be extracted from his veins, and transfused into the body of an old man, which was rejected. He was executed by the light of torches, Aug. 1792.

ROSS, Alexander, a Scotch prelate, born at Aberdeen, 1640, and educated at St. Andrews. He was, in 1686, made bishop of Edinburgh; but the revolution put an end to his power, and to the episcopal authority in Scotland. He died at Edinburgh, 1720, aged 80. He was author of some tracts now little known.

ROSS, Alexander, author of Virgilius Evangelizans, a singular canto on the life of Christ, extracted all from Virgil—and other tracts, was born in Aberdeen, and became master of Southampton grammar-school, and chaplain to the first Charles. He died 1654, aged 64.

ROSS, John, a native of Herefordshire, educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, where he took his degree of D.D. 1756. He afterwards obtained Frome vicarage, Somersetshire, and in 1778, on the death of bishop Keppel, was preferred to the see of Exeter. He wrote a Defence of Dr. Middleton against the attacks of Mr. Markland, 1746, and in 1749, edited Cicero's Epistles ad Familiares, in 2 vols. 8vo. He published besides some single sermons, and died 1792.

ROSS, George, one of the signers of the declaration of American independence, was an eminent lawyer of Lancaster county, Pennsylvania.

ROSSI, John Victor, or JANUS NICIUS ERITHREUS, a Roman, of noble birth, who devoted himself totally to studious pursuits. He died 15th Nov. 1647, aged about 70. He wrote Pinacotheca Imaginum Illustr. Virorum, 8vo.—Epistolæ, 2 vols.—Dialogi, 8vo.—Exempla Virtutum et Vitiorum, Svo.—Eudemix Libri decem, Svo.

ROSSI, Jerome, a learned native of Ravenna, physician to Clement VIII. He died 8th Sept. 1607. He wrote a valuable History of Ravenna—besides treatises de Distillatione Liqueurum—de Melonibus, &c.

Rossi, Bernard Marie de, a native of Forly, educated at Florence. He became theological professor to the Dominicans of Venice, and declined all the ecclesiastical honours offered to him. He wrote several works on historical and antiquarian subjects, the best known of which are his Account of the Church of Aquileia. He died 1775, aged 88.

ROSSLYN, Alexander Wedderburn, earl of, an able lawyer, descended from an ancient family, and born in Scotland, 13th Feb. 1733. He was educated at Edinburgh university, and called to the Scotch bar, 1752; but he was ambitious of a wider sphere for the exertion of his abilities, and he came the next year to London, and entered at the Inner Temple. He was in 1757 called to the bar, and six years after, in consequence of his merit, he was appointed king's counsel. In parliament, where he sat as member for Richmond, he distinguished himself as an able and well-informed orator in support of Mr. George Grenville's administration, and he zealously espoused the cause of the mother country in her struggles to reduce the revolted American colonies. Mr. Wedderburn was appointed solicitor general in 1771, attorney general in 1778, and created, June, 1780, baron Loughborough, and made chief justice of the Common Pleas. He supported the coalition ministry; and was in 1783 made first commissioner for keeping the great seal; but was dismissed with lord North and Mr. Fox, whose opposition to the new ministry he ably seconded in parliament. In 1793, however, he accepted the seals under Mr. Pitt's administration, and was in 1801, created earl Rosslyn, and soon after resigned the office of chancellor to retire to privacy. He died suddenly, 2d Jan. 1805, at his seat at Baylis, near Salt-hill, and was buried in St. Paul's cathedral. He was twice married; by his first wife he had no issue, and by the second, sister of the late lord Courtney, whom he married 1782, he had a son, who died an infant. As he left no issue, he obtained the grant of his earldom to his relation sir James St. Clair Erskine. As a lawyer and a judge, lord Rosslyn supported a most respectable character; he proved himself on the bench the friend of the seamen, whose rights had been invaded by their commanders; but he was censured by some for arbitrarily placing at the trial of the Southwark rioters, in one indictment, men who were strangers to each other, and who thus were deprived of the privileges afforded by the law even to the greatest criminals. He was author of a pamphlet, called "Observations on the State of the English Prisons, and the Means of Improving them," a work of merit, and dictated by the purest humanity.

Rosso, Le, or MASTER ROUX, a native of Florence, who, by studying the works of Michael Angelo and Parmesan, acquired celebrity as a painter, even without the assistance of a master. Francis I. appointed him superintendent of works at Fontainebleau, and rewarded his attention and services by a canonry of the holy chapel. He was so much affected by the tortures which were inflicted on his friend Pellegriin, whom he had accused falsely of robbing him of a sum of money, that in a melancholy moment of reflection, he took poison, and soon after died, 1541, aged 45. His heads of old men, and his female figures were much admired.

ROTARI, Peter, a native of Verona, who acquired great celebrity as a portrait and historical painter. He was, in 1756, at Petersburg, where he was patronised by the court, and took the portraits of the imperial family, and of the nobility, and he afterwards returned to Italy. The year of his death is not ascertained.

ROTGANS, Luke, a native of Amsterdam, who engaged in the wars of Holland in 1672, but after two years service, retired to his country seat, where he devoted himself to poetry. His epic poem, in eight books, on the Life of William III. is held in high estimation by the Dutch. He wrote also other poems, and shares with Vondel and Antonicides the honour of being at the head of the bards of Holland. He died of the smallpox, 3d Nov. 1710, aged 66.

ROTHENAMER, John, a native of Munich, eminent as a painter, and as the successful imitator of Tintoret. His historical pieces possessed merit, and he was liberally patronised by the emperor Rodolph II. He died 1604, aged 40.

ROTHERAM, John, a native of Yorkshire, who studied physic and took his medical degrees, at Edinburgh. He published a Philosophical Inquiry into the Nature and Properties of Water, and other medical works, and died 1787.

ROTHERAM, John, author of an Apology for the Athanasian Creed; Essay on the Truth of Christianity; Discourse on Faith, and its Connexion with good Works, Svo. and other religious tracts, was rector of Houghton-le-Spring, Durham, and died 1788.

ROTHMAN, Christopher, author of a Treatise on Comets, and Letters on Astronomy, addressed to Tycho Brahe, was astronomer to the landgrave of Hesse, and died 1592.

ROTRON, John de, a native of Dreux, distinguished as a poet, and as a magistrate. While an epidemic disorder raged in Dreux, and all fled for safety, the humane Rotron remained to administer to the necessities of the poor; and in answer to his brother, who earnestly solicited his departure, he said, "the bells are tolling for the 22d person who has died this day, and how soon soever they may announce my departure I know not, but I will not desert my post." Soon after the contagion carried him off, 28th June, 1650, in his 41st year. He was patronised by Richelieu, but never would condescend, to please his patron, to attack the Cid of Corneille, a poet whom he revered and loved. He wrote 37 plays, tragedies, and comedies, with vigour, spirit, and success, of which the best known are Chosroes, Antigone, and Wenceslaus, tragedies.

ROUBILLAC, Francis, a native of Switzerland, eminent for his beautiful statuary. He was engaged in finishing some of the most splendid of the monuments erected in Westminster Abbey, and died 1762, in London, where he had been for some time settled.

ROUCHER, J. A. a native of Montpellier, distinguished as a poet. He hailed the approach of the French revolution as an era which was to bless the earth; but when he beheld its atrocities, he spoke with freedom against the tyrants whose violent measures deluged the kingdom with blood. His observations drew down upon him the resentment of the revolutionary tribunal, and he was guillotined, July 1794, and he met death with great composure and resignation, after seeing 37 heads struck off before he suffered. His chief work is the Months, a poem in 12 cantos, which, though occasionally tedious and weak, contains beautiful and animated descriptions. He also translated Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations, and some of his fugitive pieces appeared after his death, 2 vols. 8vo.

ROUELLE, William Francis, a native of Matthieu, near Caen, who practised as an apothecary at Paris, and gave lectures in chymistry in the royal botanical garden. He contributed some valuable things to the memoirs of the academy of sciences, and left his chymical lectures in MS. He died at Paris, 3d Aug. 1770, aged 67. His brother Hilary-Marin, succeeded him as lecturer in chymistry, and died 1st April, 1779.

ROUILLE, Peter Julian, a Jesuit of Tours, professor of theology and philosophy to his order. He was engaged with Catrou in the composition of the Roman History, in 21 vols. 4to. and also assisted in revising the Revolutions of Spain by d'Orleans. The Journal de Trevoux, was conducted by him from 1733 to 1737. He died at Paris, 17th May, 1740, aged 57.

ROUS, Francis, one of the fanatics of the commonwealth. He was of a good family in Cornwall, and represented Truro in the long parliament, and became speaker of Barebone's parliament under Cromwell. His violent speeches against the bishops and against Arminianism, rendered him a favourite with the usurper, and he was made provost of Eton, though a layman. His works, which breathe the same spirit of enthusiasm, virulence, and bigotry, which he every where exhibited, appeared fol. 1657. He died 1659. He was called in ridicule, the illiterate Jew of Eton.

ROUSE, John, author of the Antiquities of Warwick—a Chronicle of the Kings of England—a History of the two Universities, was a native of Warwick, and died there, 1491.

ROUSSEAU, John Baptist, an eminent French poet, born at Paris, 1669. Though his father was a shoemaker, yet he received a decent education, and early displayed a strong and correct taste for poetry. In 1688, he went as page in the embassy to Denmark, and from thence passed with marshal Tallard, as his secretary, to the English court. Distinction in literature, and not in opulence, was his chief aim, and therefore he refused about this time some honourable appointments which would have set him above dependence, and was better pleased to be enrolled member of the academy of inscriptions and belles lettres. About this time some satirical verses, very severe and grossly abusive, were produced as his own, and though he solemnly declared his innocence, and pronounced them forgeries invented by his enemies, he was tried by the parliament, and banished the kingdom. The sentence was harsh, as even Voltaire, his personal enemy, admits, and he ever after protested that the treatment he received was unjust, cruel, and illiberal. From France he came to Switzerland, where he was protected by de Luc the French ambassador, and he afterwards went to Baden, where he was noticed by prince Eugene, and with him visited Vienna. In 1721 he came to London, where he published a collection of his poems, 2 vols. 4to. and by that means found his resources respectable. He returned to Paris incognito, 1739, and listened to those offers of reconciliation which his friends promised to procure for him; but soon after he was attacked by a fit of apoplexy at the Hague, and died of that dreadful visitation at Brussels, 17th March, 1741. His poems, consisting of odes, epigrams, epistles, comedies in verse, &c. have been published in 3 vols. 4to. and 4 vols. 12mo. 1743. His poetry, particularly his odes, in Voltaire's opinion, are beautiful, diversified, and abound with images. In his private character he was overbearing and unsubmitive; he quarrelled with his patron prince Eugene, and with the same levity and rudeness affronted the duke of Aremberg, who had kindly and liberally noticed him.

ROUSSEAU, James, a French painter born at Paris, 1630. He studied in Italy, and was patronised by Lewis XIV. but as he was a protestant, he left his country to avoid persecution. He next went to Holland, and afterwards visited England, where he was employed by the duke of Montague. His landscapes and architectural representations are much admired. He died in London, 1693.

ROUSSEAU, John James, a celebrated philosopher, born 28th June, 1712, at Geneva, where his father was a watchmaker. His mother died in bringing him into the world, and his birth, as he observes, was the first of his misfortunes. Though of a weakly constitution, his mind was strong and active, and the reading of Plutarch and Tacitus, which adorned the shelves of his father's shop, opened his ideas, and inspired him with courage. Some juvenile frolic induced him to quit his father's house, and without protectors he changed his religion to procure bread. By the care of the bishop of Anneci, in whose house he solicited an asylum, he was placed with Mad. de Warens, a lady who had lately abandoned the protestant for the catholic tenets, and devoted part of her fortune to deeds of charity. Rousseau some time after quitted the hospitable roof of this amiable female, who had been to him a mother and a friend, and as he was fond of music he began to teach it at Chamberri. From Chamberri he came, in 1741, to Paris, and two years after went as secretary with Montague, the French ambassador, to Venice; but his proud and restless spirit could not long bear the confinement of servitude, and in consequence of a quarrel with his employer, he returned to Paris. Here he was noticed by Dupin, the farmer general, who gave him an office in his department, and at last, in 1750, he began his literary career, and obtained the prize of the academy of Dijon, on the subject, Whether the re-establishment of the arts and sciences has been conducive to the purity of morals? He adopted, by the advice of his friend Diderot, the negative position, and defended it with such eloquence and success, that he excited a number of literary antagonists against him. He next attracted the public attention by his discourse on the cause of inequality among men, and on the origin of society, a work of singular character, and which unites the boldest flights of imagination with the most incoherent ideas, and elevates savage nature above the comforts of domestic and social life. This composition, dedicated in animated language to the republic of Geneva, restored him to the favour of his native country, and to the bosom of the protestant faith. After returning for a while to Paris, he retired to solitude, and devoted himself to study. His letter to d'Alembert, written about this time, and published in 1758, on the subject of establishing a theatre at Geneva, drew upon him the censures and the persecution of Voltaire, and it was remarked with surprise that this bold advocate for the purity of morals against the contagion of theatrical representation had himself written a comedy and a pastoral, which had been exhibited on the Paris stage. His next work was the Dictionary of Music, which contains many valuable articles, but not without inaccuracies. His New Heloise appeared in 1761, in 6 vols. 12mo. and, notwithstanding its many defects, and its immorality, excited much of the public attention, for its bold delineation of character, its interesting details, and its fascinating language. Heloise was followed, in 1762, by Emilius, in 4 vols. 12mo. a moral romance, still of greater celebrity. In this popular work the philosopher wishes to leave in education every thing to nature, and whilst he inveighs in warm language against the luxuries, the vices, and the prejudices of the age, he speaks truths worthy of Plato and of Tacitus. It is, however, much to be lamented that in tracing out the education of a young man, and in drawing a most affecting picture of the benign author of Christianity, and of the sublime beauties of the gospel, he attacks with blind misguided fury the miracles and the prophecies on which that divine revelation rests, and builds his system of salvation on reason and natural religion. The book, though popular, was exposed to the censures and condemnation of the parliament of Paris, and the author hastened out of France. He sought an asylum at Geneva, but the gates of the city were shut against the disgraced philosopher, and he retired to Neufchatel in Switzerland, where he began to write a defence of his works, and of his principles. Here, however, the populace was roused to acts of violence, by the pulpit discourses of the ministers of the neighbourhood, and therefore fearing greater insults than the pelting of his widows, he fled from Neufchatel. Berne, where he sought an asylum, was shut against him, and he therefore hastened to Strasburg, where the marshal de Contades relieved his necessities, and enabled him to proceed to Paris, in which place he expected the protection of David Hume. With the English philosopher he travelled to London, and found in this country a peaceful residence; but whilst he fled from persecution the citizen of Geneva still longed for celebrity. In England he was a common man, and not the favourite of the people, admired and applauded, and therefore he soon quarrelled with his protector, Hume, and left the kingdom in disgust. He passed through Amiens and returned to Paris, where he was permitted to remain, provided he wrote nothing offensive against religion or the government. Ever restless and suspicious he now appeared in the Armenian dress, and when flattered by the homage of those who revered his abilities, he declared himself insulted, and began to interpret the approbation of the world as a regular system of persecution excited against him by men of letters. The last years of his life were spent in the company of a few friends, and while he seemed to condemn the fallacy of former opinions, he resigned himself to the peaceful studies and solitude of declining age. He died of an apoplexy at Ermenonville, the estate of M. de Girardin, 30 miles from Paris, 2d July, 1778, aged 66; and in the isle of Poplars, in this beautiful retreat, are inscribed these words: "Ici repose l'homme de la nature et de la verité! Vitam impendere vero." Rousseau, who may be called the Diogenes of modern times, married in 1769, at Bourgoin in Dauphiné, a woman of the name of le Vasseur, who, without elegance of manners and without mental attainments, exercised over him the most absolute dominion. She, however, gave him in return all the attentions of a nurse and of a friend, and accompanied him in all his wanderings at Montmorenci, Geneva, Berne, Motiers, Neufchatel, London, Brienne, Bourgoin, Paris, and Ermenonville. The works of this singular character have been collected in 33 vols. 8vo. and 12mo. His confessions were published after his death. His "Pensées" have appeared in a separate form, and are valuable, as they exhibit much of the original character of the man, and the most sublime truths of morality and of religion, without the prejudices, the passions, and the absurdities of the misanthrope.

ROUSSEAU, Samuel, a learned printer, was born in London, in 1763. He served his apprenticeship in the office of Mr. Nichols, by whom he was occasionally employed in collecting remains of antiquity. While an apprentice and journeyman he made himself master of the Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Syriac, Persian, and Arabic languages: with some knowledge of the French. Yet these acquisitions did not raise him to independence; and he died in very indigent circumstances in 1820. He compiled—1. Flowers of Persian Literature—2. Dictionary of Words used in the East Indies—3. Persian and English Vocabulary—4. Grammar of the Persian Language; and other works.—W. B.

ROUSSEL, William, a benedictine of Conches in Normandy. He devoted himself to literary pursuits at Rheims, and died at Argenteuil, 5th Oct. 1717, aged 59. He ably translated St. Jerome's Letters, 3 vols. 8vo. and began a literary history of France, which was finished by Rivet.

ROUSSEL, Peter, a native of Ax in Pamiers, who took his medical degrees at Montpellier, and was the pupil of the great Bordeu. He published Systeme Physique et Moral de la Femme, 12mo. a work of great merit, and began a work on the same subject on man. He died at Chateaudun, 1803, aged 60, and his eulogy was pronounced by his friend Bordeu.

ROUX, Augustin, a native of Gascony, who studied medicine, and took his degrees at Bourdeaux. He published a Treatise on Purifying Liquors—Memoirs of Chymistry—Typographical Annals—New portable Encyclopedie, 2 vols. 8vo.—and also continued Vandermonde's Journal of Medicine. He died 1776, aged 50.

ROWE, Nicholas, an eminent English poet, born at Little Bedfordshire, 1673. From Highgate school he went to Westminster, under the tuition of the great Busby, and at the age of 16 removed to the Middle Temple. Though his abilities might have raised him to eminence in the law, yet he preferred literature to all other pursuits, and at the age of 25 he produced his first tragedy, "the Ambitious Stepmother," which was received with universal applause. Tamerlane; the Fair Penitent; Ulysses; the Royal Convert; Jane Shore; and Lady Jane Gray, succeeded, and with equal approbation; but the poet found his powers inadequate to the ease and sprightliness of comedy, and his "Biter" was so little popular that it is not even inserted in his works. His literary fame, made him known to the great; the duke of Queensbury, when secretary of state, made him his public secretary, and on the Hanoverian succession he was appointed poet laureat, and land surveyor of the customs of the port of London, and afterwards chancellor Parker's secretary to the presentations, and clerk to the prince of Wales's council. He died 6th Dec. 1718, aged 45, and was interred in Westminster abbey, lamented not only by Pope's muse, but by many characters of merit and virtue, by whom he was highly esteemed. He translated into verse Lucan's Pharsalia, and Quillet's Callipædia, and edited Shakspeare's plays, with an account of his life. Rowe is still a popular poet on the stage, and his Jane Shore, as Johnson says, is always seen and heard with pity. Though he does not often excite terror, yet he elevates the sentiments, and though he seldom pierces the breast, he always delights the ear, and often improves the understanding.

Rowe, Elizabeth, an English lady, known for her genius and virtues, daughter of Mr. Singer, a dissenting minister, and born at Ilchester, 11th Sept. 1674. She early displayed a poetical genius, and in her 22d year were published some of her poems under the title of poems on several occasions by Philomela. Her talents and virtues rendered her soon a favourite with the public, and among her respectable suiters she had the poet Prior; but she disregarded all applications till 1710, when she gave her hand to Mr. Thomas Rowe, a gentleman already known for his literary acquirements. After his death, which happened 1715, and which she recorded in one of her best elegies, she lived in retirement at Frome, in the cultivation of the muses. She died of an apoplexy, 20th Feb. 1736-7. After her death, agreeable to her request, her devotions were published by Dr. Watts, under the title of Devout Exercises of the Heart, &c. and in 1739, appeared her miscellaneous works in prose and verse, 2 vols. 8vo. These works contain the History of Joseph, a poem—Friendship in Death—Letters Moral, &c. and enforce by the strongest conviction and the most interesting examples, the love of virtue and the practice of every good and benevolent action.

Rowe, Thomas, the husband of the preceding, was son of Benoni Rowe, a dissenting minister. He was born in London, and educated at the Charter-house, and at Leyden university. In 1710, two years after his return from the continent, he married Miss Singer, with whom he lived five years in the enjoyment of every domestic comfort, till a lingering illness put an end to his life, May, 1715, in his 28th year. Among other things he wrote an ode to his wife, some time after his marriage, under the title of Delia, a proof of his love and of her many virtues. He also undertook to give a translation of Plutarch's Lives, but finished only eight.

Rowe, Thomas, a native of Petherwin, Devonshire, educated at Exeter college, Oxford. He became minister of Litchet, Dorsetshire, but was ejected in 1662, for nonconformity, and afterwards took the care of a dissenting congregation at Wimbourn, where he died 1698. He was author of the Christian's Work, &c.

Rowe, John, an English divine, born at Crediton, Devonshire, and educated at New-Inn-hall, Oxford. He was for some time a popular minister at Witney, Oxfordshire, and then removed to Tiverton, in his native county, and in 1654 settled as preacher in Westminster abbey, from which he was ejected, 1662, for nonconformity. He died 12th October, 1677, and was buried in Bunhill fields. His "Love of Christ," in 30 sermons, are a much esteemed publication. He wrote besides some practical treatises.

Rowland, Henry, a native of Anglesey, known for a valuable and interesting history of his native island, called Mona Restaurata, in 4to. He was in orders, and died 1722.

Rowland, David S. congregational minister of Windsor, Connecticut, was born at Fairfield, in that state, in 1719, and graduated at Yale college in 1743. He was first settled in Plainfield, and afterwards at Providence, Rhode-Island, where he remained twelve or thirteen years. At the commencement of the revolution he removed, and was installed, March 27th, 1776, pastor of the first church in Windsor, where he continued, greatly esteemed for his talents, piety, and usefulness, till his death, January 13th, 1794, in the seventy-fifth year of his age, and forty-seventh of his ministry.  L.

Rowley, a monk of Bristol, said to have flourished in the 15th century. Some particulars of his writings, either real or fictitious, are mentioned under Chatterton.

Rowley, William, a dramatic writer in the reign of the first Charles, educated at Cambridge. He was the friend of the learned of his own times, and is spoken of with great commendation by Wood. He left five plays, in one of which he was assisted by Shakspeare.

Rowley, Samuel, a dramatic writer in Charles the first's reign, but of no great celebrity. Two historical plays by him are mentioned, but with little commendation.

Rowley, William, an eminent physician, descended from an Irish family, born in London, 18th November, 1743. After applying himself to the medical profession, he served in the army, and was at the siege of Belleisle, and at the taking of the Havana, and his conduct was so meritorious that he was employed by the ministry under the patronage of lord Keppel to make professional visits to Cuba, and all the leeward islands, for which he was honourably rewarded. He settled afterwards in London, and acquired an extensive practice, but though he was honoured with a doctor's degree from St. Andrews, and had been admitted bachelor of medicine from St. Alban's hall, Oxford; some objections were made in that university to his obtaining the next degree, and he never took it. His publications were respectable in number, and all on medical subjects. Though a man of great observation and of extensive experience, it is remarkable that either from the love of singularity, or from prejudice, he opposed the vaccine inoculation, and thus impeded by the weight of his authority the adoption of a system which bids fair to extirpate one of the greatest scourges of the human race. This excellent man, whose humanity and benevolence were as conspicuous as his medical reputation was extensive, died 17th March, 1806, and was privately buried in St. James's chapel, Tottenham court road.

ROWNING, John, an able mathematician, fellow of Magdalen college, Cambridge, and afterwards rector of Anderby, Lincolnshire. He died in Carey-street, London, November, 1771, aged 72. His compendious system of natural philosophy, 2 vols. Svo. is a popular work, and has often been reprinted, and was once a standing class-book at Cambridge.

ROXBURGH, William, a physician and botanist, was born at Craigie, in Ayrshire, in 1759. He received his education at Edinburgh, where he served his time as a surgeon; after which he went to India, and settled at Madras. Having communicated several papers on natural history to the Royal Society, he was appointed keeper of the botanical garden at Calcutta, where he formed an intimacy with Sir William Jones, and became a member of the Asiatic Society, whose volumes exhibited abundant proofs of his talents. Dr. Roxburgh made several important discoveries, particularly in the colouring matter of the lacca insect, and the cultivation of hemp in Bengal, for which he received three gold medals from the Society of Arts. He died at Edinburgh in 1815. His other works are—1. Plants of the coasts of Coromandel, 2 vols. 4to. 2. Botanical Description of Swietenia, 4to. 3. An Essay on the Natural Order of the Scitamineæ, 4to.—W.B.

ROY, Julian le, a native of Tours, who, from his earliest years showed great mechanical knowledge. He came to Paris at the age of 18, and in 1713, was admitted into the society of clock-makers. He raised his profession to the highest pitch of excellence, and his watches acquired the same celebrity in France, as those of Graham in England. He died at Paris, 20th Sept. 1759, aged 74, leaving four sons. Peter the eldest was watch-maker to the king, and published Memoirs for the Clock-Makers of Paris, 4to.—Etrennes Chronometriques—treatise on the Labours of Harrison and le Roy for the discovery of Longitude at Sea, 4to.—Letter to M. de Marivetz. He died 1785. Julian David, another son, was member of the national institute, and became professor of architecture. He travelled over Greece and other countries, and published Ruins of the Finest Monuments of Greece, fol. a work of merit—History of the Construction of Christian Temples, Svo.—Observations on the Edifices of the Ancients—on the Marine, Ships, Sails, &c. of the Ancients. He died of an apoplexy at the end of Jan. 1803, aged 75.

ROYSE, George, D.D. an English divine, born at Martock, Somersetshire, 1655, and educated at Edmund hall, Oxford. He became fellow of Oriel college, and was afterwards chaplain to king William, and to Tillotson the primate, who gave him Newington Rectory, Oxfordshire. He was elected provost of Oriel 1690, and afterwards was made dean of Bristol, and died April, 1708.

ROYSE, John, A.M. a popular preacher under Cromwell, educated at Pembroke hall, Cambridge. He was ejected in 1662, and died the next year. His "Spirit's Touch Stone" is admired.

ROZEE, N. a native of Leyden. She excelled in the use of the pencil, but in the finishing of her pictures she applied, instead of colours, silk floss on the ground, which she disposed with the highest effect, and with the most correct taste. Her landscapes, portraits, and historical pieces, all finished in this delicate manner, are much admired. She died 1682, aged 50.

ROZIER, Francis, an eminent agriculturist, born at Lyons, 24th Jan. 1734. Though he embraced the ecclesiastical profession, and became doctor in divinity, and prior of Nanteuil, he devoted himself deeply to the study of his favourite science, and to botany, chymistry, and natural history. At Paris, he was noticed by the great and the powerful, but he sought for retirement at Beziers, where he composed and finished his valuable course of agriculture in 10 vols. 4to. In 1788, he returned to Lyons, where the academy admitted him among its most honourable members. During the revolution he showed himself firm and moderate, but when Lyons was besieged a bomb fell on his bed while he was asleep, and buried his shattered limbs among the ruins of the house, 29th Sept. 1793. He wrote besides Memoirs on making Wine, on Mills and Presses, and other useful works on agricultural and commercial subjects.

RUBENS, Sir Peter Paul, a celebrated painter, born at Cologne, 1577. He studied at Antwerp, from which for a time the civil wars had driven his family; but while he applied to the belles lettres, he displayed a strong partiality for the art of designing. This taste was happily promoted, and after receiving instruction from the best Flemish masters he went to Italy, where he greatly improved himself, especially by studying accurately the colouring of Titian, and all the striking beauties of Julio Romano, of Raphael and other illustrious painters. After an absence of seven years spent in viewing the cabinets of Italy, he returned to Antwerp, where he took a wife, whom after four years of domestic happiness he lost. He afterwards took a second wife of great beauty, whose personal charms it is said, he transfused into his paintings. The fame of his great talents soon spread over Europe, and he was deservedly courted by great men and princes. He was invited to Paris by Mary de Medicis to paint the Luxemburg gallery, and he became such a favourite with the infanta Isabella of Spain, that she sent him as her ambassador to England to negotiate a peace in 1630. During his residence in England, he painted the Banqueting house, and was much noticed by Buckingham, and also by Charles I. who knighted him. On his return to Spain he was honourably received by Philip IV. and made secretary of state in Flanders. He died 1640, leaving an immense fortune behind him. His eldest son Albert succeeded him as secretary in Flanders. Rubens was deservedly held in high esteem, and it is said that few persons passed through Flanders without seeing a man of whose talents and great reputation they had heard so much. Of his many pupils Vandyke acquired the greatest celebrity.

RUBENS, Albert, son of the above, was born at Antwerp, 1614, and gained the esteem of the archduke Leopold William, governor of the Low Countries, by his virtues and intelligence. He wrote de Re Vestiariâ Veterum, præcipue de Lato Clavo—Diatribæ de Gemmâ, Tiberianâ, Augustæ, &c.—Regum et Imperatorum Roman. Numismata, fol.—de Vitâ Flavii Manli Theodori, 12mo. He died 1657.

RUCCELLAI, John, a native of Florence, of illustrious birth. He embraced the ecclesiastical state, and was sent by Leo X. his relation, as ambassador to Francis I. but the death of that pope cut off his hopes of obtaining the purple, though the next pontiff, Clement VII. appointed him governor of St. Angelo. He died in obscurity about 1526, aged 50. He wrote Rosamonde, and Orestes, tragedies, and the Bees, a poem of merit in blank verse, translated into French by Pingeron.

RUCCELLAI, Bernard, a native of Florence, in the 15th century, author of Belum Italicum, printed, London, 1733, in 4to. &c. Another of the same family who embraced the ecclesiastical profession and obtained considerable benefices from the pope. His intimacy with the pope raised him enemies, and he left Italy and retired to France, where he lived in the most effeminate and sumptuous manner. He died at Montpellier, 22d Oct. 1622.

RUDBECK, Olaus, professor of medicine at Upsal, wrote Excercitatio Anatomica, 4to.—Atlantica, sive Manheim Vera Japheti Posterorum Sedes ac Patera, 3 vols. fol. with an Atlas—Leges West-Gothicæ, fol.—collection of Plants on Plates, 2 vols. fol.—Laponia Illustrata, et iter per Upland, 4to.—Dissertation on the Bird called Selai in the Bible, &c. He died 1702, aged 73. His son of the same name was also an eminent physician, and published Dissertatio de Hedera—a Catalogue of the Plants of Lapland—Specimen Lingux Gothicæ, 4to.

RUDDIMAN, Thomas, a learned Scotchman, born in Aberdeenshire, 1684, and educated at Aberdeen. He was made overseer of the king's printing-house, Edinburgh, and for near fifty years continued keeper of the advocates' library there, and distinguished himself for the many valuable books which he edited. He was strongly attached to the Stuart family, and therefore opposed the revolution. His Diplomata et Numismata Scotiae, are admired, but particularly his excellent Latin grammar, with valuable notes. He died at Edinburgh, 1757, aged 84.

RUDING, Rogers, an English divine, was born at Leicester, Aug. 9, 1751. He became fellow of Merton college, Oxford, where he took the degree of bachelor of divinity in 1782. In 1773, he was presented to the college living of Meldun in Surrey, and soon after he was elected a fellow of the society of antiquaries, to whose archæologia he was a contributor. He published "Annals of the coinage of Britain, and its dependencies," in 4 vols. 4to. He died in 1820.—W. B.

RUE, Charles de la, a French orator and poet, born at Paris, 1643. He was educated among the Jesuits, and distinguished himself as a professor of belles lettres and rhetoric, and as an eloquent preacher. He published in 1667, the Conquests of Lewis XIV. a Latin poem, which Corneille translated into French with many high commendations of the original author. He was among the editors of the Dauphin classics, and published Virgil. He wrote also tragedies in Latin and French, which possessed great merit, besides 3 vols. of sermons, and died 1725, aged 82.

RUE, Charles de la, a Benedictine monk, born 1685. He was very learned in Greek and Hebrew, and became the friend and associate of Montfaucon, and by his advice published the works of Origen, in 3 vols. fol. He died 1739.

RUFFHEAD, Owen, an English writer. He published the life of Pope—a collection of statutes at large—and other works, and died 1769.

RUFFI, Anthony de, a learned counsellor of Marseilles. He is author of an History of Marseilles, 2 vols. fol. which was continued by his son Louis Anthony. He wrote besides, the History of the Generals of the Gallies, &c. He died 1689, aged 82, and his son 1724, aged 67.

RUFINUS, a father of the church. He was born at Aquileia, and was the friend and afterwards the antagonist of St. Jerome. He died in Sicily 410. Besides a Latin translation of Josephus, and of some of the works of Origen, he wrote the lives of some of the fathers of the desert, &c.

RUFUS, Ephesius, an ancient Greek anatomical writer in Trajan's reign. He was considered as an able physician, but his works have all perished, and only the Greek names of the parts of the body are preserved from his writings. He wrote treatises on the Diseases of the Reins and Bladder—on the Bile, &c.

RUGENDAS, George Philip, a native of Augsburg, celebrated as a painter. He painted with his left hand. He chiefly excelled in the representations of battles, sieges, and in historical pieces, and died 1742, aged 76.

RUGGLE, George, an English writer, fellow of Clare-hall, Cambridge. He wrote Ignoramus, a Latin comedy of some merit, performed with great applause in the university before James I. 1614. He died about 1640.

RUGGLES, Timothy, a brigadier general, under general Amherst, in the expedition against Canada, was born at Rochester, Massachusetts, October 11th, 1711, and graduated at Harvard college, in 1732. He established himself as a lawyer first at Sandwich, and afterwards at Hardwick, and attained to high respectability in the profession. He served as a brigadier general in the French war, and was second in command in the battle with Dieskaw. In 1756, he was appointed a judge of the court of common pleas for Worcester, and in 1762, chief justice, and held the office till the revolution, when he joined the royal party, and left the state. He had been for many years a member of the legislature, and possessed a large share of influence, and was in 1765 sent a delegate to the congress, which met at New-York, but refused to concur in the measure adopted by it, for which he was reprimanded by order of the legislature. After the war he resided in Nova Scotia, and died in 1793.

RUINKENIUS, David, a native of Stolp in Pomerania, who became professor of belles lettres and history, and librarian, in Leyden university. He died 14th May, 1798, aged 75. He wrote Epistolæ Criticæ in Hesiodi et Homeri Hymnos—de Vitâ et Scriptis Longini—Timæi Sophistiæ Lexicon—Historia Critica Oratorum Græcorum, 2 vols. Svo.—Editions of V. Paterculus, Rutilius Lupus, &c. The life of this able and learned critic has been published by Wyttenbach.

RUINART, Thierry, a Benedictine monk, born at Rheims, 1657. He was an able theologian, and was the associate of Mabillon, in his literary labours. He was author of the Acts of the Martyrs of the Four first centuries, 4to.—History of the Persecution of the Vandals, 4to.—the Life of Mabillon—the Life of Pope Urban V. besides an edition of Gregory of Tours. He died 1709.

RULE, Gilbert, a native of Elgin, educated at Aberdeen, where he became professor of philosophy. He was, in 1659, made principal of his college; but was ejected two years after for nonconformity, after which he went to Leyden, and took his degrees in medicine. At the revolution he was appointed principal of the university of Edinburgh, and died there 1705, aged 77. He wrote some pieces in defence of his nonconformity, and against episcopacy, of little merit. Some specimens of his pulpit oratory are preserved in the Scotch presbyterian eloquence.

RULHIÈRES, N. de, a learned Frenchman, secretary to the French ambassador l'Hopital in Russia, when Peter III. was hurled from his throne. He published a short but very interesting account of this extraordinary event, and afterwards gave a history of the revolution in Poland. He was preparing an account of the French revolution, when he died suddenly, 30th Jan. 1791. He wrote besides a pamphlet of great merit, on the Protestants of France, and two poems on Disputes—les Jeux des Mains. Two volumes of his posthumous works appeared 12mo. 1791.

RULLAND, Martin, a physician of Freisingen in Bavaria, professor of medicine at Lawingen in Swabia, and physician to Rodolphus II. He wrote Medica Practica—Appendix de Dosibus, &c.—Thesaurus Rullandinus—Lexicon Alchymicæ—Hydratica, or a treatise on Mineral Waters. He died at Prague, 1602, aged 70. His son Martin was born at Lawingen, and became physician to the emperor, and died at Prague, 1611, aged 52. He wrote some medical tracts.

RUMPHIUS, George Everard, doctor of medicine in Hanau university, became consul at Amboyna, and paid there particular attention to botanical pursuits. Though he had the misfortune to lose his sight at the age of 43, he yet followed his favourite studies, and by the delicate powers of his taste and of his smell, he still distinguished all the varieties of plants. His learned labours were presented to the public in 1755, with a supplement by John Burmann, in 6 vols. fol. He published besides, Imagines Piscium Testaceorum, fol. 1711, and Political History of Amboyna.

RUMSEY, James, an ingenious mechanic of Berkley county, Virginia, who invented a method of employing steam in navigation, in 1782, and obtained a patent for it from Virginia, in 1787. In 1784 he published a treatise on the subject in controversy with John Fitch, who claimed to have also about the same time discovered a method of propelling vessels by steam. Rumsey's method was carried into effect on a small scale both in the United States and England, but did not succeed. He died at Philadelphia, while publicly delivering a description of his invention. Fitch also, whose invention was subsequent to Rumsey's, obtained a patent for it from Virginia in 1788, and made a trial of it on the Delaware. But it was equally unsuccessful.  L.

RUNDLE, Thomas, a learned prelate, educated at Exeter college, Oxford, where he took the degree of LL.D. 1723. The friendship of lord Talbot, to whom he was chaplain, procured him preferment, and he became archdeacon of Wilts, treasurer of Sarum, rector of Sedgefield, and prebendary of Durham, which he exchanged in 1735, for the see of Derry. He was the intimate friend of the learned and of the polite in his age. A volume of his letters has been printed. He died 1743.

RUNNINGTON, Charles, sergeant at law, was born in Hertfordshire, in 1751. His education was private, and in 1768 he was placed with a special pleader, who employed him in a digest of the law of England. In 1778 he was called to the bar, and in 1787 to the degree of sergeant at law. In 1815, he was appointed commissioner for the relief of insolvent debtors, which office he resigned in 1819. He died at Brighton, Jan. 18, 1821. Sergeant Runnington published—1. Hale's History of the Common Law, 2 vols. 2. Gilbert's Law of Ejectments, 8vo. 3. Rufhead's Statutes at large, 4 vols. 4to. 4. History of the Legal Remedy by Ejectment, and the resulting action for Mesne Process, 8vo.—W. B.

RUPERT, Prince, son of Frederic king of Bohemia, and Elizabeth daughter of James I. visited England at the beginning of the civil wars, and as he had acquired some military knowledge abroad, he was intrusted by Charles with the command of some of his armies, and behaved with spirit and address. Under the second Charles he was placed at the head of the navy, and defeated the Dutch fleet in 1673. In the midst of his military engagements he paid particular attention to the arts and sciences, he was fond of chymistry, and from the accidental observation of a soldier scraping his rusty gun he invented mezzotinto printing, of which he himself executed the first specimen, still to be seen in Evelyn Sculptura, first edition. This gallant prince died 1682.

RUREMOND, John William de, a French fanatic. He believed himself to be inspired in 1580, and commissioned by apostles to restore the tenets of the anabaptists of Munster, and for a while he collected adherents around him, by encouraging them to pillage the rich, whose property he regarded as common to the disciples of Christ, and by permitting them polygamy. He was at last seized, and by order of the duke of Cleves condemned to be burnt by a slow fire. He suffered the punishment with astonishing fortitude, and two of his wives, imitating his example, shared his fate with the same obstinate indifference.

RUSCELLI, Jerome, a native of Viterbo, educated at Venice. He was eminent for his learning, and published Rimario, or a dictionary of Rhymes—Imprese Illustri, or Illustrious Coats of Arms, &c. and died at Rome, 1565.

RUSH, Benjamin, M.D. LL.D. a distinguished American physician, was born January 5th, 1745, near Bristol, about twelve miles from Philadelphia. His father died while he was young, and left him to the care of an intelligent and pious mother, who gave him a virtuous education. At the age of eight or nine years he was placed under the tuition of Dr. Samuel Finley, afterwards president of the college at Princeton, and after becoming accomplished in the knowledge of Latin and Greek, he entered that institution, then under the care of president Davies, and was graduated in 1760. The next succeeding six years he devoted to the study of medicine, under the direction of Dr. John Redman, of Philadelphia. He there embarked for Europe, and attended the medical lectures at the University of Edinburgh for two years, and afterwards spent some time at the hospitals in London. In 1769 he returned to America, with qualifications for his profession seldom equalled, and commenced the practice of physic in Philadelphia, where his superior talents and learning, and highly amiable and engaging manners, soon procured him extensive practice. Not long after his establishment there he was appointed professor of chymistry in the medical school in that city. In 1789 he became professor of the theory and practice of medicine; in 1791 of the institutes of medicine and clinical practice; and in 1805 was chosen to the united professorships of the theory and practice of medicine, and of clinical medicine, which he held the remainder of his life. On the commencement of the contest with Great Britain, Dr. Rush entered with warmth into the defence of the rights of the colonies, and in 1776 was elected a member of congress, and signed the declaration of independence. In April of the next year he was appointed surgeon-general of the military hospitals of the middle department; but, preferring the place of physician-general, for which his studies had better qualified him, he was transferred to that station in July. He resigned that office in 1773, and after employing his influence to promote the establishment of a new constitution in Pennsylvania, and serving as a member in the convention of that state, which ratified the constitution of the United States, retired from political life, and devoted himself to medical studies. He had before this period published several medical tracts, and he continued for many years to add frequently to their number. In 1798 he collected his works relating to medicine, and published them in five volumes. They were republished in 1804, in four volumes, and again in 1809. His volume on diseases of the mind he gave to the world in 1812. He died on the 18th of April, 1813, in the sixty-ninth year of his age. Dr. Rush was one of the greatest and best men who have adorned his country. He possessed an acute and rapid perception, a discriminating judgment, a brilliant imagination, a retentive memory, and a cultivated taste. He was a most assiduous and persevering student; his knowledge was various and profound, and he eminently excelled in the several departments of his profession, both as a practitioner and lecturer. His writings are a noble monument of his genius. His investigations were characterized by great independence and originality. He added many important facts to the science of medicine, and was peculiarly felicitous in his method of describing diseases. His works enjoyed an uncommonly extensive circulation, and gave him a rank in the estimation of foreigners, as well as his own countrymen, among the greatest men who have adorned his profession. In private life he was distinguished by amiableness, modesty, uprightness, affability, uncommon powers of conversation, great punctuality to his engagements, and great philanthropy; and he enjoyed to a remarkable degree the confidence, esteem, and admiration of all around him. To those characteristics he also added, in an eminent degree, the virtues of an enlightened and practical Christian.

RUSHWORTH, John, a learned Englishman, born in Northumberland, 1607, and educated at Oxford, and Lincoln's Inn, where he was called to the bar. He was very expert as a short-hand writer, and in consequence of his great dexterity was employed to minute down the particulars of the most important debates and causes in parliament, and in the courts of justice. He was, in 1640, appointed joint clerk to the house of commons, and afterwards attended his relation, general Fairfax, as his secretary. In 1658 he was chosen member for Berwick, and also in 1660, and 1678, and the next year, and he recommended himself to the king's favour, by presenting to him some valuable records of the privy council, which he had preserved during the civil wars. Either through extravagance or carelessness, he was imprisoned in the king's bench, and died there after six years' confinement, 12th May, 1690. His historical collections of private passages in state, &c. appeared at various times, in 7 vols. fol. and were reprinted in 1721, with an additional volume. The work is generally considered as too favourable to the republican party, and thence he was accused of untruths, and of libelling the government, by Dr. John Nalson of Cambridge, who published in opposition, a collection of the affairs of state, &c.

RUSSEL, Alexander, physician to the English factory at Aleppo, was born and educated at Edinburgh. During his residence in Turkey, he applied himself to acquire the knowledge of the language, and gained great celebrity by his medical abilities, which procured him the patronage and friendship of the pacha of Aleppo. He returned to Europe in 1759, and was elected physician of St. Thomas's hospital, London. His history of Aleppo has been considered as a valuable performance, which has been translated into various languages. He died in London, 1770.

RUSSEL, Richard, an eminent physician, author of a popular treatise on the virtues of sea water. He died 1768.

RUSSEL, lord William, third son of William, the first duke of Bedford, was born about 1641. He obtained a seat in the House of Commons under Charles II. and distinguished himself as a violent opposer of the succession of the duke of York to the throne. His conduct was regarded by the court with a jealous eye, and at last he was arrested as guilty of treasonable practices, in conjunction with the duke of Monmouth, and condemned to death. He was beheaded in Lincoln's Inn fields, 21st July, 1683. After the revolution his sentence was revised, and an act passed to examine who were the authors of his death. He had married, in 1637, Rachel, second daughter of Thomas Wriotesley, earl of Southampton, widow of lord Vaughan, a woman of great merit and piety. When she heard of his condemnation, she threw herself at the king's feet, but she implored in vain: Charles was inexorable, and she immediately went to the Tower, and employed all the powers of affection and eloquence in exhorting her husband to support the dignity of his character, and to die with heroic resolution, and all the firmness of a Christian. She parted from him on the day of his execution, and he, turning from her, exclaimed, "the bitterness of death is now past." This excellent woman continued a widow till her death, 1723, at the age of 57, and she had the consolation to see her second son succeed to the honours and to the estates of the Bedford family. The letters which passed between her and her husband have been published, and display, in the strongest features, the characters of a man of upright integrity, and of a woman of the most generous heart, and the most affectionate sentiments.

RUSSEL, Elizabeth, lady, daughter of sir Anthony Cooke, married sir Thomas Hobbes, who died 1566, and afterwards lord John Russel, son and heir of Francis, the second earl of Bedford. By her second husband, who died 1584, she had one son and two daughters, Anne and Elizabeth, the last of whom was buried in Westminster abbey, where a statue on her monument seems to indicate that she died in consequence of pricking her finger with a needle. Lady Russel was a woman of a well-cultivated mind, and fond of literature. She translated from the French a religious book on the Sacrament, printed 1605. She died about 1600, aged 71.

RUSSELL, Chambers, a judge of the supreme court of Massachusetts, was the son of the Hon. Daniel Russell, a member of the council and impost officer of Massachusetts, by a daughter of the Hon. Charles Chambers. He was graduated at Harvard college, in 1731. In 1747 he succeeded Mr. Auchmuty as judge of the admiralty court, and died at Dover in England, in 1766. The family of Russells was one of the first rank and respectability in Massachusetts. Richard Russell, the ancestor who came first to America, was from Herefordshire in England. He was treasurer, and a magistrate of the province, in 1659. His son, grandson, and two great grandsons were members of the council. ¶ L.

RUSSELL, Thomas, who died in Boston, in 1796, was a descendant of the above. He was a merchant, and a member of the council. The first American ship employed in the Russian trade was owned by him. His wife was a daughter of colonel Watson, of Plymouth, and after his death the lady of sir Grenville Temple. ¶ L.

RUST, George, a fellow of Christ college, Cambridge, who, by the friendship of Jeremy Taylor, became dean of Connor, and afterwards was raised to the see of Dro-more. He died 1670, author of a discourse on Truth—a sermon, preached at the funeral of his friend bishop Taylor, and other religious pieces.

RUTH, a woman of Moab, who married Mahlon, and afterwards Boaz, by whom she had Obed, the father of Jesse, and thus became the progenitor of the royal race of David. Her history is supposed to be written by Samuel, in a simple, pleasing, chaste, and interesting style, and it forms a connexion between the book of Judges, and the first of Samuel.

RUTHERFORTH, Thomas, a learned divine, born at Papworth-Everard, Cambridgeshire, 13th Oct. 1713, and educated at St. John's, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He was afterwards professor of divinity to the university, rector of Shenfield, Essex, and Barley, Herts, and archdeacon of Essex. He wrote a System of Natural Philosophy, 2 vols. 4to—Institutes of Natural Law, 2 vols. 8vo.—some sermons—charges, &c. besides an Explanation of Plutarch's Description of the Instrument used to renew the Vestal fire, communicated to the Spalding society. He died Oct. 5th, 1771.

RUTILIA, a Roman lady, the wife of M. Aur. Cotta, celebrated by Seneca, as a woman of great virtue.

RUTILIUS RUFUS, Publius, a Roman consul, banished about 105 B. C. by the knights, through envy. He was honourably received wherever he went in his exile, in Asia.

RUTILIUS, Claudius, a native of Toulouse, in the fifth century, who wrote a Latin Itinerary, in elegiac verse. It has appeared at Amsterdam, 1687, in 12mo.

RUTLEDGE, John, governor of South Carolina, was distinguished for talents and patriotism, and for vigorous efforts in support of the liberties of the country during the war of the revolution. He was elected a member of the congress of 1774; and when the temporary constitution of South Carolina was established in 1776, was appointed president and commander-in-chief of the colony. He continued in the office till the formation of the new constitution in 1778. The following year he was chosen governor, and retained the office till 1782, making the most strenuous and judicious exertions in opposition to the British forces which ravaged Carolina during that period. He was conspicuous for eloquence, decision of character, and integrity; and equally an ornament and a blessing to the colony and nation. He died on the 23d January, 1800. ¶ L.

RUTLEDGE, Edward, whose name is affixed to the declaration of American independence, was born in Charleston, South Carolina, in November, 1749, and after receiving a classical education, and obtaining some knowledge of law, went to England in 1769, and completed his preparation for the bar in the temple. He returned in 1773, and entered on the profession. He was elected in 1774 a member of congress, and repeatedly afterwards, and was a highly respectable member of that body. Being prevented by sickness from attending the session in 1779, he was at Charleston, when the British attacked the place the year, and had a command in the militia which opposed them. He afterwards resumed his profession, and was long one of the most respectable at the bar, and one of the leading members of the legislature of South Carolina. In 1798 he was elected governor of the state. He died January 23d, 1800, in his fiftieth year. His dispositions were amiable, and his manners polished; he conducted his professional business with great integrity, and was a popular speaker.

RUYSCH, Frederic, a famous Dutch anatomist, born at the Hague, 1638. He studied at Leyden and Franeker, and then settled at the Hague, which he left on an honourable invitation to become anatomical professor at Amsterdam. Here he devoted himself with indefatigable industry, in the dissection and examination of the various parts of the human body, and made a most valuable collection of natural curiosities, which he was prevailed upon to present, for 30,000 florins, to the Czar Peter, when he visited Amsterdam, and honoured the professor with his notice and esteem. His anatomical works, which are very valuable, appeared in 4 vols. 4to. He was member of the London royal society, and of the Paris academy of sciences, and died Feb. 22d, 1731, aged 93. His son Henry, who died before him, was also an able anatomist, and published Theatrum Universale omnium Animalium, &c. 2 vols. fol. 1718.

RUYSDALL, Jacob, a famous landscape painter, born at Haerlem, 1636. His banks of rivers, cascades, hilly grounds, woods, and groves, display great correctness, and all the animated beauties of nature. He died 1681. He had a brother, Solomon, equally known as a painter, though of inferior merit. He died at Haerlem, 1670.

RUYTER, Michael Adrian, a famous Dutch admiral, born at Flushing in Zealand, 1607. At the age of 11 he began his military career, and after various services, after going eight times to the West Indies, and twice to the Brazils, he was made admiral in 1641. He assisted the Portuguese against the Spaniards with great bravery, and afterwards went to the port of Salce, on the Barbary coast, where he defeated a superior force of Algerine corsairs. In 1653 he was second in command to Van Tromp in the three battles fought against the English, and two years after he displayed his valour against the Turks in the Mediterranean. His services to Denmark against the Swedes in 1659, procured to him a liberal pension from the king, and the honours of nobility. His next expedition was against the combined fleets of England and France in 1672, where he upheld his former character of bravery and intrepidity, and the next year he was engaged again in three battles with the same hostile squadrons. He was in 1676 in the Mediterranean, and in an engagement with the French fleet before Sicily, he unfortunately received a wound, which proved fatal a few days after. His death was lamented not only by his nation, but even Lewis XIV. expressed his sorrow at the fate of a man who had carried personal bravery and cool presence of mind to so high a pitch.

RYAN, Lacy, a dramatic writer, born at Westminster about 1694. His friends intended him for the law, but the stage had greater attractions, and he was the first who performed the character of Marcus in Addison's Cato, which he gave with spirit and effect, though only eighteen years old. He grew into public favour, and though a very respectable actor, he never was considered as a first rate performer, as the cadence of his voice was unfortunately and disagreeably too shrill to please the ear. His intimacy with Quin reflects honour on both, and it was remarked with pleasure, that the aged veteran stepped forth with alacrity to perform his favourite Falstaff, for the benefit of his friend. Mr. Ryan died 15th August, 1760, aged 68, at Bath, where he had retired for his health.

RYCKHAERT, Martin, a native of Antwerp, esteemed as a landscape painter. He was the friend of Vandyck, and other eminent artists, and died 1636, aged 45.—There lived also in his age, in the same place, and of the same name, David, who was eminent as a painter of rural scenery.

RYKIUS, Theodore, professor of history at Leyden, published editions of Tacitus, 2 vols. 12mo.—and of Stephanus Byzantius, fol. &c. He died 1690.

RYCQUIUS, Justus, a native of Ghent, who travelled into Italy, and was honoured with the title of citizen of Rome, in consequence of his writings. He was made by Urban VIII. professor of eloquence at Bologna, where he died 1627. His work de Capitolio Romano, 1617, 4to. is a valuable composition, which was again edited at Leyden, by J. Gronovius, with learned notes.

RYER, Peter du, a dramatic writer, born at Paris, 1605. He was, in 1626, appointed secretary to Lewis XIII. but in consequence of an imprudent marriage, and of attendant poverty, sold the place. He was afterwards secretary to the duke of Vendome, and was made member of the French academy, and also historiographer of France, with a pension. He wrote nineteen dramatic pieces, and translated thirteen, which, according to Voltaire, were popular on the stage. He died 1658.

RYLAND, John, author of the Christian Student and Pastor—the Preceptor—Elements of Mechanics—Sermons—and some controversial tracts, was a baptist preacher at Northampton. To increase his income, he kept for some years an academy, and died at Enfield, 1792. As his reputation was extensive among people of his persuasion, he received the honorary degree of M.A. from Edinburgh university, and as a literary character, he was flattered by the friendship and correspondence of Dr. Johnson, Doddrige, Hervey, and other learned men.

RYLAND, William Wynne, an unfortunate man, son of a London copper-plate printer. He learnt engraving under Ravenat, and afterwards visited Italy and France, where he greatly improved his talents. His copper-plates, to yield impressions with all the softness of chalk drawing, were so popular, that he obtained the place of engraver to the king, with a pension of 300*l.* per annum. His connexion with a printseller of Cornhill, afterwards embarrassed his affairs, and produced a bankruptcy, and in an evil hour he committed a forgery on the East India company, for which he was tried and executed, 1783.

RYMER, Thomas, an eminent English antiquary, born in Yorkshire, and educated at Northallerton school, and at Cambridge. He afterwards entered at Gray's inn, and in 1692 became historiographer to William III. He devoted some of his time to poetry, but his tragedy of Edgar possesses little merit, and his "View of the Tragedies of the Last Age," displays his abilities as a critic in a very unfavourable light, as severe, partial, and uncandid, and an acrimonious detractor of the immortal reputation of Shakspeare. The best known work of Rymer is his Fœdera, in 20 vols. fol. a most valuable collection, containing public acts, conventions, treaties, state papers, letters, foreign correspondence, reprinted at the Hague in 10 vols. abridged by Rapin, and translated by Whatley in 4 vols. 8vo. 1731.

RYSBRAEC, John Michael, an eminent statuary, who died in London 1770, aged about 78.

RYSBRAECK, Peter, a native of Antwerp, 1657. He acquired reputation as a landscape painter, and particularly excelled in the strong and spirited representation of trees, and the other beauties of rural scenery.

RYVES, Sir Thomas, a civilian, born in Dorsetshire, and educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford. He applied himself to the civil law in Doctors' Commons, and distinguished himself greatly in that profession. He was made master in chancery, king's advocate, and was knighted by Charles I. whom he served with great ability, not only in the cabinet, but in the field during the civil wars. He died in 1651, and was buried in St. Clement Danes, near Temple bar. He was a learned man, and wrote the Vicar's Plea—Historia Navalis Antiqua—Historia Navalis Media, &c.

RYVES, Bruno, a celebrated preacher, related to the preceding. He was chaplain to Charles I. and for his attachment to his master, was exposed, during the civil wars, to persecution and plunder; but at the restoration, he was made dean of Windsor, and secretary to the Garter. He died 1677. He was author of "Mercurius Rusticus," a political paper, first printed 22d Aug. 1642—Querela Cantabrigiensis, &c.—a Catalogue of those Lords, Persons of Quality, &c. slain or executed during the civil war—some Sermons, &c.

RYVES, Eliza, an Irish lady, known for her literary abilities. Her family was respectable; but a law-suit devoured the little property which she possessed, and she found protection and subsistence by the labours of her pen. She wrote the Hermit of Snowdon, a novel—besides some popular translations from the French, and a liberal contribution to the annual registers. She died in London, 1797.

SA

SA, or SAA, Emanuel, a Jesuit, born at Condé in Portugal. He was public professor of theology at Coimbra and Rome, and then became a preacher, and was employed by Pius V. to complete a new edition of the Bible. He wrote besides, Scholia in quatuor Evangelia—Notationes in totam Sacram Scripturam—Aphorismi Confessariorum, and died at Arona, 30th Dec. 1596, aged 66.

SA DE MIRANDA, Francis, a native of Coimbra, knight of the order of Christ, and professor of jurisprudence in the university. He quitted the profession of the law after his father's death, and though honoured by the king of Portugal, he preferred a life of ease and retirement to the intrigues of the court. He died at his country seat, 1558, aged 65. His works are, Satires—Comedies, and Pastorals, printed together at Lisbon, 1614, in 4to. Though the first, he is not the most correct poet of his nation.

SAADAS GAON, a Jewish rabbi, author of a book on the Belief of the Jews; an Arabic translation of the Old Testament; Commentaries on Ezra and Daniel; Explanation of the Jezirah. He was at the head of the school at Sora, near Babylon, and died 943.

SAA'S, John, a native of Franqueville, near Rouen, who died of an apoplexy, 10th April, 1774, aged 72. He was member of the Rouen academy, secretary to the archbishop, and afterwards canon of the church, and librarian. He wrote an account of the MSS. of the Cathedral of Rouen; an Abridgment of the French Historical Dictionary, 4 vols.; Criticisms on the Supplement to Moreri; on the Encyclopedie, &c. and other things.

SAAVEDRA, Michael de Cervantes, a celebrated Spanish writer, author of Don Quixotte, born at Madrid, 1549. He was from his very youth unusually fond of reading novels, and curious adventures, and thus he began to lay the foundation for those comic and striking incidents which prove so amusing and so interesting in his hero. He quitted Spain for Italy, and he was chamberlain to cardinal Aquaviva at Rome. He was also for some time engaged in the hardy profession of a soldier, under the victorious Colonna, and was at the battle of Lepanto, 1571, in which he lost his left hand, which was either shot, or dreadfully maimed by an arquebus. In 1574 he was unfortunately taken by a Barbary corsair, and carried to Algiers, where he endured, for five years and a half, all the horrors of captivity, till ransomed by the religious society of redemption. On his return to Spain, he began to write comedies and tragedies for his maintenance; but though his pieces were acted with universal applause at Madrid, he pined in poverty, and at last found himself in a prison. In his confinement he began his Don Quixotte, of which the first part appeared in 1605, and the second part ten years after. This immortal work was a strong and pleasant satire on the books of knight errantry, which were then so fashionable in Spain, and it met with universal approbation; and though written to ridicule the follies of a particular age, it continues still to be read and admired in every known language. Though deservedly popular, Cervantes, such is too often the fate of literary men, was little noticed by the great; the book was read, but the author was neglected, and he could not obtain the small pittance of a pension, which might have kept him above want. Yet, in the midst of his wretchedness, he preserved his serenity and pleasantness, and in his last moments displayed that unconcern and jocularly which would have become a happier period of life. He received extreme unction at Madrid, 18th April, 1616, and died soon after, but what day is not ascertained. Besides Don Quixotte, and dramatic pieces, he wrote the Troubles of Persiles and Sigismunda, a novel—Galatea, a novel in six books.

SAAVEDRA FAJARDO, Diego, a noble Spaniard, born in Murcia. He was for some time ambassador in Switzerland, and was made knight of St. Jago, and member of the supreme council of the Indies. He wrote Idea of a Politic Prince—the Gothic Crown—the Literary Republic, a work of merit, translated into French at Lausanne, 1770. He died 1648.

SABAS, a heresiarch, founder of the Messalians. In his eagerness after perfection, he interpreted the gospel literally; he made himself an eunuch, and distributed all his goods to the poor. This sect, which prevailed near Edessa about 310, was extinct at the end of the century.—There was another of that name, who became head of the monasteries of Palestine, and died highly respected, 5th Dec. 531, aged 92.

SABATEI-SEVI, a Jewish impostor, born at Smyrna, 1626. With great natural talents well cultivated by education, he formed a design of imposing himself upon the Jews as their long-promised Messiah. After some persecution, he was received at Jerusalem as an extraordinary character, and the dispersed Hebrews were invited to come and salute their deliverer. In the madness of his ambition, Sevi declared himself king of kings, and amused his deluded followers with pretended communications with the divinity, and a promise that the holy temple would descend all complete and beautifully adorned, from heaven, and that on it to the end of the world would be regularly offered the adoration of all the nations of the earth. While the vulgar, lost in astonishment, even forgot their usual employments in hopes of the promised happiness, the impostor marched towards Constantinople, where he expected obedience and submission. He was, however, seized; but such was the enthusiasm of his followers, that his keeper was enriched by the presents which he received to permit the multitude to kiss the feet of his prisoner. When brought before the sultan Mahomet, Sevi refused to perform miracles to prove his divine mission, and preferred embracing Mahometanism to the dangerous experiment of being exposed as invulnerable to the arrows of skilful archers. As his conversion was not sincere, the sultan still detained him in prison, and there he died, 1676, aged 50.

SABBATHIER, Peter, a native of Poitiers, of the order of the Benedictines of St. Maur. For twenty years he was engaged in making a collection of the Latin versions of the Bible, which was published in 1743, under the title of Bibliorum Sacrorum Latinae Versiones Antiquae, 3 vols. folio. The two last volumes were published, not by the author, but by Charles de la Rue. He died at Rheims, 24th March, 1742, aged 60.

SABBATHIER, Francis, a French writer, was born at Condom in 1735. He became a teacher at the college of Chalons-sur-Marne, where also he established an academy, to which he acted as secretary. Afterwards he ruined himself by engaging in a paper manufactory. He died in 1807. His works are—1. Essai sur l'origine de la puissance temporelle des Papes. 2. Le Manuel des Enfants. 3. Dissertations sur divers sujets de l'Histoire de France. 4. Les Mœurs, Coutumes, et Usages des Anciens Peuples, 3 vols. 5. Dictionnaire pour l'intelligence des auteurs classiques Grecs et Latins, 36 vols. 8vo.—W. B.

SABELLICUS, Mark Anthony Cocceius, a learned Italian, born at Vicovaro, and made professor of belles lettres at Udina, and librarian to St. Mark's at Venice. He was an able teacher, and began a Universal History, of which one vol. appeared, besides a History of the Venetian Republic, folio, and other pieces in prose and verse, &c. He died 1506, aged about 70.

SABELLIUS, an African, founder of a sect in the third century, which denied any distinction in the three persons of the Trinity. This heresy, which had many followers, was condemned by the council of Constantinople, 381.

SABEO, Faustus, a native of Bresse, in the Venetian territory, who distinguished himself as a poet. His edition of Arnobius, Rome, 1542, in folio, is much valued. He was honoured with a gold chain from the emperor Henry II. to whom he dedicated his epigrams, 1556. He died about 1558, aged 80.

SABINA, Julia, wife of Adrian, was celebrated for her respectable character in public and private life. Her husband, at his death, prevailed upon her to take poison, and not to survive him, A.D. 138.

SABINAS, Aulus, a Latin poet in the age of Ovid. His epistles were said to possess merit. They have perished.

SABINUS, Francis Floribus, author of Interpretations of the Civil Law—of an Apology for the Latin Language, &c. was a very learned and polite Italian writer, and died about 1547.

SABINUS, George, an excellent modern Latin poet. He was born in the electorate of Brandenburg, 1508, and by his talents acquired the esteem of the learned of his times. He married, in 1536, Melancthon's eldest daughter, after whose death, at Kohnigsberg, 1547, he settled at Frankfort on the Oder, where, in the character of professor, he acquired great celebrity. He was patronised by the elector of Brandenburg, and also employed in various negotiations by the emperor Charles V. who esteemed him and respected his talents. He died in consequence of an illness contracted in Italy, 1560. His Res Gestæ Cæsæ-

rum Romanorum, and other poems, are well known.

SABLIER, N. a French writer of eminence. He published Variétés Serieuses et Amusantes, 4 vols. 12mo.—Essai sur les Langues, 8vo. besides translations from Goldoni, &c. He died at Paris, 10th March, 1785, aged 93. Another of that name wrote two dramatic pieces for the Italian theatre, and died about 1760.

SABLIÈRE, Anthony de Rambouillet de la, a French poet. He died at Paris, 1680, and his Madrigals, admired for their simplicity and delicate sentiments, were published by his son. His wife, Hesselin, seemed to retain his virtues, and she was the friend of the learned, and particularly of Fontaine, who has repaid her kindness, and the honourable asylum which for many years she gave him in her family, by immortalizing her name in his poems.

SACCHI, Andrea, an Italian painter, born at Rome 1601. He studied with great assiduity the labours of his predecessors, and the antique marbles; and by the directions of Albani, and his own exertions, he soon acquired a celebrity superior to that of his cotemporaries. He was ambitious to be correct, and therefore did little, and but slowly; and, as he said, he never did any thing but what he proposed should be seen by Raphael and Hannibal. He was patronised by some of the cardinals, and particularly by Urban VIII. whose picture he drew, and in such a correct style as to be equal to the best efforts of ancient or modern times. He died 1661.

SACCHINI, Antoine Marie Gasper, an able musician, born at Naples, 1735. He studied under Durante; and at Rome, Venice, and Naples, he began to display those great powers of composition and harmony which procured him so much applause in Germany, Holland, England, and Paris. He was of a benevolent disposition, and died at Paris, 1786. His operas were much admired.

SACHEVERELL, Henry, an English divine of celebrated notoriety. He was son of a poor clergyman at Marlborough, and was educated by the kindness of his godfather, and placed at Magdalen college, Oxford, where he became demy, 1687, and afterwards fellow. His regularity and polite manners rendered him a favourite tutor in the college, and his Latin poems, some of which appeared in the Musæ Anglicanæ, proved him an elegant scholar, and a man of respectable talents. He was, at Oxford, the cotemporary and the friend of Addison, who inscribed his farewell poem to the muses to him, as his dearest friend and colleague. He took his master's degree 1696, and that of D.D. 1708. His first preferment was Cannock, Staffordshire, to which in 1705 was added the preachership of St. Saviour's, Southwark. His two famous sermons were delivered at Derby, 14th Aug. 1709, and at St. Paul's, Nov. 9th, before the lord mayor, and as in one of them he was supposed to allude, under the name of Volpone, to lord Godolphin, they excited great attention, and drew upon him the resentment of parliament. His trial before the peers began 27th Feb. 1709-10, and ended the 23d March; but though he was suspended for three years from preaching, and his sermons were burnt by the executioner, so violent was the party spirit of the times, that in laying the foundation of his future preferment it completely overturned the ministry. The queen saw with pleasure the propagation of sentiments which enforced the divine rights of monarchs, and submissive obedience to her authority, and when the punishment of this persecuted divine, therefore, was expired, he was presented to the valuable living of St. Andrew's, Holborn, and received with such enthusiasm by the people, that of the first sermon which he preached, and which he sold for 100*l.* 40,000 copies were immediately distributed through the nation. Thus, for a while regarded as the champion of the church, and as the victim of party, Sacheverell enjoyed honours and popularity, till at last he sunk into retirement and obscurity. He died 5th June, 1724, and by his will left 500*l.* to bishop Atterbury, who is supposed to have written for him the defence which he made before the peers, and to have composed the elegant Latin inscription for the silver basin gilt, which he presented to his counsel and defender, sir Simon Harcourt. He is described by the dutchess of Marlborough, who no doubt was displeased at his popularity, as an ignorant, impudent incendiary, a man who was the scorn of those who made use of him as a tool; and Burnet, with equal contempt, observes of him, that he possessed little of religion, virtue, learning, or good sense, but forced himself to preferment by railing at dissenters and low churchmen.

SACHTLEVEN, Herman, a native of Rotterdam, whose landscapes were held in high esteem. He died 1685, aged 76. His relation, Cornelius, was also eminent in landscape painting, but inferior to him.

SACKVILLE, Thomas, first lord Buckhurst, was born at Buckhurst, Sussex, 1536. He was entered at Oxford, and then removed to Cambridge, and afterwards to the Inner Temple, where he was called to the bar. He early acquired celebrity by his "Induction, or introduction to the Myrror of Magistrates," a series of poems, and by his "Gorbodue," a tragedy, acted in 1561, with great applause, at Whitehall, before the queen. When thus distinguished as a writer, he laid down his pen and became a statesman. He was called up to the peerage, and served Elizabeth, to whom he was related by her mother's side, in various negotiations. In 1590 he was made knight of the garter, and the next year chancellor of Oxford, and in 1598 treasurer in the room of lord Burleigh. Though he had been one of the commissioners who tried the unfortunate Mary, queen of Scots, he was noticed by James, on his accession to the English crown, and was created, 1604, earl of Dorset. He died suddenly, in consequence of a dropsy in the brain, while attending at the council board, April, 1605, and was buried in Westminster abbey. It appears, according to the testimony of Naunton, and others, that he was an able, virtuous, and magnanimous statesman, and few first ministers have left so fair a character. Several of his letters have been printed in the Cabala, &c.

SACKVILLE, Charles, earl of Dorset and Middlesex, descended from lord Buckhurst, was born 1637. He was educated under a private tutor, and afterwards travelled through France and Italy, and returned a little before the restoration. He sat for some time as member for East Grinstead; but he was too fond of gallantry, and the licentious excesses of a corrupt court, to apply himself to political affairs. He served as volunteer in the Dutch war in 1665, under the duke of York, and the night previous to the naval engagement, composed a celebrated song still regarded as the best of his poetical pieces. He was afterwards employed in embassies by the king, and in 1674 succeeded to the estates of his uncle, earl of Middlesex, and to the honours of his father two years after. The violent measures of James were wholly disagreeable to him, and he warmly espoused the cause of the prince of Orange, and accompanied Anne in her flight to Northampton, and for his attachment to the revolution he was made chamberlain of the household, a privy counsellor, and knight of the garter. He died at Bath, 19th Jan. 1705-6, and was succeeded by Lionel, his son by his second wife, who in 1720 was raised to the dignity of a duke. Lord Dorset was not only a poet, but also the friend and patron of learned men, and he has been commended in the highest strain of panegyric and admiration by Dryden, Congreve, Addison, and especially by Prior, whose dedication of his works to his son is deservedly considered as a composition of superior merit. His poems are short and few, but possess great beauty.

SACKVILLE, Edward, earl of Dorset, and grandson of the above, was born 1590. He was sent, in 1620, with a force to assist Frederic, king of Bohemia, and was at the battle of Prague, fought that year, and in 1621 he went as ambassador from England to the French court. His abilities recommended him strongly to the favour of his master, Charles, and after his brother's death, to whose title and estates he succeeded, 1624, he was advanced in the government, and made knight of the garter, president of the council, and lord privy seal. He died 1652, and was succeeded by his son Richard, who died 1677. There is, in the 129th paper of the Guardian, an account of a duel which he fought in Zealand with lord Bruce, in 1613, and in which he killed his antagonist.

SACKVILLE, George, viscount, third son of the first duke of Dorset, was born in 1716. From Westminster school he went to Ireland, where his father was appointed viceroy, and he received his education in Trinity college, Dublin. He afterwards embraced the military profession, and was at the battles of Dettingen and Fontenoy, and distinguished himself under the duke of Cumberland, against the Scotch rebels. In 1758, he rose to the rank of lieutenant-general, and went with Marlborough in the expedition against St. Malo's. At the battle of Minden, the next year, where he commanded the united English and Hanoverian cavalry, his conduct was highly censured, because during the action he did not bring up his troops with the celerity which he was ordered. Whether the delay originated in the unintelligible manner in which the orders were conveyed, or the timidity of the general, is unknown; but a court martial dismissed him from the service, and his name was struck off from the list of privy counsellors. These severe measures were condemned in the next reign, and he was restored to the favour and protection of his sovereign, and advanced to places of trust and honour. In 1769 he assumed the name of Germaine, according to the will of lady Elizabeth Germaine, to whose property he succeeded, and the next year he attracted much of the public notice by the duel which he fought with governor Johnstone, who, in one of his speeches in the house of Commons, had reflected on his conduct with more asperity than good manners permitted. He was, in 1775, made secretary of state for the colonial department, and also first lord of the board of trade; but on the change of ministry he gave up his appointment, and in 1782 he was created a viscount. He died 26th Aug. 1785.

SACY, Lewis de, an eloquent advocate of the parliament of Paris, and a learned member of the French academy. He published an excellent French translation of Pliny's Letters, and a Panegyric on Trajan, 3 vols. 12mo.—treatises on Friendship—and on Glory—a Collection of Facts, and other pieces, 2 vols. 4to. He died at Paris, 26th Oct. 1727, aged 73.

SADDER, or SAAHDI, a famous Persian poet, born at Schiraz, 1193. The invasion of Persia by the Turks, drove him into Palestine, where he fell into the hands of the Franks, then on a crusade, and was treated as a slave, till ransomed by the kindness of an Aleppo merchant, whose rich daughter he married. This union proved not the source of happiness, and the poet complained bitterly of the disagreeable temper and manners of his wife. He died, it is said, at the advanced age of 116. His poems have been much admired, though Voltaire and others affect to speak of them with contempt. They consist of Gulistan, or the Garden of Flowers—Bostan, or the Garden of Fruits—and Molaamat, the Sparkles, &c. which have been translated at Calcutta, 1795, folio.

SADE, N. de, abbot of Ebreuil, died 1780, in an advanced age. He published Memoirs of the Life of Petrarch, 3 vols. 4to. a work of merit.

SADELER, John, a native of Brussels, 1550, eminent as a designer and engraver. He was patronised by the duke of Bavaria, and after travelling into Italy, and presenting some of his pieces to Clement VIII. who received them with barren praise, he returned to Venice, where he died. His brother and pupil Raphael, was also an excellent artist. He accompanied his brother to Rome, and died at Venice. Their nephew Giles, was superior to his uncles in taste, and in the neatness and elegance of his engravings. He was for some time in Italy, and was patronised by the emperor Rodolphus II. and his two successors. He died at Prague, 1629, aged 59. His Vestiges of the Antiquities of Rome, folio, 1660, are much and deservedly admired.

SADLER, Sir Ralph, a statesman, born at Hackney in Middlesex, 1507. He was educated under Cromwell earl of Essex, and by his abilities and good conduct became known to Henry VIII. who employed him in several political affairs, and at last admitted him into the privy council, and made him secretary of state. He was at the battle of Musselburgh in Scotland, and for his bravery was made a knight banneret. After being also in favour with Elizabeth, and holding under her offices of trust and honour, he died at his seat of Standon, Herts, 30th March, 1587, aged 80, leaving behind him three sons and four daughters.

SADLER, John, an English writer, born in Shropshire, 1615, and educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He entered afterwards at Lincoln's inn, and was in 1644 made master in chancery, and in 1649 town clerk of London. He was in great favour with Cromwell, and was offered, by him, the place of chief justice of Munster in Ireland, which he declined. He was also member of parliament; but at the restoration he lost all his places, because he refused to subscribe to the oath which declared it unlawful, under any pretence whatever, to take up arms against the king. To this public misfortune was afterwards added the loss of some of his houses by the great fire of London, and in consequence of these calamities, he retired to privacy on his estate of Warmwell, Dorsetshire, where he died, April 1674, aged 59. He wrote Rights of the Kingdom, or Customs of our Ancestors, &c. much esteemed—and “Olbia,” or the New Island discovered, &c.

SADLER, Anthony, a native of Chilton, Wilts, educated at Edmund hall, Oxford, where he took his degree of D.D. He was chaplain to Charles II. after the restoration, and published a Divine Masque, inscribed to general Monk—several tracts—sermons, &c. and died 1680.

SADOC, supposed founder of the sect of the Sadducees among the Jews, lived two centuries before the birth of Christ. His tenets were, that virtue, for its own sake, is to be loved and practised, as there are neither rewards nor punishments after this life. These opinions were very prevalent, and in the days of our Saviour, the sect was become very numerous and powerful. It is said that the Sadducees still exist in Africa, and in other places.

SADOLET, James, a learned Italian, born at Modena, 1477. He received an excellent education under his father, who was a civilian, and professor at Ferrara, and acquired a most extensive and perfect knowledge of Latin and Greek. He lived in great intimacy with the learned at Rome, and became with Bembo secretary to pope Leo X. and to reward his merit the sovereign pontiff made him against his will bishop of Carpentras, near Avignon, and he held the same office of honourable confidence with some of his successors, Clement VII. and Paul III. who raised him to the dignity of cardinal, and employed him in various negotiations. He died 1547, not without suspicion, say some, of poison, because he maintained too confidential a correspondence with the protestants. His works consist of epistles, discourses, expositions of the Psalms, and St. Paul's epistles, poems, &c. published at Verona, 3 vols. 4to. These compositions are written in elegant and truly Ciceronian Latin; and to the character of a polite scholar, Sadolet united the amiable qualities of mildness, moderation, and exemplary virtue, so that Erasmus has called him with truth, eximium atatis suæ decus.

SAGE, Alian René le, an ingenious writer, born at Ruys in Brittany, 1667. His compositions display not only wit, taste, and judgment, but elegance and neatness.

Though indebted for the plan and subject of his romances to Spanish writers, yet he possessed peculiar merits of his own. His works are “Gil Blas”—the Diabie Boiteux—besides the Bachelier de Salamanque—the New Don Quixote, and other theatrical pieces, and the Letters of Aristenætus to the Greek. His Gil Blas is, and ever will be, a popular performance, and must be read, because, as Voltaire has observed, he has imitated nature. He died near Paris, 1747.

SAGE, David le, a French poet, born at Montpellier. He wrote the Follies of Le Sage, containing epigrams, satires, sonnets, elegies, &c. and died about 1650.

SAGE, John, a native of Fifeshire, educated at St. Andrews, and made, after the revolution, bishop of Edinburgh. He was an able divine, and published a sensible defence of episcopacy, against the persecution of the Presbyterians, called the Principles of the Cyprianic age, and other tracts, and died 1711, aged 59.

SAGITTARIUS, Gaspard, a native of Lunenburg, who became professor of history in the university of Halle, and historian to the duke of Saxony. He was also, as a divine, an able supporter of the doctrines of Luther. He published Dissertations on the Oracles—the Succession of the Princes of Orange to William III.—History of the City of Hardewyck—Life of St. Norbet—Historia Antiqua Norbergiæ—Genealogy of the Dukes of Brunswick—History of Lubeck—Antiquities of Thuringia, &c. This learned man died 9th March, 1694, aged 51.

SAGREDO, John, a noble Venetian, procurator of St. Mark, and in 1675 elected doge, and afterwards employed as ambassador to various courts. He wrote the History of the Ottoman Empire, in Italian, 1677, 4to. a work valuable, candid, and elegant, and deservedly compared to the labours of Tacitus. A translation of it in 6 vols. 12mo. appeared at Paris.

SAILLANT, N. du, a French officer, who at the beginning of the revolution raised around his retreat at Jales near Mende, an army of nearly 20,000 men, who like himself were zealous for the defence of the monarchy, and the protection of the king's person. While, however, he hoped to persuade these adherents to march with him against Paris, he found their loyalty grow faint, and soon saw them desert from his ranks. He was at last surrounded with a few brave men who determined to share his fortunes, and conducted to Vans, where he was massacred in cold blood.

SAINT-AMAND, Mark Antony Gerard de, a native of Rouen, who spent the best part of his life in travelling, and in writing poetry. He might have obtained a settlement near the person of the queen of Poland, but in his inconstant conduct he refused it, and died poor, 1660, aged 67, and of grief, because Lewis XIV. censured his poem on the Moon. His name is immortalized in Boileau's satires. His best piece is an Ode on Solitude. His works are collected in 3 vols. 12mo.

SAINTE-ANDRÉ, Nathaniel, a native of Switzerland, who became eminent in this country as a reader on anatomy, and as a surgeon. His character was ruined for the foolish part which he acted with respect to Mary Toftes, the rabbit impostor. He died at Southampton, 1776. More particulars about him are recorded in Nicholas's Anecdotes of Hogarth.

SAINTE-AULAIRE, Francis Joseph de Beauport, marquis de, an ingenious French poet, born at Limosin. He spent the younger part of his life in the army, but his love of literature prevailed, and he sought retirement and learned ease. He wrote short and light pieces, much in the manner of Anacreon, and what is remarkable, his best compositions were those of his old age, when he had reached his 90th year. He was admitted into the French academy, though Boileau exclaimed against it, because he was an immoral poet. He was for 40 years the favourite of the court of the duchess of Maine, and died at Paris, 17th Dec. 1742, aged near 100.

SAINTE-CLAIR, Arthur, a general in the American army, was born at Edinburgh, in Scotland, and accompanied the fleet under admiral Boscawen to America, in 1755. He was a lieutenant in the British army under general Wolfe, and when the peace was concluded, he had the command of fort Mifflin, in Pennsylvania, assigned to him. Here he settled, and becoming a naturalized citizen of Pennsylvania, was appointed to several offices of a civil nature. When the revolution commenced, he embraced the cause of the Americans, and in January, 1776, was appointed to command a battalion of Pennsylvania militia. He was engaged in the expedition to Canada, and was the second in command in the proposed attack on the British post at Trois Rivières. He was soon after ordered to join the army in New-Jersey. He was in the battle of Trenton, and had the credit of suggesting the attack on the British at Princeton which proved so fortunate. In August, 1776, he was appointed a brigadier general, and in February following, major general. He was the commanding officer at Ticonderoga when that post was invested by the British, and evacuated it July 6th, 1777, with such secrecy that a considerable part of the public stores were embarked and safely conveyed away. Charges of cowardice, treachery, and incapacity were brought against him in consequence, but a court of inquiry honourably acquitted him. He afterwards joined the army under General Green, in the south, and at the close of the war returned to his former residence. In 1783, he was a member of the council of censors of Pennsylvania, and the same year was elected president of the Cincinnati Society of that state. In 1785, he was elected a delegate to congress, and in February, 1787, was chosen president of that body. In October following, he was appointed governor of the territory of the United States north-west of the Ohio, an office which he retained until November 1803, when he was removed by Mr. Jefferson in consequence of the too free expression of his political opinions. In 1790, he commanded an army employed against the Miami Indians, and was defeated with the loss of between six and seven hundred men, on the 4th of November. On this occasion a portion of the citizens were loud in their censures of his conduct; but a committee of the house of representatives appointed to examine into the causes of the failure of the expedition, exculpated him from blame. He resigned his commission of major general in 1792. Reduced in his old age to poverty, and embarrassed by debts, he applied to congress for relief. His claims on the sympathy of his country were listened to with indifference, and admitted with reluctance. After long suspense, he obtained, in 1817, a pension of sixty dollars per month. He died August 31st, 1818, aged 84.

SAINTE-CYR, Tannequil de Bouchet, a brave Poitevin of the party of the Calvinists under Charles IX. He was chief of the conspiracy of Amboise, and was made governor of Orleans, after the battle of Dreux. He was killed, bravely fighting, at the battle of Moncontour, 1569, aged 85.

SAINTE-CYRAN, John du Verger, de Houranne, abbot of, a learned ecclesiastic born at Bayonne, 1581. He was educated in divinity at Louvain, where he gained the friendship of Lipsius, and he was patronised by the bishop of Poitiers, who resigned to him the abbey of St. Cyran. He wrote various books, and was universally esteemed for his learning. He became celebrated in France for maintaining what was called two extraordinary paradoxes, that a person under certain circumstances may kill himself, and that bishops may take up arms. He was for some time persecuted by Richelieu, and he was one of those who disapproved of the council of Trent, and considered it as a political assembly, rather than as an ecclesiastical meeting. He died of an apoplexy at Paris, 1643.

SAINTE-EVREMOND. Vid. EVREMOND.

SAINTE-FOIX, Germain Francis Poullain de, a French writer born at Rennes, 25th

Feb. 1703. After serving in the army he settled at Paris, and devoted himself to literature. He was appointed historiographer of the order of the Holy Ghost, and died highly respected at Paris, 26th Aug. 1776. His works are, Turkish letters, an epistolary romance of merit, yet inferior to the work of Montesquieu in the same style—Historical Essays on Paris, 7 vols. 12mo. History of the Order of the Holy Ghost, 3 vols. 12mo.—Comedies, 3 vols. 12mo. &c. All his works were published together at Paris, 6 vols. 8vo. 1778.

SAINT GELAIS, Octavian de, a native of Cognac, who by the favour of Charles VIII. was made bishop of Angoulême. He died 1502, aged 36. He is author of some poetical pieces, the Life of Lewis XII.—Translation of Terence—Ovid's Heroides, &c.

SAINT GELAIS, Melin de, the natural son of the preceding, as is generally supposed, became known as a poet, and deserved the name of the French Ovid. He was educated at Poitiers and Padua, and embraced the ecclesiastical profession. He opposed Ronsard the poet, at the court of Henry II. but this jealousy ended in the closest friendship. He died at Paris, 1559, aged 67. His works are in Latin and in French, and consist of elegies, epistles, sonnets, epigrams, songs, &c. Sophonisba, a prose tragedy, and were first published at Paris, 1719, in 12mo.

SAINT GENNIEZ, John de, a native of Avignon, who became canon of Orange, and died there, 1663, aged 56. He wrote some satires, elegies, idyls, and other poetical pieces of great merit, collected together at Paris, in 4to.

SAINT GERMAIN, Robert, count of, a native of Lons-le-Saunier, in Franche Comté, who left the Jesuits for the profession of arms. He distinguished himself in Hungary, and in the war of 1737, against the Turks, and afterwards in the French service, in the campaigns of 1741, and 1757. Displeased, however, with the treatment of the French court, he went into the service of Denmark, where he was promoted to the rank of field-marshal, and made knight of the Elephant. The death of Struensee, and the commotion which took place on the occasion, rendered him dissatisfied with the Danish court, and he retired to Hamburg, where he lost nearly the whole of his property by the failure of a banker to whom he had intrusted it. This severe blow did not break his spirits, and he withdrew to the privacy of a small estate which he had near Lauterbach in Alsace. He was called away from his obscurity by Lewis XVI. who knew his merit, to preside over the war department, and after reforming several abuses, and contributing to the comforts of the military, he died, 15th Jan.

1778, aged 70. He wrote Memoirs, one vol. 8vo. 1779.

SAINT GERMAIN, N. count de, an impostor of some temporary celebrity, who pretended to have lived 2000 years, and to have sat by the side of our Saviour at the marriage of Cana. He died at Sleswick, 1784.

SAINT HYACINTHE, Themiseul de, a French writer born at Orleans, 1684. He taught Italian for his support, and after travelling over several countries of Europe, he settled at Breda, where he married, and where he died, 1746. He forced himself much upon the public notice by his quarrel with Voltaire, who heaped upon him every opprobrious epithet. He wrote Le Chef d'Œuvre d'un Inconnu, 2 vols. 8vo.; Mathanasiana, 2 vols. 8vo.; some romances of little merit, &c.

SAINT JOHN, Henry viscount Bolingbroke, a great politician and philosopher, born 1672, at Battersea, of an illustrious family. He was educated at Eton and Christ-church, Oxford, and though his earlier years were disgraced by extravagance, and an immoderate love of pleasure, he laid the foundation of that eminence which afterwards distinguished him as an orator, and as a statesman. To wean him from dissolute habits his friends married him to the daughter of sir Henry Winchcombe, and soon after he obtained a seat in parliament for Wotton Bassett, 1700. He here acquired great influence among the Tories, and in 1704 was made secretary at war, but resigned when his friend Harley was dismissed from the seals in 1707. Three years after he again shared the honours of Harley, who was called to the office of chancellor of the exchequer, and he became secretary of state; but the part which he supported in framing the peace of Utrecht has exposed him to much censure. In 1712, he was created lord St. John, viscount Bolingbroke, and made lord lieutenant of Essex; but dissatisfied with these honours because he was not raised to the rank of an earl, he ambitiously meditated a separation from his long-tried friend Harley, and in the attempt to place himself at the head of affairs, he ruined his own fortunes, and those of his former associate. On the accession of George I. in 1714, the seals were taken from him, though he had shown himself a friend of the Hanoverian succession, and all the papers of his office were also secured. Finding it dangerous to continue in the country, where threats of impeachment were thrown out against him, he retired to France, March, 1715, and he resolutely rejected the overtures which were made to him by the pretender. The persecuting spirit, however, of his enemies at home, made a change in his sentiments, and he accepted at last the office of secretary of state to the pretender, and prepared for the invasion of England. These measures were no sooner known than he was impeached by Walpole; but while disgraced at home he was exposed to equal persecution abroad, and his new master stripped him of his office, and impeached him of treachery, incapacity, and neglect. Thus discarded he determined to effect a reconciliation with the government at home, and by means of lord Stair, the ambassador in France, he obtained a promise of pardon from the king, 1716, which was fully granted in 1723. Restored to his country, and to his forfeited property, he settled near Uxbridge, and devoted himself to literary and rural employments, and to the conversation and correspondence of Swift, Pope, and other learned friends; but finding the royal mercy not granted to its full extent, as he was still excluded from a seat in the House of Lords, he vented his disappointment against the minister, Walpole, and attacked his measures in the Craftsman, and in some pamphlets. For ten years he showed his opposition and virulent hostility against the minister, and then laid aside his pen, and retired, in 1735, to France, resolved never again to enlist in political contests. He afterwards returned to England, and settled at Battersea, where the last part of his life was spent in the otium cum dignitate. He died there 15th Nov. 1751, on the verge of 80. His manuscripts were left to Mallet, who published them with the rest of his works in 5 vols. 4to. 1754. His works may be divided into political and philosophical, the former consisting of Letters upon History; Letter to Windham, on Patriotism; Papers in the Craftsman, published separately in 3 vols. 8vo. under the title of Political Tracts, &c.: and the latter, Substance of Letters written to de Pouilly; Letter on one of Tillotson's Sermons; Letters and Essays, addressed to Pope. As a writer, lord Bolingbroke was nervous, elegant, and argumentative, and in him were united, as a panegyrist has observed, the wisdom of Socrates, the dignity and ease of Pliny, and the wit of Horace. It is, however, to be lamented that in his writings he is too often skeptical, and that he disregards or ridicules the great truths of revelation, and of Christianity. As the friend of poets and of wits, he has also acquired reputation; and Pope, who esteemed him to adoration, has immortalized himself and his noble friend in the Essay on Man, which he began and finished by his persuasion. He married, in 1716, for his second wife, a niece of Madame de Maintenon, widow of the marquis de Villette; but as he died without issue, his estates and titles were inherited by his nephew.

sanguinary revolutionists of France, was born at Blerancourt near Noyon, 1768. He obtained a seat in the national convention, and gained the friendship of Robespierre, by devoting himself to his infamous purposes, and by supporting all his cruel measures. His easy eloquence, his bold effrontery, and unappalled conduct, rendered him a fit partner for all the atrocities of that dreadful period, and by his influence the property of the emigrants was exposed to sale, the Girondists were conducted to the scaffold, and the effects of foreigners were confiscated. The reign of Louis XVI. was described by this artful and shameless orator as a scene of horrible tyranny; while the government of Robespierre exhibited nothing but benevolence and happiness to the people of France. The punishment of this worthless tyrant at last approached, and after he had insulted the feelings of human nature, interpreted pity into crimes, and condemned to death those who presumed to weep for the loss of their friends and relatives, it was not to be expected that he could excite much of the commiseration of the world. He was conducted to the scaffold with Robespierre, in 1794, and suffered death with more courage than could have been expected from such a tyrant. He wrote Esprit de la Revolution, &c. 8vo. 1791.

SAINT-LAMBERT, Charles Francis de, member of the French academy, and afterwards of the national institute, was born at Nanci 1717, and died at the age of 85. He was the friend of Voltaire, and his genius and poetical abilities gained him the esteem of the learned of France. He wrote Les Fêtes de l'Amour—a comedy—Essay on Luxury—the Four parts of the Day—the Seasons, a poem which Voltaire prefers, but with injudicious partiality, to the Seasons of Thomson—Oriental Fables, besides fugitive pieces, &c.

SAINT-MARK, Charles Hugh le Fevre de, a French writer born at Paris, 1698. After studying at Plessis and at the Mazarin college, he embraced the military profession, which he soon quitted for literature. He died at Paris, 20th Nov. 1769. He edited the Memoirs of Marquis de Feuquieres—Rapin's History of England—Despreaux's Works—the Life of Hecquet—the Works of Pavillon, Chaulieu, &c.

SAINT-MARTIN, N. a native of Amboise, who, after serving six years in the army, retired to privacy and literature. The retirement which he loved and the sweetness of his manners saved him during the horrors of the revolution, and he died at Aunai in the house of a friend, in the beginning of 1804, aged 60. He is author of an excellent book on Error and Truth, 8vo. 1775, often edited—a Picture of Natural Order, 8vo.

SAINT-NECTAIRE, Magdalen de, a French heroine, famous in the wars of the Protestants. She ably defended her castle of Miremont in Limousin, against the superior forces of her enemies.

SAINT-NON, John Claude Richard de, counsellor of the parliament of Paris, is author of Julia, a comedy, and of a voyage pittoresque to Naples and Sicily, 5 vols. fol. with 417 plates. He died at Paris, 25th Nov. 1791, aged 64.

SAINT-PAVIN, Denys Sanguin de, a French poet. He was an ecclesiastic, but he preferred literature and pleasure to the austerities of a monastic life, and after spending much of his time in frivolous and often profane pursuits, he died very penitent 1670, in an advanced old age. He was attacked by Boileau in his satires, and he retorted the censure. His poems consist of epigrams, sonnets, epistles, &c. published in 1759, with those of Charleval, 12mo.

SAINT-PHALIER, Frances Theresa Aumele de, a French lady, who wrote the Confident Rival, a comedy, and some other poetical pieces, and died at Paris 1757.

SAINT-PIERRE, Eustache de, a native of Calais, celebrated for his noble disinterestedness and patriotism. When Edward III. in 1347, displeased with the obstinate resistance of the people of Calais, demanded six of the chief men to be devoted to death, Saint-Pierre in the midst of the hesitation of his countrymen offered himself, and walked with five others, who followed his great example to the conqueror, with halts about their necks. The English queen by her entreaties with difficulty obtained the pardon of these devoted men.

SAINT-PIERRE, Charles Irenæus Castel de, a French ecclesiastic, born in Normandy 1658. He accompanied cardinal de Polignac to the conferences of Utrecht, but though a popular character he was excluded from the French academy, for preferring the measures of the regent duke of Orleans to those of Lewis XIV. He was very intelligent as a man of letters, and as a politician, and died at Paris 29th April, 1743, aged 86. He was author of a project for universal peace among the European powers, 3 vols. 12mo.—Project for reforming the Orthography of the European Languages—Memoirs on Various Subjects, &c. His works have been collected in 18 vols. 12mo. 1744.

SAINT-PIERRE, Jacques Henri Bernardin de, a French writer, was born at Havre de Grace in 1737. His education was liberal; but a great part of his youth was spent in rambling from one country to another. At length he entered into the corps of military engineers; but quitted it, and went to Russia, where he obtained a commission as lieutenant. At the expiration of eighteen months, he joined the Poles, and was taken prisoner; but was soon released, and returned to Paris. He now sailed for the Isle of France; but being dissatisfied with the situation, he revisited his native country, and in 1773 published a relation of his voyage. In 1784 appeared his "Studies of Nature," which became a popular work, and the author was made intendant of the Botanical garden, with a liberal salary. In 1789 came out his beautiful tale of "Paul and Virginia;" and about the same time his "Indian Cottage." He died in 1814, leaving a work entitled "The Harmonies of Nature," which has been translated into English; as also have all his other writings.—W. B.

SAINT-PREUIL, Francis de Jussac d'Embleville de, a French warrior, distinguished at the battle of Castlenaudari, in which he took Montmorenci prisoner, and at the siege of Corbia, which he defended against the Spaniards. He was afterwards governor of Arras, and was condemned to be beheaded by his political enemies for having attacked by mistake a body of men who had surrendered prisoners of war. He suffered at Amiens, 9th November, 1641, aged forty.

SAINT-SIMON, Louis de Rouvroy, duke of, a French statesman, born at Paris 16th June, 1675. He quitted the military service to become ambassador in Spain, 1721; but without sharing the guilt of the perfidious and artful measures of the government of the regent Orleans, he retired to his country seat, where he composed his memoirs. He is accused of jansenism, and of reflecting with too much acrimony against his contemporaries. His works have appeared in 13 vols. Svo. Strasburg, 1791.

SAINT-VINCENT, John Francis Fauris de, a native of Aix, who distinguished himself as an upright magistrate, and president of the parliament of Provence. He was member of the academy of inscriptions, and contributed to its memoirs two valuable papers on the coins of Provence, and on the ancient monuments of Marseilles. He died 22d Oct. 1798, aged 80.

SAINT-YVES, Charles, an able oculist, born at Viette near Rocroi. He acquired great reputation in his profession, and died 1736, aged 69. His treatise on the Disorders of the Eyes, 1722, 4to. and 1736, Svo. is much admired.

SAINTE-ALDEGONDE, Philip de Marnix, lord du Mont, an illustrious statesman, born at Brussels, 1538. He early signalized himself by the copious resources of his mind, and by a perfect knowledge of the classics, of civil law, politics, and divinity; but when his country was persecuted by the tyranny of the Spaniards, he withdrew from oppression into Germany. At Heidelberg he was, in consequence of his merits, raised to the office of counsellor in ecclesiastical affairs; but the miseries of his country at last recalled him home in 1572, and he prepared to assert her liberties, and to defend her religion by the vigour of his mind. He was sent as one of the deputies to England to solicit the protection of Elizabeth, and afterwards went to the diet of Worms, and here his eloquence painted in frightful colours the tyranny of Alva, and called aloud for the assistance of the Germans. In 1580, he again served his country as ambassador, and went to France, and offered the sovereignty of the duke of Alençon, whom he the next year accompanied to England. He was, in 1584, consul of Antwerp, when that city was besieged by the duke of Parma, and he died at Leyden 1598, aged 60. For wisdom, sagacity, and decision, he is deservedly respected as one of the greatest politicians of his age. He published, in Dutch, 1571, Alvearium Romanum, a ludicrous work, which was received and read with great applause, as it ridiculed with well-directed satire the church of Rome. His Tableau des Differens de la Religion, in French, published after his death, was equally popular. He wrote besides other things, and particularly a famous song in praise of prince William of Nassau, which animated his countrymen to resist their oppressors, and like the muse of Tyrtaeus, roused them to despise dangers, and to brave death in the support of their rights and liberties.

SAINTE-BEUVE, James de, a learned ecclesiastic, who became divinity professor at the Sorbonne, from which he was expelled for not subscribing to the censure on Arnauld. He died in retirement 15th Dec. 1677, aged 64. His decisions, 3 vols. 4to. were published by his brother.

SAINTE-MARTHE, Charles, a French physician born 1512. He was honoured with the patronage of Francis II. and of queen Margaret of Navarre, and wrote some elegant pieces in poetry and prose, in Latin as well as French. He died 1555.

SAINTE-MARTHE, Gaucher de, better known by the name of Scævola, was an active character under Henry III. and Henry IV. His conduct was very firm and loyal in the states of Blois, 1588, and afterwards by his influence he reconciled the town of Poitiers to the cause and interests of his master, who he again served with successful zeal in the assembly of the notables at Rouen. He died at Loudun, 29th March, 1623, aged 87, honoured with the title of father of his country. He wrote Gallorum Doctrinâ Illustrium, &c. elogia, besides some poetical pieces of great merit in Latin—epigrams, &c. collected together in 1633, in 4to.

SAINTE-MARTHE, Abel de, eldest son of the preceding, was counsellor of state, and librarian at Fontainebleau. He wrote the Laurel—the Salic Law—elegies, odes, epigrams &c. inferior in merit to the poetical compositions of his father. He died 1652, aged 82.

SAINTE-MARTHE, Gaucher de, or Scævola, and Louis de, twin brothers, sons of Scævola, were born at Loudun, 20th Dec. 1571. They resembled each other in their features, as well as in the qualities of their mind, and they both were appointed historiographers of France, and wrote together some valuable works. The elder died at Paris 7th September, 1650, and Louis 29th April, 1656, and their mutual affection was well depicted by this curious epitaph:

In geminis unum, geminos agnovit in uno

Their works are Genealogical History of the Royal Family of France, 2 vols. fol.—the Genealogical History of the House of Beauvau, fol. &c.

SAINTE-MARTHE, Claude de, grandson of the Scævola just mentioned, embraced the ecclesiastic profession, and died in retirement at Courbeville, 11th October, 1690, aged 71. He wrote some theological pieces. His brother Denis was also an ecclesiastic of great learning and exemplary piety, in the congregation of St. Maur. He wrote the Life of Cassiodorus—the History of Gregory the Great, &c. There were besides other members of that family also illustrious for learning.

SAINTE-PALAYE, John Baptist de la Curne de, a native of Auxerre, who became member of the French academies and of that of inscriptions. He devoted himself assiduously to the study of antiquities, and wrote some valuable works, especially on Ancient Chivalry, three vols. 12mo. He also formed the plan of a Universal French Glossary in forty vols. folio. He died at Paris much respected 1st May, 1781, aged eighty-four.

SALADIN or SALAHEDDIN, sultan of Egypt and Syria, after Adad, was celebrated for his valour during the crusades. After conquering Syria, Arabia, Persia, and Mesopotamia, he marched to the attack of Jerusalem, and with an army of 50,000 men he defeated the Christians near Tiberias, and took Guy de Lusignan the king of Jerusalem prisoner. This signal victory opened the gates of Jerusalem to his forces; but while all expected death, Saladin behaved with humanity to the conquered, and restored to their wives and children the various captives who had been detained in slavery and in chains. These conquests alarmed the Christians of Europe, and already the kings of England and France, with numerous forces marched to the relief of the oppressed Christians of Palestine, but discord defeated their successes. Though Acre, Cæsarea, and Jaffa, yielded to the arms of the Europeans, Richard king of England found his forces so weak by desertion and discord, that he concluded a truce with the Egyptian sultan for three years and three months, 1192. Saladin died the next year at Damascus, aged fifty-seven, leaving seventeen sons, who divided his extensive dominions among them. He was a man of high character, who viewed with the eyes of a sage and a Christian the vanity of human grandeur. In his last illness he ordered to be unfurled before his army the winding sheet which was to encircle his remains, while a herald proclaimed aloud, this is all which Saladin the vanquisher of the East can retain of all his conquests. A French history of this extraordinary character was published in 1758, in 2 vols. 12mo. by M. Marin.

SALARIO, Andrew, an eminent painter, born at Milan 1487. He was a pupil of Leonardo da Vinci, and his pieces were held in high estimation. He died at Florence at the age of 72.

SALDEN, William a native of Utrecht, who became minister to the Hague church, where he died 1694. He wrote Otia Theologica, 4to.—Concinator Sacer, 12mo.—De Libris Variorumque Eorum Usu et Abusu, a work of merit, 12mo.

SALE, George a learned Englishman, well skilled in oriental literature. He contributed much to the completion of the universal history, but his chief work is a translation of the Koran with notes, with a long and valuable preliminary discourse. He died in London, 14th Nov. 1736.

SALERNE, Francis, a physician of Orleans, who devoted himself to the elucidation of natural history. He published with Arnault, the Animal Kingdom—the Natural History of Animals, &c. He also translated Ray's Synopsis Avium. He died 1760.

SALSBURY, William, author of a Welch dictionary—of some poems—of a treatise on rhetoric—and other works, flourished in Wales at the beginning of the seventeenth century. He was bred up to the law, and assisted bishop Davies in the translation of the New Testament into Welch, a useful performance, published 1620.

SALIAN, James, a Jesuit of Avignon, who became rector of the college of Besançon, and died at Paris, 1640. He wrote several theological works, the best known of which is Annals of the Ancient Testament, in Latin, 6 vols. fol. 1625.

SALIMBENI, Venuri, a native of Sienna, distinguished as a painter. His historical pieces were much admired. He died 1613, aged 56. His descent of the Holy Ghost is still admired at Lord Pembroke's, Wilton.

SALINAS, Francis de, a native of Burgos. Though he lost his sight at the age of 10, he acquired a most perfect knowledge of Greek and Latin, and of mathematics and music, and was liberally patronised by the duke of Alba, Paul IV. and others. He died 1590. He was author of an excellent treatise on music, fol. and he translated into Spanish verse some of Martial's epigrams.

SALINGUERRA, a chief of the Ghibelins, who seized upon Ferrara, in 1195, and defied the powers of the pope, and of the duke of Este. He afterwards was driven from his strong post by d'Este, and died in prison at Venice, 1240, aged 80.

SALIS, Ulysses de, a noble Swiss. After serving in the Venetian armies, he engaged in the wars of Valteline, and then entered into the service of France. He distinguished himself at the siege of Rochelle under Lewis XIII. and afterwards went to the aid of his native country, whose independence the Austrians had threatened. In 1635, he at the head of a French army, defeated the Spanish troops at Mont-Franco, and afterwards signalized himself at the siege of Coni. He died in the country of the Grisons 1674, aged 79.

SALISBURY, John, an English divine in Stephen's reign. His works on subjects of antiquity and criticism are curious and valuable.

SALISBURY, Robert Cecil, earl of, an able statesman, son of William, lord Burleigh, born 1550. He was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, and was introduced by his father into the business and the intrigues of political life. He was first secretary to lord Derby, ambassador in France, and in 1596, was made under secretary to sir Francis Walsingham, after whose death he succeeded to the place of principal secretary of state. He was made chancellor of Lancaster 1597, and afterwards succeeded his father lord Burleigh as prime minister, and in this high and dangerous office behaved with great prudence and sagacity. The influence which he possessed under Elizabeth, he retained in the next reign, and James was so pleased with the conduct of this minister, that he created him earl of Salisbury in 1605, and made him knight of the garter. On the death of lord Dorset 1608, he succeeded to the office of high treasurer, and applied his great talents to restore the finances of the kingdom to a more regular and improving state. He died of the complicated attacks of the dropsy and scurvy, 24th May, 1612. His opposition to the earl of Essex, who at last ended his life on the block, is exposed to reprehension, but his enmity to the virtuous Raleigh, continued with increasing asperity, renders his character on that subject peculiarly odious and criminal. He was deformed, it is said, in his person, but the energies of his mind made sufficient amends for the defects of personal appearance.

SALLENGRE, Albert Henry de, a learned writer, born at the Hague 1694. He was educated at Leyden, and became an advocate of the court of Holland, and afterwards commissary of the finances of the States

General; but his further and deserved advancement was stopped by the smallpox, which carried him off 1723, aged 36. He was much respected by the literati of England and France, whom he visited, and was author of Memoirs of Literature, 2 vols.—History of Montmaur, 2 vols. 12mo.—Novus Thesaurus Antiquitatum Romanarum, 3 vols. fol.—Essay on the History of the United Provinces, 4to. which was part only of a larger work which he did not live to complete.

SALLO, Dennis de, a French writer, born at Paris 1626. Though dull in his youth, his powers gradually expanded, and he became an acute classical scholar, and in 1652 was admitted counsellor of the parliament of Paris. He did not, however, abandon literature, but was the first who, in 1664, formed the project of a "Journal des Scavans." But so severe were his censures on the labours of his contemporaries, that a crowd of enemies rose up against him, and he dropped in dismay his critical remarks. The plan nevertheless was adopted by the learned of Europe after his example, but with more moderation, and consequently greater success. He died 1669, and though an author of some ability, he is remembered now only as the inventor of a scheme of periodical criticism, which has proved so useful and so entertaining to the polished nations of the world.

SALLUST, Caius Crispus, a celebrated Latin historian. He was in the early part of life so debauched that his name was erased from the list of senators; but the friendship of Cæsar restored him to his dignity, and gave him the government of Numidia, where he amassed an opulent fortune. He built some stately edifices at Rome, which still bear his name. He died B. C. 34. Though devoted to luxury and voluptuous ease, he wrote valuable histories of the Jugurthine war, and of the Catiline conspiracy.

SALMANASAR, a king of Assyria, who invaded Samaria and put an end to the kingdom of Israel, by carrying the people into captivity. He was afterwards unfortunate in his attack upon the Tyrians, who defeated him by sea. He died about 714 B. C. after a reign of fourteen years.

SALMASIUS, Claudius, or SAUNAISE, a most learned writer, born at Saumur, 1588, of a respectable family. He was educated under his father, who was a member of the parliament of Burgundy, and afterwards studied at Paris, and then passed to Heidelberg where he publicly professed the protestant religion which he had imbibed from the precepts and example of his mother. In this place he drew upon himself the admiration of the university by his learning and continued application, and proved himself deservedly to be what his friend, Isaac Casaubon, had described him, "ad miracu-lum doctus." His literary reputation was now such that he received pressing and most liberal invitations from Venice, from Oxford, and even from the pope; but these he declined, and settled in 1632 in Holland, where he succeeded Scaliger as professor at Leyden. In 1640, on the death of his father, he visited Burgundy, and received the strongest solicitations from Richelieu, and the offer of a pension of 12,000 livres a year to settle in France; but this he again rejected, and preferred the independence and freedom of Holland to the servility of a courtier. In 1650 he visited Christina, queen of Sweden, who received him with great respect, and treated him with the most flattering marks of friendship. His reputation, in the mean time, suffered in the controversy which he had with Milton; for while he defended, at the request of the exiled family of England, the conduct and principles of Charles I. his antagonist brought against him, if not more learning, yet more wit, more fancy, and more poignancy of thought, so that the labours of the Englishman were read with more applause throughout Europe than the duller composition of the defender of royalty. He began, indeed, to answer Milton, but with slowness and a heavy heart, and it was said that he died of chagrin, at the superior powers of his opponent. It is, however, more probable, that his death was occasioned by drinking improperly the Spa waters. He died 3d Sept. 1653. His answer to Milton was published by his son. Salmasius was universally acknowledged to be the most learned man of his time. He was well acquainted with all the languages of Europe, and in Greek, Latin, Hebrew, and the other oriental tongues, he was a most perfect master; but all these great qualities were tarnished by self-love, by a fastidious disregard of others, and the most inveterate odium against, all such as dared to controvert or differ from his opinions. His works are very numerous, the best known of which are his "Notæ in Historiæ Augustæ Scriptorum—and Exercitationes Plinianæ in Solinum," besides good editions of Tertullian, Florus, Polyhistor, Simplicius on Epictetus—and Treatises de Modo Usurarium—de Re Militari Romanorum—de Hellenistica—de Fœnere Trapezetico, &c.

SALMERON, Alphonsus, a native of Toledo, who finished his studies at Paris. He was one of the first and of the most zealous followers of Ignatius Loyola, the founder of the Jesuits, and after travelling through Germany, Poland, the Low Countries, and Ireland, he appeared at the council of Trent, where he displayed his learning and eloquence. He afterwards was very active in the establishment of the Jesuits' college at Naples, where he died 13th Feb. 1585, aged 69. He wrote Commen- taries on the Scriptures, and other works, edited in 8 vols. folio, 1612.

SALMON, William, an eminent empiric, author of the Complete Physician, or Druggist's Shop opened, 8vo.—a large Herbal, 2 vols. fol.—Polygraphice, or the Art of Painting, a work of merit—treatise on Astrology, &c. He flourished about 1685.

SALMON, Nathanael, an antiquarian, born at Mepsall, Bedfordshire, and educated at Benet college, Cambridge. He entered into orders, but though he had taken the oaths to William, he refused to do it to Anne, and being thus driven from the church, he applied himself to physic, which he practised at St. Ives, Huntingdonshire, and Bishop's Stortford, Herts. He wrote a Survey of Roman Stations in Britain, 8vo.—a Survey of Roman Antiquities in the Middle English Counties, 8vo.—The History of Hertfordshire, folio—the Lives of English Bishops from the Reformation—the Antiquities of Surrey, and of Essex. He died 1742.

SALMON, Thomas, brother to William, was a writer of reputation. He was author of the Present State of all Nations—a Geographical Grammar, 8vo. afterwards improved by Guthrie—the Chronological History of England, 2 vols. 8vo.—Examination of Burnet's History of his own Times, besides valuable assistance in the Universal History, &c. He died suddenly, April, 1743, and was buried in St. Dunstan's church.

SALONINA, wife of Gallienus, was a woman of great merit, as the friend of literature, and a benevolent princess. She was murdered with her husband, 268.

SALTER, Samuel, a learned divine, born at Norwich, and educated at the Charter-house, and Benet college, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow. He was appointed by Sir Philip Yorke, afterwards lord Hardwicke, tutor to his children, and to this connexion, so well deserved by his talents and attention, he was indebted for his preferment in the church. He obtained from Herring the Lambeth degree of D.D. 1751, and in 1754 was appointed preacher at the Charter-house, and in 1761 master, on the death of Dr. Bearcroft. He was besides prebendary of Norwich, and had some livings. He died May 2d, 1778, and was buried in the burial ground of the Charter-house. He was a man of great abilities, eminent as a scholar, and popular as a preacher, and blessed with such a retentive memory, that he always delivered his sermons without even the use of notes. He printed some single sermons, &c.—an edition of his maternal grandfather, Dr. Jeffrey's tracts and sermons, 2 vols. 8vo. &c. He was for some time the friend of Bentley, and some anecdotes of that celebrated critic are preserved from his papers, by Bowyer.

SALTONSTALL, Gurdon, governor of Connecticut, was born 27th March, 1666, in Haverhill, Massachusetts, and was graduated at Harvard college, in 1684. He was endowed with fine talents, and devoting himself to the ministry, soon became distinguished. He possessed a keen understanding, a rich fancy, and his style and delivery were manly and attractive. He settled at New-London, Connecticut, on 25th November, 1691, and remained there highly esteemed till 1707, when he was selected as a candidate for the office of governor, and the legislature, to render him eligible, repealed a law, requiring the choice to be made from among the magistrates. He was advanced to the office, and annually re-elected till his death, in 1724, in his fifty-ninth year. His administration was able and popular. He left a widow who was much celebrated in New-England for her accomplishments, piety, and munificence to literary and charitable objects.

SALTONSTALL, Richard, nephew of the governor, and grandson to the Hon. Nathaniel Saltonstall, was born in 1703, and graduated at Harvard college, in 1722, and as early as 1728 he was a representative from Haverhill, and was afterwards a member of the council. In 1736 he was appointed a judge of the superior court, and held the office until a few months before his death, when he resigned on account of ill health. He died October 20th, 1756, aged 54. His eldest son Richard was graduated at Harvard college, in 1751. He was an officer in the war with the French, and afterwards sheriff of Essex county. He married a daughter of the Hon. Elisha Cooke of Boston. At the commencement of the revolution he left the province, and died at Kensington, England, in 1785.

SALVATOR, Rosa, an Italian painter, born at Renessa, near Naples, 1615. His youth was dissipated, and passed frequently in the abandoned company of banditti, in whose wild and rugged retreats he imbibed that taste for rough scenery which he described on canvass with so masterly a hand. His human figures are much admired, but few of his larger works are to be found in England, though he was so rapid in his execution, that he often began and finished a picture in one day. His prints, of which he etched a great number, are in general esteem. He distinguished himself also as a poet, and deserved, by the force and popularity of his satire, to be called the Juvenal of Italy. His works were printed, Amsterdam, 1719, 8vo. He died at Rome, 1673.

SALVI, John, an historical painter, who displayed great taste and judgment in copying the pieces of the best masters. He was born near Urbino, and died 1590 aged 86.

SALVI, Nicholas, an architect, born at Rome. He died 1751, aged 52. The best known of his works is the fountain of Crevi, which he finished at the desire of pope Clement XII.

SALVIANI, Hippolitus, a noble native of Citta-di-Castello, who practised medicine at Rome, and died there 1572, aged 59. He is author of a treatise on Fishes, folio—de Crisibus ad Galeni Censuram—poems and comedies in Italian.

SALVIANUS, a divine of the fifth century. He wrote, in an elegant style, a treatise on Divine Providence, and other works, printed, 2 vols. 8vo. 1623. He was a native of Cologne, and died at Marseilles, 484.

SALVIATI, Francis, a painter of Florence, born 1510. He was patronised by cardinal Salviati, and in consequence of this he exchanged his name of Bossi for that of his benefactor. He was at Paris 1554, but looked with envy upon the eminence of rival painters, and afterwards returned to Italy. He was much admired for the grace which he gave to his naked figures, and the beauty and ease of his draperies. The best of his pieces are preserved at Florence, Venice, and Rome. He died 1563.

SALVIATI, Joseph, a Venetian painter, who exchanged his family name of Porta for that of his master Salviati. His design and colouring were highly admired, and his abilities were frequently employed by the Venetians, with those of Tintoret and Paul Veronese. He died at Venice, 1585.

SALVINI, Anthony Marie, an eminent scholar, born at Florence, and professor of Greek there. He was member of the de la Crusca academy, and contributed much to the completion of their Dictionary, in 6 vols. folio. Besides elegant poetical translations into Italian of the Iliad and Odyssey, of Theocritus, Hesiod, Anacreon, and other Greek poets; besides Ovid's Metamorphoses, Horace's Satires and Art of Poetry, and other Latin works; and Boileau's Art of Poetry, and Addison's Cato, &c. he wrote some elegant sonnets; Academical Discourses; a Funeral Oration for Magliabechi, &c. He died at Florence 1729.

SAMBUCCUS, John, a native of Tirnau in Hungary, who studied medicine and improved himself by travelling through Germany, Italy, and France. He was patronised by the emperors Maximilian II. and Rodolphus II. and was appointed counselor of state and historiographer of the empire. He wrote Lives of the Roman Emperors—History of Hungary—Emblemata—Icones Medicorum, folio—translations in Latin from Hesiod, Plato, Thucydides, &c. This learned and well-informed man died of an apoplexy at Vienna, 13th June, 1584, aged 53.

SAMPSON, William, author of the Vow Breaker, a tragedy, lived in the age of the first Charles. He also assisted Markham in the composition of his tragedy of Herod and Antipater.

SAMPSON, Henry, M. A. a native of South Leverton, Notts, educated at Pembroke hall, Cambridge, where he became fellow. He obtained the living of Framlingham, but was ejected for nonconformity at the restoration, and then studied physic at Leyden and Padua, and practised with success in London. He died 1705. He published an edition of Porter on Divine Grace, and prepared materials for a history of nonconformists, which, however, he never published.

SAMSON, son of Manoah, of the tribe of Dan. He is celebrated in Scripture for his extraordinary strength, which he displayed against the enemies of his country. He was at last betrayed by his mistress, Delilah, into the hands of the Philistines, who put out his eyes, and made him work in a mill. He avenged himself of his enemies when they had assembled to make sport of him, and while in the temple of Dagon, he seized the pillars against which he rested, and throwing down the whole edifice, perished in the ruins, with 3000 of the Philistines, B.C. 1117.

SAMUEL, a celebrated prophet of Israel. He was early devoted to the service of God in the temple as the attendant upon Eli, and when called to the holy office of prophet, he anointed Saul, and afterwards David, to be kings over his nation. He died about 1057, B.C. aged 98. The book of Judges and of Ruth are supposed to be written by him.

SAMWELL, David, a native of Nantglyn, Denbighshire, known as the surgeon of the Discovery, at the time when the unfortunate Cook was murdered by the natives of Owhyhee. As he was present at this dreadful scene, he gave to the public a very circumstantial account of it. He also published some poems in Welch, and died 1799.

SANADON, Noel Stephen, a learned Jesuit, born at Rouen, 1676. He taught with reputation at Caen, and afterwards with equal success, was professor of rhetoric at Paris. He was intrusted with the education of prince de Conti, and made librarian to the king. He died 21st Sept. 1733. He was author of some orations and poems, much admired, besides a translation of Horace's works, accompanied with learned notes, the best edition of which is that of Amsterdam, 1735, in 8 vols. 8vo. containing Dacier's version and notes.

SANCHEZ, Antonio Nunes Ribeiro, a learned physician, born 7th March, 1699, at Penna-Macor, in Portugal. He studied at Coimbra and Salamanca, and afterwards passed to London, and then visited Leyden, where he further improved his knowledge under the direction of Boerhaave. When in 1731, Anne, empress of Russia, required of that illustrious professor to recommend her three physicians, Sanchez was honourably nominated one of the number. In this distant country he was appointed physician to the army, and he distinguished himself by his extensive and successful practice, and at last became first physician at court. The revolution of 1742, however, changed his prospects, and in the midst of the proscriptions which he daily witnessed, he had the good fortune to be permitted to leave the country. He retired to Paris, where he died 14th Oct. 1783. His correspondence with the learned was extensive, and his papers are now, it is said, in the hands of Dr. Andre. It is to be observed, that Catherine, when she ascended the Russian throne, rewarded his services to her subjects with an honourable pension of 1000 roubles. The works of Dr. Sanchez, are Dissertations on the Origin of the Venereal Disease—on Earthquakes—a Method of studying Medicine, &c.

SANCHEZ, Thomas, a learned Jesuit, born at Corduba, 1551. His reputation for chastity and mortification was very great. He died at Grenada, 19th May, 1610, and was buried with extraordinary magnificence. His works on the Decalogue, on Monastic Vows, &c. in 4 vols. folio, display great genius; but in examining the controversies concerning marriage he has used language too often coarse and indelicate.

SANCHEZ, Peter Anthony, a Spanish divine, was born at Vigo, in Galicia, in 1740. He became canon of the cathedral of St. James, and professor of divinity at his native place, where he was admired as a preacher, and esteemed for his charity. He died in 1806. His works are—1. Summa theologiæ Sacræ, 4 vols. 2. Annales Sacri, 2 vols. 3. A Treatise on Toleration, 3 vols. 4. History of the Church of Africa. 5. Essay on the Eloquence of the Pulpit. 6. Sermons, 3 vols. 7. On the Means of encouraging Industry.—W.B.

SANCHO II. surnamed the Strong, king of Castile, resented the division made by his father Ferdinand, of his dominions, and therefore on his mother's death, he de-throned his brothers. Garcias was banished from Galicia, and Alphonsus quitted the throne of Leon, to end his days in a monastery. Sancho afterwards stripped his sisters of their patrimony; but in besieging Zamora, which belonged to the eldest, he was assassinated, 1072.

SANCHO, Ignatius, a negro of extraordinary character, born 1729, at sea, on board a ship in its passage from Guinea to Spanish America. He was baptized at Carthagen, by the name of Ignatius, and when two years old was brought by his master to England, and given to three maiden sisters near Greenwich, who contemptuously bestowed on him the appellation of Don Quixote's squire. Though treated with harshness by his austere mistresses, he found a patron and a friend in the duke of Montague, and after that nobleman's death he lived with the dutchess in the capacity of butler, and at her decease, received from her bounty an annuity of 30*l.* A habit of low debauchery, however, and a fondness for gaming, soon ruined his little fortune, till at last reflection brought him back to his senses, and as he was very partial to theatrical representations, he presented himself as a proper character, to portray the person of Othello and Oroonoko. The attempt did not, however, answer the public expectation; but though thus disappointed, a marriage with a respectable young woman, of West India origin, dictated to him the necessity of industrious and honest exertions. By the friendship of the Montague family, he was again placed above want, and settled in a small grocery shop, where his good conduct enabled him, in the enjoyment of domestic comforts, to provide a decent subsistence for himself and his numerous family. He died 15th Dec. 1780. This singular character, patronised by the great, by the dutchesses of Queensbury and Northumberland, and noticed by the learned and the fashionable, by Sterne, Garrick, and others, was author of several letters, which possess great originality, and display strong powers of intellect, and which appeared for the benefit of his family under the benevolent care of Miss Crewe.

SANCHONIATHON, a Phœnician historian, who flourished about the time that Gideon judged Israel. Some fragments remain in Eusebius and Porphyry, of his history of the Antiquities of Phœnicia, which Philo of Byblos had translated into Greek.

SANCROFT, William, an eminent English prelate, born at Fresingfield, Suffolk, 1616. He was educated at Bury school, and Emanuel college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow in 1642. He was ejected from his fellowship in 1649 for refusing to conform to the republican establishment, and then went over to the continent, where he continued till the restoration. He returned to England soon after Charles, and became chaplain to Cosin bishop of Durham, who gave him the valuable living of Houghton-le-Spring, and a prebend stall. In 1662, he was elected master of Emanuel college, in 1664 made dean of York, and a few months after promoted to the deanery of St. Paul. In this new situation he contributed much to the repairing of the cathedral, and when it was destroyed by the fire of London, he gave 1400*l.* towards rebuilding it. In 1657 he was unexpectedly raised by Charles II. to the metropolitan see of Canterbury, and added dignity to that high station by his exemplary conduct and paternal care of the church. He attended his royal master in his last moments, and it is said, used great freedom of exhortation. Under his successor he evinced a strong attachment to the established church, by his opposition to popery, and he was one of the seven bishops sent to the tower in 1688. Though thus zealous against the papists, and one of those lords who declared for the prince of Orange, on James's abdication, yet he refused to wait upon the new made monarch, to whose elevation he had so powerfully concurred, and for this pusillanimous conduct he is deservedly censured by Burnet and others. This conduct, and his refusal to take the oath of allegiance rendered him unpopular with the court, he was suspended, and Tillotson in 1691 was appointed in his room. As he refused to leave Lambeth, he was cited before the court of exchequer as an intruder, and now, finding all resistance vain, he retired to Fresingfield, where he lived for two years in obscurity, till an intermittent fever carried him off, 24th Nov. 1693. Though a man of great learning, he published little, which was a Latin dialogue against Calvinism, called the Predestinated Thief—Modern Politics, from Machiavel, Borgia, &c. besides sermons—Familiar Letters, &c. His MSS. were purchased for 80 guineas, and presented to the Bodleian library by bishop Tanner.

SANCTORIUS, an ingenious physician, professor at Padua, was born at Capo d'Istria, 1561, and died at Venice 1636. He is chiefly known for his curious experiments on insensible perspiration, which he made on himself in his statical chair, ascertaining, with incredible accuracy, what he gained by aliment, and what he lost by secretion and other discharges. This ingenious system was presented to the admiring world in his "Ars de Staticâ Medicinâ," Venice, 1614, translated into French 1722, and into English by Dr. Quincy. He published, besides, Methodus vitandorum Errorum in Arte Medicâ, 4to.—Commentaria in Galeni, &c. all together collected in 4 vols. 4to.

ham, who acquired some celebrity as an architect, and was appointed professor of that science in the Royal academy, London. He died 1798, aged 77.

SANDBY, Paul, an artist, was born at Nottingham in 1732. At the age of fourteen, he became a student in the drawing-room in the Tower, and in 1748 he was sent to take views in the Highlands for the duke of Cumberland. Of these he made small etchings, which he afterwards published. After this he was much employed in making sketches throughout the kingdom; and he executed several prints, in imitation of drawings in Indian ink, which art of aquatinta, as it is called, he carried to great perfection. He became one of the first members of the Royal Academy, and in 1768 was appointed chief drawing-master of that at Woolwich. He died Nov. 7, 1809. His brother, Thomas Sandby, became professor of architecture in the Royal Academy, and died in 1798, at the age of 77.—W. B.

SANDEMAN, Robert, a Scotchman, born at Perth, 1723, and educated at St. Andrews. Instead of entering into the church, for which he was intended, he became a linen manufacturer, and afterwards turned preacher.—He came to America in 1764, and settled in Danbury, Connecticut, where he gathered a church the following year. He afterwards established several societies in New-England. The chief peculiarity of his creed was the dogma, that justifying faith is a mere act of the understanding, a merely speculative belief. He died at Danbury, April 2d, 1771, aged 53 years. His sect still bears his name. He wrote an answer to Hervey's Theron and Aspasio, very offensive to the Calvinists.

SANDERS, Robert, an English writer, born near Breadalbane, in Scotland, about 1727. From a comb-maker he became a hackney writer, when transplanted to London, and besides engagements in some periodical publications, was amanuensis to lord Lyttelton, when he wrote his History of Henry II. He wrote the Complete English Traveller, folio—the Newgate Calendar—Gaffer Graybeard, a novel, in 4 vols. 12mo. in which he occasionally employs his wit with effect against fanaticism. In his last years he projected a Chronology of all Nations, but died before its completion, of a disorder on his lungs, 19th March, 1783.

SANDERS, Nicolas, divinity professor at Louvain, was born at Charlewood, Surrey, and educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford, from which he was banished for his religious tenets. He was with cardinal Hosius, at the council of Trent, and afterwards went to Poland, and he was sent by Gregory XIII. as his nuncio to Ireland, where he led for some time a wandering life in the woods and mountains during the civil troubles, and at last died of want, 1581. He wrote, against the reformation, De Origine et Progressu Schismatis Anglicani, 8vo.

SANDERSON, Robert, an eminent prelate, born at Rotherham, Yorkshire, 19th Sept. 1587. After receiving his education at Rotherham school, he entered at Lincoln college, Oxford, where he became fellow, 1606. In 1618 he was presented to the living of Wyberton, near Boston, which he resigned the next year on account of the unhealthiness of the place, and then succeeded to Boothby Pagnel rectory, which he enjoyed for 40 years. He was afterwards promoted to a prebend of Southwell, and on account of his extensive learning was recommended by Laud to the king, and made his chaplain. In 1636 he was created D.D. at Oxford, and in 1642 appointed regius professor of divinity, and canon of Christ church. His attachment to the king rendered him an object of persecution with the parliament; but he adhered to his principles, and attended the king at Hampton court, and the Isle of Wight, and advised him with respect to the proposal of the parliament, to alter, and even abolish the Episcopal government of the church, and also published his sentiments under the title of Episcopacy not prejudicial to regal power. In 1648 he was ejected from his professorship, but permitted to retain, though with difficulty, his living; and at the restoration he was reinstated to all his ecclesiastical honours, and soon after raised to the see of Lincoln. Though he held this new dignity but a little time, yet he assiduously was engaged in promoting the interests of religion, and in improving the poor vicarages of his diocese. He died 29th Jan. 1662-3, and was buried privately in Bugden church. As a divine and a scholar Sanderson was well versed in ecclesiastical and antiquarian history, and was considered as the ablest casuist of the times. He used to say that he read only three books, Aristotle's Rhetoric, Aquinas's Secunda Secundæ, and Cicero's works, especially his Offices, which he could repeat without book. The strong sense and manly diction of his writings have been deservedly admired. The chief of his works are "Logicæ Artis Compendium," 36 sermons, fol.—Nine Cases of Conscience resolved—De Juramenti Obligatione—de Obligatione Conscientiæ, translated into English by Charles, during his confinement in the Isle of Wight—Pax Ecclesiæ, about predestination, &c.—Discourses concerning the Church, &c.—Lectures in the Divinity School, Oxford, &c.

SANDERSON, Robert, Esq. F.A.S. usher of the court of Chancery, and clerk of the Rolls' chapel, distinguished himself as the laborious continuator of Rymer's Fœdera, from the 16th to the 20th volume. A new edition of Rymer appeared in 1727. Sanderson died 25th Dec. 1741.

SANDRART, Joachim, a German painter, born at Frankfort, 1606. He studied at Prague, Utrecht, London, Venice, and Rome. His abilities were noticed and rewarded by the king of Spain; but instead of living the whole of his life abroad, he returned to Frankfort, where he married, and afterwards settled at Nuremberg, where he established an academy of painting. He published some works on his art, the best known of which is the Lives of Painters, with their effigies, abridged from Vasari and Ridolfi. He died at Nuremberg, 1683.

SANDYS, Edwin, a distinguished prelate, born in 1519, in Lancashire, at Hawkshead, as it is supposed. He was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, and in 1547 was elected master of Catharine-hall, and in 1553 vice chancellor. He was a strong advocate for the reformation, and therefore willingly seconded the views of Northumberland in proclaiming Jane Grey queen; but when, two days after, the same nobleman, yielding to the times, wished him to proclaim Mary, he boldly resisted. For this contumacy he was deprived of his honours, sent to the Tower for seven months, and at last liberated with great difficulty. His attachment to the protestant cause was so zealous that Gardiner meditated his ruin; but he escaped to the continent, where he continued till the accession of Elizabeth. On his return to England he was appointed one of the nine divines who were to dispute against nine catholics before the assembled parliament, and he was also named one of the commissioners for the revision of the liturgy, and the reformation of the church. He was raised to the see of Worcester, and in consequence of his great learning, was one of those employed in the translation of what is called the Bishops' Bible, in which he translated for his share the books of Kings and Chronicles. In 1570 he succeeded Grindal in the see of London, and in 1576 was translated to York. His severity against the papists, in the cause of the reformation, was so great, that he created himself many enemies, and so resentful were some of these religious opponents, that they scrupled not to charge the bishop of adultery, by introducing, while he was asleep at an inn at Doncaster, the wife of the innkeeper into his bed, and then exciting the husband, in pretended irritation, to chastise the violence offered to his honour. This infamous conspiracy was fully detected, and the accomplices, men of rank and fortune, were severely punished in the star chamber. The archbishop, thus persecuted, and exposed during his active life to great obloquy and much contention, died 10th July, 1588, and was buried at Southwell. He was twice married, and by his second wife had seven sons and two daughters, from one of whom is descended lord Sandys. As a preacher Dr. Sandys was much admired; 22 of his sermons were published in 4to. and some of his letters have also appeared in print.

SANDYS, sir Edwin, second son of the archbishop, was born in Worcestershire, 1561, and educated at Corpus Christi, Oxford, under the celebrated Hooker. In 1581 he obtained a prebend in the church of York, and afterwards travelled into foreign countries, and published an Account of his Observations, under the title of Europæ Speculum. He resigned his prebend in 1602, and was knighted by king James, and employed by him in affairs of trust and importance with foreign states. He opposed, in 1621, the measures of the court in parliament, for which he was imprisoned, but soon after set at liberty, by the interference of the commons. He died 1629, and was buried at Northbourne, in Kent. He left 1500*l.* to the university of Oxford, for the foundation of a metaphysical lecture. Some sacred hymns have appeared under his name, though some attribute them to another person of the same name.

SANDYS, George, brother to the preceding, was the seventh and youngest son of the archbishop, and was born at Bishopsthorp, 1577. In 1588 he entered at St. Mary's hall, Oxford, and afterwards removed to Corpus Christi, and in 1610 set out on his travels, and during an absence of two years, visited not only the chief countries of Europe, but the most celebrated places of the East, the Holy Land, Egypt, &c. He published, on his return, an Account of his Travels, in folio, 1615, with plates, which was very popular, and was often reprinted. He was also distinguished as a poet, and translated, in 1632, Ovid's Metamorphoses into English verse, in folio—besides the Psalms of David Paraphrased—Christ's Passion, a sacred drama, from Grotius, &c. He died at Bexley, in Kent, March, 1643, and was buried there. His learning and virtues have been commended not only by his contemporaries, Lucius, lord Falkland, and others, but by Dryden, who called him the best versifier of his age, and by Pope, who declared that English poetry owed much of its beauty to his translations.

SANNAZARIUS, James, an eminent Italian poet, born at Naples, 28th July, 1458. He was patronised by Frederic, king of Naples, and accompanied that prince into France, after his expulsion from his kingdom. He afterwards returned to Naples, where he devoted himself to study and to pleasure. He died 1530. His Latin poems, consisting of elegies, eclogues, and epigrams, have been often edited. His epic poem, De Partu Virginis, in 3 books, is considered as an elegant and highly finished performance, though the mixture of Christianity and paganism must be regarded as offensive to truth and probability. He wrote also two pieces in Italian, Arcadia, in prose and verse, and Rime, a poem.

SANSON, Nicolas, a French geographer, born at Abbeville, Dec. 12th, 1600. He early distinguished himself by his geographical labours, and was so indefatigable that he executed not less than 300 large maps of places, ancient and modern, in a correct and elegant manner. He was engineer and geographer to the king, and was patronised by Richelieu and Mazarine. He died at Paris, 1667, leaving two sons, who inherited his geographical talents. His Atlas was published, 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1693. He wrote besides Treatises on the Four Parts of the World; a Description of the Roman Empire, France, Spain, Italy, &c.

SANSOVINO, James, called Fatti, a native of Florence, eminent as a sculptor and architect. The mint, the library of St. Mark, and the palace of Cornavo, at Venice, are beautiful specimens of his skill and genius, which were so highly admired, that in a public tax he and Titian were exempted from the general contribution. He died at Venice, 1570, aged 91. His son Francis was born at Rome, 1521, and studied at Venice, but took his degrees in law at Padua. He, however, abandoned jurisprudence for polite literature, and erected a printing-house at Venice, where he printed his own works, and those of others. He wrote a Chronology of the World, to 1582—a Translation of Plutarch—Annals of the Ottoman Empire—Description of the Government of Genoa, Lucca, and Ragusa—a collection of 100 novels of illustrious Italian writers, &c. He died at Venice, 1586, aged 65.

SANTEUL, John Baptist de, a Latin poet, born at Paris, 1630. He was one of the canons of St. Victor, and was rewarded for his merits with a pension from Lewis XIV. He died at Dijon, 1697. His Latin poems were much admired, and appeared in 3 vols. 12mo.—besides Latin Hymns, in another volume. Bruyere has spoken of him in high strains of commendation. His brother Claude, who died 1684, also excelled as a Latin poet.

SANTI DI TITI, a native of Florence, whose historical pieces and portraits were much admired. The best part of his works are preserved at Florence. He died 1603, aged 65.

SAPOR I. king of Persia after his father Artaxerxes, A.D. 238. He extended his dominions by the conquest of Mesopotamia, Syria, and Cilicia, and by the defeat of the emperor Valerian. He was afterwards defeated by Odenatus, and some time after put to death by his subjects, 273.

SAPOR II. king of Persia after his father Hormisdas, was a brave and successful warrior against the Romans, but a violent oppressor of the Christians. He died 380 A. D.

SAPPHO, a celebrated poetess, born in Mitylene, about 600 B. C. Her poetical powers in lyric composition were so respectable, that she was called the tenth muse, and her countrymen even stamped her image on their coin. Her manners, however, were dissolute, and it is said that she threw herself into the sea, on account of the coldness with which young Phaon returned her love.

SARASIN, John Francis, a French writer, born at Hermanville, near Caen, 1604. He studied at Caen and Paris, and though not very learned, was eminent for his vivacity, his wit, and his acquaintance with polite literature. He was made secretary to the prince of Conti; but though long protected and favoured by him, he was at last dismissed from his service with ignominy, because he had prevailed upon him, through interested motives, to marry cardinal Mazarine's niece. This severe treatment weighed heavily upon his spirit, and at last occasioned his death, 1654. His works were published under the care of his friend Menage. They are in French, and consist of a Discourse on Tragedy; History of the Siege of Dunkirk, 1649; the Funeral Pomp of Voiture; Miscellanea; besides poems, odes, eclogues, epigrams, &c.

SARAVIA, Adrian, a native of Hesdin, in Artois; protestant professor of divinity at Leyden, where he joined the conspiracy for delivering up the city to Robert de Leicester. Upon the failure of this plan he fled to England, where he became canon of Canterbury, and the friend of Hooker, whose last moments he attended. His works have been collected into one vol. folio. He died 1611, aged 81. He is represented by P. Burmam, as avaricious, inconstant, and ambitious.

SARBIIEWSKI, Matthias Casimir, a Jesuit. VID. CASIMIR.

SARDANAPALUS, a dissolute king of Assyria. When defeated in an insurrection of his subjects, who viewed with indignation his effeminate conduct, he set his palace on fire, and perished in the flames, B. C. 820.

SARGENT, Winthrop, governor of Mississippi, was a native of Massachusetts, and graduated at Harvard college in 1771. In July, 1775, he entered the army, and served in various capacities with great reputation, until the termination of the war. After the peace he became connected with the Ohio company, and in 1786 was appointed by congress surveyor of the northwestern territory, and in 1787 secretary of the government established there. He repaired thither in 1788, and the succeeding year was authorized to take upon him the government in case of the death or resignation of St. Clair. The administration devolved on him in 1790, during the absence of the governor. He attended general St. Clair in the capacity of adjutant general in his unfortunate expedition against the Indians, and was wounded in the retreat. He was also adjutant general and inspector under general Wayne, and on the departure of St. Clair was again governor of the territory. He was removed from office in 1801, and succeeded by Claiborne. He died on a voyage from Natches to Philadelphia, June 3d, 1820.

SARISBURY, John of, an English ecclesiastic, born at Rochester, 1110. He was the favourite of Henry II. and of Thomas Becket, and for some time was the English resident at the court of Rome. He was afterwards the friend and faithful companion of Becket, and was with him when he was assassinated at Canterbury. He then passed over to France, and was made bishop of Chartres, 1179, but died soon after. He was a man of great genius and extensive learning, which he showed in a Latin Treatise called Policraticon, sive de Nugis Curialium, &c.; besides his "Letters;" a Life of Becket; a Treatise on Logic and Philosophy, much commended by Du Pin, and by Lipsius.

SARJEANT, John, a secular priest, whose real name was Smith, born in Lincolnshire, 1621, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. He became secretary to Morton, bishop of Durham; but afterwards went to Lisbon, and in the English college there, changed his religion. He returned to England, 1652, and wrote some tracts in favour of the new tenets which he had embraced, especially against Tillotson, Bramhall, Pierce, Hammond, &c. He died about 1670.

SARPI, Peter Paul, commonly known by the name of Father Paul, was born at Venice, 14th August, 1552. At the age of twelve he entered into the order of the Servites, and soon acquired distinction by his learning and abilities. Well skilled in the knowledge of the learned languages, he was equally conversant in philosophy, mathematics, and theology, and had made some progress in medicine and anatomy. These high acquirements were noticed and rewarded; he was not only made provincial of his order, but was honoured with the esteem of cardinals and princes. The quarrels of Venice with pope Paul V. engaged the attention of Sarpi, and he so ably defended the rights of his fellow-citizens, that the pope ordered him to come to Rome, and on his refusal excommunicated him. Undismayed by the displeasure of the pontiff, he did not cease to advocate the cause of Venice against foreign powers, in his speeches and in his writings; but his boldness proved almost fatal to him. He was attacked on the bridge of St. Mark by five assassins, who, after stabbing him in three places, escaped to a ten-oared barge, which waited their arrival; and though the republic, incensed at the treatment of their brave defender, offered a high reward, the murderers were never discovered. The wounds were not mortal, but they hastened the dissolution of Sarpi, whose constitution was very delicate, and his health feeble. He died 14th January, 1623, aged 71, and his last words were esto perpetua, expressive of his wish for the immortal glory of his country. This learned man wrote several works of merit, and his knowledge was so extensive, that the Italians have not hesitated to ascribe to him the discovery of the circulation of the blood. He was author of the History of the Council of Trent, a valuable work, printed in Italian, London, 1619, and Latin, 1620; Considerations of the Censures of Paul V. against the Venetian Republic; treatise on the Interdict; De Jure Asylorum; treatise on the Inquisition; on Benefices; letters; Memoirs of his life appeared at Venice, 1766. His works were collect'd at Venice, 1677, in 6 vols. 12mo.

SARTO, Andrea de, an Italian painter, born at Florence, 1471, the son of a tailor, hence his name. He was first apprentice to a goldsmith; but he was born with a genius for painting, and by copying and imitating, at his leisure, the pieces of the greatest masters, and by the instruction of Basile, Cossimo, and Bigio, he soon acquired correctness and celebrity. He was invited by Francis I. to France, and received very honourable marks of the royal bounty; but when permitted to visit Florence, to make a collection of pictures to adorn the king's palaces, he not only shamefully forgot his promise, but dishonourably embezzled the money intrusted by the monarch to his care. This dishonourable conduct rendered him despised and poor; but he forgot himself for a while in the intoxication of unlawful pleasures, and died of the plague, 1520, aged 42. As an artist he possessed superior powers, though his pictures are said to be deficient in boldness, in strength, and life.

SATURNINUS, a heretic of the second century. He supposed that the world was created by angels, and he regarded the connexion of the sexes as criminal.

SATURNINUS, Pub. Sempronius, a Roman general, who assumed the imperial purple, 263. He was murdered by his soldiers four years after. A general of Aurelian, of the same name, was proclaimed emperor by the Alexandrians, 280, and reluctantly accepted the honour, but soon after destroyed himself.

SAVAGE, Richard, an eminent English poet, natural son of Anne, countess of Macclesfield, by the earl of Rivers, was born 1698. Doomed to misery, his infancy was intrusted to the care of a poor woman, by his unnatural mother, who wished not, indeed, to conceal her shame, but punish her offspring. His father was prevented from leaving him a legacy of 6000*l.* because the cruel countess declared that he was dead, and after thus robbing him of independence, she endeavoured to send him to the plantations, and then placed him apprentice to a shoemaker in Holborn. The death of the nurse who had taken care of him, now altered his situation, and in searching the effects of a woman, whom he considered as his mother, Savage discovered letters which informed him of his real birth. Leaving, therefore, in disdain, his humble profession, he addressed himself to his mother, and tried by every art of tenderness and regard to awaken her affection. His appeals were in vain upon the obdurate heart of the countess, and therefore, as he had acquired some little learning at St. Alban's school, he commenced author to gain subsistence. But though noticed by the wits of the age, by Sir Richard Steele, and by Wilks, Savage often passed his nights in the open fields, or in the streets, unable to pay even for an obscure lodging. His tragedy of Sir Thomas Overbury, at last raised him to the short independence which could be gained from the profits of 200*l.* but whilst he congratulated himself on his success, he had the misfortune in a drunken quarrel at a house of ill fame to kill one of his companions in debauchery, a Mr. Sinclair. He was tried for the offence and found guilty, and it was now that he discovered his mother's cruel conduct. She not only rejoiced at his condemnation, but used all her influence to cause him to be executed, and her diabolical wishes would have been gratified, had not the countess of Hertford, out of compassion, reported to the queen the extraordinary sufferings of the condemned culprit, and procured his pardon. Thus incapable of raising compassion in the breast of his mother, he thought he might extort money from her by the powers of ridicule, and he succeeded. Lord Tyrconnel received him, in consequence, into his family and friendship, and allowed him 200*l.* a year. But the manners of Savage were licentious; he was fickle in his temper, violent and irascible, and he easily quarrelled with his patron, and was dismissed from his favour. His next effort for subsistence was the publication of his "Bastard," a poem of great beauty, and which grew so popular, that his mother, at that time at Bath, was obliged to fly from the place, to avoid hearing the lines, which were repeated on all sides, to create her shame and confusion. His "Volunteer Laureat," on the queen's birthday, procured him from the royal purse, a present of 50*l.* with a promise of the like annual sum; but the money was soon squandered, and the poet, left without resources, often quitted the house of a friend, where his wit and politeness procured him an invitation, to pass the night in the society of the meanest rabble, in the summer on heaps of rubbish, and in the winter among the ashes of a glass-house. The death of the queen, in 1738, brought on, with the loss of his pension, increasing poverty; yet his friends exerted themselves in his favour, and promised to raise 50*l.* a year for him if he would retire to Wales, and live there in privacy. He accepted the kind offer, and departed for his distant residence, but grew soon tired, and sighed for the dissipation of London. On his return he passed through Bristol, where his elegant manners, and pleasant conversation procured him admittance to the tables of the rich; but after a time his company grew disagreeable from his late hours, and his irregularity of conduct. Poverty too increased his miseries; his clothes were now too shabby for genteel company, and at last he was arrested by the mistress of his coffee-house for the small sum of 8*l.* Six months he languished in the confinement of a jail, when a fever came to terminate his wretched existence. He died 1st Aug. 1743, aged 46, and was buried in St. Peter's churchyard, at the expense of the jailer. This unhappy man, whose character was so chequered with vices and good qualities, might have become, from the strong natural powers which he possessed, a most respectable member of society; but his mind was untutored, and the cruelty of his mother made him quarrel with the whole world, which he regarded with the consequence of persecuted virtue, and injured innocence. Whatever kindnesses he received, he considered as due to his merits, and he seldom suffered the good opinion of a friend towards him, long to continue in his favour. His works, which display the power of a wild, but original writer, have been collected together by T. Evans, bookseller in the Strand, and published in 2 vols. 8vo. with the memoirs of his life by Dr. Johnson, who often shared his poverty, and was a witness to his sufferings, his follies, and his imprudence.

SAVAGE, John, D.D. president of the Royston club, and lecturer of St. George's, Hanover-square, was made rector of Clot-hall, Herts, by lord Salisbury, whom he had attended on his travels. He was educated at Westminster, and ever after showed great fondness for the school. He died 24th March, 1747, and out of respect the scholars of Westminster inscribed a small tablet to his memory, in the east cloisters of the abbey. He printed two occasional sermons.

SAVAGE, Samuel Morton, a dissenting divine, educated under Eames. He afterwards was assistant to Dr. Jennings, whom he quitted in 1785. He received the degree of D.D. from Aberdeen university, 1767, and died 1791, aged 70. He published some single sermons of little merit.

SAVARY, James, a French writer, born at Doué, in Anjou, 1622. He was employed in the first part of his life in commercial pursuits, and afterwards was admitted of the council for the reformation of commerce. As his knowledge on mercantile subjects was very extensive, he digested his ideas into a volume, which he published 1675, 4to. under the title of the "Parfait Negociant," a most useful work, translated into every language of Europe, and of which the eighth edition appeared with additions by his son Philemon Lewis 1721. He further published a supplementary volume in 1688, and died 1690. He had seventeen children by one wife, and eleven survived him. Two of these sons, James and Philemon, laboured together to complete that useful work, the Universal Dictionary of Commerce, which was published, 2 vols. fol. 1723, and again in 3 vols. fol. 1748. James died 1716, and Philemon, 1727.

SAVARY, N. a French writer, born at Vitre, in Brittany. He studied at Rennes, and in 1776, travelled into Egypt, where he continued three years, earnestly attentive to the manners and habits of the inhabitants, and to the antiquities of the country. On his return he visited the islands of the Archipelago, and in 1780, published a translation of the Koran, and afterwards produced his "Letters on Egypt," 2 vols. 8vo. a popular work, translated into various European languages. He published also Letters on Greece. He was a man of good talents, and refined taste, but too warm an imagination for the soberness of an historian. He died 1788, at Paris.

SAVERY, Roland, a celebrated landscape painter, born at Cambray. He died 1639, aged 63.

shire, 30th Nov. 1549, and educated at Merton college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He early distinguished himself as an excellent classical scholar, and after travelling on the continent, was made tutor, in the Greek language, to queen Elizabeth. In 1585 he was appointed warden of Merton, over which society he presided with great dignity 36 years, and in 1596 he was advanced to the provostship of Eton College. He was as great a favourite with James as he had been with Elizabeth; but he declined all offers of promotion either in church or state, and was satisfied with the honour of knighthood conferred, 1604. Upon the loss of his son, he devoted all his property and his time to the encouragement of learning, and with commendable munificence, founded in 1619, two professorships at Oxford, one in astronomy, and the other in geometry, and bestowed various sums of money, and also lands, for other benevolent purposes of improvement in the university, besides some valuable books to the Bodleian. This amiable man died at Eton college, 19th Feb. 1621-2, and was buried in the chapel there. His character has been deservedly applauded by his learned contemporaries, by Is. Casaubon, Jos. Scaliger, Mercerus, Meibomius, Montagu, &c. and the university of Oxford, in a public speech, paid also the highest honours to this their worthy benefactor. His works are four books of Tacitus's history, and the Life of Agricola, translated into English, fol. with notes; Commentaries concerning Roman warfare; a Latin Collection of Ancient Writers of English History, with a Chronological Table from J. Caesar to William the Conqueror; St. Chrysostom's Works in Greek, 8 vols. folio, a valuable edition which cost him 8000*l.* in the publication. He published besides, Bradwardin's de Causâ Dei; Prælectiones, 13 in Euclid, &c. His brother Thomas was fellow of Merton, and afterwards of Eton, and distinguished himself for his learning, and his intimacy with Camden, &c. He died in London 1592-3.

SAVILLE, Sir George, marquis of Halifax, an eminent statesman, descended from a Yorkshire family, and born 1630. He contributed greatly to the restoration, and was rewarded for his services with a peerage. In 1672 he went as ambassador to Holland, with Arlington and Buckingham, to treat about a peace with France, but with little success; and in 1675 he was removed from the council board for opposing the test bills, and the declaration for a toleration, by the influence of the duke of York, whose measures he warmly reprobated as hostile to the constitution. He was, however, so violent against the exclusion bill, that the commons addressed the king to remove him from his council, to which he had lately been restored, but his firmness prevailed; the parliament was dissolved, and he was raised to the dignity of an earl, and refused the office of secretary of state, and of lord lieutenant of Ireland. In 1682 he was created a marquis, and made privy seal, and on James's accession, he was appointed president of the council; but when he refused to consent to the repeal of the test act, he was dismissed by the king from all his offices. When James abdicated the crown, Halifax was made president of the lords, and in the convention parliament, was appointed speaker of the upper house, and vigorously supported the elevation of the prince of Orange to the vacant throne, and for his services was nominated privy seal. In 1689 he quitted the court, and ever after displayed a strong and determined opposition to the measures of the ministry till his death, which happened in April, 1695, occasioned by a gangrene in a long-neglected rupture. Halifax was a man of great abilities as a statesman and a speaker, but the soundest arguments and the most solid truths, were too often turned into contempt by the force of ridicule, and a vicious propensity to low and vulgar wit, which he was eager on all occasions to show. Though reputed an atheist by the world, he confessed to Burnet, who attended his last moments, his firm belief in the goodness of God, and the mediation of Christ. His titles were extinct, by the death of his only surviving son in 1700. He was an elegant writer, and besides his valuable "Advice to a Daughter," he published the character of a Trimmer; the Anatomy of an Equivalent; a Letter to a Dissenter; Maxims of State; the Character of king Charles II. &c.

SAUL, son of Kish, of the tribe of Benjamin, was anointed king of Israel by Samuel, 1095, B.C. He disobeyed the command of God by sparing the Amalekites and Philistines, who were devoted to destruction, and Samuel told him that the kingdom would be removed from his family. He was very jealous of the great popularity of David, who had killed the giant Goliath, and who was doomed to succeed him. He killed himself after an unfortunate battle at Gilboah.

SAUNDERS, Charles, a dramatic writer in the age of the second Charles. His abilities displayed themselves so early, that while at Westminster school, he wrote the play of Tamerlane the Great. Little is known of the particulars of his life.

SAUNDERS, Sir Edmund, from a common beggar, rose to eminence in the law, by the friendship of a lawyer of Clement's inn, who saw and patronised his abilities by admitting him among his clerks. From a clerk he became a counsel, and at last was appointed chief justice of the King's Bench.

where he supported the dignity of his office by patience, integrity, and impartiality. He died 1683.

SAUNDERS, Richard, author of Astrological Judgment and Practice of Physic, 4to. &c.—Physiognomy and Chiromancy, &c. folio, obtained some celebrity in a credulous and superstitious age, and died 1680.

SAUNDERS, John Cunningham, a surgeon, was born at Lovistone, in Devonshire, in 1773. He served his apprenticeship to an eminent practitioner at Barnstaple; after which he became a pupil of St. Thomas's hospital, where at the end of two years, he was chosen demonstrator of anatomy. In 1804 he instituted an infirmary for diseases of the eye, in operating on which organ he was remarkably successful; but while thus prosecuting his favourite pursuit, he was cut off by an apoplexy, Feb. 9th, 1810. He published a folio volume on the Anatomy and Diseases of the Ear; and an Essay on the Inflammation of the Iris. After his death appeared the papers which he had left on disorders of the eye, with some account of the author prefixed.—W. B.

SAUNDERS, William, a physician, was born in 1743. He took his degree in Scotland; but after settling in London, entered himself at Cambridge, where he regularly graduated, and then became a fellow of the college of physicians. He was senior physician to Guy's hospital; and died at Enfield in 1817. His works are—1. Treatise on Mercury in Venereal Cases. 2. A tract on the Devonshire Cholera. 3. Observationes de Antimonis. 4. Treatise on the Mephitic Acid. 5. Treatise on the Red Peruvian Bark. 6. Dissertation on the Structure and Diseases of the Liver. 7. Oratio Harveyana. 8. On the Chymical History of the most celebrated Mineral Waters. 9. On the Hepatitis of India.—W. B.

SAUNDERSON, Nicolas, a celebrated mathematician, born at Thurlston, Yorkshire, 1682. When 12 months old, he was deprived of his sight by the smallpox, and therefore retained no idea whatever of light and of colours. His education, however, was not neglected; at Penneston grammar-school he acquired such knowledge of the classics, that he could most perfectly understand Euclid, Archimedes, and Diophantus, when read in Greek. His fondness for mathematics began to appear when first he was made acquainted by his father with numbers, and soon, by the power of his memory, he formed intricate calculations, and resolved difficult problems. The friendship of Mr. West, who observed his unusual powers, initiated him into the knowledge of algebra and geometry, and under the further assistance of Dr. Nettleton, he acquired all that correctness, and that vast information which raised him to such celebrity. He afterwards improved his knowledge of logic and metaphysics at a private school near Sheffield, and at the age of 25 appeared at Cambridge, as a resident in Christ's college, though not a member of the society. His extraordinary powers, and the difficulties of a narrow fortune, however, procured him friends and admirers, and Whiston, the mathematical professor, very liberally permitted him to lecture before the university. His lectures were on the Newtonian philosophy, and were attended by crowded audiences, and so deservedly popular did he become, that on the removal of Whiston from his professorship, the blind lecturer was honourably called upon, by the wishes of all the university, to fill up the Lucasian chair, and a degree of M.A. by royal mandate was obtained, 1711, to qualify him for the office. His inauguration speech was delivered in elegant Latin, and his reputation continued to increase, so that when George II. visited the university, the professor was, by royal favour, created Doctor of Laws. This great character became, by close application, a valetudinarian, and at last was attacked by a mortification in his foot, which carried him off, 19th April, 1739, aged 57. He was buried at Boxworth, Cambridgeshire, the rectory of Mr. Dickens, his father-in-law, by whose daughter he had a son and a daughter. The vivacity and wit of his conversation were much admired; but his judgment of persons and things was often expressed with such freedom, and such unconcern, that he created himself many enemies. This singular character had astonishing powers of feeling; when in a garden, where observations were making on the sun, he could point out every cloud that obscured the sky, and he discovered such quickness in observing the voice of persons with whom he conversed, that he recollected every one with the most singular exactness. He was a great proficient in playing on the flute, and cultivation was only wanting to have made him as great in music as in mathematics. His Elements of Algebra were published at Cambridge, by subscription, 1740, 2 vols. 4to. and a treatise on Fluxions, 8vo. appeared also after his death. It is needless to say that he was the friend of the great men of his times, admired and respected by them, and repaying their esteem by the strongest gratitude. Of Sir Isaac Newton, whom he knew intimately, he always spoke in a style almost bordering on veneration.

SAVONAROLA, Jerom, an Italian monk, born at Ferrara, 1492. He entered into the Dominican order at Bologna, and became an eloquent and popular preacher, after teaching for some time physics and metaphysics. His influence in the pulpit was so great at Florence, that for some years he guided the state as its sovereign;

but when he inveighed against the corruptions of the church of Rome, and the scandalous life of the pontiff Alexander VI. he drew down upon him the vengeance of the holy see, which neither his popularity, nor the purity of his morals could divert. He was condemned to be hanged and burnt, and suffered that dreadful punishment in 1498, with great resignation. He wrote sermons—the Triumphs of the Cross, and various other theological works, printed Leyden, 6 vols. 12mo. J. Fr. Picus, of Mirandula, has written his life.

SAVOT, Lewis, a native of Saulieu in Burgundy, who studied medicine, and became physician to Lewis XIII. He also applied himself to antiquarian pursuits. His works are, Discourse on Ancient Medals, 4to.—French Architecture in Private Buildings, a work of merit, 4to.—Galen's Art of Healing by bleeding, from the Greek—de Causis Colorum, 8vo. He died 1640, aged 61.

SAURIN, James, son of a protestant lawyer, was born at Nismes, 1677. He left France with his father, on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and went to Geneva, where he studied with great assiduity, and afterwards served as a cadet in lord Galloway's regiment in the campaign of 1694. He, however, abandoned the military life for philosophy and divinity, and after improving himself further at Geneva, he passed, in 1700, into Holland and England, and in 1703 married. In 1705 he settled at the Hague, where his eloquence as a preacher was displayed with astonishing effect to crowded audiences. He died at the Hague, 30th Dec. 1730. He wrote a treatise on education, dedicated to the princes, sons of George II. and was rewarded with a pension by the princess of Wales. He published besides, his sermons, highly esteemed, in 12 vols. 8vo. which have been translated into English by Robinson and Hunter; but his greatest work is Discourses Historical, Critical, and Moral, on the most memorable Events of the Old and New Testament, left incomplete, but afterwards continued in 6 vols. folio. He was unfortunately engaged in a controversy with la Chapelle and others, for asserting in a pamphlet that, in some cases, truth may be disguised, and though a strong friend to toleration, he was severely treated by his antagonists.

SAURIN, Joseph, a French mathematician, born at Courtuson, in the principality of Orange, 1659. He was a protestant, but afterwards abjured his principles at Paris, and was admitted member of the academy of sciences, and received a pension from the king. He devoted his life to geometrical pursuits, and communicated some valuable papers to the Memoirs of the academy, and the Journal des Sçavans. He was engaged in a controversy with Rousseau, who had falsely charged him with writing some libellous verses against some persons of distinction, which he himself, it is supposed, had composed; a scandalous conduct, which, when examined, proved the innocence of Saurin, and the guilt of Rousseau. Voltaire has vindicated his memory, but still his character must be considered as violent and unbending. He died at Paris, 1737.

SAURIN, Bernard Joseph, son of the preceding, was advocate of the parliament of Paris, and member of the French academy. He disregarded the law for literature and poetry, and became the friend of Voltaire, Montesquieu, and Helvetius. He wrote some plays of great merit and popularity, especially Sparticus, Blanche and Richard, tragedies—Anglomanie, a comedy, the Marriage of Julia—Mœurs du Temps, &c. His dramatic pieces were collected in 2 vols. 8vo. 1733. He was so much esteemed by Helvetius, that the philosopher allowed him a handsome pension. He died at Paris, 17th Nov. 1781.

SAUSSURE, Nicolas de, a native of Geneva, member of the council of 200, and distinguished by his writings on agriculture. He is author of Essays on the Vine—on the Scarcity of Wheat—on Dew—on Fire, &c. He died 1790, aged 81.

SAUSSURE, Horace Benedict de, son of the above, was born at Geneva, 17th Feb. 1740. From his earliest years he evinced great partiality for literature, especially natural history, and at the age of 21 he was elected to the chair of philosophical professor at Geneva, which he filled with great public advantage, for 25 years. He first visited Paris in 1768, and afterwards examined the discoveries of Montgolfier at Lyons, and after travelling through Holland, Belgium, and England, he, in 1772, extended his philosophical researches to Italy. He visited the island of Elba, and with sir William Hamilton, examined the wonders of Vesuvius, and afterwards measured the crater of Ætna. In the progress of his important researches he discovered some valuable plants, and also invented various instruments, very useful in the operations of science and of art. His next excursions were on the Alps, and after crossing them 14 times by eight different places, he ascended, through a thousand difficulties, to the summit of Mont Blanc, where he could scarce breathe. These laborious exertions in the cause of science, rendered him deservedly popular; he was made member of the academy of sciences at Paris, and of other learned bodies, and the emperor Joseph, when he visited Geneva, paid particular attention to the philosopher. In the French revolution, he was elected, on the union of his country to France, to the national assembly; but the disorders which prevailed not only ruined his little fortune, but broke his heart, and he died of chagrin 1799. He is author of an Eulogy on his friend Bonnet, 8vo.—Dissertatio Physica de Igne—Inquiry on the Bark of Leaves, &c.—Dissertatio Physica de Electricitate, 8vo.—Plan of Reform for the College of Geneva—Description of the Electrical Effects of Thunder—Essay on Hygrometry, 4to.—Voyages in the Alps, 4 vols. 4to. a most valuable work, and various communications to the memoirs of the learned societies of which he was a member.

SAUVAGES, Francis Boissier de, a native of Alais, who applied himself to medical pursuits, and became professor of botany and medicine at Montpellier, and member of several of the learned societies of France, and of foreign nations. His reputation was so extensive, that he was consulted from all parts of France, and he received the merited surname of the Boerhaave of Languedoc. This able and respected physician died at Montpellier, 19th Feb. 1767, aged 61. He wrote Theoria Febris—Nosologia Methodica, 5 vols. 8vo.—Physiologia Mechanica Elementa, 12mo.—Methodus Foliolorum, 8vo.—a translation of Hales' Statistical Essays on Animals, &c.—Dissertationes—Memoirs, &c.

SAUVAL, Henry, an advocate in the parliament of Paris. He is author of a laborious work, the History of the Antiquities of Paris, 3 vols. folio, on which he was engaged for 20 years, and which he did not live to complete. He died 1670, and in consequence of the death of his continuator, the work did not appear till 1724. It was again edited in 1733.

SAUVEUR, Joseph, a French mathematician, born at La Fleche, 1653. He was dumb till his seventh year, and then his powers of speech appeared very weak and imperfect, so that what he uttered was with difficulty and slowness. He had a strong propensity for mechanical knowledge, and disregarding the classical instruction which he received in the Jesuits' college, applied himself to mathematical studies, against the wishes of his friends, who had marked out for him preferment in the church. To maintain himself, he began to teach mathematics, and so great was his reputation, that at the age of 20 he had prince Eugene among his pupils. His abilities recommended him to the great and the learned; he was esteemed by Condé, honoured with the notice of the royal family, and in 1686 was made professor of mathematics to the royal college, and in 1696 admitted member of the academy of sciences. He wrote a treatise on Fortification, and to enable him to do it scientifically, he attended the siege of Mons. He wrote besides, a treatise on Music, and papers in the memoirs of the academy. He died 1716.

SAWYER, sir Robert, an eminent lawyer, attorney-general from 1681 to 1687. He was removed from his offices for refusing to lend his name to the arbitrary measures of James's government. He was a warm admirer and imitator of justice Hale, and died 1692.

SAXE, Maurice, count de, natural son of Frederic Augustus, elector of Saxony, and king of Poland, by the countess Konigsmark, was born at Dresden, 13th October, 1696. He showed fondness for war from his very infancy, and refused to undergo the labours of study, unless his application was rewarded with the permission of riding or of military exercise. His first campaign was in Flanders, under Eugene and Marlborough, where his valour was displayed at the taking of Lisle, Tournay, and Mons, and at the battle of Malplaquet. When the king of Poland, in 1711, besieged the fortress of Stralsund, the young warrior appeared there to great advantage; he encouraged the soldiers by his example, and crossed the river in the sight of the enemy; and in the following dreadful battle of Guedelbusck he had a horse shot under him, while he rallied three times the retiring troops. In 1717 he was with the emperor at the siege of Belgrade, where he defeated the Turks, and on his return he was decorated with the order of the white eagle. After the treaties of Utrecht and Passarowitz, he went to France, where the duke of Orleans gained his attachment and services by bestowing on him the brevet rank of field marshal. During the peace of the continent, he laboriously employed himself in improving his mathematical knowledge, and in introducing strict military discipline in the regiment intrusted to his care; but in 1726 he was roused from his tranquil retirement by the states of Courland, who unanimously elected him their sovereign. Poland and Russia opposed his elevation, but he defended himself with bravery, and with a small force resisted with success thousands of his invaders; but at last he gave up the unequal contest, and abandoning the supreme power which his valour so much deserved, he retired, in 1729, to privacy in France. Here, during the attacks of a fever, he composed, in 13 nights, his Reveries, a work worthy of the pen of a Cæsar or a Condé, and valuable for the important instructions which it conveys to the general as well as to the soldier. The death of the king of Poland, his father, in 1733, rekindled the flames of war through Europe, and Saxe prepared to share the dangers and the glories of the approaching campaign. He declined the command of the Saxon troops, offered him by his brother, the elector, and preferred serving in the French armies on the Rhine under marshal Berwick. He distinguished himself at the battle of Etlingen, and at the siege of Philipsburg, and for his services was rewarded with the rank of lieutenant general. In the war which followed the death of Charles VI. Saxe gathered fresh laurels. He besieged Prague in 1741, and took it by assault, and soon after made himself master of Egra, and then marching to the Rhine, he seized the strong lines of Lauterburg. In 1744 he was made marshal of France, and intrusted with the armies in Flanders. Though ill, he immediately left Paris for his post, and opened the campaign of 1745 by the famous battle of Fontenoy, which he gained, though carried around his camp in a litter. This was followed by the fall of Tournay, Bruges, Ghent, Oudenarde, Ostend, and Brussels, and the next year another victory at Rocoux crowned his arms, and procured for him the most flattering honours from the king of France, and the title of marshal of all his armies, and of governor of the newly conquered countries. In the next campaign the victory of Lawfeldt was followed by the fall of Bergen-op-Zoom, and then of Maestricht, when the terrors of the Dutch arrested the career of the conqueror, and peace was concluded in 1748. After the peace Saxe visited Berlin, where he was received with all the honour due to his merits, and then he returned to France, where he devoted himself to literature and the arts. This great hero, whose celebrity was extended over the whole world, died 30th Nov. 1750, aged 54, and was buried in the Lutheran church of St. Thomas, Strasburg. He had married the countess of Lobin, whom he divorced some time after from capricious motives, and he frequently repented of this conduct, as she possessed every amiable quality, and soon after gave her hand to a second and more constant husband. His eloge, by M. Thomas, obtained the prize of the French academy in 1759. The best edition of his Reveries is in 2 vols. 4to. Paris, 1757.

Saxo, Grammaticus, a celebrated writer, whose origin, and even country, is involved in obscurity. He is generally acknowledged to have been a native of Zealand, an island of Denmark, and to have flourished in the 12th century. He studied theology, and was employed in the cathedral of Roschild, and went, in 1161, to Paris, to invite some of the monks of St. Genevieve to come and to reform the morals of the Danish priests. He died about 1208, aged upwards of 70, and was buried in Roschild cathedral, where, three centuries after, Lago Urne, bishop of Scalandra, placed an inscription upon his tomb. By the encouragement of Absalom, bishop of Roschild, Saxo undertook the History of Denmark and other northern nations, and after 20 years of labour completed it in a manner worthy a man of learning and virtue. This valuable work was first published by Petræus at Paris, 1514, and reprinted at Basil and Frankfort afterwards, and in 1644 at Sora, under the care of Stephanus.

SAY, Samuel, a dissenting minister, who after being engaged in various congregations in Norfolk and Suffolk, succeeded Dr. Calamy in 1734, at Westminster, where he died in St. James's street, 12th April, 1743, aged 68, of a mortification in his bowels. After his death appeared a thin 4to. volume of his poems, with two prose essays on the harmony, variety, and power of numbers, exhibiting great taste, knowledge, and judgment.

SAYLE, William, first governor of Carolina, was sent by the proprietors, in 1667, to examine the country. After exploring the coast he returned to England, carrying a favourable report, and encouraging them to establish a colony there. The settlement was commenced and Sayle appointed governor in 1669. He was driven among the Bahama Islands on his passage, and he gave so favourable an account of them that the Carolina company obtained a charter also for them. He first landed in Carolina, at or near Beaufort, early in 1670, but soon moved northwardly, and established on the banks of Ashley river the foundations of old Charleston. He fell a victim to the unhealthiness of the climate, and died in 1671. West succeeded him.

SCALA, Bartholomew, an Italian statesman, born about 1424. Though but the son of a miller, he rose to distinction at the bar, under the protection of Cosmo de Medicis at Florence. After the death of his patron, he retained the same confidential offices with his successor, Peter, and was employed by him in some important negotiations. He was, for his services, ennobled at Florence, and knighted by the pope, and made senator of Rome. He died at Florence, 1497. He wrote the History of Florence, in 20 books, of which four books only have been published, besides letters—a Speech made to pope Innocent VIII.—pro Imperatoriis Militaribus Signis, &c.

SCALA, Alexandra, daughter of the above, was distinguished for her knowledge of classical literature, as well as for her beauty, and her private virtues, which have been deservedly praised by Politian and others. Marullus married her for the purpose of perfecting himself in the Latin language in her company. She died 1506.

SCALIGER, Julius Cæsar, a celebrated writer, born 1484, at Ripa, in the territory of Verona, and descended from the princes of Verona. His father was in the military service of Matthias Corvinus, king of Hungary, and at the age of 12 the son was presented to the emperor Maximilian, and continued as page about his person for 17 years. During his attendance on the emperor he was engaged in various expeditions, and was at the battle of Ravenna, 1512, where he lost his father and brother. At the age of 40 he abandoned the military life, and after studying divinity, applied assiduously to medicine, and settled, in 1526, at Agen, where, though 45, he took for his wife a young girl of good family, but scarce 16, with whom he lived 29 years, and by whom he had 15 children. In this retirement he devoted himself with uncommon application to literature and the modern languages, and while he practised physic for his maintenance, he acquired celebrity by the labours of his pen. He died of a retention of urine, 1558, at Agen, where he was buried with this epitaph, Jul. Cæsaris Scaligeri quod fuit. The abilities of Scaliger were undoubtedly great, but though commended by his son as a benevolent and amiable character, he was vain and petulant, and among others treated Erasmus with great virulence and illiberality, because he had ridiculed some of the learned men of Italy for their servile attachment to the Latinity of Cicero. The best known of his writings are, Exercitationes contra Cardanum de Subtilitate, 4to.—de Causis Linguae Latinae, 4to.—Poetices Libri septem, fol.—Poemata—Epistolæ—Commentarii in Theophrasti Libros—in Aristotelis Animal. fol.—in Hippocratis Librum de Insomniis, 8vo.—de Causis Plantarum, fol.—Animadversiones in Historiam Plantarum, 8vo. &c.

SCALIGER, Joseph Justus, son of the preceding, was born at Agen, 1540. He studied at Bourdeaux and under his father; but after his death he passed to Paris to attend the lectures of Turnebus. His eagerness to improve, however, could not await the slow progress of regular lectures, and therefore he applied himself without the assistance of an instructor, to Greek, and when a perfect master of the language he turned his attention to the Hebrew, and with such activity that he was well acquainted with 13 different languages. So much learning, to which was united a profound knowledge of the sciences, rendered his name very celebrated. He was invited to fill the chair of belles lettres at Leyden, in 1603, and he accepted the honourable appointment, and died there of a dropsy, 21st Jan. 1609. Like his father, Scaliger possessed great abilities, but certainly superior learning, so that he was deservedly called the most learned man of the age; but these high qualities were obscured by a haughty deportment, and a contemptuous disregard of the merits of others, attended with abusive and illiberal language profusely directed against every opponent. The works of this extraordinary man are numerous and various, but the best known and the most useful is his Opus de Emendatione Temporum, in which he not only displays vast erudition and an extensive knowledge of ancient writers, but lays the foundation of regular and systematic chronology, especially by the invention of the Julian period, and deserves the name which he has received, of the father of chronology. He wrote, besides, "Thesaurus Temporum, &c." in which he corrected some of the errors of his former work—de Tribus Sectis Judæorum, 2 vols. 4to.—Latin poems, 8vo.—Epistolæ, Notes on Varro, and almost on all the authors of ancient Greece and Rome, containing various learned remarks, with bold, ingenious, and interesting conjectures. Two "Scaligerana," have appeared, one at the Hague, 1666, and the other at Groningen, 1669.

SCAMOZZI, Vincent, a native of Vincenza, the most celebrated architect of his time. After travelling over France, Germany, and Hungary, to improve himself in the knowledge of his art, he settled at Venice, which he adorned by the labours of his genius. One of the most remarkable of his works is the citadel of Palma in the Friuli. He wrote, in Italian, Ideas on Universal Architecture, in 10 books, which, however, did not receive his finishing hand, as he died before its completion, 1616, aged 64. Of his valuable work only the first six books appeared in 2 vols. fol.

SCANDERBEG, or GEORGE CASTRIOT, king of Albania, was born 1404, and was delivered up by his father, with three of his brothers, as hostages to Amurath II. emperor of the Turks. The three brothers were cut off by poison, and George was spared on account of his youth, and by his valour soon distinguished himself in the service of the bloody oppressor of his family. He was circumcised, and took the command of a body of troops under the title of Sangiac; but on the death of his father, 1432, he determined to recover the dominions of his ancestors. In the expedition with which he was intrusted against Hungary, he formed a secret correspondence with Huniades Corvinus the king of the country, and enabled him to defeat the Turks, 30,000 of whom fell in the field. After this he compelled the secretary of the sultan, who was in the camp, to write letters, sealed with the imperial signet, demanding the delivery of the capital of Albania into his hands. After the messengers were despatched, he put to death all those who were witnesses of his measures, that no report might be carried to Amurath, and then hastening to Albania, he was received as a deliverer by his countrymen, and acknowledged king 1443. In vain Amurath and his successor Mahomet made war against this enterprising hero, and besieged Croic his capital; their numerous armies were defeated, and after several years of hostility, peace was restored in 1461, and the independence of Albania confirmed. At the request of Pius II. the Albanian monarch visited Italy, and not only relieved Ferdinand of Arragon, who was besieged at Bari, but assisted him to defeat his victorious enemy the count of Anjou. Afterwards Scanderbeg was again engaged in war with the Turks, and his capital was twice besieged, but immediately relieved by his conquering arms. This heroic prince, who had been present in 22 battles, and had killed 2000 Turks with his own hands without receiving only a slight wound, died at Lissa in the Venetian territories, 17th Jan. 1467, aged 63. His death was universally lamented, and the Turkish emperor bore witness to his bravery by dancing for joy at the intelligence that he was no more. Though occasionally severe, he was a man of mild manners, and of the most benevolent heart, and he exhorted earnestly his soldiers to chastity, observing that nothing was more prejudicial to their profession than sensual pleasures. His life was written by the Jesuit du Poncet, 1709, in 12mo.

SCAPULA, John, a lexicographer who studied at Lausanne, and was afterwards engaged in the printing-house of Henry Stephens. While thus employed, he privately made an abridgment of the great work which his master was preparing for the press, and by publishing it in 1580, under the title of a Greek Lexicon, he not only gained a considerable sum, but thus dishonourably ruined in some degree the laborious Thesaurus of Stephens, which when it appeared, found few purchasers. Stephens vented his indignation in the "Latinity of Lipsius," but found no other redress.

SCARBOROUGH, Sir Charles, physician to Charles II. and his two successors, was eminent for his extensive practice, as well as for his knowledge of mathematics, in which he was so perfect that he could repeat in order all the propositions of Euclid, Archimedes, and other ancient authors. He was assistant and successor to Dr. Harvey, as lecturer on subjects of anatomy and surgery, and he was the first who judiciously applied mathematics to medical subjects. He wrote Syllabus Musculorum; an elegy on Cwley, &c. and died 26th of February, 1693.

SCARELLA, John Baptist, an ecclesiastic of Brescia, who warmly supported the principles of Newton's system. He wrote Physica Generalis, 3 vols. 4to.; de Rebus ad Scientiam pertinent. 2 vols. 4to.; de Magnete, 4to.; Hydrodynamica, 4to.; Elements of Logic, Ontology, and Natural Theology, 4 vols. 4to. He died Feb. 1779, aged 70.

SCARRON, Paul, a burlesque writer, born at Paris 1610. Though deformed and in his manners very licentious, he was intended for the church by his father, who was a counsellor in the parliament, and a canonry at Mans was obtained for him. At the age of 27 he unfortunately lost the use of all his limbs, but in this helpless and deplorable state he indulged his propensity for humorous writings, and was universally courted for his wit and jocularly. Though his father had displeased Richelieu, yet the son recovered his esteem, by presenting to him a very humorous supplication. He married, in 1651, Mademoiselle d'Aubigné, a lady of 16, afterwards so celebrated by the name of Maintenon, who thus early sacrificed her beauty, her person, and her liberty, to the caprices of a deformed and impotent invalid. Scarron died 1669. The pleasantry which enlivened his conversation was trausfused into his writings, which were Virgil's Æneid travestied; the Comical Romance; Comedies; a tragedy, &c. which were all published at Paris, 1695, and 1737, 10 vols. 12mo. and in 1786, in 7 vols. 8vo.

SCHAAF, Charles, a learned German; born at Nuys, near Cologne, 1646. He was educated at Duisbourg, and became professor of oriental languages there, from which he removed in 1679 to Leyden, to fill the oriental chair. He died of an apoplexy at Leyden, 1729. He wrote Opus Aramæum, cum Grammatica Chaldaicâ et Syriacâ, 4to.; Novum Testamentum Syriacum cum Versione Latina, 4to.; Lexicon Syriacum Concordantiale; Epitome Grammaticæ Hebraicæ, 8vo.; a letter in Syriac, &c.

SCHACHT, Christian Paul, a native of Harderwyck, in Holland. He took his degree of M.D. and became professor of medicine, botany, chymistry, and natural history, in his native place, 1791, and died nine years after, aged 32. He is author of some valuable memoirs, &c. inserted in the Dutch journals.

SCHAGEN, Giles, a native of Alcaemar, who acquired great celebrity as a painter of portraits, and in historical subjects. He resided for some time at Paris, and died 1663, aged 52.

SCHALKEN, Godfrey, a Dutch painter, born at Dort 1643. He studied under Hoogstraten, and Gerard Duow, and chiefly excelled in painting candlelight pieces. He was in London and drew William III. by candlelight, and humorously made his majesty hold the candle. He was vulgar in his manners. He died at the Hague, 1706.

SCHATEN, Nicholas, author of Historia Westphaliæ, fol. 1690; Annales Paderborneses, fol. ; and a Dissertation on Charlemagne, was a German Jesuit at the end of the 17th century.

SCHÉELE, Charles William, an eminent chymist, born at Stralsund, 1742. He was member of the Swedish academy of sciences, of the medical society of Paris, and universally esteemed for his knowledge, and his chymical discoveries. He was first engaged with an apothecary, who died much in debt; but the industry of the apprentice restored the prosperity of the house, and the widow, pleased with his fidelity and character, married him. But unhappily, the day of the marriage, 17th May, 1786, proved the beginning of a fever which hurried him quickly to his grave. His valuable treatise on Air and Fire has been translated into French from the German, by Dietrich, in 12mo. and is deservedly known over Europe.

SCHÉELSTRATE, Emanuel de, a native of Antwerp, who became librarian of the Vatican, canon of St. John Lateran, and of St. Peter at Rome. He died at Rome 5th April, 1692, aged 43. He wrote Antiquitates Ecclesiæ Illustrate, 2 vols. fol. ; Ecclesia Africana sub Primate Carthaginiensi, 4to. ; Acta Constantiensis Concilii, 4to ; Acta Ecclesiæ Oriental, &c.

SCHÉFFER, John, a learned German, born at Strasburg, 1621. When driven by war from his country, he went to Sweden at the invitation of queen Christina, and obtained the chair of eloquence and politics at Upsal. He was also librarian, and honorary professor of the law of nations in that university. He died there 1679. He published de Militia Navali Veterum; Upsalia Antiqua; Laponia, translated into English; Suecia Literata; de Re Vehiculari Veterum, besides notes on Phædrus, Ælian, and other classics.

SCHÉGGINS, James, a native of Schorn-doff in the dutchy of Wirtemberg, professor of philosophy and medicine at Tubingen. Though blind, he pursued his favourite studies, and even refused to submit to an operation for the restoration of sight, observing that he wished to avoid seeing many odious and disagreeable objects. He wrote a dialogue, de Animæ Principatu; a treatise de unâ Personâ et duabus Naturis in Christo, adversus Anti Trinitarios; Refutatio Errorum Simonii, fol. 1573. He died at Tubingen, 1587.

SCHÉINER, Christopher, an able astronomer, rendered memorable for first discovering the spots on the sun's disc. He was born at Mecklenburg, in Germany, and entered among the Jesuits, and afterwards taught Hebrew and mathematics at Ingoldstadt, Brisac, Rome, &c. He was also counsellor to the archduke Charles, and died rector of the Jeunits' college at Neisse in Silesia, 1650. His observation of the solar spots was at Ingoldstadt, 1611; but he was afraid to publish the discovery, which, however, Velscrus, to whom he communicated it, unhandsomely did, and Galileo himself laid claim, but improperly, to the merit of being the first observer. He published these phenomena in 1630, in folio, under the title of Rosa Ursina, containing accurate delineations of the spots.

SCHÉLHAMMER, Gouthier Christopher, a native of Jena, who was professor of medicine at Helmstadt, afterwards at Jena, and then at Kiel, and was physician to the duke of Holstein. He wrote Introductio ad Artem Medicam, 4to. and other medical works, and died 1716, aged 75.

SCHÉLLINKS, William, a native of Amsterdam, eminent as a painter of landscapes, history, and sea views. His chief performance is said to be Charles II. embarking for England. He died 1678, aged 47. His brother Daniel excelled in landscapes. He died 1701, aged 68.

SCHENCK DE GRAFFENBERG, John, a physician, who was born at Friburg, and died there 12th Nov. 1598, aged 67. He was author of Observationum Medicarum, Rararum, Admirabilium et Monstros. Volumen, fol. edited by Spon. His son John George was also eminent as a physician, and settled at the Hague, where he died about 1620. He wrote de Formandis Medicinæ Studiis, 12mo. ; Hortus Patavinus; Monstrorum Historia, 4to.

SCHENCKIUS, John Theodore, professor of medicine at Jena, died 1671, aged 52, author of Observations on Medicine, folio, and 8vo. ; de Sero Sanguinis, 4to. ; a Catalogue of the Plants of the Medical Garden of Jena, 12mo. &c.

SCHÉRTLIN, Sebastian, a native of the dutchy of Wirtemberg, who first served in Hungary, and afterwards greatly distinguished himself at the defence of Pavia. At the taking of Rome and Narni, and in the defence of Naples, 1528, he displayed such valour and intrepidity, that several potentates solicited his services; but he attached himself to the independence of Augsburg. He espoused the cause of the league of Smalkalde against the emperor, and afterwards passed into the service of France, and accompanied Henry II. in his expedition to the Rhine and the Low Countries. Charles V. afterwards restored him his property, which had been confiscated at Augsburg, and he distinguished himself in the service of the emperor Ferdinand I. and died 1577, aged 82, deservedly respected as a brave general.

SCHÉUTCHZER, John James, a native of Zurich, who became there professor of mathematics and medicine. His reputation as a physician and a man of letters was such that the Czar Peter made him liberal offers to settle in Russia; but the people of Zurich detained him by their generosity. He died in his native town 1733, aged 61. He published Natural History of the Bible, in German, four large vols. fol. translated into Latin, 1735, and into French, 1734, but of this the original edition in German is the most valuable, on account of its 750 plates; Itinera Alpina, 2 vols. 4to.; Piscium Querelæ, 4to.; Herbarium Diluvianum, fol.; Musæum Diluvianum, 8vo.; Homo Diluvii Testis, 4to.; Historiæ Helveticæ Naturalis Prolegomena; Sciagraphia Lithologica, 4to.; Nova Literaria Helvetica, or Journal of Swiss Literature; a treatise on the Mineral Waters of Switzerland, 4to. His son John Gaspard was an able antiquarian. He translated into English Kœmpfer's History of Japan, 2 vols. fol. and died at London, 1729, in the flower of youth. John, brother of John James, was professor of medicine and physician at Zurich, where he died, 1738. He was author of Ægrostographia, seu Graminum, Juncorum, &c. Historia, 4to.

SCHIAVONE, Andrea, a Venetian painter, born at Sebenico in Dalmatia, 1522. Though poor and uneducated, he rose by the powers of his genius, and his great application, to eminence. His designs, however, were not much admired, while his colouring, and the elegance of his draperies, were superior to the efforts of his contemporaries. His pictures were esteemed after his decease, though unfortunately for him disregarded by his contemporaries. He died poor, 1582, at Venice.

SCHIAVONETTI, Lewis, an engraver, was born at Bassano, in the state of Venice, in 1765. He studied painting; but after the death of his master, he applied to engraving, in which he attained considerable eminence. The fame of Bartolozzi drew him to England, and here he executed several very fine plates, after ancient and modern masters. He died at Brompton in 1810.—W. B.

SCHICKARD, William, professor of Hebrew at Tubingen, died of the plague 1635, at the age of 43. He wrote Horologium, or Hebrew Grammar, 8vo.—Treatises de Jure Regio Judæorum, 4to.—Series Regum Persiæ, 4to.

SCHIDONE, Bartholomew, a native of Modena, eminent as a painter. Though patronised by the duke of Parma, his fondness for gaming reduced him to poverty. His pictures are scarce, but possess great merit. He died 1616, aged 56.

SCHILLER, Frederic, a German dramatic writer of celebrity. He was born at Marbach in Wirtemberg, and educated in the military school of Stutgard, where he produced his first dramatic piece, called the Robbers. The principles inculcated in this piece gave such offence to his superiors, that he fled from their resentment to Mannheim, and for some time supported himself in the capacity of a regimental surgeon. An appointment in the theatre at Mannheim proved more congenial to his feelings, and enabled him to produce his Conspiracy of Fiesco, his Intrigue and Love, his Rhenish Thalia, and other pieces. Eager after distinction, he went from Mannheim to Mentz, and afterwards to Dresden, and then to Leipsic, where he completed his tragedy of Don Carlos. For some time he resided at Jena, as professor of history, and then removed to Wiemar, where he died, 1805. He wrote besides, the History of the Revolt of the Netherlands from the Spanish Government—the Maid of Orleans, and other dramatic pieces, much admired for originality, fire, and elegance, though occasionally immoral, and deficient in unity.

SCHILLING, Drebold, a native of Soleure, who wrote in German a History of the Wars of the Swiss against Charles duke of Burgundy, published, Berne, fol. 1743. The work is very accurate, as he was present at the scenes which he describes. He lived in the 15th century.

SCHLICHTINGIUS, Jonas de Bukowic, a native of Poland, banished on account of his Socinian principles by the diet of Warsaw. He retired to Muscovy and Germany, and then settled at Zullickaw, where he died, 1661, aged 65. His works, which are chiefly commentaries on the holy Scripture, were published at Amsterdam, 1666, folio.

SCHMIDT, George Frederic, a native of Berlin, eminent as an engraver. He was the pupil of Larmessen at Paris, and for his abilities was admitted into the French academy of painting. His engravings of portraits were particularly admired. He died at Berlin, 1775, aged 63.

SCHMIDT, Erasmus, professor of mathematics, and of Greek, at Wittemberg, was born at Delitzch in Misnia, 1560. He published an edition of Pindar with learned notes, 1616, 4to. and died at Wittemberg, 1637.

SCHMIDT, Sebastian, a professor of oriental languages at Strasburg, who died there, 1697.

SCHMIDT, John Andrew, a Lutheran divine, born at Worms, 1652. He was theological professor at Mariendal, and died there, 1726. He wrote Compendium Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ, 8vo.—de Bibliothecis, 4to.—Lexicon Ecclesiasticum Minus, 8vo. besides Pardies' Geometry, translated into Latin, &c.

SCHOEFFLIN, John Daniel, a learned German Lutheran divine, born Sept. 6, 1694, at Soultzbouurg, in Baden Dourlach. He studied at Dourlach, Basil, and Strasburg, and was appointed, in 1720, profes-tor of eloquence and history in this last university. His reputation for learning was so great that he received the most honourable invitations from the empress of Russia, from Sweden, from Frankfort, from Leyden, and other learned bodies, but he preferred the tranquillity and retirement of Strasburg. In 1726, he quitted his professorship, and travelled at the public expense, and as a philosopher he visited Italy, Paris, London, and other places. He died at Strasburg of a slow fever, August 7, 1771, universally and deservedly lamented. His works are Historia Zaringo-Badensis, Carlsruhe, 7 vols. 4to.—Alsatia Diplomatica, fol.—Alsatia Illustrata, 2 vols. fol.—Alsaticarum Rerum Scriptores, fol.—Vindiciæ Typographicæ, 4to.—Vindiciæ Celticæ—Memoirs of a Rising Academy, addressed to the elector palatine, &c.

SCHOMBERG, Henry de, of an ancient family of Misnia, established in France, was made governor of la Marche, and served with reputation under Charles IX. and his two successors. He died suddenly in 1599. His son of the same name succeeded in his government of la Marche, and distinguished himself in Piedmont, in 1617, under marshal d'Estrées, and against the Huguenots, in 1622, for which he was made marshal of France. He contributed much, in 1625, to the defeat of the English in their attack against the isle of Rhé, and two years after he forced the passage of Suza, where he was severely wounded. In 1630, he made himself master of Pignerol, and relieved Casal, and soon after defeated the rebels in Languedoc, at the famous battle of Castelnaudari, where Montmorenci was wounded and taken prisoner. He was, in reward for his services, made governor of Languedoc, and died the next year of an apoplexy, 17th Nov. aged 49. He was a man of abilities in the cabinet, as well as in the field. He was ambassador for some time in England, and Germany, and he wrote a Relation of the War in Italy, in which he had been engaged, printed 1630, 4to. again 1669, and 1682. His son Charles distinguished himself also in the service of France, and was made governor of Languedoc, and marshal of France. He conquered the Spaniards at Leucate in Roussillon, and took the town of Tortosa by assault. He died at Paris, 6th June, 1656, aged 56.

SCHOMBERG, Frederic Armand de, of an illustrious family, but of a different branch from the preceding, was early engaged in the service of Frederic Henry prince of Orange, and afterwards of his son William. He went, in 1650, into the service of the French king, and was made governor of Gravelines and Furnes, and, in 1661, sent to command the army in Portugal, where he behaved with such bravery and prudence that Spain was obliged to acknowledge the family of Braganza as lawful sovereigns of Portugal. He was, in 1675, made marshal of France, though a protestant, and the next year he went to the campaign of the Low Countries, and obliged the enemy to raise the siege of Maestricht and Charleroi. On the revocation of the edict of Nantes, 1685, he quitted France and retired to Prussia, where the elector of Brandenburg appointed him his prime minister, and commander in chief. He was afterwards in Portugal and in Holland, and he accompanied William of Orange into England when he invaded the kingdom, and for his services he was created an English duke, made knight of the garter, and rewarded with a pension by the parliament. In 1689, he was sent to Ireland as commander in chief, and the following year he attended William at the battle of the Boyne, and bravely crossed the river, which was obstinately defended by the enemy. He was, however, wounded by one of the soldiers of James II. and soon after shot dead by mistake by one of the French refugees in his own regiment, 11th July, 1690, in his 82d year. He was buried in St. Patrick's cathedral, where a monument, and an elegant inscription by Dr. Swift mark his grave.

SCHONER, John, a German philosopher, born at Carlostadt, 1477. His abilities were so great that he was chosen, when young, to be mathematical professor at Nuremberg. He was, however, too fond of astrology, though in other respects a man of vast intelligence and erudition. He published some valuable astronomical tables after those of Regiomontanus—a Treatise on Dialling—on the Astronomical Equator—Use of the Globes—Organicum Uranicum, &c. He died 1547.

SCHOOKIUS, Martin, a native of Utrecht, successively professor of languages and philosophy at Utrecht, Deventer, Groningen, and Frankfort on the Oder. He was a man of erudition, though extremely satirical. He is author of Exercitationes Variæ:—de Harengis, seu Halecibus—de Signaturis Fœtus—de Ciconis—de Statu Reipublicæ Fœderati Belgii—de Scepticismo—de Sternutatione—de Imperio Maritimo—de Lingua Hellenistica, &c. He died at Frankfort 1669, aged 55.

SCHOONFIELD, John Henry, a painter of eminence, born at Bibrach in Germany. Some of his pictures are preserved in the churches and public edifices of Augsburg. He died 1689, aged 70.

SCHOONJANS, Anthony, a native of Antwerp, distinguished as a painter. After studying in Italy he settled at Vienna, where he was patronised by the emperor. His altar pieces for several German churches are much admired. He died 1726, aged 61.

SCHOREL, John, a Flemish painter, born at Schorel, a village near Alcaer, in Holland. He studied under Albert Durer, and then went with a friar to Jerusalem, where he painted some very interesting pieces. On his return he passed through Venice and Rome, and was made by Pope Adrian VI. superintendent of the Belvidere buildings. After that pontiff's death he returned to his country, where he died 1562, much respected. He was also a tolerable musician and poet, and well understood Latin, French, Italian, and German.

SCHOTTUS, Andreas, a learned German, born at Antwerp, 1552. He was educated at Louvain and Douay, and upon going to Spain, was in consequence of his great abilities, made, 1580, Greek professor at Toledo. He entered among the Jesuits in 1586, and afterwards taught rhetoric at Rome, and after three years residence returned to Antwerp, where he spent the rest of his life, and died 23d Jan. 1629. He was author of Hispania Illustrata, 14 vols. fol.—the Lives of Francis Borgia, Ferdinand Nunez, Peter Ciaconius, &c. besides valuable editions of Pomponius Mela, Cor. Nepos, Valerius Flaccus, Aurelius Victor, &c.

SCHOTTUS, Gaspard, a Jesuit, born at Wurzburg, in Franconia, where he died, 1666, aged 58. He resided for some time at Palermo in Sicily, and at Rome, where he became intimate with the famous Kircher. He is the learned author of Physica Curiosa, or Mirabilia Naturæ et Artis, 2 vols. 4to.—Magia Naturalis et Artificialis, 4 vols. 4to.—Technica Curiosa, 4to.—Machina Hydraulicæ-Pneumaticæ—Pantometrum Kircherianum, seu Instrumentum Geometricum Novum—Itinerarium Staticum Kircher—Encyclopediæ, containing a course of mathematics—Mathesis Cæsarea, 2 vols. 4to.—Anatomia Physico-Hydrostatica Fontium et Fluminum, 8vo.—Arithmetica Practica Generalis, 8vo.—Schola Steganographica—Organum Mathematicum, 4to.

SCHREVELIUS, Cornelius, a laborious critic of Holland, born at Haerlam, 1615. He published editions of Homer, Hesiod, and other classics, said to be not very correct. The work by which he is best known, is his Greek Lexicon, 8vo. now in general use. He died 1667.

SCHULEMBOURG, Matthias John, count of, was born in 1661, and from his earliest years devoted himself to military affairs. He was first in the service of the king of Poland, who intrusted him with the command of the Saxon troops in 1704, and with a small force he bravely withstood, in an advantageous situation, five attacks of Charles XII. of Sweden. In 1708, he was placed at the head of 9000 Poles, who were in the service of the Dutch, and the next year he was at the battle of Malplaquet, where prince Eugene saw and admired his valour, and gave him his esteem. In 1711 he went into the service of the Venetians, and ably defended them against the Turks at the siege of Corfu, where his conduct was so intrepid, that a larger pension was bestowed upon him, and a statue raised to his honour. In 1726 he visited his sister, the countess of Kendal, in England, and was received with distinction by George I. and he afterwards returned to Venice, where he died, 1743, universally respected.

SCHULTENS, Albert, a German divine, born at Groningen. He was minister of Wosseuar, and professor of oriental languages at Franeker, and afterwards at Leyden, where he died, 1741, aged 70. His works are a Commentary on Job, 2 vols. 4to.—a Hebrew Grammar—the Life of Saladin, from the Arabic, folio—Commentary on Proverbs, 4to.—Animadversiones Philologicæ et Criticæ ad Varræ Veteris Testam. Loca—a treatise of Hebrew Roots, &c.

SCHULZE, John Henry, a physician born at Colbitz in Magdeburg. He was medical professor at Halle, where he died 1745, aged 58. He was also well skilled in Greek, and in Arabic literature, and wrote Historia Medicinæ a Rerum Initio ad Annum Urbis Romæ 535 Deducta, 4to.—Physiologia Medica, 8vo.—Pathologia Generalis et Specialis—de Materiâ Medicâ Dissertationes Medicæ et Historicæ, &c.

SCHURMAN, Anna Maria, a German lady born at Cologne, 1607. She possessed uncommon powers, and not only excelled in music, painting, sculpture, and engraving, but in the knowledge of the learned languages, of Greek, Hebrew, Syriac, and Arabic, as well as the modern tongues. When six years old she cut on paper all sorts of figures without model, and two years after designed flowers in a very masterly manner. These great accomplishments were adorned further by the most modest and diffident manners; but her powers were too great to be long concealed from the world, and by the means of her friends and correspondents, of Vossius, Spanheim, Rivet, and others, her reputation was spread over Europe; and she was visited by Richelieu, and other persons of the highest rank, and even princesses. Her devotion was said to be equal to her learning, but in 1650, her attachment to Labadie lessened her fame, and after living with that enthusiast at Altona, and attending him in his last moments, she retired to Wiemar, in Friesland, where she died 1678. She wrote Latin poems—a Defence of female study—Eukleria, in defence of her attachment to Labadie—Opuscula, in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, printed 1652, 4to.

his pieces are still admired in the churches of Antwerp. He died 1660, aged 60.

SCHURTZFLEISCH, Conrad Samuel, a native of Corback in Waldeck, professor of history, poetry, and Greek at Wittemberg. He travelled over Germany, France, England, and Italy, and was made counsellor and librarian to the duke of Saxe Weimar. He died 1708, aged 67. His works are Disputationes Historicae Civiles, 3 vols. 4to.—Letters, 3 vols. 8vo.—Continuation of Sleidan till 1678—Dissertationes et Opuscula. His brother, Henry Leonard, wrote Historia Ensisferorum Ordinis Teutonici, 12mo. 1701.

SCHUUR, Theodore Vander, a painter, born at the Hague. He was at Paris, where he studied under Sebastian Bourdon, and then went to visit the Italian schools. He was happy in his pieces, which he enriched in the back grounds with fine ancient ruins. He died 1705, aged 77.

SCHUYLER, Peter, mayor of Albany, New-York, and distinguished for his patriotism and popularity with the Indians. In the year 1691, with a party of English and Mohawks, he attacked the French at the north end of lake Champlain, and defeated them. He had great influence with the five Indian nations, and in 1710 went to England with five of their chiefs, for the purpose of exciting the government to expel the French from Canada. In 1719, he being the oldest member of the council, held the chief command in New-York. ☞ L.

SCHUYLER, Philip, major-general in the army of the American revolution, was appointed to that office in 1775, and despatched to the fortifications in the north of New-York, for the purpose of preparing for an invasion of Canada. By the loss of his health, the command soon devolved upon Montgomery. On his recovery he employed himself in directing the operations in that section, and on the approach of Burgoyne in 1777, made every exertion to obstruct his progress. In consequence of the evacuation of Ticonderoga by St. Clair, he unreasonably fell under some suspicion, and was superseded in the chief command by general Gates. He afterwards rendered important services in the transactions at New-York, though not in command. He was a member of congress previous to the establishment of the present constitution, and afterwards twice a senator. He died at Albany in 1804, in his seventy-third year. He possessed a mind of great vigour and enterprise, and was characterized by integrity and amiableness. ☞ L.

SCHWARTZ, Bertholet, the inventor of gunpowder, was a monk of the order of Cordeliers, and was born at Friburg, in the 13th century. He was an able chymist, and it is said, discovered the fatal secret of the ingredients of gunpowder, when making some chymical experiments on nitre. This discovery was first applied to firearms at the battle of Cressy, 1346, or according to others, as early as 1300, by the Venetians; and it consequently changed the whole art of war. Roger Bacon is considered by some to have been acquainted with the fatal secret, which he refused to reveal.

SCHWARTZ, Christopher, a native of Ingolstadt, eminent as a painter. He was the pupil of Titian, and the successful imitator of Tintoret. He was patronised by the elector of Bavaria, and was called the Raphael of Germany. He died at Munich, 1594, aged 44.

SCHWERIN, Christopher, count of, governor of Niess and Brieg, and field marshal in the Prussian service, was born 26th Oct. 1684, and rose by merit to the highest honours. He gained the battle of Mollwitz, in 1741, when the Prussians thought that all was lost, and he continued to distinguish himself in succeeding engagements against the Austrians, till the battle of Prague in 1757, in which he fell, aged 72. His memory was honoured with a statue by the king of Prussia in Berlin, and a monument by Joseph II. in 1783, on the very spot where he expired. He had been, in 1712, envoy from the duke of Mecklenburg, to Charles XII. of Sweden, at Bender, and he caught some of the martial spirit of that celebrated monarch.

SCHYNDAL, Bernard, a Dutch painter, whose shepherds, ale-houses, fairs, &c. were much admired. He was born at Haerlem, and died 1716, aged 57.

SCIORPIUS, Gaspar, a learned German, born 1576, at Newark, Upper Palatinate, and known for the virulence with which he attacked every man of merit and reputation. He studied at Amberg, Heidelberg, Altdorff, and Ingolstadt, and early distinguished himself by writing, among other things, a commentary on "Priapeia," with obscene quotations, and licentious remarks. In 1509 he turned Roman catholic, and then abused not only the protestants, but also the Jesuits, against whom he wrote not less than 30 different treatises. Not only Joseph Scaliger felt the acrimony of his satire, but Henry IV. of France, and James I. of England, to whom he wrote a Latin pamphlet, called an "Eye Salve for his Britannic Majesty." The last part of his life he devoted to the explanation of the prophecies of the Holy Scriptures, and particularly of the Apocalypse, and he pretended to have discovered the very key which Peter left on earth. He died 1649. He was a man of extraordinary learning, and had he possessed equal moderation and good sense, his fame would have been deservedly superior to the rest of the world. His memory was such, that it was said that he could, like another Ezra, have restored the Scriptures if lost, as he knew them all by heart. His works were more numerous than his years, the best known of which are Verisimilium Libri quatuor, 8vo.—Commentarius de Arte Critica, 8vo.—Classicum Belli Sacri—de Sua ad Catholicos Migratione—Notationes in Phædrum—Suspectarum Lectionum—Grammatica Philosophica, 8vo. &c.

SCIPIO, Publ. Cornel. an illustrious Roman. He avenged the death of his father and uncle, who had fallen in Spain, by the total defeat of the Carthaginians in that country, and he afterwards passed into Africa, to carry war to the gates of the capital. The battle of Zama, and the defeat of Annibal, put an end to the second Punic war, and the victorious Roman obtained the honourable surname of Africanus. The Romans afterwards behaved with jealousy towards him, and he retired from public clamours to his country house, where he died, B. C. 180.

SCIPIO, Luc. Cornel. brother to the preceding, obtained the name of Asiaticus, from his conquests in Asia, in which he was assisted by the valour and the judgment of the great Africanus.

SCIPIO NASICA, of the same family as the conqueror of Carthage, was eminent for his virtues, and for his success in Spain.

SCIPIO, Publ. Æmilianus, son of Paulus, was adopted by the Scipios, and obtained the surname of the second Africanus, by his final conquest of Carthage, B. C. 147. He afterwards destroyed Numantia, and enlarged the Roman possessions in Spain. He was found dead in his bed, 123, assassinated, it is supposed, by his political enemies.

SCIPIO, Publius, father-in-law of Pompey, retired from the battle of Pharsalia to Africa, where he was soon after defeated at Thapsus, by J. Cæsar.

SLATER, William, D.D. a native of Somersetshire, educated at Brazen-nose college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He died 1647, on his living of Otterden, in Kent. He was author of elegies and epitaphs, under the title of Threnodia Britannica, 4to.—Palæ-Albion, or History of Great Britain to the Reign of the First James, in Latin and English verse, fol.—Psalms, or Songs of Sion—Genethliacon, or Stemmi Jacobi Regis ab Adamo, folio. Another divine of that name was also D. D. fellow of King's college, Cambridge, and vicar of Pitminster, Somersetshire, where he died 1626; author of a Commentary on the Epistles to the Thessalonians and Romans, fol. His son was prebendary of Exeter, and minister of Cullumpton, Devon, and author of some sermons.

SCOPAS, a sculptor and architect of Patros, 430 B. C. His most admired works were the Mausoleum of Artemisia, and a statue of Venus.

SCORZA, Sinibaldo, a painter and engraver of Voltaggio, in the Genoese territory. He particularly excelled in animals, flowers, and landscapes, and also in miniatures. He was banished by his enemies, on the false accusation of being leagued with the duke of Savoy, against whom his countrymen were engaged in war. He was afterwards recalled, and died at Genoa, 1631, aged 41. Some of his engravings from Albert Durer possessed great merit.

SCOR, Reynolds, an English writer, born of an ancient family near Smeeth, in Kent. He was of Hart-hall, Oxford, but left the university without a degree, and retired to his seat, where he devoted himself to the reading of obscure authors. He published "a Perfect Platform of a Hop-Garden, &c." in 4to. second edition 1576—the Discoveries of Witchcraft, &c. 4to.—Discourse upon Devils and Spirits, &c. These works, in a superstitious age, exposed him to much obloquy, and his labours were attacked with great virulence by those who supported the doctrines of astrology, alchemy, legerdemain, and witchcraft, and he was censured not only by Meric Casaubon, Joseph Glanvil, Raynolds, and others, but by James I. in his Demonologia. This worthy man, distinguished for his piety and benevolence, as well as for his learning, died at the seat of his ancestors, and was buried at the church of Smeeth, 1599.

SCOTT, John, D. D. an able divine, born at Chippenham, Wilts, 1638. Though for three years engaged in trade, he prevailed upon his friends to send him to Oxford, where, without taking his degrees in arts, he accumulated the degrees of bachelor, and doctor in divinity, in 1685. He was successively minister of St. Thomas's, Southwark, rector of St. Peter le Poor, London, rector of St. Giles in the Fields, prebendary of St. Paul, and canon of Windsor, and refused a bishopric, because he would not take the oath of homage. He died 1694, and was buried in St. Giles church. He was a warm opposer of the catholics, and wrote various things, the best known of which are the Christian Life, a most valuable and popular work, in folio, and 5 vols. 8vo.—Sermons—Cases of Conscience Resolved, and some pieces against the papists.

SCOTT, Daniel, an eminent writer, son of a merchant. He was educated at Tewkesbury, Gloucestershire, and afterward went to Utrecht, where he took the degree of LL.D. but though he studied divinity, he never entered into the church, as he rather inclined to the Baptists. He published an Essay towards the Demonstration of the Scripture Trinity, 1725, which passed through three editions—a New Verston of St. Matthew's Gospel, with notes, 1741—Appendix to H. Stephens's Greek Lexicon, 2 vols. fol. 1745, &c. He died 1759.

SCOTT, Thomas, brother of Daniel, was a dissenting minister, first at Hitchin, Herts, and then at Norwich, where he died 1746. He is author of Occasional Sermons, &c. in which he endeavoured to settle the dispute about the godhead of Christ, by John 20, v. 28. His son Joseph Nicol was pastor of a dissenting congregation at Norwich, and then became Arian, and at last took the degree of M.D. in Scotland, and practised as a physician. He was author of 2 vols. of sermons, and assisted in the revision of Bailey's folio Dictionary. His brother Thomas was also a dissenting minister at Lowestoff, afterwards at Ipswich, and then at Hapton, Norfolk, where he died 1775. He is author of single sermons—of lyric poems—of a translation of Job into English verse, with notes, twice edited, &c.

SCOTT, Thomas, B.D. an English divine, for some years preacher to the English company at Utrecht. He was basely assassinated by a soldier, as he was going to his church, in 1626. He is author of Vox Populi; Vox Dei; Vox Regis; the Belgick Pismire Stinging the Slothful Sleeper, 4to.; Symmachia, or True Love's Knot between Great Britain and the United Provinces, 4to.; a Tongue Combat between Two English Soldiers in the Tilt Boat of Gravesend, 4to.; Digitus Dei; the Projector, a sermon before the judges at Norwich; the Highways of God and the King, two sermons, 4to.; News from Parnassus, 4to.

SCOTT, Samuel, an English painter, who died 1772. His sea pieces were much admired, and were regarded as equal to the interesting works of Vandervelde.

SCOTT, Michael, a native of Balwirie, in Fifeshire, born 1240. He conducted himself with such bravery at the battle of Largo, 1260, that Alexander III. of Scotland, knighted him, and afterwards employed him in various political affairs. He was, on the king's death, made one of the regents of Scotland, and died 1291. He was much addicted to astrology, and in consequence of his great learning, passed for a magician. Some of his writings are preserved by Dr. M'Kenzie.

SCOTT, David, a Scotchman, born near Haddington, 1675. He was strongly attached to the Stuart family, and refused to take the oaths to William III. in consequence of which he was exposed to much persecution. He wrote a History of Scotland, folio, an indifferent performance, and died at Haddington, 1742.

SCOTT, John, an English poet, of the persuasion of the quakers. His father was a London tradesman, and retired to Anwell, Hertfordshire, a place which our author has fondly celebrated in his elegant poem of that name. He wrote besides, "Digest of Laws respecting Highways and Turnpikes;" Observations on the Poor; a Traet on Rowley's Poems. His poems, descriptive and moral, appeared together, 1782, in 8vo. and the author died the next year.

SCOU GAL, Henry, M.A. a learned Scotchman, born at Saltoun, East Lothian, 1650, and educated there, and at Aberdeen university, where he took his degree, and was appointed professor of moral philosophy, and also of theology. His exertions as a preacher brought on a consumption, of which he died in 1678, aged 28. This respectable and amiable character wrote "Life of God in the Soul of Man," much admired, besides nine sermons.

SCREVEN, James, a brigadier general of the militia of Georgia in the revolutionary war, commanded a body of troops which was engaged in repelling the invaders from Florida, and died of wounds received in a skirmish with them at Midway, November 24, 1778. He early engaged in the cause of liberty, and in 1774, was one of the committee which drew up articles of association for its defence in Georgia. Congress ordered the erection of a monument as a mark of their respect for him.

SCRIBONIUS LARGUS, a Roman physician of eminence, in the age of Augustus and of Tiberius. Some of his works are extant.

SCRIVERIUS, Peter, a native of Haerlem, eminent as a poet and philologer. He died 1653, aged 73, and was author of "Batavia Illustrata," 4to.; Batavia Comitumque Historia, besides editions of Vegetius, of Aquilius' Chronicon Geldricum, &c.

SCROGGS, Sir William, a native of Deddington, Oxfordshire, educated for the church, but drawn into the army during the civil wars. He afterwards entered at Gray's Inn, and was called to the bar. His abilities recommended him to the court; he was knighted in 1669, made sergeant at law, and in 1678 raised to the high office of chief justice of the king's bench. Three years after he was removed from his place by an impeachment of the commons, because he was supposed to have acted with partiality on the trial of persons concerned in the popish plots which so frequently alarmed the nation in those turbulent times. He died 1683. Some of his speeches have been preserved in the state trials.

SCUDDER, Henry, minister of Collingbourne Ducis, Wilts, and bachelor of divinity at Cambridge, was author of the Christian's Daily Walk, 8vo. a popular work. He was in his principles a strong presbyterian, and died before the restoration.

SCUDERI, George de, a French writer born at Havre de Grace, 1603. He possessed great facility in writing, and paid his court to Richelieu by publishing some severe censures on the Cid of Corneille. He wrote much, but with such rapidity that, as Boileau says, he could each month bring forth a volume. His works, therefore, are now little known. He was member of the French academy, and died at Paris, 1665.

SCUDERI, Madeleine de, sister of the preceding, was born at Havre de Grace, 1607. She was eminent for her wit, her vivacity, and her writings, and was made member of the Ricovrati academy at Padua. She was also honoured with the correspondence of several learned persons, and was rewarded for her works by Mazarine, and pensioned by Christina of Sweden, and Lewis XIV. Her house was the general resort of the witty and the learned. She died 1701, aged 94, and two churches disputed the honour of possessing her remains, which was at last settled by the interference of cardinal de Noailles. Her works are very numerous, but she is better known for some elegant verses, according to Voltaire, than for her ponderous romances. She wrote Clelia, 10 vols. Svo.—Artamenes, or the Grand Cyrus, 10 vols. Svo.—Ibrahim, or the Illustrious Bashaw, 4 vols.—Conversations and Discourses, 10 vols.—a Discourse on Glory, &c.

SCULTETUS, Abraham, a native of Grumberg, in Silesia, professor of theology at Heidelberg, and deputy of the university at the synod of Dort. He left his place by the envy and intrigues of his enemies, and died at Embden, 1626, aged 60. He wrote Medulla Patrum, 4to. and other theological works.

SCYLAX, a geographer of Caria, whose abilities were employed by Darius in visiting and making observations in India, B.C. 522. The invention of geographical tables is ascribed to him by several authors. His Periplus was edited by Gronovius, 1697.

SEAMAN, LAZARUS, D.D. a native of Leicester, educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, and made master of Peterhouse, in consequence of his active and zealous exertions in favour of the parliament during the civil wars. He was afterwards one of the divines of the Westminster assembly, and died 1675. He published several sermons. It is said that his library was the first ever sold by auction in England.

SEABURY, Samuel, first bishop of the Episcopal church in the United States, was born in 1728, and graduated at Yale college in 1751. He went to Scotland, and studied theology, and in 1753 obtained orders in London. After returning to America he settled in New-London, Connecticut, where his father had preached. In 1784 he went to England to obtain consecration as bishop of that state. Not succeeding in England, he went to Scotland, and was consecrated by three non-juring bishops. Returning to New-London he discharged the duties of his office with ability till his death in 1796. He published several volumes of sermons. He possessed a vigorous mind, and had stored it with extensive knowledge. ☞ L.

SEBA, Albert, author of a valuable work on Natural History, in 3 vols. folio, with plates and explanations in Latin and French, published Amsterdam, 1734, was born at Etzeel, East Friesland.

SEBASTIAN, posthumous son of the infant John, and of a daughter of Charles V. succeeded his grandfather John III. on the throne of Portugal, 1557. He invaded in 1574, the Moors in Africa, but without honour, and four years after he went to the assistance of Muly Mohammed, against his uncle Moluc, king of Fez and Morocco. The expedition was unfortunate, and in a battle fought near Tangiers, 29th July, 1578, the greatest part of the Portuguese army was cut to pieces, and Sebastian shared their fate. As his body could not be found, some supposed that he escaped from the general slaughter, and in consequence two impostors arose to claim the throne, both of them hermits, and after some confusion these ambitious hypocrites were removed, the one being executed and the other sent to the galleys.

SEBASTIANO, a painter, born at Venice, 1485, and called del Plombo, from an office in the lead mines, given him by pope Clement VII. He studied under Bellino and Giorgione, and was the friend of Michael Angelo, at Rome. His Lazarus raised from the Dead, is his best piece, scarce eclipsed by the famous transfiguration of Raphael. He invented the preparing of plaster walls for oil painting, and died 1547.

SECKENDORF, Guy, Lewis de, a learned German, born at Aurach, in Franconia, 1626. He was much noticed, and patronised by the duke of Saxe-Gotha, and by the duke of Saxe-Weist, and afterwards by the elector of Brandenburg, who made him counsellor of state, and chancellor of Halle university. He wrote several books, the best known of which was Commentarius Historicus, et Apologeticus de Lutheranismis, &c. 2 vols. fol. a valuable work, which contains the best account of Luther. He died at Halle, 18th Dec. 1692.

SECKER, Thomas, a pious prelate, born at Sibthorpe near Newark, Notts, 1693. As his father was a dissenter, he was instructed in the principles of those secretaries, first at Chesterfield, and then in Yorkshire, and afterwards in Gloucestershire, and in 1716 he began to study medicine. In 1719, he visited Paris, where he became acquainted, by means of his friends Benson and Butler, with Mr. Talbot, son of the bishop of Durham, who liberally promised him his father's patronage, if he would enter into the orders of the English church. After mature deliberation he accepted the proposal, but to obtain his degrees with greater facility he went to Leyden, where after a residence of three months he proceeded M.D. On his return to England he entered as gentleman commoner at Exeter college, Oxford, and soon after was admitted to the degree of B.A. He was regularly ordained by bishop Talbot, and in 1724, obtained the rectory of Houghton-le-Spring, Durham, which he afterwards exchanged for a prebend, and the living of Ryton near Newcastle, 1727. In 1732, he became chaplain to the king, and the next year resigned Ryton for St. James's, Westminster. In 1735, his abilities recommended him to the bishopric of Bristol, and in 1737, he was translated to Oxford, and on Hutton's death 1753, the duke of Newcastle, unsolicited, procured his elevation to the see of Canterbury. As he grew old he was much afflicted with the rheumatic and gouty complaints, and on the last day of July, 1768, he had the misfortune to break his thigh-bone, while turning himself on his couch. A delirium followed the fracture, but recovery was impossible, and he expired on the 3d August following, aged 75. It was afterwards discovered that his thigh-bone was perfectly carious, and that the pains which long afflicted him arose from the decayed state of that limb. Secker left the best part of his property to charitable uses, and with great munificence upheld the dignity of his see, and of his clergy. In his conduct as a bishop he was vigilant and attentive, eager to reward merit, and at all times severe against vicious or dissipated members of the church. The dissenters hoped much from his elevation, but he behaved with coolness and distrust towards them, and while he forgot the tenets in which he had been educated, he showed that his present opinions were formed upon mature and well-weighed conclusions. He was an elegant scholar, an animated preacher, and a sound divine. His sermons are deservedly popular, and in his lectures on the catechism he displays all the perspicuity, eloquence, and argumentation, which can command not only admiration but conviction, in the pure and apostolic doctrines of the church of England. His works have altogether been published in 12 vols. 8vo. 1795.

His life was given to the public by Dr. Porteus, his chaplain and executor.

SECONDAT DE MONTESQUIEU, John Baptist, son of the celebrated Montesquieu, was counsellor in the parliament of Bourdeaux, and devoted himself to the study and the pleasures of agriculture. He died at Bourdeaux, 17th July, 1796, aged 79. He wrote Memoir on Electricity, 8vo. against Nollet—Observations on the Mineral waters of the Pyrenees, 12mo.—Considerations on the Marine of France, 8vo.—Natural History of the Oak, folio.

SECOSSE, Denys Francis, a learned Frenchman, born at Paris, 8th Jan. 1691. He was one of Rollin's first pupils, and afterwards left the bar for the study of literature. He was admitted into the academy of belles lettres, and became the friend of the learned and of the great. He continued, at the request of the chancellor d'Aguesseau, the collection of royal ordinances, begun by Lauriere, and also discharged the office of censor royal. He gradually became blind in the last period of life, and died at Paris, 15th March, 1754. He was author of a collection of Royal Ordonnances, from the second to the 9th vol. lately continued by Villevaut—Memoirs for the History of Charles the Bad, 2 vols. 4to.—Memoirs of Condé, edited with Lenglet, 6 vols. 4to.—Dissertations in the Memoirs of the academy of inscriptions.

SECUNDUS, John, a modern Latin poet, born at the Hague, 1511. He was well skilled in painting and engraving, and studied law under Alciatus, and became secretary to the archbishop of Toledo. His poems are excellent, and display great wit, elegance, invention, and delicacy. They consist of elegies, epistles, epigrams, odes, and miscellanies, but the most famous is his Basia, or Kisses, a beautiful poem, translated into several modern languages. He died at Utrecht, 1536.

SECURIS, John, a native of Wiltshire, educated at New college, Oxford. He afterwards studied at Paris, and then settled at Salisbury, where he practised physic with great success, and died about 1570. He wrote "Prognosticons," a sort of almanacs, besides a Compendium how to keep a Moderate Diet—Detection and Querimony of the Daily Enormities and Abuses committed in the Three Branches of Physic.

SEDAINE, Michael John, a French dramatic writer, son of an indigent architect, was born at Paris, 14th June, 1719. He left the obscure employment of stone mason for literature, and by frequenting the theatre he imbibed such partiality for dramatic pieces, that he directed all the powers of an ardent imagination to the composition of a play. He was successful, and in 1754

Mouet, director of the comic opera, soon discovered that by employing the talents of the new dramatist, he could command numerous and applauding audiences. Sedaine was in his private character a mild and amiable man, and his abilities procured him a seat in the academy of inscriptions, and he also became secretary to the academy of architecture. He died in the spring of 1797. His comic operas are numerous and valuable, and some of them, such as Richard Cœur de Lion, and Blue Beard, have made their appearance on the English stage.

SEDGWICK, Obadiah, a native of Marlborough, educated at Queen's college, Oxford. He went as chaplain to sir Horatio Vere, in his expedition into the Low Countries, and during the civil wars he warmly espoused the republican principles, and frequently preached before the parliament. He published some sermons and religious tracts, and died in his native town, 1657, aged 57. There was another of that name, William, of a fanatical turn of mind, who was surnamed Domsday Sedgwick, because he foretold the day of judgment.

SEDGWICK, Theodore, born at Hartford, Conn. West Division, May, 1746, died 24th January, 1813, at Boston, whence his remains were removed to Stockbridge, Berkshire co. Massachusetts, the place of his residence. Major Robert Sedgewicke, the ancestor from whom the American branch of this family is derived, is mentioned in the early annals of Massachusetts as "having been raised up to all feats of war in London Artillery Garden." He was chosen "the first sergeant-major in the regiment of Essex," and it is stated that although Charleston, where he resided, "doth not advantage such overtopping batteries as Boston doth, yet by the help of a good head-piece he hath erected his to a very good purpose, insomuch that all shipping that comes into Boston or Charleston must needs face it all the time of their coming in;" and that "the costs he hath been at in helping on the discipline of his regiment hath profited much." He was afterwards sent by Cromwell to administer the government of Jamaica as commissioner. An interesting account of the sufferings and death of himself and his associates is to be found in Edwards's History of the West Indies. His son, who had been educated in Boston, returned there, went again to Jamaica, and died on his passage home, and was buried in Boston. The family estate having been impaired at Jamaica, his widow removed to the interior, in the northern part of Massachusetts, on the Connecticut river, and the family was subsequently compelled by the hostilities of the Indians to migrate to Connecticut, and settled in Hartford, West Division. Here the subject of the present article was born. His father, Benjamin Sedgwick, relinquishing mercantile business, removed to Cornwall, in the western part of Connecticut, where he died, at the age of about 45, leaving little property, and a widow and six children, of whom Theodore, then about ten years of age, was the youngest son. Through the generosity of his eldest brother, John, he was with great difficulty educated at Yale college. He did not complete his college term, but commenced the study of divinity, which he left for the law. He studied law with Mark Hopkins, Esq. of Great Barrington, and was admitted an attorney of the court of common pleas in Berkshire, in April term, 1776, before he was twenty years of age. He first practised law in Great Barrington, then in Sheffield, and in 1785 removed to Stockbridge, all in the same county. He embarked in the revolutionary struggle with all his constitutional ardour. In 1776 he was in the expedition to Canada as an aid to General Thomas. Subsequently he made great exertions in procuring supplies for the army, and at the same time hazarded his popularity by the protection which he afforded to the tories. He represented Sheffield in the Massachusetts general court several times before and after the revolution. In 1785 and 1786 he was a member of congress under the old confederation. In the winter of 1787 he was one of the first to perceive the dangerous nature of the insurrectionary spirit then pervading the state of Massachusetts. Active and zealous in animating, rallying, and organizing the comparatively small number of the well-affected, in defiance of danger and in despite of the remonstrances of his friends, he exposed himself, attended only by a single individual, in every part of the county, to outrage and insult, and as many apprehended, to the loss of his life. His house was plundered in his absence by a party of the insurgents. In one instance, advancing on horseback in front of a company of government troops, he raised his sword over the head of the leader of the rebels, and commanded him to direct his men to lay down their arms. He obeyed: the men did lay down their arms, and were instantly dispersed. His exertions in the suppression of what was called the "Shays rebellion," were fully appreciated at the time, and are honourably mentioned in Minot's history of that commotion. In 1788 he was a member from Stockbridge of the convention called in Massachusetts to decide on the adoption of the federal constitution, and was one of the chief advocates in its favour. In the same year he was a member of the state legislature, and chosen speaker of the house of representatives. In the same year he was chosen a representative to the congress commencing March, 1789, and in this capacity he remained in that body upon successive elections until March, 1796. In 1796 he was chosen by the legislature of Massachusetts a senator of the United States, and remained such until March, 1799, and during that time he was president pro. tem. for a considerable portion of one session. In 1799 he was again elected a member of the house of representatives, and chosen speaker. In 1802 he was appointed judge of the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, and continued in that office until his death in 1813. While at the bar he was very zealous in the cause of the emancipation of the negroes, and was one of the counsel who, shortly after the adoption of the Massachusetts constitution, procured a decision giving a construction to that instrument which abolished slavery in that state. He received degrees as doctor of laws from Nassau and Harvard. His life was in an uncommon degree varied and active; his integrity was never questioned; an ardent enthusiasm was the basis of his character; his industry was unwearied; his attachments and aversions were strong and enduring; he was a zealous and consistent politician; his temper was unusually social, and his manners dignified and benevolent. He was beloved by his family and friends, and as a statesman and jurist highly valued by his country. He firmly believed the truth of the Christian religion, and died in the communion of the church of the Rev. Dr. Channing, in Boston.

SEDLEY, sir Charles, an English poet, born at Aylesford, in Kent, 1639. He was of Wadham college, Oxford, but left it without a degree, and became afterwards one of the wits of the debauched court of Charles II. Thus devoted to dissipation of every kind, he grew poor; but though unprincipled, he was highly offended with the intrigue which James II. had with his daughter, who was in consequence ennobled with the title of countess of Dorchester. This elevation gave him the greater concern, and he espoused the more warmly the revolution, observing that he did it from a principle of gratitude, "for since his majesty," said he, "has made my daughter a countess, I wish to do all I can to make his daughter a queen." Sedley's works were published, 2 vols. 8vo. 1719, and consist of plays, translations, songs, epilogues, &c. but though without much fire or genius, they possess the dangerous art of insinuating loose and licentious principles. He died 1703.

SEDULIUS, Cœcilius, an ecclesiastic of the fifth century, author of a poem on the Life of Christ, called Paschale Carmen, published by Aldus, 1502, 8vo.

SEED, Jeremiah, an able divine, born at Clifton, near Penrith, in Cumberland. He was educated at Lowther, and then entered at Queen's college, Oxford, of which he became fellow, 1732. He was for a long time curate at Twickenham, and in 1741 obtained from his college the rectory of Enham, Hants, where he died 1747. This excellent divine, deservedly esteemed for his private exemplary character, published discourses, on several important subjects, 2 vols. 8vo. and after his death his "Posthumous Works," consisting of sermons, letters, &c. appeared under the care of Mr. Hall, of his college, 2 vols. 8vo.

SEE-MA-KOANG, a Chinese philosopher in the 11th century. Though a Mandarin of distinction, and the favourite of the emperor, he relinquished all his employments about the court, and retired to solitude, where he devoted himself to study and meditation. He was fifteen years in composing a history of China, which began at the year 403 before Christ. He wrote also some moral pieces, &c. and was universally esteemed as a learned and amiable man.

SEGAR, sir William, garter king at arms, and author of Honour Civil and Military, fol. 1602, died 1633. His MSS. on heraldry were valuable, and from them Edmonson has chiefly extracted his baronage of England. He was once imposed upon, and granted to George Brandon, the common hangman, the royal arms of Arragon, with a canton of Brabant, for which he was imprisoned, but again set at liberty when the particulars were made known.

SEGHERS, Gerard, a Dutch painter, born at Antwerp. He studied under Janssens, and ably imitated Rubens and Vandyck. He was happy in pieces of devotion, but he also excelled in representations of musicians and low scenes. He died at Antwerp, 1641, aged 49. His brother Daniel, who was a Jesuit, painted flowers and insects with admirable art. He was the disciple of Velvet Breughel. His pieces sold for a high price. He died at Antwerp, 1660, aged 70.

SEGNERI, Paul, a native of Nettuno, who entered among the Jesuits, and became, by the austerity of his manners, and the eloquence of his tongue, a popular preacher, and an active missionary of the society. He was invited to Rome by pope Innocent XII. to whom he became chaplain; but he soon after fell into a languid state, which carried him off, 9th Dec. 1694, aged 70. He wrote sermons, 7 vols.—the Unbeliever without excuse—the Pastor instructed—the Illusions of the Quietists—the Servant of Mary, &c. all collected into 3 vols. fol.

SEGRAIS, John Renaud de, a French poet, born 1624, at Caen, of a noble family. He was educated among the Jesuits, but declined to enter into orders, and afterwards distinguished himself so much by his pen, that he was introduced, by count de Frisque, to Mad. de Montpensier, who took him into her family. His opposition to her marrying count de Lauzun, drove him from her protection, but he found a new patroness in Mad. de la Fayette, in whose house and society he was for seven years treated with kindness and honourable distinction. He afterwards returned to his native country and married a rich heiress, 1679, and spent the rest of his life in the retirement of learned ease and independence. He died at Caen, of a dropsy, 1701. His conversation was very fascinating and witty, and many of his anecdotes are recorded in the "Segrasiana," published after his death. He was a member of the French academy, and wrote several things, the best known of which are his poems, consisting of pastorals, besides translations of Virgil's Georgics and Æneid. His prose writings were chiefly romances possessing little merit.

SECVI, Joseph, a native of Rodez, who early devoted himself to belles lettres and poetry, and obtained in 1732 the poetical prize of the French academy. He was honoured, in consequence of his success, with a place at the French academy, the abbey of Genlis, and a canonry in Meaux cathedral. He died at Meaux, March, 1761, aged 72. He published Panegyrics, 2 vols. 12mo.—sermons, 2 vols.—Academical discourses. His panegyric of St. Lewis was received with such applause, that some attributed it to the superior powers of la Mothe.

SECVIER, John Francis, a native of Nismes, who abandoned jurisprudence to follow his more favourite studies of botany. He improved his knowledge by travelling with the marquis Scipio Maffei into France, England, Holland, Germany, and Italy, and was honoured on his return with the place of president of the academy of Nismes. This indefatigable writer, who also paid great attention to medallic history, died at Nismes, 1st Sept. 1784, aged 81. He wrote Bibliotheca Botanica, 4to.—Plantae Veronenses, 8vo.—a Translation of Maffei's Memoirs, 2 vols. 12mo.

SEJANUS, Ælius, a well-known favourite of Tiberius. He first introduced himself to the notice of Caius Cæsar, the grandson of Augustus, and afterwards engrossed the favours of Tiberius, when on the throne. Not satisfied with the honours which he enjoyed, he aspired to the imperial purple, and after murdering Drusus, the emperor's son, he claimed the hand of his widow, but was indignantly rejected. Tiberius at last opened his eyes, and the favourite, deserted by all his flatterers, was strangled, A.D. 31, and his body thrown into the Tiber.

SELDEN, John, a learned Englishman, born at Salvinton, Sussex, 1584. He was educated at Chichester school, and Hart-hall, Oxford, after which he entered at Clifford's Inn, and two years after removed to the Inner Temple. He early distinguished himself as an antiquarian, and in 1610 published Jani Anglorum Facis Altera, et Duello, or the Origin of Single Combat. Besides other pieces he published Titles of Honour, 1614, a work of great merit, and in 1618 appeared his History of Tithes, which, as it censured the ignorance and laziness of the clergy, gave great offence to that body. The work was attacked by several writers, especially Montague, afterwards bishop of Norwich, and the author at last was obliged to make submission before the lords of the privy council for this offensive publication. His opinions in favour of the privileges of the house of commons, and his opposition to the measures of the court, drew upon him in 1621, the displeasure of king James, who committed him to the custody of the sheriff of London, from which he was liberated by the interference of his friend bishop Andrews. In 1623, he was chosen member of parliament for Lancaster, and two years after for Great Bedwin, and in the house he distinguished himself by his attack on the character of Buckingham, and became one of the managers of his impeachment. His opposition to the measures of the court continued, and for the freedom of his sentiments he was, in 1629, arrested with several other members, and upon refusing to make submission to the court he was sent to the king's bench prison. He was again sent into confinement the following year; but his sufferings in the cause of public liberty were rewarded by the parliament of 1646, who voted him 5000*l.* for his losses. Though apparently much engaged in politics, Selden was laboriously employed in literary pursuits. In 1634, he defended, in his Mare Clausum, the privileges of the English, and their rights in the herring fishery, against Grotius's work, called Mare Liberum. He was in 1640, elected member for Oxford university, and in 1642, it was intended by the king's ministers to remove lord Lyttelton from the seals, and to give them to him, as though he opposed the measures of the court, he was a sincere friend to the just prerogatives of the crown, but the offer was not made, as his delicate constitution, and his great love of ease prevented his exertions, and would have induced him to decline the honourable office. In 1643, he became one of the lay members of the Westminster assembly of divines, and he about this time took the covenant, and was made by the parliament keeper of the records of the Tower. But, however, though he continued member of the house, and was in 1644, one of the 12 commissioners of the admiralty, he did not concur in the violent measures of the parliament, and when the Icon Basilice appeared, Cromwell in vain solicited him to employ his talents to write against it. He died 30th Nov. 1654, at White friars, at the house of the countess of Kent, with whom he lived in habits of friendship, and some report, of criminal intimacy. He was buried in the Temple church, and Usher preached a sermon in honour of his memory. His valuable library was given by his executors to the university of Oxford. As a scholar Selden ranks very high. He was not only skilled in the Hebrew and Oriental languages, but he was acquainted with all laws, divine and human, and in the stores of a most retentive memory he had treasured up whatever is valuable, interesting, and important, in ancient and modern literature. He was, as Grotius states him, the glory of the English nation, and as Whitelock says, his mind was as great as his learning, and he was as hospitable and as generous as any man. He was a person, as Clarendon has observed, whom no character can flatter, or transmit in any expressions equal to his merit and virtue. His learning was stupendous, and if he had some infirmities they were weighed down with wonderful and prodigious abilities, and excellences, in the other scale. The works of this great character were collected by Dr. Wilkins, 3 vols. fol. generally bound in six, 1726, of which the two first contain his Latin pieces, and the third his English, with a long life prefixed.

SELEUCUS NICANOR, a king of Syria at the division of the provinces after Alexander's death. He was at last assassinated after a stormy reign, by Ptolemy Ceraunus, B.C. 280.

SELIM I. second son of Bajazet II. defeated his father in 1512, and after poisoning him, and cutting off his elder brother Achmet, and the younger Korcud, he ascended the throne of Turkey. Firm in his power he marched against Egypt, and in a bloody battle near Aleppo, he killed Campson Gaury the Egyptian monarch, and in another battle near Cairo defeated the new king, and totally crushed the power of the Mamelukes, which for 260 years had governed the country. He was equally successful against the Persians; but whilst he prepared to make war against the Christians, he was attacked by a violent disease, which soon proved fatal. He died at Cluri in Thrace, 21st Sept. 1520, on the very spot where he had caused his father to be poisoned.

SELIM II. grandson of the preceding, ascended the throne after the death of his father Solyman II. 1566. He violated in 1570, the treaty which existed between him and the Venetians, and by a sudden attack he made himself master of Cyprus, but the next year he lost at the battle of Lepanto above 35,000 men beside his fleet, and therefore readily listened to terms of peace. Devoting his time to the sensual pleasures of his seraglio, he died little respected, 1574, aged 52.

SELIS, Nicholas Joseph, a French poet, born at Paris 27th April, 1737. By the friendship of Delille he left Amiens, where his poetical talents were already admired, and settled at Paris, respected by the learned, and admitted professor of belles lettres at the central school of the Pantheon, and member of the national institute. He is author of a translation of Persius, with notes, 8vo.—Epistles in verse—Relation of Voltaire's Disorder, Confession, and Death—Letter to de la Harpe on the College of France—Discourse on Central Schools—Dissertations, Literary and Grammatical, &c. He died 19th Feb. 1802.

SELKIRK, Alexander, a native of Largo in Scotland, who, by his application, and his knowledge of navigation, obtained the command of a ship, and made several voyages to the South Seas. In one of these, 1705, while in the ship of captain Pradling, he had a quarrel with him, and in consequence of it was cruelly sent on shore, on the desert island of Juan de Fernandez, with only a fowling piece, gunpowder and shot, and very few necessaries. In this desolate situation he continued three years, comfortably subsisting on the goats, with which the island abounded, and the various sorts of fish which he caught around the shore, till the accidental arrival of captain Wood Rogers, in 1709, removed him from his solitary abode. This singular adventure forms the basis of Robinson Crusoe, a romance embellished by the pen of the celebrated De Foe.

SELLER, Abednego, a native of Plymouth, educated at Lincoln college, Oxford, which he quitted without a degree. He became minister of Combeintine head, Devonshire, and obtained another living in London, both of which he lost at the revolution for refusing to take the oaths to William. He wrote remarks relating to the state of the church, in the three first centuries, 8vo.—the Devout Communicant, often reprinted under the title of the Week's Preparation for the Sacrament, 12mo.—Tracts against Popery. He died about 1720, aged 73.

SELLIUS, Godfrey, a native of Dantzic, member of the imperial academy, and of the Royal Society in London. He lived much of his time in France, and died at Charenton, where he had been confined a little time in consequence of insanity, 25th June, 1767. He wrote Geographical Description of Dutch Brabant, 12mo.—Voyage to Hudson's Bay, 8vo.—Dictionary of Monogrammes—a Natural History of Ireland—History of the Ancient Revolutions of the Globe—History of the United Provinces, 8 vols. 4to.

SEMRAMIS, wife of Ninus, and queen of Assyria, is celebrated in mythological history, as a warrior, and as the builder of Babylon. She is said to have resigned the throne to her son Ninyas, about 2108, B.C.

SENAC, John, a native of Lombez, who became physician to the French king, counsellor of state, and superintendent of the mineral waters of the kingdom. He died at Paris, 20th Dec. 1770. He published a translation of Heister's Anatomy, with Physical Essays on the Use of the Parts of the Human Body, 8vo. and 3 vols. 12mo.; treatise on the Causes and the Cure of the Plague, 4to.; on the Structure of the Heart, 2 vols. 4to.; de Reconditâ Febrium Naturâ et Curatione, 8vo.; Reflections on Drowned Persons; Memoir on the Diaphragm, &c.

SENAUDT, John Francis, a native of Antwerp, who became member of the oratory, and afterwards its superior. He died at Paris, universally respected, 3d Aug. 1672, aged 71. He wrote a treatise on the Use of the Passions, 4to. and 12mo. a popular work, translated into English, German, Italian, &c.; a paraphrase of Job, 8vo.; the Christian Man, 4to.; and the Criminal Man, 4to.; the Duties of the Sovereign, 12mo.; Lives of Saints and Illustrious Persons; sermons.

SENECA, Lucius Annæus, a native of Corduba, celebrated as an orator and as a pleader in the Roman Forum.

SENECA, Luc Annæus, son of the preceding, was also born at Corduba. He was appointed tutor to Nero by Agrippina, but all the sound precepts which he had inculcated were forgotten when his pupil ascended the throne, and instead of being rewarded, the virtuous preceptor was marked for destruction. On the discovery of Piso's conspiracy, he was commanded to destroy himself, and after taking poison, and then opening his veins to no effect, he was suffocated in a warm stove, A. D. 65. As a philosopher and moralist, Seneca ranks very high. The tragedies ascribed to him are possessed of little merit.

SENECAL, or SENECE, Anthony Bauderon de, a French poet, born at Macon, 13th Oct. 1643. He left the profession of the law for belles lettres; but an unfortunate duel drove him to Savoy. Here a quarrel with the brothers of a lady who had shown strong partiality for him, rendered his residence disagreeable, and he retired to Madrid, from whence he was permitted to return to France. He became first valet to Maria Theresa, the wife of Lewis XIV. and after her death, entered into the service of the dutchess of Angouleme. He died at Macon, 1st Feb. 1737. He wrote epigrams; satires; poetical novels; and fugitive poems, in a pleasing style.

SENNACHERIB, a Syrian king, whose army, when besieging Jerusalem in the reign of Hezekiah, was struck by a pestilence, and nearly destroyed. He escaped with difficulty from the ravages of the disease, and was at last slain in the temple of his gods by his two sons, B. C. 710.

SENNERTUS, Daniel, a German physician, born at Breslaw, son of a shoemaker. He studied at Wittemberg, and afterwards at Leipsic, Jena, Frankfort, and Berlin, and on his return was elected professor of physic at Wittemberg. He introduced the study of chymistry among his pupils, and acquired great celebrity both as a professor and as a practitioner, but his censure of the ancients, and his opinions about the soul, drew upon him the virulence of contemporary writers, and the charge of impiety. He was three times married, and had by his first wife seven children, and none by the rest. He died of the plague at Wittemberg, 21st July, 1637. He wrote various things, printed together at Venice, 3 vols. fol. 1640, and Lyons, 1676, 6 vols. folio.

SENNERTUS, Andrew, son of the preceding, was born 1535, at Wittemberg, and became there professor of oriental literature. He lived to a good old age, highly respected, and died 1619, aged 84. He wrote treatises on the Hebrew language, and other books.

SEPULVEDA, John Genes de, a Spanish writer, born at Cordova, 1491. He was historiographer to Charles V. and is known for his profligate vindication of the cruelties of the Spaniards against the Indians, against the humane representations of de la Casas. He wrote some other works, not much esteemed, and died at Salamanca, 1572.

SERAPION, John, an Arabian physician whose works appeared at Venice, 1497, fol. He flourished 890. There was a medical writer of that name, born in Alexandria, in the fifth century.

SERRARIUS, Nicholas, a learned Jesuit, born at Rambervillers, in Lorraine. He taught philosophy at Wurtzburg and Mayence, and died at the last place, May 20th, 1610, aged 65. He wrote Commentaries on the Bible, fol.—Prolegomena, fol.—Opuscula Theologica, &c. all of which have been collected into 16 vols. fol. and display great labour and extensive erudition.

SERENUS SANMONICUS, the preceptor of young Gordian, was a physician of the third century. He wrote a poem on Medicine, and was put to death by Caracalla.—Another of that name was a mathemati-tion, author of a treatise on Conic Sections.

SERGARDI, Lewis, a native of Sienna, author of some elegant Latin poems and satires. He was an ecclesiastic, and died 1726, aged 86. His satirical reflections on Gravina are deservedly censured.

SERGEANT, John, American Missionary to the Indians, was born at Newark, New-Jersey, in 1710, and educated at Yale college, where he obtained a degree in 1729. He was afterwards a tutor in that institution a number of years. In 1734 he began to preach to the Indians at Stockbridge, Massachusetts, and continued there till his death, labouring with great diligence and success. He baptized 129 Indians, and left a church of 42 at his decease. He translated the whole of the New Testament except the Revelation, and several parts of the Old into the Indian language. He died in 1749.  L.

SERGEANT, Jonathan Dickinson, an eminent counsellor at law, was born at Newark, New-Jersey, in 1746. He entered the college at Princeton, and was graduated in that institution in the year 1762, in the 16th year of his age. He studied law, and commenced the practice of that profession in his native state; but the revolutionary struggle coming on, his patriotic zeal and eminent talents soon recommended him to the confidence of the people for public employment. He was elected a member of congress from the state of New-Jersey, and took his seat a few days after the declaration of independence. He was repeatedly afterwards sent as a delegate to that body. Before the close of the war, he transferred his residence to the city of Philadelphia, and soon became a very conspicuous member of the bar in that city. Here he continued to reside until the year 1793, when during the prevalence of the yellow fever, he fell a victim to his benevolent exertions as one of the board of health. He died in the 47th year of his age. Mr. Sergeant was endowed with a powerful and active mind, and his moral qualities were not less distinguished and estimable than his intellectual.  L.

SERGIUS, a native of Syria, patriarch of Constantinople and head of the Monothelites, a sect which supported that there was only one will and one operation in Christ, a doctrine condemned by a council of Constantinople. He died 638.

SERLIO, Sebastian, an architect, born at Bologna. He was employed by Francis I. in embellishing the palaces of Fontainebleau, &c. He died in France, 1552, and was known for a treatise on Architecture, printed, Venice, 1584, 4to.

SERRANUS, or DE SERRES, John, a learned Frenchman, who, as a protestant, escaped with difficulty the St. Bartholomew massacre, and fled to Lausanne. He was afterwards minister at Nismes, and enjoyed the favour of Henry IV. He published in 1597, a book called "de Fide Catholice," in which he attempted to reconcile the Protestants and Roman Catholics to the same tenets, in consequence of which he displeased both parties, and was at last supposed to have been poisoned by the Calvinists of Geneva, as he died there suddenly, 1598, aged about 50. He wrote also a treatise on the Immortality of the Soul, 8vo.—Inventory of the History of France, 2 vols. folio—Memoirs of the third Civil War of France, 3 vols. 8vo.—History of the Five Kings of France—de Statu Religionis et Reipub. in Franciâ—besides an edition of Plato, 3 vols. folio, of which the Latin version is very elegant, but inferior in accuracy to that of Ficinus.

SERRES, Oliver de, a French agriculturist, born at Villeneuve de Berg, near Viviers, 1539. Though his chief delight was in the country, he was prevailed upon by Henry IV. to come to Paris, and as the monarch was pleased with his conversation, he made him superintendent of his plantations. He was the first who introduced the white mulberry-tree into France, and to his labours agriculture was much indebted for the rapid improvement which it made under his directing hand. He died 1619, aged 80. He wrote a treatise on the White Mulberry-tree, and on Silk, since reprinted—the Theatre of Agriculture and the Management of Land, 4to. a work of great merit and utility, and often reprinted.

SERTORIUS, Quintus, a famous Roman, who, after distinguishing himself in war under Marius and Cinna, found himself proscribed by Sylla, and retired to Spain, where he declared himself independent. He was at last defeated by Pompey and Metellus, and assassinated by one of his officers, B.C. 73, after governing the country with great wisdom and moderation, and every where showing himself valiant, vigilant, and active.

SERVANDONI, John Nicolas, a Florentine architect and painter, born 1695. He possessed great abilities for the display of theatrical shows, and therefore was engaged at Paris at the play-houses from 1728 to 1746. He was in London 1749, and prepared that beautiful edifice for the exhibition of fireworks on Tower-hill, in honour of the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle. He died 1766. The best known of his paintings are the Descent of Æneas into Hell—the Triumph of Conjugal Love—Hero and Leander; and of his architectural powers, the portal of St. Sulpice at Paris, is a beautiful specimen.

ova in Arragon, son of a notary. He studied the law at Toulouse, but afterwards applied to medicine at Paris, and took there his doctor's degree. The boldness and pertinacity of his opinions created him enemies, and he left the capital to settle at Lyons, but afterwards he retired to Charlieu. On the invitation of the archbishop of Vienne in Dauphiny, he was prevailed upon to fix his residence there, and he might have lived in peace and respected, had he been satisfied to seek celebrity in medical pursuits alone. Eager to publish his Arian opinions on religion, he sent three questions to Calvin on the Divinity of Christ, on Regeneration, and on the Necessity of Baptism, and when answered with civility, he reflected on the sentiments of his correspondent with arrogant harshness. This produced a quarrel, and ended in the most implacable hatred, so that Calvin, bent on revenge, obtained, by secret means, copies of a work in which his antagonist was engaged, and caused him to be accused before the archbishop as a dangerous man. Servetus escaped from prison, but on his way to Italy, he had the imprudence to pass in disguise through Geneva, where he was recognised by Calvin, and immediately seized by the magistrates as an impious heretic. Forty heretical errors were proved against him by his accusers, but Servetus refused to renounce them, and the magistrates, at last, yielding to the loud representations of the ministers of Basil, Berne, and Zurich, and especially of Calvin, who demanded the punishment of a profane heretic, ordered the unhappy man to be burnt. On the 27th Oct. 1553, the wretched Servetus was conducted to the stake, and as the wind prevented the flames from fully reaching his body, two long hours elapsed before he was freed from his miseries. This cruel treatment deservedly called down the general odium on the head of Calvin, who ably defended his conduct, and that of the magistrates. Servetus published various works against the Trinity, which were burnt in disgrace at Geneva, and other places. They bore for titles, de Trinitatis Erroribus Libri Septem—Dialogorum de Trinitate Libri Duo—de Justitiâ Regni Christi, &c.—Christianismi Restitutio—Apologia pro Serveto, &c. As he said in his Christianismi Restitutio, that the whole mass of blood passes through the lungs by means of the pulmonic veins and arteries, some have attributed the discovery of the circulation of the blood to him, which, however, must be, with more satisfactory reasons, claimed by Harvey. The History of the Opinions and of the Misfortunes of Servetus has been published by Mosheim, 1728, in 4to. and is an interesting performance. Servetus wrote besides, some medical tracts—and a translation of Ptolemy's Geography.

SERVIUS, Honoratus Maurus, a Latin grammarian, author of a valuable Commentary on Virgil in the fourth century.

SERVIUS TULLIUS, sixth king of Rome, distinguished himself by the regulations which he introduced among his subjects with respect to rank, law, and property. He was murdered by his son-in-law, the second Tarquin, 534 B.C.

SESOSTRIS, a fabulous king of Egypt, who is said to have extended his conquests over various parts of the world. It is supposed that he at last destroyed himself when borne down by age and infirmities.

SESSA, an Indian philosopher, who is said to be the inventor of the game of chess. When he presented his invention to Scheram, king of India, the monarch, pleased with his ingenuity, desired him to demand for his reward whatever he pleased. Sessa asked only a grain of wheat to cover the first square of the chess board, two for the second, four for the third, and so on in progressive order through the 64 squares. The king regarded the request as unworthy of his merit; but the philosopher persisted in his wishes, and when the numeration began to be made, it soon appeared how difficult it would be to grant it, since all the granaries of the kingdom contained not wheat enough to satisfy the demand. The king, still more pleased with the wisdom of the philosopher, conferred on him the highest honours of his kingdom.

SESTO, Cesare de, a painter of Milan, the best of the pupils of Leonard de Vinci. His pieces are deservedly admired for elegance, correctness, and taste. He died at the beginning of the 16th century.

SETTLE, Elkanah, an English poet. He was born at Dunstable, Bedfordshire, 1648, and educated at Trinity college, Oxford, which he left without a degree to reside in London. He there soon distinguished himself by his writings, became the city poet with a pension, and composed some dramatic pieces of merit, besides the Medal Reversed—Azariah and Hushai, against Dryden, in which he showed himself a very formidable rival, and "left the palm of superiority," says Johnson, "undecided." His Cambyses, king of Persia—Fatal Love—Empress of Morocco, &c. are mentioned with applause. He was known also as a violent supporter of the measures of administration, in whose favour he was a weekly journalist. He died in the Charterhouse, 1724, comptroller of the play-house.

SEVERUS, Lucius Septimius, a Roman emperor after Pertinax. He took as his partner on the throne, Albinus, whom, after the defeat and death of his other rival.

Pescennius Niger, he cut off in Gaul. He was a brave general, and made many conquests in the east, and built the Roman wall in Britain, to check the invasions of the Picts. He died at York, A. D. 211. Two other emperors of that name afterwards perished by the hand of their enemies, one by Maximin, 307, the other 461.

SEVERUS, Cassius, a Roman orator, banished into Crete by Augustus, on account of the severity of his satirical declamations.

SEVERUS, Sulpitius, an historian, called the Christian Sallust. His Historia Sacra is an elegant work, from the creation to the year of Christ, 400, edited Padua, 1741, two vols. 4to. He died 420.

SEVERUS, L. Cornel. a Latin poet in the age of Augustus.

SEVERUS, a heretic of the second century. He maintained with Tatian two opposite principles, one good, and the other evil, &c.

SEVIER, John, governor of Tennessee, was an officer in the revolutionary war, and distinguished himself in the battle with the party under colonel Ferguson, at King's Mountain, in 1780. He and colonel Shelby, afterwards governor, were the principal projectors of that enterprise against the British commander, and it was by their exertions chiefly that the force was raised and organised. In consideration of his services on that occasion, the legislature of North Carolina, in 1813, voted him a sword. He commanded the forces which defeated the Creek and Cherokee Indians in 1789. He was afterwards a general in the provisional army, and in 1798, governor of Tennessee. In 1815, he was a representative in congress from that state, and one of the commissioners appointed to ascertain the boundary line, and died while engaged in that service at Fort Decatur, in October, 1815.  L.

SEVIGNE, Mary de Rabutin, marquise de, a lady, eminent for her wit, and for her virtues, daughter of Celsus Benignus de Rabutin, baron of Chantal, was born 1626. She, when little more than a year old, lost her father at the defence of Rhé against the English, and in 1644, she married the marquis of Sevigné, who, seven years after, fell in a duel. Thus left a widow with a son and daughter, she devoted herself to the education of these children, and had the happiness to find her labours most successfully rewarded. Her daughter married, in 1669, the count de Grignan, governor of Provence, and it was at her house that she caught a fever, and died 1696. She was a woman of great mental powers, and her letters are considered as the best models for epistolary writings. They have frequently been published; and the best edition is in 8 vols. 12mo. Paris, 1754. In the celebrated dispute about the merit of the ancients and the moderns, she said that the ancients are the finest, and we are the prettiest. A collection of anecdotes, moral sentiments, and apophthegms, extracted from her letters, and called Sevigniana, appeared at Paris, 1756. Her son was one of the admirers of Ninon de l'Enclos, and disputed with Madame Dacier about a passage in Horace. He died 1713.

SEVIN, Francis, member of the academy of belles lettres, and keeper of the MSS. in the king's library, was born in the diocess of Sens, and died 1741. He went, in 1728, with Fourmont to Constantinople, in search of MSS. and returned with 600, among which, however, were none of the ancient Greek authors. His letters in this voyage have appeared in Svo. and they contain interesting accounts about the Levant, Egypt, &c. He wrote a Dissertation on Menes, or Mercury, the first king of Egypt, 12mo.—and communications to the memoirs of the academy.

SEWALL, Samuel, chief justice of the supreme court of Massachusetts, was born in England on the 28th March, 1652, and came with his father to America in 1661. The family resided at Newbury, the settlement of which the father had commenced at a former visit to Massachusetts. Young Sewall was educated at Harvard college, where he obtained his degree in 1671. He became a magistrate in 1684, and by the charter of 1692, was appointed a member of the council. He was made a judge the same year, and in 1718, chief justice of the superior court. He retained that office, as well as that of judge of probate, till 1728, when his age induced him to resign. He died on the first of January, 1730, in his seventy-eighth year. He was distinguished for learning, integrity, and piety.  L.

SEWALL, Stephen, chief justice of the superior court of Massachusetts, was born at Salem, December, 1702, and graduated at Harvard in 1721. He studied theology, and preached a short time with popularity, but at length devoted his attention to law. In 1728, he was appointed tutor of the college, and held the place till 1739, when he was elected to a seat on the bench of the supreme court, a station for which he was eminently fitted by talents and learning. He was distinguished by great quickness of apprehension, extent of research, and solidity of judgment. In 1752, he was appointed chief justice, and held that office, together with a seat in the council, to which he was soon after advanced, till his death in 1760. He held the first rank among his associates in genius, knowledge, excellence of character, and popularity.  L.

SEWALL, Samuel, LL.D. chief justice of Massachusetts, who was born at Boston, December, 1757, and graduated at Harvard college in 1776, devoted himself to the law, and soon became eminent in the profession, particularly as a commercial lawyer, for which department he had qualified himself by an unusual attention to the laws of nations. He settled at Marblehead. In 1797, and again afterwards he was elected a member of congress, and was distinguished in that body for his knowledge of commercial law. In 1800 he was placed on the bench of the supreme judicial court, and continued in that station till 1813, when he was appointed chief justice, but enjoyed the office only till the 8th of June, 1814, when he died suddenly at Wiscasset, where the gentlemen of the bar erected a monument to his memory. Judge Sewall possessed a fine understanding and fancy. He was high minded and quick in his feelings, and correct in his principles. As an advocate, he was learned, ingenious, and often highly eloquent; and as a judge, characterized by integrity and firmness, and was highly popular both with the bar and people.

SEWALL, Stephen, first Hancock professor of Hebrew in Harvard college, was born at York, Maine, in 1734, and graduated at Harvard, in 1761. The following year he was appointed teacher of Hebrew in that institution, and on the establishment of a Hebrew professorship was elected to fill it. He was inaugurated June 17th, 1765, and retained the office till 1785. He was an accomplished scholar. He published a Hebrew Grammar, and wrote a Chaldee and English Dictionary, which is preserved in manuscript. He died in 1804.

SEWALL, Samuel, brother of the preceding, possessed a vigorous and inventive mind, was well versed in the principles of mechanics and natural philosophy, and had a happy talent for applying his knowledge to useful purposes. He was the author of a number of improvements in the arts, among which is the construction of bridges on piles, which he first introduced at York, in 1761. He afterwards superintended the erection of the Charlestown bridge on the same plan. He was distinguished for piety, benevolence, and public spirit. His death took place at York, July 21, 1815, in the 92d year of his age.

SEWARD, Thomas, an English divine, who obtained Eyam rectory, in Derbyshire, and a prebend of Lichfield cathedral. He wrote some poems, which are preserved in Dodsley's collection, and he also published an edition of the plays of Beaumont and Fletcher, and a treatise on the conformity between the pagans and the Romish church. He died at Lichfield, 1790, aged 82. He was father to Anna Seward, whose poetical and literary abilities are so well known.

SEWARD, William, a native of London, son of a brewer. He was educated at the Charter-house, and at Oxford, which he quitted without a degree. As he possessed a comfortable fortune, he devoted himself to literary ease, unambitious of honours, or of any distinction, except what private merit and virtue confer. He was fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian Societies, and was highly and deservedly respected for urbanity of manners, and entertaining anecdotes by those who had the pleasure of his acquaintance. He published Anecdotes of Distinguished Persons, extracted from scarce curious books, 5 vols. 8vo. to which he afterwards added a supplement, in two vols. under the title of Biographiana. This worthy man died 1799, aged 52.

SEWARD, Anna, was the daughter of the Rev. Thomas Seward, rector of Eyam, in Derbyshire, and canon residentiary of Lichfield. She was born in 1747, and though she evinced a poetical taste in early life, she was discouraged from indulging it by her parents. At length, on contracting an acquaintance with lady Miller, she ventured to become a contributor to her vase, at Bath-Easton. After this, she published elegiac poems on major André and captain Cook, and in 1782, her poetical romance of "Louisa." In 1799 she printed a collection of sonnets; and in 1804, a "Life of Dr. Darwin," in which she asserted her claim to the first fifty lines of that author's "Botanic Garden." She died at Lichfield, March 25, 1809, leaving her works to sir Walter Scott, and her letters to Mr. Constable, who published them with a biographical preface.—W. B.

SEWELL, William, a quaker, born at Amsterdam, of English parents, 1654. He practised as a surgeon at Amsterdam, but distinguished himself chiefly by his excellent History of Quakers, written in Low Dutch, 1717, and translated into English, in folio. He wrote besides, a Dictionary of the English and Low Dutch Languages, 4to.—a Dutch Grammar—a Translation of Josephus—of Kennet's Roman Antiquities. He died at Amsterdam, 1720.

SEWELL, George, an English poet and physician, born at Windsor, and educated at Eton, where his father was treasurer and chapter clerk to the college, and at Peter-house, Cambridge. He afterwards studied medicine at Leyden, and then settled at Hamstead, where for some time he met with great success, but died poor, 8th Feb. 1726, and was meanly buried, unattended by friends or relations, though universally and deservedly esteemed. He wrote seven controversial pamphlets—the Life of John Philips—a Vindication of the English Stage—sir Walter Raleigh, a tragedy, acted at Lincoln's inn fields, 1719—

SEXTUS EMPYRICUS, a Pyrrhonian philosopher, preceptor to the emperor Antoninus. As he was one of those philosophers who guided their practice by experience, his followers have received from him the name of Empyrics. Two of his compositions are extant.

SEXTUS, a native of Cheronea, nephew of Plutarch. He was a stoic philosopher, and was preceptor to L. Verus, and to Marcus Aurelius.

SEYDLITZ, Frederic William, baron de, one of the famous generals of the great Frederic, born in the dutchy of Cleves. He distinguished himself in the war of Silesia, and ably covered the retreat of the Prussian army after the fatal day of Kolin. He was at the battle of Rosbach, and defeated the Russians at Zorndorf. He died 1773, covered with glory, and his memory was honoured by the gratitude of Frederic, who raised him a public statue at Berlin.

SEYMOUR, Edward, protector of the kingdom, and guardian to Edward VI. to whom he, as brother of Jane Seymour, was uncle, was created viscount Beauchamp, and duke of Somerset. Though he discharged his trust as protector with ability, and supported the reformation, he was violently opposed by the party of the earl of Warwick, and at last brought to the scaffold as guilty of high treason, a disgraceful sentence which the young king was prevailed upon to confirm, 1552. His brother Thomas, admiral of England, had, by his unnatural influence, suffered on the scaffold three years before, on a charge of high treason.

SEYMOUR, Anne, Margaret, and Jane, daughters of Edward, duke of Somerset. They were known for their poetical talents. Their 104 Latin distichs on the death of Margaret de Valois, queen of France, were translated into French, Greek, and Italian, printed at Paris, 1551, 8vo. but possess little merit. The eldest, Anne, became wife of the earl of Warwick, and afterwards of sir Edward Hunton. Margaret died single, and also Jane, who was maid of honour to queen Elizabeth.

SEYMOUR, lady Arabella, daughter of Charles Stuart, earl of Lennox, the youngest brother of Darnley, the husband of Mary of Scots. Her mother was a daughter of sir William Cavendish, of Chatsworth, Derbyshire. Her affinity to the royal family proved the source of her misfortunes; and in those turbulent times, the measures planned by the disaffected for her elevation to the English throne, procured her severe imprisonment under Elizabeth. Soon after James's accession, she privately married William Seymour, the second son of lord Hertford: but as this was without the permission of the king, she was seized, and with her husband conveyed to the tower. They escaped after a year's confinement; but though the husband made good his flight on board a vessel, lady Arabella was taken, and four years after, 1615, died in her melancholy prison.

SFONDRAI, Francis, senator of Milan, and state counsellor to Charles V. was born at Cremona, 1494. He was employed by the emperor as ambassador to Sienna, but after his wife's death he took orders, and was raised by Paul III. to the bishopric of Cremona, and to the dignity of Cardinal. He died 31st July, 1550, aged 56. He wrote the Rape of Helen, a poem. He left two sons, Paul, and Nicolas, who obtained the tiara under the name of Gregory XIV. One of his grandsons, Paul Æmilius, became a cardinal, and died at Rome, 14th Feb. 1618, aged 57.—Another, Celestin, became also a cardinal, and abbot of St. Gal. He died at Rome, 4th Sept. 1696, aged 53, author of Gallia Vindicata—Nodus Prædestinationis Dissolutus, 4to. &c.

SFORZA, James, a renowned warrior, surnamed the Great, born at Cotignola, 1639. He was the son of a labourer or shoemaker, and attracted by the fame of a military life, he joined a party of soldiers passing through his village, and gradually rose by valour to command. He was for some time in the service of Joan, queen of Navarre, and was afterwards made gonfalonier of Rome, by Pope John XXIII. and also count of Contignola. His abilities were now displayed in the defence of Naples, when besieged by Alphonso, king of Arragon, whom he obliged to raise the siege. In his pursuit of the flying enemy, he was unfortunately drowned in the river Pescara, 1424, after rendering his name illustrious, and laying the foundation of the noble house of the Sforzas, dukes of Milan.

SFORZA, Francis, natural son of the preceding, became an eminent statesman and a great general. He served under his father, and was present at his melancholy death, and continued the war against Alphonso with equal success. He afterwards served Joan of Naples, and also her successor René, duke of Anjou, and his reputation in arms was such that he was chosen by the pope, the Venetians, and Florentines, general of their armies against the duke of Milan, though he had married his daughter. The death of the duke changed the face of affairs, 1447, Sforza was appointed general of the Milanese against Venice, and after a successful campaign, he turned his arms against his employers, and obliged them to name him duke of Milan, an honour which he deserved for his services, and which was acknowledged by the French king, and to which afterwards was added the sovereignty of Genoa. This celebrated warrior died 1466.

SFORZA, Galeas-Marie, succeeded his father Francis, as duke of Milan; but his debaucheries, and his ferocious conduct, revolted the affection of the people, and he was assassinated ten years after, 25th Dec. 1476. His son John Galeas Marie, was for a little time under the guardianship of his mother, but the government was seized by his uncle Ludovic-Marie, a monster of iniquity, who administered slow poison to him, and cut him off in 1494. The murderer was seized by Louis de Tremouille, the general of Lewis XII. and carried to France, where he died in prison, 1510.

SFORZA, Catharine, natural daughter of Galeas-Marie, mentioned above, acquired celebrity for her courage and presence of mind. She married Jerome Riario, prince of Forli, who was some time after assassinated by Francis Ursus, who had revolted against the government of her husband. She in consequence fell with her children into the hands of the enemy; but found means to escape to Rimini, which still continued attached to her person, and she defended it with such determined bravery against her enemies, who threatened to put to death her children if she did not surrender, that at last she restored herself to sovereign power. She afterwards married John de Medicis, and again in 1500, ably defended Forli, against the attacks of the duke of Valentinois, the illegitimate son of Alexander VI. When obliged to surrender she was taken prisoner, and confined in the castle of St. Angelo, but soon after set at liberty, though never restored to her dominions. This heroic woman died soon after.

SFORZA, Isabella, of the same family as the preceding, was distinguished for her learning in the 16th century. Her letters, possessing great merit, were published at Venice by Hortensio Lando, 1549.

SHADWELL, Thomas, an English poet, descended of a good family, and born at Stanton hall, Norfolk, 1640. He was of Caius college, Cambridge, and afterwards of the middle temple, but after travelling abroad, he turned all his attention to dramatic composition, and acquired great celebrity. His plays are 17 in number, besides other poems, &c. At the revolution he was made historiographer to the king, and poet laureat in the room of Dryden, who resented the appointment by the severest satire in his Mack Flecknoe. In spite, however, of the attacks of malevolence, he possessed merit, and wrote with great ease, and rapidity, so that he composed his "Psyche" in five weeks. He was an amiable man, and died 6th Dec. 1692, it is said, in consequence of a large dose of opium, taken by mistake. His funeral sermon was preached by Dr. Brady, and a monument erected to his honour in Westminster abbey, by his son sir John. The best known of his plays were his Virtuoso—the Gentleman of Alsace—Epsom Wells—the Misanthrope—the Lancashire Witches, &c. comedies. There was a Charles Shadwell, either his son or nephew, whose plays, especially the Fair Quaker of Deal, are mentioned with credit. He died 1726.

SHAKSPEARE, William, the illustrious poet of Nature, was born of a respectable family at Stratford-on-Avon, April, 1564. His father was engaged in the wool trade, and of ten children the poet was the eldest. He was early removed from the grammar-school of Stratford, as business, and not learning, was to form the employment of his future life; but after being some time engaged in his father's trade, he married, at the age of 17, the daughter of Hathaway, a neighbouring farmer, and became master of a family, and a parent. At this time he unfortunately formed a connexion with some dissipated companions, and in a thoughtless hour he accompanied them in deer-stealing, in the park of sir Thomas Lucy, of Charlecote, near Stratford. The offence was again and again repeated, and a prosecution was consequently begun against the depredators; but the young poet, instead of conciliating the baronet by submission, wrote a ballad upon him, with such satirical bitterness, that it became unsafe for him to remain at Stratford. He fled therefore to London, to escape the law, and soon enrolled himself among the players. For a while he maintained himself in the character of an inferior performer; but the acquaintance which he formed with the stage was productive of the noblest consequences. Though his name appears in the list of the actors of those days, it is not ascertained that he rose to any eminence in the profession, as Mr. Rowe asserts, that the ghost in his own Hamlet was the highest character which he could venture to perform. He was, however, born not to act, but to delineate characters, not to play the hero, or the tyrant of a foreign muse, but to create characters and beings of his own, and with the pencil of nature, to portray in the most glowing colours the various emotions of the heart. Without patronage from the great, and an exile from his native town, the poet at last burst to eminence and fame. His plays became popular, several of them were performed before the court, and Elizabeth was so pleased with his Falstaff, in the two parts of Henry IV. that she wished to see the valiant knight in love, and the hint produced the inimitable drama of the Merry Wives of Windsor. These meritorious exertions for the entertainment of the court, and of the public, no doubt raised patrons to the poet; but little is known of them, and the name of lord Southampton only is mentioned, as distinguishing him with his friendship and confidence. It is said that in one instance the generous lord gave the poet one thousand pounds, to enable him to complete a purchase which he had made. For some years Shakspeare, as allied with Ben Jonson, and the other wits and poets of the age, was manager of the playhouse, and after he had acquired a competent fortune, he retired to his native town, where he lived respected and beloved by his neighbours. To the house which he purchased, he gave the name of New Place, and he had the good fortune to save it from the flames, in the dreadful fire which nearly consumed the whole of the town, in 1614. The mulberry-tree which he planted in his garden afterwards became an object of veneration, and when cut down by the hands of an avaricious proprietor, the wood was fashioned into various utensils, which sold for a high price, and were preserved with more than common affection, as a precious memorial of the immortal planter. Shakspeare made his will in the beginning of 1616, and died the 23d of April of the same year, in the 53d year of his age. He was buried in the tomb of his ancestors, on the north side of the chancel in Stratford great church, where the following Latin distich is written on the elegant monument against the wall, and the English lines on the grave-stone beneath:

Judicio Pylium, Genio Socratem, arte Maronem,

Terra tegit, populus mæret, Olympus habet.

Good friend, for Jesus' sake forbear

To dig the dust inclosed here.

Blest be the man that spares these stones,
And cursed be he that moves my bones.

In 1740 a noble monument was raised to his honour in Westminster abbey, and that his fame, and not public charity, should contribute to the due homage, the collection was made from the admission to see his Julius Cæsar acted at Drury Lane, 28th April, 1738. Shakspeare had three daughters, the youngest of whom was made, with her husband, executrix to his will, and inherited the best part of his estate. One of the daughters died young; Judith married Mr. Thomas Quincy, and Susanna, Dr. Hall, a physician. As an author, Shakspeare deserves particular praise, as in originality, sublime conception, force and delineation, he has surpassed the poets of every age, and every country; and he therefore is properly the boast and the glory of England. In the midst, however, of his great and incomparable beauties, there are many blemishes; and while he scatters roses with a full and liberal hand, he is careless of the offensive weeds which accompany his exuberant profusion. His plays, of which it is scarce possible to trace the history, or to discover the date, except from a few scattered passages, have been often published, and by their own intrinsic merit, have given celebrity even to those who, as editors, have bestowed some labour in the elucidation of them. The first collection of them was in 1623, in folio, by two of his friends and fellow-comedians, Heminge and Condell, and afterwards they engaged the attention of Rowe, in 1714, of Pope in 1721, of Theobald in 1726, of Hanmer in 1744, in 6 vols. 4to., of Warburton in 1747, of Dr. Johnson in 1765, of Steevens in 1766, of Capell in 1768, of Johnson and Steevens in 1778, besides more modern editions, and the publication of separate plays.

SHARP, James, a Scotch prelate, born of a good family in Banffshire, 1618. He was educated at Aberdeen, and early distinguished himself as an able opponent against the covenanters. He was in England, where he was noticed by Hammond, Taylor, and others, and in consequence of his great abilities, was patronised by lords Rothes and Crauford, and obtained some preferment. He was the advocate of a presbyterian party for Scotland before Cromwell, and acquitted himself of his duty with great dexterity, and when Monk was commander in Scotland, he used the talents of Sharp in his attempts to settle the ecclesiastical affairs of the kingdom, and in soliciting the approbation of the exiled king to the proposed measures. At the restoration he became a convert to the principles of the church of England, and was made archbishop of St. Andrews; but this elevation was considered as a shameful dereliction of his friends, and the covenanters were determined to sacrifice him to their resentment. His life was attempted in 1668, by a fanatic preacher; but in 1679, nine assassins proved more successful, and he was barbarously murdered on Magaskmoor, three miles from St. Andrews. He was then in his coach with his daughter, but neither her cries, nor his entreaties, availed, and he fell, pierced with 22 wounds.

SHARP, John, an English prelate, born at Bradford, Yorkshire, 1644. He was educated at Christ college, Cambridge, and after he had taken orders he became chaplain to sir Heneage Finch, attorney-general. In 1672 he was made archdeacon of Berks, and in 1675, prebendary of Norwich, and then rector of St. Bartholomew near the Exchange, and afterwards of St. Giles in the Fields. In 1679 he took his degree of D.D. and in 1681, was made dean of Norwich, by the interest of his friend Finch, now lord chancellor. In 1686 he was suspended, for preaching in favour of the Anglican church against popery; but though the bishop of London, who refused to pronounce against him, was himself suspended, the storm of disgrace passed away, and he was restored to favour, and in 1689, promoted to the deanery of Canterbury. Though he refused some of the bishoprics vacated in consequence of the refusal of the bishops to take the oath of allegiance to William, yet he consented to succeed to the see of York, on the death of Dr. Lamplugh. He preached the sermon on Anne's coronation, and was made privy counsellor. He died at Bath, 1713, and was buried in York cathedral, where an inscription by Dr. Smalridge records his merits. His sermons, in 7 vols. 8vo. have been published since his death, and are deservedly popular.

SHARP, Thomas, D.D. younger son of the preceding, was born in Yorkshire, and educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship, 1728. He became chaplain to archbishop Dawes, of York, and obtained the rectory of Rothbury, Northumberland, a prebend of Durham, and the archdeaconry of Northumberland. He died 1753, aged 65. He is author of two Dissertations on the Etymology of the Hebrew words Elohim and Berith, 8vo.—besides Discourses on the Antiquity of the Hebrew Tongue and Characters, &c. He was father to Granville Sharp, so eminently known as an elegant classical scholar, and as the author of Remarks on the Definitive Article in the Greek Testament, 12mo.

SHARP, Granville, was born at Durham, Nov. 10th, 1735. He was not bred to the law, but to the trade of a linen-draper on Tower-hill, and while in that situation studied the Greek and Hebrew languages, without a master. His first exertion in favour of the oppressed Africans was in the case of Jonathan Strong, originally a slave to one Lisle of Barbadoes, by whom he had been abandoned in London. By the united care of Mr. Sharp and his brother, this poor negro was restored to health and liberty. Some other instances of a like kind occurred before the decision of the court of king's bench, in the case of the negro Somerset, in 1772. Mr. Sharp also interested himself in behalf of the Caribs, in the island of St. Vincent's, and other humane objects. To his different accomplishments it should be added, that he was an excellent performer on the harp, and had an admirable skill in drawing caricatures. He was a zealous supporter of the Bible society, and no less zealous against the claims of the catholics. Though a firm friend to church and state, he carried his notions of parliamentary reform to a visionary extent.

W. B.

SHARPE, Gregory, D.D. F.R.A. S.S. an able divine, born in Yorkshire, 1713. From Hull school he came to Westminster under Dr. Friend, and then completed his education at Aberdeen, under Dr. Blackwell. Soon after his return to England he took orders, and then became minister of Broadway chapel, St. James's, and chaplain to the king, and next succeeded Dr. Nicolls, as master of the Temple. He died 8th Jan. 1771, highly respected for his virtues, and his extensive knowledge of oriental literature. He wrote a Review of the Controversy about the Demoniacs of the New Testament, 8vo.—Two Dissertations on the Origin of Language, and the Power of Letters, with a Hebrew Lexicon, 8vo.—Defence of Dr. Clarke against Leibnitz, 8vo.—Dissertation on the Origin and Structure of the Latin Tongue, 8vo.—Two Arguments in Favour of Christianity—Hobbes's Introduction to Universal History, translated, 8vo.—Sermons, 8vo. &c.

SHARROCH, Robert, a clergyman's son, born at Adstock, Buckinghamshire, and educated at Winchester school, and New College, Oxford, where he took the degree of LL.D. 1661. He was prebendary and archdeacon of Winchester, and rector of Bishop's Waltham, Hants, and of Horewood, Bucks, and died 1684, much respected as a divine, and as a man. He wrote the History of the Propagation and Improvement of Vegetables, 8vo.—Hypothesis de Officiis secundum Humanæ Rationis Dictata, seu Naturæ Jus, unde Casus Conscientiæ, &c. 8vo. against Hobbes—Judicia, seu Legum Censuræ, de Variis Incontinentiæ Speciebus, &c. 8vo.—De Finibus Virtutis Christianæ, in several discourses, 4to.

SHAW, Thomas, D.D. a celebrated traveller, born at Kendal, Westmoreland, 1692, and educated there, and at Queen's college, Oxford. When he took orders, in 1713, he received the appointment of chaplain to the English factory of Algiers, and during his residence there, he made various excursions to examine the curiosities and antiquities of the country. In his absence he was chosen fellow of his college, and returned in 1733, and the next year took his doctor's degree, and in 1740, was appointed principal of Edmund hall, and vicar of Bramley, Hants. He was afterwards regius professor of Greek, and died 15th Aug. 1751. His travels were published at Oxford, in 1738, and have often been reprinted. They contain an interesting and accurate account of Barbary and the Levant, and particularly of Egypt, and were ably vindicated by the author, against the attacks of Dr. Pococke.

SHAW, Cuthbert, an English poet, son of a shoemaker, born at Ravensworth, Yorkshire, 1739. He was brought up at Scorton school, where he became assistant, and afterwards also at Darlington grammar-school; but this laborious confinement was too much for his volatile spirit. He therefore removed to London, in quest of easier employment, and went afterwards to Bury, and engaged as actor in the Norwich company. In 1760 he performed sir George Wealthy, in the Minor, under Foote, at the Hay-market, and the next year he appeared on the boards of Covent-garden, but met with little public encouragement. After a life of chequered adventures and misery, he died 1771, in very indigent circumstances. He was author of Liberty, 4to. 1756—Odes on the Four Seasons, 4to. 1760, published under the name of Seymour—the Four Farthing Candles, 4to. 1762, a poem which attacked and ridiculed Lloyd, Churchill, Colman, and Shirley—the Race, a satirical poem on the chief poets of the time, 1666—a Monody on his Wife, whom he lost 1768, soon after his marriage. He wrote also an Account of the Beaume de Vie, a quack medicine, of which he was proprietor.

SHAW, John, a native of Durham, educated at Queen's college, Oxford, and Brazen-nose. He was rector of Walton, Northumberland, in 1645, and at the restoration, obtained St. John's chapel, in Newcastle. He published, No Reformation of the established Religion, 8vo.—and some Tracts against Popery, and died 1689.

SHAW, Samuel, a native of Repton, Derbyshire, educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree. He was for some time master of Tamworth grammar-school, and then removed to Mosely, and afterwards to Long Whatton, Leicestershire. Though ejected from his ecclesiastical preferment for non-conformity at the restoration, he obtained, in 1666, the school of Ashby-de-la-Zouch, where he collected a very respectable number of pupils. He died 1696, aged 61. He wrote the Voice of One crying in the Wilderness, 8vo.—Emanuel, a moral treatise, 8vo.—the True Christian's Test, or Meditations—a Latin Grammar—Words made visible, or Grammar and Rhetoric, and the Different Humours of Men, two comedies, acted by his pupils.

SHAW, Peter, author of the Practice of Physic, 2 vols. 8vo.—a Course of Chymistry, 4to.—an edition of Bacon's Works, 5 vols. 4to. was a member of the London college of physicians, and of the Royal Society, and a respectable practitioner, and died 1763.

SHAW, Stebbing, a native of Stowe, Staffordshire, educated at Repton school, and Queen's college, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship, and took his master's degree. He travelled in 1787, through the Highlands of Scotland, and the next year visited the West of England, of which two journeys he published an account separately, of no great merit. In 1789, he was engaged in the Topographer, which contained extracts from curious works preserved in the British museum; but this work was discontinued in 1791. The first volume of his History of Staffordshire, a work of considerable merit, and of great labour, appeared 1798, folio, and three years after, the first part of the second volume was published. This respectable divine, who had, in 1799, succeeded to the living of Hartshorn, Derbyshire, on his father's death, died 1803, aged only 41.

SHAW, George, an eminent naturalist, was born at Berton, in Buckinghamshire, of which parish his father was vicar in 1751. At the age of 14, he went to Magdalen-hall, Oxford, where, in 1772, he took his master's degree; after which he entered into orders, and became assistant to his father. His predilection for scientific pursuits, however, induced him to relinquish the clerical profession, and after studying at Edinburgh, he took his degrees in medicine at Oxford; where also he stood candidate for the botanical professorship; but lost it in consequence of his having been ordained. He now settled in London; and on the formation of the Linnæan Society was chosen one of the vice presidents. While the Leverian Museum existed, he delivered lectures there on natural history, and he afterwards published a description of that collection in English and Latin. He also conducted some popular periodical works, as the "Naturalist's Miscellany," and the "Speculum Linnæum, or Linnæan Zoology." In 1789, he was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society, and in 1791, appointed librarian and assistant keeper of natural history in the British museum; where, in 1807, he became the principal in that department. He died July 22, 1813. His other works are—1. The Zoology of New Holland. 2. Cimelia Physica. 3. General Zoology, 7 vols. 4to. 4. Zoological Lectures, 2 vols. 8vo. 5. An Abridgment of the Philosophical Transactions, in conjunction with Drs. Pearson, Hutton, &c. 6. Papers in the Linnæan Transactions.—W. B.

SHEBBEARE, John, a native of Bideford, Devon, educated there under Mr. Mudge, the master of the grammar-school. He was apprenticed to an apothecary, and after being in business in Bristol, he removed in 1740 to London. His politics, however, were unfriendly to the government, and he went to Paris, where he was admitted member of the academy of sciences, and presented to a doctor's degree. On his return to England, he published the Marriage Act—and Lydia, or Filial Piety, two satirical novels, of little merit, and in 1759, his seventh Letter to the People of England, exposed him to the resentment of government, and he was pilloried. On the accession of George III. he obtained a pension from lord Bute, and laying aside his attachment to the Stuart family, he defended the conduct of government in several pamphlets, especially at the beginning of the American war. He wrote also a History of Jersey, 2 vols. 8vo. 1771, in which he, with partial severity, attacks the conduct of the chief magistrate of the island—History of the Sumatrans, 2 vols.—Chrysal, or the Adventures of a Guinea, 4 vols.—Practice of Physic, 2 vols. 8vo.—Letters on the English Nation, under the name of Angeloni, 2 vols. 8vo. &c. He died 1788, aged 79.

SHEFFIELD, John, duke of Buckinghamshire, a respectable poet, and able statesman, born 1650. Though he lost his father when only nine years old, his education was not neglected; but assiduity brought to perfection the naturally strong powers of his mind. After travelling into France, he went as volunteer in the second Dutch war, and afterwards made a campaign in the French service. He was next intrusted by Charles II. with the defence of Tangier, on the coast of Africa, which was threatened by the Moors. He soon became a great favourite at court, though his violent partiality for the princess Anne, afterwards Queen, involved him in temporary disgrace. Under James II. he was privy counsellor, and lord chamberlain; and though he did not at first approve of the revolution, he afterwards warmly supported the measures for proclaiming William king, against those who wished to appoint Mary sole sovereign. Under Anne he was raised from the rank of an earl to that of duke of Normandy, and afterwards of Buckinghamshire, and was made steward of the household, and president of the council. On George's accession, he retired from the court, and died 24th Feb. 1720-1. He was buried in Westminster abbey, where the Latin inscription on his monument, written by himself, created some controversy, and drew upon him the reproach of skepticism. Though three times married, he left only one son, who died at Rome in 1753, and in whom the title became extinct. His works were elegantly published, in 1729, in 2 vols. 8vo. the first of which contains his Essay on Poetry, his Rehearsal, and other poems, written on several occasions, and the second his prose works, consisting of essays, speeches, historical memoirs, dialogues, letters, &c. His learning and abilities have been greatly praised by his contemporaries; but later writers affect to speak with indifference of his compositions, and consider the adulations of Prior, Dryden, Addison, Garth, and Pope, as paid more to the nobleman, and the favourite of courts, than to the man of poetical merit and deserved literary fame.

SHELDON, Gilbert, a distinguished prelate, born at Stanton, Staffordshire, 1598. He was admitted at Trinity college, Oxford, 1613, and in 1622 was elected fellow of All-Souls. He afterwards took orders, and was made prebendary of Gloucester, and recommended by his patron, Lord Coventry, to Charles I. who gave him the living of Hackney and other preferments. In 1635, he was elected warden of his college, and would have risen to higher honours, had not the civil wars prevented his elevation. His attachment to the king rendered him suspected by the parliament, and he was deprived of his preferment, imprisoned with Dr. Hammond, and, when set at liberty, forbidden to visit his royal master at the Isle of Wight. He retired to Shelston, Derbyshire, and at the restoration recovered his ecclesiastical appointments, and was soon after made master of the Savoy, dean of the chapel royal, and successor to Juxon in the see of London. In 1663 he became primate, and in 1667 succeeded lord Clarendon as chancellor of Oxford. His freedom with the king, in advising him to put away his mistress, Barbara Villiers, proved so offensive that he retired from the court, and spent the rest of his days at Croydon, where he died 9th Nov. 1677, aged near 80. His only publication was a sermon, preached before the king at Whitehall. His munificence was very great, he expended not less than 66,000*l.* in charitable purposes, and of his splendid donations, the theatre at Oxford is a very noble and lasting monument.

SHELLEY, George, writing-master at Christ's hospital, was very eminent as a penman, and died 1736, aged about 70, at his house the Hand and Pen, Warwick-lane. He published the Penman's Magazine, 1708, 32 plates, engraved by Nutting—Natural Writing, 1714, 26 plates, engraved by Bickham—Moral Sentences for Schools, &c.

SHENSTONE, William, a celebrated English poet, born at Hales-Owen, Shropshire, Nov. 1714. He was taught to read by an old dame, whose kind services he has transmitted to posterity in his School-Mistress, and from his earliest years he showed a great fondness for books. After being at Hales-Owen school, and at Solihul, under Mr. Crompton, he removed in 1732 to Pembroke college, Oxford, a respectable society, among which he derived both delight and advantage, as he continued his name among them 10 years, though he took no academical degree. After wandering about and visiting sometimes London, sometimes Bath, yet without forgetting the muses, he settled, 1745, on his estate, on the death of his friend Mr. Dolman, who had, with indefatigable attention and strict integrity hitherto regulated his affairs. But his object here was not to increase his income, but to improve the beauties of his estate; and by degrees, through inattention and injudicious expense, he brought on himself pecuniary distress, and probably hastened his own death by the difficulties and anxieties which surrounded him. He was a lamp, as his biographer observes, that spent its oil in blazing. He was attacked by a putrid fever, which proved fatal, at the Leasowes, 11th Feb. 1763. He was buried in Hales-Owen churchyard by the side of his brother. The tenderness and generosity of his character are mentioned with deserved applause. He was kind to all within his influence, but so irascible, that if once offended, he was not easily appeased. He was inattentive to economy, and careless of his expenses, but his life was unstained by any crime. His mind was not very comprehensive, nor his curiosity active, and he esteemed light those parts of learning which he had not cultivated. His works have been published by Dodsley, in 3 vols. 8vo. consisting of 26 elegies, songs, odes, ballads, moral pieces, &c. written with ease, elegance, and simplicity. His epistolary correspondence afterwards appeared by Mr. Hull, in 2 vols. 8vo. and recollections of his life have been published by his venerable friend Mr. Graves.

SHEPREVE, John, an eminent scholar, born at Sugworth, near Abingdon, Berks, and educated at Corpus Christi, Oxford, where he became Greek reader. In 1538 he succeeded Wakefield as university professor of Hebrew, and acquired great popularity as a lecturer. He had a most retentive memory, and wrote verses with astonishing rapidity, often 100 during the vacant hours of the day. He died at Amer-sham in Buckinghamshire, 1542. He wrote Summa et Synopsis Novi Testamenti Ducentis Sexaginta, Distichis Comprehen-sa, 8vo.—Hippolytus Ovidianæ Phædræ Respondens, &c. His nephew William was a Roman Catholic, who wrote some religious pieces, and died at Rome 1593.

SHERARD or SHERWOOD, William, an eminent botanist, born in Leicestershire, and educated at Merchant Tailors' school, and St. John's college, Oxford, of which he became fellow, and where he took the degree of bachelor of laws 1677. During his travels abroad as tutor to some noblemen, he visited the chief places of Europe, and was honoured with the acquaintance of the great Boerhaave, of Tournefort, and other learned men. He obtained the appointment of consul at Smyrna in 1702, and during 16 years residence in this distant region, he applied himself to form a valuable collection of the plants of Asia Minor and Greece, and to examine every thing remarkable as a subject of antiquity, or of natural history. After visiting England, he returned to the continent, and ascended the Alps in search of plants, where he nearly escaped being shot by a peasant, who mistook him for a wolf as he was lying on the ground. On his return to England he was attended by Dillenius, to whom he gave an honourable asylum at his seat at Eltham, and whom he appointed first professor in the botanical professorship which he founded at Oxford by the bequest of 3000*l.* He had been admitted doctor of laws at Oxford, in 1718, and he died 10 years after, much respected for his benevolence and liberality, as well as his great learning and extensive information. He published Herman's Paradiscus Batavus, 4to.—Schola Botanica, 12mo. which appeared under the name of Wharton, and he made some valuable communications to the philosophical transactions. His brother James was an apothecary, and afterwards a physician, who acquired also some celebrity as a botanist, and died 1741.

SHERBURNE, sir Edward, an English writer, born at St. Giles, Cripplegate, London, 1618, and educated at Mr. Furnaby's school. He travelled abroad, and, in 1641, succeeded on his father's death as clerk of the ordnance, from which he was soon afterwards ejected by the House of Lords for adhering to the king. He then joined the king, and was at the battle of Edgehill, and retired with Charles to Oxford, where he was made master of arts. When Oxford surrendered to the parliament, he, after suffering much in his property from parliamentary prosecution, went to London, and lived for some time in the Middle Temple. In 1652 he travelled abroad with sir John Coventry, and at the restoration was reinstated in his clerkship, and knighted by Charles II. On the abdication of James II. he was deprived of his offices, and lived the rest of his life in retirement, and died 4th Nov. 1702, aged 85. He translated some of Seneca's tragedies into English, besides the Sphere of Manilius, Theocritus's 16th Idyllium, and poems and other translations.

SHEREBATOF, Prince, a Russian nobleman, author of a Journal of Peter the Great, 2 vols. 4to.—the Russian History from 1114 to 1472—the Life of Peter the Great—History of Russia, from the earliest times, 4 vols. 4to. a work valuable for its accuracy and impartiality.

SHERIDAN, Thomas, a divine and poet, born about 1684, in the county of Cavan, Ireland. Though his parents were in indigent circumstances, he received by the kindness of his friends a good education, which he finished at Dublin college, where he took the degree of D.D. He afterwards kept a school in Dublin, and obtained celebrity by the number of his scholars, and the diligence and abilities with which he instructed them. He was presented by the friendship of Swift to a living in the South of Ireland, worth about 150*l.* per ann. but his sermon on these words, "Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof," preached at Cork on the anniversary of the first George's birthday, seemed so pointed at the politics of the times, that he ruined all hopes of further preferment. He afterwards exchanged his living for that of Dunboyne, and again exchanged that for the free-school of Cavan; but his temper was fickle, and dissatisfied with the air, or more properly with the inhabitants of his new appointment, he sold it for 400*l.* He died some time after in indigent circumstances, 10th Sept. 1738, aged 55. Lord Corke describes him as better acquainted with books than men, as slovenly, indigent, and cheerful, yet in the midst of his poverty still a quibbler, a punster, a fiddler, and a wit, who never suffered the day to pass without a rebus, an anagram, or a madrigal. He published a prose translation of Persius, with judicious notes, 12mo. 1739, and his correspondence with Swift, &c. has also appeared in Swift's Miscellanies.

SHERIDAN, Thomas, son of the preceding, was born at Quilca in Ireland, and educated at Westminster school and Dublin university, where he took the degree of B.A. He early showed a partiality for the stage, and in 1743, when 22 years old, he personated Richard III. in the Smock-alley theatre, after which he exhibited on the boards of Covent-garden. In 1744, he undertook the management of the Dublin stage, but he met with such opposition in his attempts to reform abuses and to introduce regularity, that a conspiracy was formed against him, and a mob threatened the demolition of his theatre. Thus driven from Dublin he became an itinerant lecturer on elocution, and he acquired such celebrity in this new method of conveying instruction, that not only his own university, but Cambridge, honoured him with the degree of M.A. About 1760, he again had recourse to the stage, and appeared at Drury-lane theatre with great applause, and had the interest to obtain a pension from the government. In 1767, he engaged himself at the Haymarket, and for a while amused the town with his Attic Evening, an entertaining medley of singing, music, and repetition. He quitted the stage in 1776, to succeed Garrick as manager of Drury-lane, but he resigned three years after, and again had recourse to his lectures and literary labours. He died at Margate 1783, aged 67. He was author of several works, the best known of which are, a Dictionary of the English language, in which he attempts to establish a permanent standard of pronunciation, 4to. and 2 vols. 12mo.—British Education, or the Source of the Disorders of Great Britain, 8vo.—Lectures on the Art of Reading, 8vo.—Dissertation on the Causes and Difficulties of learning the English Tongue, 4to.—Course of Lectures on Elocution, &c. 4to.—Life of Swift prefixed to his works, 8vo.—Elements of English, 12mo.

SHERIDAN, Richard, the third son of the preceding, was born at Dublin in 1751. He was educated at Harrow school, after which he became a student of the Middle Temple; but was never called to the bar. In 1775 he brought out "The Rivals," a comedy which proved very successful; but was exceeded in popularity by the comic opera of the "Duenna;" as that also was by the "School for Scandal." While the former of these dramas was delighting the town, the author became a partner in Drury-lane theatre, by the purchase of Garrick's share of the patent, in conjunction with Dr. Ford and Mr. Linley. The other dramatic pieces of Sheridan, about this period, were the "Trip to Scarborough," and the "Critic." In 1779 he wrote a Monody on the death of Garrick, which was spoken by Mrs. Yates in the character of the Tragic Muse. In 1780 Mr. Sheridan was returned to parliament for Stafford; and soon became distinguished as a powerful speaker on the side of opposition. When the Rockingham party came into power, he was made one of the under-secretaries; and in the coalition administration, he was appointed secretary to the treasury. That post, however, he did not hold long, and during the whole of Mr. Pitt's ascendancy, the talents of Sheridan were displayed in combating that great statesman. On the trial of Hastings, he acted a prominent part; and his eloquence had an electrifying effect on many of his auditors. On the death of Mr. Pitt, he became treasurer of the navy, but another change taking place, he was again seated on the opposition side of the house; where, however, his influence was visibly lessened by the decay of his powers; and he retired from parliament some time before his death, which happened July 7, 1816. Besides the pieces already noticed, he was the author of part of "A translation of Aristænetus;" a farce called "St. Patrick's Day;" a "Letter to Henry Dundas;" "Pizarro;" a play altered from Kotzebue; and poems. Mr. Sheridan was twice married, first to Miss Linley, a celebrated singer; and the second time to Miss Ogle, daughter of the dean of Winchester.—W. B.

SHERIDAN, Frances, was grand-daughter of sir Oliver Chamberlaine, and first distinguished herself as author of a pamphlet in the dispute which Mr. Sheridan had with the Dublin people with respect to his theatre. The little performance excited the attention of the manager, and he soon after married her. She proved a most amiable character in all the relations of life, and not only possessed very engaging manners, but joined the greatest benevolence of heart to respectable literary talents. After suffering much from a lingering illness, she retired for the recovery of her health too late to the south of France, and died at Blois 1767. Her Sydney Bidulph is a romance of great merit, and her Nourjahad deserves equal commendation. She wrote besides, two comedies, the Discovery—and the Dupe.

SHERLOCK, William, D.D. an English divine, born at Southwark 1641, and educated at Eton and Peter-house, Cambridge. In 1669, he obtained the rectory of St. George's, Botolph lane, London, and a prebend of St. Paul's, and soon after was chosen master of the Temple. He was an able advocate for the church of England against the papists, but at the revolution he refused to take the oath of allegiance, though he afterwards complied, and published an account and vindication of his conduct, which was severely censured by the nonjurors. In 1691, he was made dean of St. Paul's, and died at Hampstead, 19th June, 1707, and was buried in St. Paul's. He had a controversy with Dr. South about the Trinity, and also published various sermons, and some pamphlets on death and the last judgment. Burnet says that he was a clear and strong writer, but that the contempt he expressed for his adversaries made him pass for an insolent and haughty man.

SHERLOCK, Thomas, D.D. a learned prelate, son of the preceding, and born 1678. He was of Catherine hall, Cambridge, of which he was elected master. He was early eminent for his learning, and the policy and wisdom of his conduct at the head of a house, procured him from Dr. Middleton the title of the principal champion and ornament of the church and university. He succeeded his father as master of the Temple, and this honourable appointment was held by father and son for more than 70 years. He displayed great abilities in the vindication of the corporation and test acts against the attacks of bishop Hoadley; and also in the defence of the use and intent of prophecy, in six discourses delivered at the Temple, in answer to Collins, and also in an able vindication of the miracle of Christ's resurrection against the attacks of Woolston. He wrote besides other controversial works; but his sermons in 4 vols. 8vo. are particularly valuable, as compositions of elegance, ingenuity, and crudition. In 1728, Dr. Sherlock was made bishop of Bangor, and in 1734, was translated to Salisbury, but in 1747, on the death of Potter, he refused the offer of the metropolitan see, in consequence of a severe illness under which he laboured, though the following year he accepted the diocese of London. He died July 18, 1761, in his 84th year. His private character was adorned with the purest virtues of benevolence and humanity. He sent 2000 copies of his excellent discourse to the colonies and settlements of America, and presented his valuable library to Catherine hall, where he founded a scholarship and the office of a librarian.

SHERLOCK, Richard, a native of Oxton in Werral, Cheshire, educated at Magdalen hall, Oxford, from which he removed to Trinity college, Dublin. He obtained some preferment in Ireland, but during the civil wars returned to England, and was made chaplain to one of the king's regiments. At the restoration he took the degree of D.D. at Dublin, and was presented by his patron lord Derby, to the valuable living of Winwick, Lancashire, where he died 20th June, 1689, aged 76. The best of his works are, the Practical Christian, 8vo. to the sixth edition of which his life is prefixed by bishop Wilson—Confessions, Meditations, and Prayers, for the Sacrament, 8vo.—pieces against the quakers, &c.

SHERMAN, John, eminent as a divine and mathematician, was born at Dedham, England, in 1613, and educated at Cambridge. He came to America in 1634, and preached at Watertown. He afterwards went to Connecticut, and was both a minister and magistrate. He at length returned to Watertown, and was settled in the ministry, and preached with great acceptance. He was also chosen a fellow of Harvard college, and delivered lectures for a long time, which not only the students, but many from the neighbouring towns, attended. He was highly accomplished as a preacher, and as a general scholar, and particularly distinguished for his knowledge of mathematics. He died in 1685.

SHERMAN, Roger, senator of the United States, was born at Newton, Massachusetts, April 19th, 1724, and rose by the force of his superior genius to distinction as a lawyer and a statesman without the advantages of a collegial education. He removed in 1743 to New-Milford, Connecticut, and in 1754 commenced the practice of law. In 1761 he removed to New-Haven, and four years after was appointed a judge of the county court, and in 1776 advanced to a seat on the bench of the superior court, and was also chosen a member of the council. He was elected a member of congress in 1774, and continued to hold a seat in that body, except when excluded by the law, requiring a rotation.

He was one of the committee appointed to draw up the declaration of independence, in 1776, and signed that instrument. He was a conspicuous member in the convention, which formed the constitution of the United States. In 1791 he was chosen a senator, and retained the station till his death, in 1793, in his seventy-third year. He possessed a mind of uncommon strength, perspicuity, and judiciousness. He was a profound and sagacious statesman, an able and upright judge, and an exemplary Christian. He received an honorary diploma of Master of Arts from Yale college, and was for many years treasurer of that institution.  L.

SHERINGHAM, Robert, an able divine. After being ejected for attachment to the king, from his fellowship of Gonvil and Caius college, Cambridge, he retired to Holland, but at the restoration he recovered his ecclesiastical honours. He wrote, de Anglorum Gentis Origine Deceptatio, Svo.—the King's Supremacy asserted—Joman, a Hebrew book, translated into Latin, with notes, 4to.—sermons, 4to. &c.

SHERWIN, John Keyse, a wood-cutter in Sussex, whose skill as an engraver was accidentally called forth at the house of Mr. Mitford. Viewing with astonishment the pieces which some of the family were engaged in drawing, he was asked to use the port-crayon, and his untutored hand produced such a drawing, that the society of arts, to whom it was presented, voted him the silver medal. Removed from his humble occupation he became the pupil and the friend of Bartolozzi, and his engravings acquired deserved popularity. This excellent artist died 1790. The most admired of his engravings is Moses among the bullrushes.

SHIPLEY, Jonathan, an English prelate, born 1714. He took his degrees at Christ-church, and upon entering into orders obtained a living, and in 1743, was made prebendary of Winchester. After travelling, in 1745, with the duke of Cumberland as his chaplain, he was promoted in 1749 to a canonry at Christ-church, became dean of Winchester in 1760, and in 1769 bishop of St. Asaph. He was author of some elegant verses on the death of queen Caroline, and published besides, some poems and sermons preached on public occasions, and died 1788.

SHIPPEN, Edward, LL.D. chief justice of Pennsylvania, was a descendant from Edward Shippen, the first mayor of Philadelphia, and was born in that city, February 16th, 1729. He studied law in the office of Mr. Francis at Philadelphia, and finished his education at the temple in London, where he was admitted a barrister. On his return to America he devoted himself to his profession, and such was his reputation that at the age of twenty-four he was appointed prothonotary of the supreme court, and judge of the admiralty court for the province. He was afterwards a member of the proprietors and governor's council until the revolution, when these offices ceased. Soon after that event he was appointed president of the courts of quarter sessions, for the county of Philadelphia. In 1792 he was appointed a judge of the supreme court, and in 1799 chief justice of the supreme court of Pennsylvania. This office he resigned in 1805. He died April 16th, 1806. He was an accomplished commercial lawyer, and in all that related to the practice and process of the courts, possessed a knowledge singularly accurate and extensive.  L.

SHIPPEN, William, M.D. first professor of anatomy in the university of Pennsylvania, was a native of that state, and educated at Princeton, where he was graduated in 1754. His medical education, which he commenced in Philadelphia, he completed in Edinburgh. After his return he settled in Philadelphia, and in 1764 began the first course of lectures on anatomy delivered in the country. The next year he was elected a professor in the medical school, which he assisted in establishing. This school, which at its commencement consisted of but ten students, contained, before he left, two hundred and fifty. In 1777 he was appointed director general of the medical department in the army. He resigned his professorship in 1806, and died July, 1808, at Germantown, in his seventy-fifth year.  L.

SHIRLEY, sir Anthony, a native of Wiston, Sussex, educated at Oxford, where he became fellow of All Souls. He studied the law, but afterwards accompanied sir Philip Sydney to the Low countries, and in 1596, he was sent to America by queen Elizabeth. He next attended Essex when lord lieutenant of Ireland, and was knighted there, after which he went abroad, and became so much respected for his knowledge and acquirements that the king of Spain created him a grandee of the kingdom, and appointed him admiral of his fleet. James I. jealous of these honours bestowed on one of his subjects, recalled him home, but he had the boldness to refuse, and died in Spain 1640, aged 75. He was author of a Voyage to America, inserted in Hackluyt's collection—Account of Muley Hamet's Elevation to the Kingdom of Morocco, &c. 4to.—History of his Travels into Persia, 4to.—Voyage over the Caspian and through Russia, in Purcha's Pilgrims—History of his Ambassies, fol. &c. His brother Robert accompanied him into Persia, and settled there, and became so great a favourite at court, that the emperor not only employed him as his ambassador to Poland and to England, but gave him his own niece in marriage, and loaded him with honours and opulence. He died it is said of a broken heart on his return to Persia, 23d July, 1627, aged 63, because he had been treated as an impostor at the English court by his predecessor the Persian ambassador, and because he was not able to receive in Persia that satisfaction which he expected. His widow came to Europe, and fixed her residence at Rome.

SHIRLEY, Thomas, of the same family as the preceding, was born at Westminster, and educated at Magdalen college, Oxford. He took his medical degrees in France, and became physician to Charles II. and died 1678. He was author of a philosophical essay on the probable causes whence stones are produced in the greater world, &c. Svo. a curious performance.

SHIRLEY, James, an English dramatic writer and poet, born in St. Mary Woolchurch parish, London, 1594. He was educated at Merchant Tailors' and St. John's college, Oxford, which he left without a degree to go to Cambridge, where he took his degrees. He afterwards took orders, and served a cure near St. Alban's, but changed his religion for that of Rome, and then settled at St. Alban's, where he kept a school, from which he removed to London. There he devoted himself to writing plays, and was patronised by Charles's queen, but when the civil wars broke out, and plays became unpopular among the republican fanatics, he had recourse to education for support, and kept a school at Whitefriars with some reputation. The fire of London, which robbed him of his property, proved so terrific to him, that both himself and his wife died in consequence of fright within 24 hours of each other, and were buried in the same grave, 29th Oct. 1669. He wrote 37 plays, besides a volume of poems, and was patronised by lord Newcastle. There was a Henry Shirley, who lived in his time, and wrote the Martyred Soldier, a tragedy, &c.

SHIRLEY, William, governor of Massachusetts, was an Englishman by birth, and educated a lawyer. He came to Boston about the year 1733, and employed himself in the profession till 1741, when he was appointed governor. He held that office till 1757. It was during his administration that Louisburg was taken, though he was not the projector of the expedition, nor its decided advocate, till its successful issue was known. In 1754 he rendered himself highly popular by refusing his assent to the excise bill. In 1755 he was appointed commander-in-chief of the British forces in America, and proceeded to Oswego in an expedition against Niagara, but was the next year superseded by Abercrombie. He was soon after recalled from Massachusetts to England, and appointed governor of the Bahama islands. In 1770 he returned to Massachusetts, and resided at Roxbury till his death the next year. He possessed a strong mind, great firmness, diligence, and address, and rendered many important services to the colony.  L.

SHORE, Jane, wife of Matthew Shore, a goldsmith in Lombard-street, is known in history as the mistress of the voluptuous Edward IV. To great and fascinating personal charms she added some of the best qualities of the heart, and though she had not virtue enough to withstand temptation, she was benevolent and humane in the midst of a debauched court. After the king's death she lived with lord Hastings, and when he fell under the tyranny of the third Richard, she was seized as an accomplice in his pretended conspiracy, and felt all the resentment of the usurper. She was accused of witchcraft, and did open penance for her adulteries, and was also plundered of her property by the artful Richard. She survived her misfortunes, and was seen by sir Thomas More, in the reign of Henry VIII. poor, decrepit, and shrivelled, without the least traces of that beauty which once commanded the admiration of a court. She perished of hunger in a ditch, called from her Shore ditch, though Stow relates that that street bore the name before her time.

SHOVEL, sir Cloudesley, a celebrated English admiral, born of obscure parents, about 1650. He was apprentice to some mean trade, which he quitted for the sea, and by application, bravery, and steadiness, he gradually rose from a cabin boy, under sir Christopher Mynns, to consequence and command. He served under sir John Narborough, at the attack on Tripoli, 1674, and by being sent on shore, had the opportunity, while negotiating with the dey, of observing the weak parts of the enemy's fortifications and defence, and in consequence directed the blow which completely destroyed all their ships. This brave conduct procured him the command of a ship; and, after other eminent services, especially in Bantry bay, he was knighted by king William at Portsmouth, and conveyed, in 1690, that king and his army into Ireland. He was engaged as one of the rear admirals at the battle of la Hogue, and afterwards had an important command before Vigo, and in the Mediterranean before Malaga. In 1705 he was again sent against Spain, and after an unsuccessful attack upon Toulon, he returned home. His fleet, however, unfortunately was wrecked on the Scilly islands, 22d Oct. 1705, and in his ship, the Association, perished with him his sons-in-law, and other persons of distinction. His body was next day cast on shore, and robbed of a ring by some fishermen, who buried him in the sand. The ring discovered his quality, the fishermen pointed out where they had deposited the body, which was dug up and brought to Portsmouth, and thence conveyed to London and buried in Westminster abbey, where a monument by the queen's directions records his meritorious services. He married his patron, sir John Narborough's widow, by whom he left two daughters.

SHOWER, John, a nonconformist divine, educated by Doolittle, Islington, whom he succeeded in his school. He was minister of Jewin-street congregation, 1687, and died at Hoxton, 1718, aged 58. He wrote Sacramental Sermons—Reflections on Time and Eternity, works of great merit.

SHREWSBURY, Elizabeth, countess of, daughter of John Hardwich, Esq. of Derbyshire, married, at the age of 14, Mr. Barley, and after a widowhood of 12 years, William Cavendish, of Chatsworth, the ancestor of the Devonshire family. She had three sons, one of whom was earl of Devonshire, and the other father to the duke of Newcastle, and three daughters, one of whom was ancestor to the Pierreponts, dukes of Kingston, and another wife of Charles, duke of Lenox, uncle to James I. Her third husband was sir William St. Low, and her fourth, lord Shrewsbury. She was for 17 years the keeper of Mary, queen of Scots, and died 1607, aged 87, and was buried in All-Hallows church, Derby.

SHUCKFORD, Samuel, rector of Shelton, Norfolk, canon of Canterbury, and chaplain to the king, was author of a History of the World, Sacred and Profane, Introductory to Prideaux's Connexions—and the Creation and the Fall of Man, and died 1754.

SHUTE, Josias, archdeacon of Colchester, rector of St. Mary Woolnoth, London, was author of a folio volume of sermons on the 16th chapter of Genesis. He was a most eloquent preacher, and much admired, but he was exposed to great persecution during the civil wars for his attachment to the king. He died 1643.

SHUTE, Samuel, governor of Massachusetts, was the son of a highly respectable family of London, and served for some time under the duke of Marlborough as a lieutenant-colonel. He arrived at Boston with his commission as governor, the 4th of October, 1716. His administration was agitated by a strong opposition, on account of his endeavours to obtain a fixed salary. He embarked for England on the 1st of January, 1723, and exhibited complaints against the colony which drew on it the censure of the king and council. He remained in England, enjoying a pension from government, till his death in 1742.

in his eighty-ninth year. He was characterized by uprightness, generosity, and love of liberty.  L.

SHUTER, Edward, a good actor, son of a chairman. From a tapster in a public house, and a marker at a billiard table, he was engaged by Rich in some of the humbler offices of the theatre of Covent-garden, from which he rose by application to consequence and the greatest popularity. His abilities appeared in low comedy and characteristic humour, and his Justice Clack, and his Midas, were long and deservedly popular characters. He died 1776.

SIBBALD, sir Robert, a physician, born near Leslie, Fifeshire, 1643, and educated at St. Andrews. He travelled into France, and on his return to Scotland projected the establishment of the college of physicians at Edinburgh, and the plantation of the botanical gardens. In 1686 he embraced the catholic religion, but afterwards read his recantation in Liberton church, with great contrition for his folly. He was the first professor of medicine at Edinburgh, and in consequence of his great reputation was knighted by Charles II. He died 1720. He was author of Scotia Illustrata, fol.—Phalainologia Nova, 4to.—History of the Sheriffdom of Fife and Kinross—Miscellanea Quædam Eruditæ Antiquitatis, 1710—and contributions to the philosophical transactions.

SIBRECHTS, John, a painter, born at Antwerp. He lived for some time in London, where his abilities were greatly patronised, and died 1703, aged 78. His landscapes and cattle possessed peculiar beauty.

SIBTHORPE, Robert, a native of Lincolnshire, educated at Oxford. He became rector of Water Stratford, Buckinghamshire, and vicar of Brackley, Northamptonshire, and by his zeal in the cause of Charles I. and by the eloquence of his preaching, he obtained a prebend in Peterborough cathedral, and Burton Latimer's rectory, Northamptonshire. These preferments were taken from him after the destruction of royalty, and his discourses were exposed to the severest censures of the house of commons. He died 1662.

SIBTHORPE, John, a native of Lincolnshire, educated at Oxford, where he took his medical degrees, and where he succeeded his father, Dr. Humphrey Sibthorpe, as professor of botany. In his zeal in the service of botany he travelled twice to Greece, and made a valuable collection of curious plants, which will appear before the public in a splendid form under the title of Flora Græca. Dr. Sibthorpe published Flora Oxoniensis, and died 1796, leaving a handsome bequest to the university for the encouragement of his favourite science.

SICINIUS DENTATUS, a warrior, surnamed from his valour the Roman Achilles. He won 121 battles, and received 45 honourable wounds in the service of his country. He was murdered by App. Claudius, B.C. 405.

SICIOLANTE, Girolamo, a native of Sermoneta in Italy, distinguished as a landscape and historical painter. He died 1550, aged 46.

SIDNEY, Henry, an English statesman, descended from a noble family in Surrey. He was a student of New college, Oxford, 1513, and afterwards became the favourite of Edward VI. who knighted and employed him as ambassador to France. Under Mary he was made collector of the revenues in Ireland, and on Elizabeth's accession he became lord president of the marches of Wales, and knight of the garter, and in 1568 was sent to Ireland as lord deputy to the queen. He was a man of great integrity, and married Mary, eldest daughter of John Dudley, duke of Northumberland. He died 1586, and was buried at Penshurst, in Kent, a manor which had been formerly granted to him by the queen. He promoted the printing of the Irish statutes, while in the government of the country. Some of his letters to his son have been published.

SIDNEY, sir Philip, son of the above, was born at Penshurst, 1554, and named Philip in honour of the king of Spain, the husband of queen Mary. He was educated at Christ church, Oxford, and at the age of 17 he began his travels. At Paris he escaped the dreadful massacre of St. Bartholomew by flying into the house of the English ambassador, and afterwards extended his travels to Germany, and returned to England after an absence of four years. In 1576 he was sent by the queen to Rodolph, emperor of Germany, and on his return visited Don John of Austria, and William, prince of Orange, by both of whom he was received with great courtesy. In 1579 he ventured to oppose the queen's marriage with the duke of Anjou, and soon after, in consequence of a quarrel with Vere, earl of Oxford, he absented himself from the court, and in his retirement wrote his famous romance, called Aradia. He was in 1582 knighted, and three years after, while he meditated an expedition to America, with Drake, he was sent by the queen to take upon himself the government of Flushing. The next year he surprised Axil, and behaved with such prudence, moderation, and wisdom, that he was proposed as a fit candidate for the vacant crown of Poland; but Elizabeth opposed it, observing, that England ought not to lose the jewel of the times. This brave man received a mortal wound in the thigh at the battle of Zutphen, 22d Sept. 1586, and was carried to Arnheim, where he expired the 16th Oct. following. As he lay, bleeding on the field of battle, and was going to taste a bottle of wine, which his attendants had procured to refresh him, he saw a wounded soldier carried by, and casting a longing look on the liquor, upon which he ordered it to be given to him, adding, "poor fellow, thy necessity is greater than mine!" His body was brought home, and buried in great funeral pomp in St. Paul's cathedral; but though no monument was placed over him, his memory was embalmed by an epitaph written in his honour by king James, and by verses from the universities of Oxford and Cambridge. This Marcellus of England was universally respected as a statesman, soldier, and scholar, and the panegyrics passed on him in his time have been re-echoed by the succeeding ages. Besides his popular Aradia, which passed through eight editions before the end of 1633, he wrote an Apology for Poetry, 4to.—sonnets—Ourania, a poem—and other pieces.

SIDNEY, Algernon, an English gentleman, second son of Robert, earl of Leicester, by Dorothy, daughter of the earl of Northumberland, was born 1617. In the civil war he espoused the party of the parliament, and was colonel in the army, and one of the king's judges, though he did not sit on the tribunal. Like Brutus, whom he made his model, he was the ardent friend of a pure republic, and therefore retired in disgust on Cromwell's usurpation. He was, however, in 1659, employed as ambassador to Copenhagen, to mediate a peace between the kings of Denmark and Sweden, but at the restoration he refused to return, and continued abroad till 1677. He was then permitted to return, and obtained the king's pardon, on condition of demeaning himself in a quiet and obedient manner. He was in 1683 accused as being concerned in the Rye-house plot, and was arraigned in November before judge Jeffreys, and found guilty. He appealed to the king, and complained of the partiality of the judge, who had tried him with a packed up jury, but all was in vain, and he was beheaded on Tower-hill, 7th Dec. 1683. His attainder was reversed as cruel and illegal in the first year of William and Mary. This strong republican was, as Burnet observes, a man of extraordinary courage, steady even to obstinacy, sincere, but of a temper that could not bear contradiction, a Christian in principle, but averse to all public worship, and an enemy to every thing that looked like monarchy. He left behind him Discourses upon Government, published 1698 and 1704, a work of such merit, that some authors declare, that the composition fully compensates for the loss of Cicero's six books de Republicâ.

SIDONIUS APOLLINARIS, a Roman, born at Lyons, and after holding various civil offices, raised to the see of Auvergne against his will. He was a pious and exemplary prelate, and died 1488, aged about 58. He left epistles, poems, &c. edited 1652, 4to.

SIGEBERT, king of the East Angles, mentioned with great praise by Bede, on account of his learning and piety. He was a munificent prince, and founded several churches, schools, and monasteries, and at last abdicated the throne to live in a cell at Burgh castle, Suffolk. He was assassinated 642.

SIGEBERT, third son of Clotaire I. inherited the kingdom of Austrasia, and married Brunehaut. He was a valiant prince, and was successful against the Huns, who invaded his kingdom, and against Chilperic, king of Soissons, his brother-in-law. He was assassinated 575, by the intrigues of Fredegonde, the wife of Chilperic.

SIGEBERT the Younger, son and successor of Dagobert in the kingdom of Austrasia, died 650, aged 20.

SIGISMUND, king of Burgundy, after his father Gondebald, 516, abjured the Arian principles of his father. He was engaged in war with Clodomir, son of Clovis, who took him, and threw him into a well, to perish, with his wife and family, at Orleans, 523.

SIGISMUND, son of Charles IV. was born 1368. He was made king of Hungary, 1386, and emperor of Germany, 1410. After re-establishing, by wise regulations, the peace of the empire, he prevailed upon pope John XXIII. to tranquilize the church by the calling of a council, which was to sit at Constance. Sigismund visited France and England to facilitate the peaceful measures which he proposed to establish, and was present at the deliberations of the council, which assembled in 1414, and consisted of 18,000 ecclesiastics, and 16,000 nobles. His conduct, however, was treacherous in suffering John Huss and Jerome of Prague, to be thrown into the flames, after he had solemnly granted them a safe passport; and this violation of faith armed against him the bravest of his subjects. The Hussites, headed by the brave Ziska, obtained a victory over the forces of the emperor, 1419, and sixteen years elapsed in civil discord and bloodshed, before peace could be restored in Germany. Sigismund died 8th Dec. 1437, aged 70.

SIGISMUND I. king of Poland, surnamed the Great, son of Casimir IV. was elected to the throne, 1507. After establishing order in his dominions, and restoring Poland to its ancient glory, he defeated the Muscovites, and drove them from Lithuania, and afterwards retook from the Teutonic knights the cities of Poland which they had seized, and in 1531 cut to pieces an army of Wallachians that had invaded his territories. This brave and wise prince died 1548, universally respected, aged 82.

SIGISMUND II. son and successor of the preceding, was surnamed Augustus, because born in the month of August. He offended his subjects by elevating to the throne Barba Radzivil, his mistress, whom he had married privately, and he reconciled the nobles only by permitting them to send their sons to be educated in the universities of Germany, which, before his reign, was not permitted. Heretical opinions were thus introduced into the kingdom, which he was not able to repress. He died 7th July, 1572, and as he had no issue, the race of the Jagellons became extinct. He was succeeded by the duke of Anjou, afterwards Henry III. of France.

SIGISMUND III. son of John III. king of Sweden, ascended the Polish throne 1587, to the exclusion of Maximilian of Austria, who had been elected by some of the nobles. On his father's death, 1594, he went to Sweden to possess himself of the crown; but as he was a determined catholic, the Swedes, who favoured the protestant principles, placed, in 1604, his uncle Charles, the duke of Sudermania, on the throne. These civil dissensions long distracted the kingdom, and by the valour of Gustavus Adolphus, Sigismund was defeated; though in Poland he obtained some advantages over the Muscovites and the Tartars, who had made war against him. He died 1632, aged 66.

SIGNORELLI, Luca, a painter, born at Cortona, 1439. His pictures of naked bodies were so correct and beautiful, that Michael Angelo has copied many of his figures in his Last Judgment. He died very rich, 1521.

SIGONIUS, Carolus, a learned Italian, born at Modena, 1525. His father intended him for a physician, but he preferred literature, to which he assiduously devoted himself. He was professor of Greek at Venice, Padua, and Bologna. He died 1584, aged 60. He wrote several books, the best known of which are, his excellent treatise de Republicâ Hebræorum; de Republicâ Atheniensium; Historia de Occidentis Imperio—de Regno Italiæ; an Ecclesiastical History, Milan, 2 vols. 4to. 1734, &c.

SILHOVETTE, Stephen de, a native of Limoges, who, by his abilities, became master of requests to the duke of Orleans, and afterwards, by the influence of his patron, comptroller-general and prime minister, 1759. His wise attempts, however, to introduce order and economy in the government were ridiculed by the fickle nation, and he retired nine months after from the helm of the state to private life. He died at his seat of Bry-sur-Marne, 20th Jan. 1767, aged 58. He is author of General Ideas on the Chinese Government, 4to.—Political Reflections on Great Princes, from the Spanish of Gracian, 4to.—a translation of Pope's Essay on Man, 12mo.—Miscellanies, &c. from Pope—treatise on Happiness—Union of Religion and Politics, from Warburton, 2 vols. 12mo.

SILIUS ITALICUS, Caius, a Roman poet, made consul by Domitian. He wrote an indifferent poem on the second Punic war, and died A. D. 74, aged 75. He paid particular attention to Virgil's tomb, which was on his estate.

SILVA, John Baptist, a native of Bourdeaux, of Jewish origin. He abandoned the religion of his parents, and studied medicine at Montpellier and Paris, and acquired such celebrity, that the empress of Russia made him liberal offers to settle in her dominions, which he declined. He died at Paris, 18th Aug. 1744, aged 61. He was author of a treatise on the Use of Bleeding, &c. 2 vols. 12mo.—Dissertations and Consultations of Chirac and Silva, 3 vols. 12mo. Memoirs of his Life were published by Brubier.

SILVESTER I. made pope 314, opposed the Donatists at the councils of Arles and Nice, and laboured earnestly to establish order and tranquillity in the church. Under him the Arian schism began first to arise. He died 335.

SILVESTER II. Gerbert, was born of obscure parents at Auvergne. He was educated at the monastery of Aurillac: but the ignorance and the consequent jealousy of his ecclesiastical brothers, drove him to Spain, where his abilities were noticed by the duke of Barcelona, who took him into Italy. Here he was recommended to the emperor Otho, who appointed him abbot of Bobio; but this office he soon quitted and became preceptor to Otho III. He was afterwards in the service of the archbishop of Rheims, and then selected by Hugh Capet to preside over the education of his son Robert, and in reward for his attention, he was, in 992, raised to the see of Rheims. He afterwards became archbishop of Ravenna, and on the death of Gregory V. he was, by the interest of Otho, placed in the papal chair, 999. He died 1003. He was a very learned man, and chiefly skilled in mathematics.

SILVESTER, Israel, an engraver, born at Nancy. His pieces, especially landscapes, were much admired, and he was employed by Lewis XIV. to embellish his palaces with the representation of his conquests. He also taught drawing to the dauphin, and died at Paris, 1691, aged 70.

SILVESTER, Louis, a painter, born at Paris. He was the pupil of Le Brun, and of Boullongne, and evinced superior powers in his profession. After distinguishing himself at home, he was invited by the king of Poland to Dresden, and was honoured with the rank of nobility, and the office of director of the royal academy of painting. After residing 24 years in Saxony, and adorning the palaces of his patron with the noblest works of his pencil, he returned to Paris, and was received with great respect by the king. He died 14th April, 1760, aged 85.

SIMEON STYLITES, a native of Cilicia, who, in his 13th year, left the employment of shepherd to enter a monastery. With the most romantic zeal of religious frenzy, he became the founder of a new sect of devotees, and exhibited himself to his astonished followers on the top of a column 60 feet high, on the mountains of Syria. He died 461, aged 69, of which he had passed 47 on the top of a column exposed to the inclemencies of the air, and of the seasons, and often supporting himself for hours and for days on one foot in his elevated situation. This new mode of mortification had several followers, who were called from the columns, Stylites, and who, like their founder, were said to have frequent visions and communications with heaven.

SIMEON METAPHRASTES, a native of Constantinople, secretary of state to Leo and to Constantine Porphyrogenitus, and author of the Lives of Saints, which he composed at the request of his imperial patron in the tenth century. His work has been translated into French and Latin. He wrote also some verses preserved in the Corpus Poetarum Græc.

SIMIANE, Charles John Baptist de, marquis of Pianeze, after serving in the armies of the duke of Savoy retired to Turin, where he died 1677. He is author of a treatise on the Truth of the Christian Religion, in Italian, translated into French by Bouhours—Piissimi in Deum Affectus, &c.

SIMLER, Josias, a native of Zurich in Switzerland, author of an Abridgment of Gesner's Bibliotheca, folio—of a treatise de Helvetiorum Republicâ, 12mo.—Vallesiæ Descriptio, and other works. He was an able protestant divine, and died at Zurich, 1576, aged 45.—There was an eminent portrait painter of the same family, called John, who was also born at Zurich, and died at Stein on the Rhine, 1748, aged 55.

SIMMONS, Samuel Foart, a physician, was born at Sandwich, in Kent, in 1750. He was educated in France, and afterward went to Edinburgh, from whence he removed to Leyden, where he took his doctor's degree. He settled in London in 1778, and the next year became a fellow of the Royal Society. In 1780 he was elected physician to the Westminster Dispensary, which situation he resigned, on his appointment to St: Luke's Hospital. In 1803 he was called to attend his late majesty, who, on his recovery appointed him one of his physicians extraordinary. In 1811 he retired from St. Luke's, and, for his services, was elected a governor of that institution. He died in 1813. Besides papers in the Philosophical Transactions, and the London Medical Journal, of which he was editor, he wrote "An Elementary Work on Anatomy;" a "Treatise on Consumptions;" and the "Life of Dr. William Hunter."—W. B.

SIMON MACCABÆUS, high priest and ruler of the Jews, 143 B. C. signalized his valour under his brothers Judas and Jonathan, and bravely supported his countrymen against the invasions of the Tyrians and Sidonians. He was unanimously elected chief of his nation at Jerusalem, and immediately employed himself in repairing the fortifications of the cities of Judea, and in obtaining from Demetrius, king of Syria, the confirmation of the privileges and independence of his nation. After defeating the troops of Antiochus Soter, he was basely murdered with his two sons by Ptolemy, his son-in-law, who had invited him to a feast, B. C. 135.

SIMON, surnamed Zelotes, an apostle of our Saviour, who, according to some, preached the gospel in Egypt, Lybia, and Mauritania, and at last suffered martyrdom in Persia.

SIMON, called the brother of Christ, was son of Cleophas, and made bishop of Jerusalem after James, A.D. 62. He was crucified under Trajan, A.D. 107

SIMON MAGUS, a native of Samaria, who was baptized by Philip. Seeing the miracles wrought by the apostles, he wished to obtain the same power, and offered them money, but Peter rejected his bribes, and passed a curse upon him. From this circumstance, the appellation of Simoniac is applied to those who sell or purchase spiritual things. Afterwards Simon became head of a sect, and maintained that the divinity had abandoned the government of the world to a certain number of supernatural beings, whom he called Æons. He next went to Rome, where he acquired great celebrity, and, as some of the ecclesiastical writers assert, he raised himself, by his magical powers, into the air, when by the prayer of St. Peter, he was precipitated to the ground, and broke his legs.

SIMON, Claude Francis, a printer of Paris, who died there 1767, aged 55. He was author of the Knowledge of Mythology, a work, in the first edition, very offensive and licentious, and he wrote besides Minos—and Reciprocal Confidence, two comedies—Memoirs of countess Horneville, a romance, 2 vols. 12mo.—Memoirs of Duguay Trouin, 4to. He also edited Virgil, Terence, and other classics.

SIMON, Thomas, an English engraver in the age of Charles I. He was brought up under Briort, the French artist, and excelled in his profession. The great seal of Cromwell, and the arms of the Commonwealth, were cut by him in a very delicate manner. His brother Abraham, was for some time in the service of Christina, queen of Sweden, and afterwards of Charles II. and died soon after the revolution. He was intended for the church, but he preferred the bent of his genius, and he acquired both opulence and celebrity as a modeller in wax.

SIMON, Richard, a French critic, born at Dieppe, 1638. He became priest of the oratory, which he quitted to study at Paris, but to which he returned about 1660. He again left that society in 1678, and died at Dieppe, April, 1712. He was a man of great critical powers, of extensive learning, and strong judgment. His works are critical History of the Old Testament, 1678, suppressed by the intrigues of the Port Royal—History of the Rise and Progress of Ecclesiastical Revenues, 1684, edited again 1709, 2 vols. 12mo.—Disquisitiones Criticæ de Variis per Diversa Loca et Tempora Bibliorum Editionibus—Answers to Le Clerc, &c.—Critical Dissertation on Dupin's Nouvelle Bibliotheque des Auteurs Ecclesiastiques, &c.—Critical History of the New Testament, 4to.—a New Select Library, pointing out good books in various kinds of literature, &c.—Critical History of the Versions of the New Testament—the New Testament translated into French with Critical Notes, &c. 2 vols. 8vo. &c.

SIMON of Durham, a monk of Whitby convent, and afterwards of Durham, in the reign of Edward III. He wrote a Chronicle, which was published at Oxford by Hearne. He died about 1356.

SIMONET, Edmund, a Jesuit, born at Langres 1662. He was professor of philosophy and theology at Rheims, and at Pont-à-Mousson, where he died 1733. He wrote Institutiones Theologicæ ad Usum Seminariorum, 3 vols. folio, Venice 1731.

SIMONIDES, a poet and philosopher of Cos. His poetry, which was chiefly elegiac, was much admired. He flourished about 480 B. C. Only fragments of his works remain.

SIMONNEAU, Charles, a native of Orleans, who studied the art of designing under Coyvel. He acquired some celebrity as an engraver, and died at Paris, 1728, aged 89. His medals, which were engraved for the medallist history of Lewis XIV. were much admired.

SIMONNEAU, Lewis, an engraver of eminence, who published the History of Printing and Engraving, 1694—and the History of other arts, &c. from 1694 to 1710, 2 vols. folio, with 168 plates, works of merit.

SIMPLICIUS, a native of Phrygia, known as a peripatetic philosopher in the fifth century, and for his commentaries on Aristotle and Epicetetus.

SIMPSON, Edward, a native of Tottenham, Middlesex, educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he took his degree of D.D. He died 1652, at his rectory of Eastling, Kent. He was author of Universal Chronology, in Latin, 1652, reprinted at Leyden, 1739, and Amsterdam, 1752.

SIMPSON, Christopher, author of a Compendium of Practical Music, 8vo. a work of merit, died at the house of his friend and patron, sir Robert Bolles, 1662.

SIMPSON, Thomas, an eminent mathematician, born at Market-Bosworth, Leicestershire, 20th Aug. 1710. As he was intended for the profession of his father, who was a stuff-weaver, he was taught only to read; but the loom was too humble an occupation for him, and the solar eclipse of 1724 roused all his attention to know and to understand how these extraordinary phenomena could be predicted. An accidental acquaintance with an itinerant pedler who pretended to tell fortunes and cast nativities, gave him opportunities of improving himself, and from the books which the modern sage lent him, from Cocker's Arithmetic, a book of Partridge's, &c. he derived much information, and began himself to be the oracle of Bosworth, and its environs. Leaving Leicestershire, he came to London, and worked for some time in Spitalfields, and by his industry was enabled not only to maintain his wife and children, but to purchase books, and to advance his knowledge of mathematics. He next engaged in teaching mathematics, and soon after published Proposals for a new treatise of Fluxions, &c. which at last appeared in 1737. He continued to write on mathematical subjects, and became so well known, that in 1743 he was appointed professor of mathematics at Woolwich academy, and some time after elected member of the Royal Society. In his new appointment he devoted himself with such ardour to the improvement of his pupils, that he gained general esteem by his mildness and the clear and distinct manner of his instruction. His health, however, was weak, and the intenseness of his application still enfeebled it more, so that he sunk into such lowness of spirits that the dropping of a tea-cup terrified him as much as if the house had tumbled down upon him. In this delicate state he was recommended to try the air of his native town; but on his arrival at Bosworth, he gradually grew worse, and died 14th May, 1761. His widow honourably received a pension from government, and handsome apartments near the academy of Woolwich. His other works are a treatise on the Nature and Laws of Chance, 4to.—Essays on Curious Subjects in Mathematics, 4to. 1740—the Doctrine of Annuities and Reversions, &c., with useful tables, 1742, with an Appendix the next year, in answer to de Moivre's objections—Mathematical Dissertations, &c.—a treatise of Algebra—Elements of Geometry—Trigonometry, Plain and Spherical—the Doctrine and Application of Fluxions—Miscellaneous tracts, &c.—papers in the Philosophical Transactions, &c.

SIMPSON, John, a Scotch divine, born near Dumfries, and educated at Glasgow, where he took his degrees in arts. In 1716 he became professor of divinity; but in his lectures he denied the doctrine of the Trinity in Unity, which excited great persecution against him for 10 years, and at last procured his deposition and excommunication from the Scotch church. Queen Caroline had some concern for his sufferings, and procured for him a pension equal to his salary. He died at Edinburgh, 1744, aged 65.

SIMPSON, Robert, an able mathematician, born at Hamilton, 1695, and educated at Glasgow university where he took his degrees in medicine. As he did not succeed in his profession, he applied himself to mathematics, for which he had strong natural abilities, and was appointed mathematical professor at Glasgow, where he died 1765. He published a treatise on Conic Sections—a valuable edition of Euclid, &c. His posthumous works appeared at Glasgow, 1776, in 4to.

SINGLIN, Anthony, a French ecclesiastic, born at Paris. He was at the head of the abbey of Port Royal, and was distinguished for his learning and piety. He died 1664. He wrote Christian Instructions on the Mysteries of Religion, &c. 5 vols. 8vo. a work of merit—Letters, &c.

SIRANI, John Andrew, a painter of Bologna. He was one of the most illustrious of Guido's pupils. His last supper was much admired. He died 1670, aged 60. His daughter Elizabeth excelled as an historical painter. She died 1664.

SIRI, Vittorio, an Italian, who settled at Paris, where he became historiographer to the king, and abbot of Vallemagne. He published Mercury, an historical journal, from 1635 to 1649, 15 vols. He wrote also Memoire Recondite, 3 vols. 4to. &c. and died at Paris, 1685, aged 77.

SIRIES, Violante Beatrice, a native of Florence, who studied painting under John Fraiellini, and acquired celebrity and opulence by her portraits, especially those of the grand duke and of the imperial family at Florence. She died about 1760, aged 50.

SIRLET, Flavius, a celebrated engraver on precious stones, who died at Rome, 1737. He also painted, but his performances as an engraver are particularly admired, especially his representation of the famous groupe of Laocoon, on an amethyst.

SIRMOND, James, an eminent French Jesuit, born at Riom, 1559. He was sent by the Jesuits of his college at Billom, to Paris, where he taught Greek and Latin, and acquired so perfect a knowledge of these languages, that his style for elegance and animation has been universally admired. In 1590, he removed to Rome by order of the general of his society, Aquaviva, and undertook the office of his secretary, in which he was laboriously employed for sixteen years. During his residence at Rome, he became the friend and the counsellor of all the men of learning, and assiduously applied himself to the study of antiquities, and to the examination of MSS. In 1606, he returned to Paris, but Urban VIII. sensible of his merit, sent for him to return to Rome, which Lewis XIII. would not permit. In 1637, he was made confessor to the king of France, after whose death, in 1643, he again returned with pleasure to the tranquillity of an humble life. In 1645, he was at Rome at the appointment of a general of his order, and on his return to France, in consequence of extraordinary exertions to support his opinions in the Jesuits' college, he heated himself too much, which brought on a jaundice, and an improper secretion of bile, of which he soon after died, Oct. 7th, 1651, aged 62. He wrote various pieces on theological subjects, and edited the works of Marcellinus, Theodoret, and Hincmar, the councils of France, &c. amounting to 15 vols. folio. He also assisted Baronius in the composition of his Annals. His character, as drawn by Dupin, is that of an amiable and virtuous man, not more distinguished by extensive erudition than by the most benevolent and mild qualities of the heart. His nephew John was historiographer of France, and member of the academy, and died 1649. He wrote Latin poems—the Life of cardinal d'Amboise, 8vo. &c.

SITGREAVES, John, an officer in the American revolutionary war, was elected in 1784 one of the delegates of North Carolina to congress. In 1790 he was appointed attorney of the United States for North Carolina, and in November following, succeeded Mr. Stokes as judge of the district court for that state. He died at Halifax, March, 1801.

SIXTUS I. pope after Alexander I. 119, died at the end of the year 127.

SIXTUS II. an Athenian, pope after Stephen, 267. He suffered martyrdom in the persecution under Valerian.

SIXTUS III. pope after Celestinus I. 432, engaged in effecting a reconciliation among the divided churches of the East, and died about 440.

SIXTUS IV. Francis Albecola, son of a fisherman of Celles, in the state of Genoa, entered into the order of the Cordeliers, and after being professor of divinity at Padua, and in other Italian universities, he was made provincial of his society. He was raised to the rank of cardinal by Paul II. after whose death he succeeded to the popedom, 1471. He attempted to make a crusade against the infidels, but without success. In 1476, he granted, by a bull, immunities to those who celebrated the feast of the immaculate conception of the Virgin. He was author of some theological tracts, and a liberal patron of the learned, but so easy of access, that he granted often favours to the unworthy, and was imprudently lavish in his kindnesses to his nephews. He died 13th Aug. 1482, aged 71.

SIXTUS V. Felix Peretti, pope, was son of a gardener, and was born Dec. 1521, in the march of Ancona. For some time he kept the sheep and the swine of a neighbouring farmer, and he was at last drawn from his obscurity by a cordelier who had lost his way, and who, pleased with the shrewdness of his remarks, took him with him, and placed him in a mean office in the school of his order. His improvement was here rapid, and he soon embraced the order, became a priest, a doctor, and professor of theology at Sienna, where he took the name of Montalto. Distinguished as a preacher at Rome, Genoa, and other places, he was sent as commissary general to Bologna, and as inquisitor to Venice; but in this last city he behaved with such severity that he was obliged to fly from the public odium. He afterwards went to Spain with Buoncompagno, and was raised to the rank of cardinal by Pius V. On the death of Gregory XIII. the successor of Pius, the opinions of the conclave were divided, and as father Felix was regarded as a man of weak constitution, and delicate habits, he was selected by the opposite factions as a proper person, fit for a few months to settle the dispute of the rival parties. No sooner was the tiara on his head than to the astonishment of all, his weaknesses, hitherto feigned, disappeared; he threw aside the stick on which he leaned, and lifting himself up, he began to sing with the loudest voice, a Te Deum, and displayed in his conduct such activity, that the people could with difficulty believe him to be the same weak, helpless, and languid Montalto. His first care was to destroy the public robbers which infested the ecclesiastical states, and every where justice was administered with impartiality and with celerity. Anxious not only to embellish Rome, but to immortalize his memory, he caused an obelisk to be erected which Caligula had brought from Spain to Rome, and after the labour of four months, this stupendous column, above 100 feet high, was raised at the entrance of the church of St. Peter, and consecrated to the holy cross. He fixed, by a bull, the number of cardinals to 70, and introduced various salutary regulations in the government of the church. He laboured much to improve the collection of the Vatican library; but his popularity was lost in the protection which he wished to afford to Clement, the vile assassin of Henry III. of France. He died 27th Aug. 1590, aged 69, universally detested for his pride and severity; and it is said that his death was hastened by poison. He promoted a new version of the Bible, which appeared in three parts, and one vol. fol. 1590.

SIXTUS, a cordelier of Sienna. He was an able divine, and a great favourite with Pius V. He died at Genoa, 1569, aged 49. He wrote some theological works.

SKELTON, John, an English poet, born in Cumberland, and educated at Oxford, where, in 1489, he was invested with the laurel, a sort of poetical degree, occasionally conferred on the favourite of the muses. He took orders, and became rector of Diss, in Norfolk; but was suspended by his diocesan, for writing loose and satirical poems. His attacks were directed not only against obscure individuals, but against Wolsey, from whose resentment he fled to the sanctuary of Westminster, and the protection of abbot Islip. He died 21st June, 1529, and was buried in St. Margaret's church, Westminster. He is called by some, but on doubtful authority, preceptor, and poet laureate to Henry VIII. His poems consist of satires, sonnets, &c. and also an attack on Lilly the grammarian, which was retorted in similar language. His genius, according to Warton, was suited to the low burlesque, and his poetry abounds not only with obscurity, but with coarse scurrility, and offensive obscenity.

SKELTON, Philip, an able divine, born near Lisburn, in Ireland, 1707. After an education at Trinity college, Dublin, where he took his master's degree, he became curate of Monaghan, and in 1750, obtained the living of Peltigo, in Donegal. In this place his conduct was not only exemplary, but humane in the extreme, so that in a time of scarcity, the charitable pastor even sold his library to supply his indigent parishioners with bread. So much merit did not pass unrewarded; the bishop of Clogher, in 1759, presented him to the living of Decnish, in Fermanagh, and in 1766, to that of Fintona, in Tyrone, where his pulpit eloquence was so powerful, that he is said to have gained over to the church, the dissenters of his district. This worthy and pious divine died in Dublin, 1787. He published three volumes of sermons, which for language, argumentation, and pathos, possess superior merit.—Deism Revealed, 2 vols. 8vo. an excellent performance—besides tracts and fugitive pieces, all of which have been collected in 7 vols. 8vo. An account of his life has been published by Burdy.

SKINNER, Stephen, an English antiquary, born at London, 1662, and educated at Christ church, Oxford, which he left without a degree, in consequence of the civil wars. He studied in various universities of Europe, and travelled over Italy, France, Germany, &c. and after taking a doctor's degree in medicine at Heidelberg, he returned to England, and was incorporated to the same academical honours at Oxford, 1654. He settled at Lincoln, where he practised with great success, and died of a malignant fever, 1667. He was well skilled in oriental literature, and was, as Wood says, a walking library. He wrote, Prolegomena Etymologica—Etymologicon Linguae Anglicanae—Etymologicon Botanicum—Etymologicon Onomation, &c.

SLEIDAN, John, a German historian, born at Sleiden, on the confines of Juliers, 1506. He studied at home, and afterwards at Paris and Orleans, and in 1535, was recommended by his friend and school-fellow Sturmius, to cardinal du Bellay, who settled a pension on him, and treated him with great attention. He was afterwards engaged in negotiations in France and England, and assisted at the council of Trent. He died at Strasburg, where he had settled, and it is said, of a broken heart, in consequence of the loss of his wife, 1556. He was an able and learned writer, and strongly attached to the doctrines of Luther. The best known of his compositions are, "De Statu Religionis et Reipublicae Commentarii, Carolo Quinto Caesare," in 25 books, 1555, a well-written book, translated into various languages—De Quatuor Summis Imperiis Libri tres, a useful work, from which Voltaire drew much information—Froissart's, and Ph. de Comines's histories translated into Latin.

SLINGELAND, John Peter Van, a Dutch artist, born at Leyden, 1640. He was the pupil of Gerard Duow, whom he successfully imitated. He worked slowly, and was engaged three years in a family picture. He died 1691.

SLOANE, Sir Hans, a celebrated physician and naturalist, born at Killileagh, in the north of Ireland, 1660. From his infancy he had a strong propensity for natural history, and to improve himself he came to London, where, in the acquaintance of Ray, and of Boyle, and in the attendance of public lectures on anatomy, botany, and chymistry, he enlarged his faculties, and laid the foundation of future eminence. After four years' residence in London he went to Paris, to attend the hospitals, and the lectures of Tournefort and du Verney, and then extended his inquiries to the south of France, where the acquaintance of Chirac and of Magnol enabled him to collect curious plants, and other natural productions. In 1684 he returned to England, and soon after was particularly noticed by Sydenham, who not only took him into his house, but recommended him to practice. He was about this time elected into the Royal Society, and the college of physicians, and soon after he accompanied, as physician, the duke of Albemarle, who went out as governor of Jamaica. Though only 15 months in the Island, he made such a large collection of plants, not less than 800, as astonished his friend Ray. On his return he was made physician to Christ's hospital, and in 1693, chosen secretary to the Royal Society, whose transactions he superintended and enriched by some original communications. His reputation was now so great as a diligent and judicious collector of natural curiosities, that at the accession of George I. he was created a baronet, and made member of the Paris Royal academy, president of the college of physicians, and successor to the immortal Newton, as president of the Royal Society. At the age of 80, this venerable character retired from public life to Chelsea, but still accessible to the poor, and still respectfully visited by the learned and the great. He died after a short illness of three days, 11th Jan. 1752, in his 91st year. The first volume of his history of Jamaica appeared 1707, and the second not till 1725. Sir Hans was an active patron of all the benevolent institutions of the metropolis, and he warmly promoted the establishment of a dispensary for the poor. He left several charitable legacies, and his cabinet of curiosities was bequeathed to the public for 20,000*l.* not half its original cost, and now adorns the British Museum.

SLODTZ, René Michael, an eminent sculptor, born at Paris. He studied sculpture under his father, who was a native of Antwerp, and at the age of 21 he went to Rome, to perfect himself. On his return to Paris he became member of the French academy, and sculptor to the king, and declined the honourable invitations offered to him by the king of Prussia. He died at Paris, 12th Oct. 1764, aged 59. The most admired of his works are, St. Bruno refusing the Mitre at Rome—the Tomb of Marquis Capponi—Heads of Calchas and Iphigenia—the Tomb of Cardinal D'Auvergne—and that of Languet, the minister of St. Sulpicius.

SLOUGHTER, Henry, governor of New-York, was appointed in 1690, and assumed the administration in March, 1691. He died July 23d, 1691, and was succeeded by Ingoldsby.

SLUYS, James Vander, a Dutch painter, born at Leyden, 1660, and bred up in the Orphans' hospital. He studied under Slingeland, and excelled in representing conversations, parties, &c. His colouring is better than his design. He died 1736.

SMALBROKE, Richard, fellow of Magdalen college, Oxford, was raised, in 1723, to the see of St. David's, and in 1730, translated to Lichfield and Coventry. He wrote a Vindication of our Saviour's Miracles, against Woolston, 8vo. a performance of great merit, and died 1749.

SMALCIUS, Valentine, a famous Socinian, born in Thuringia. He was author of a treatise, in which he denied the divinity of Christ, a work which claimed much of the public attention, and which was ably refuted by Cloppenburg, and others. He died at Cracow, 14th Dec. 1622.

SMALLEY, John, D.D. a congregational minister of Berlin, Connecticut, was born in Lebanon, in that state, June 4th, 1734, and was graduated at Yale college in 1756. He studied theology with Dr. Bellamy, and was ordained pastor of the second society in Berlin, April 19, 1758; where he continued to labour, with distinguished fidelity, reputation, and success, for nearly sixty years. He was one of the most eminent of the great divines of New-England. He possessed great energy and penetration of mind, and soundness of judgment; thought and wrote with a logical accuracy and perspicuity that are seldom surpassed, and contributed much by his numerous and popular publications, to the progress of theological knowledge. He gave to the world his celebrated Sermons on Natural and Moral Inability, in 1760. They were soon after republished in England, and were, also, it is believed, translated and published in German. His other works are, two Discourses on Universal Salvation—a Concio ad Clerum—an Election Sermon, and Sermons, in 2 vols. 8vo. His death took place June 1st, 1820, in his 86th year.

SMALLWOOD, William, governor of Maryland; was appointed a brigadier general in 1776, and commanded a brigade of Maryland troops on Long Island, and at the battle near Camden. When the Americans were defeated on Long Island in August, 1776, no portion of the army suffered more severely than that commanded by him. Two hundred and fifty-nine men, many of whom were of the first families in the country, were lost on that occasion. He also commanded the Maryland troops in the battle of Germantown in 1777. In 1785, he was appointed a delegate to congress, and the same year governor of the state. He died in February, 1792.

SMALRIDGE, George, an English prelate, born of a good family at Lichfield, 1666, and educated at Westminster school. In 1682 he was elected to Christ-church, and began soon to display his learning and his application, by his publication of Animadversions on a Piece of Obadiah Walker, on Church Government, 1687, and 1689 appeared his Latin poem, called "Auctio Davisiana," &c., on the sale of the books of Davis, the Oxford bookseller. When in orders he obtained respectable preferment, and in 1693, was made prebendary of Lichfield, and afterwards canon of Christ-church, then dean of Carlisle, and in 1713, dean of Christ-church, and the next year bishop of Bristol. He died Sept. 27th, 1719, and was buried at Christ-church. He published besides, 12 sermons in one volume, and after his death, 60 more were published by his widow.

SMART, Christopher, an eminent poet, born 11th April, 1722, at Shipbourne, Kent, and descended from a respectable Durham family. He received a good education at Maidstone and Durham schools, and at 17 entered at Pembroke hall, Cambridge; but his circumstances here were very unfavourable, in consequence of the death of his father, whose affairs, though steward to the Darlington family, were greatly embarrassed. His spirits were not, however, weighed down by family misfortunes, and while he was the friend and the companion of the gay, he cultivated the muses, and was thanked for his elegant translation of St. Cecilia's ode, by Pope, who recommended his undertaking a similar translation of the Essay on Criticism. This work was finished with applause, but brought no profit, and also a comedy, "a Trip to Cambridge," now deservedly forgotten. Afterwards for four successive years he obtained the Seatonian prize. In 1753 he married Miss Carnan, whose mother had taken for her second husband, Newbury, the bookseller; but in this new situation, and transplanted to a London residence, the same want of prudence and economy marked all his conduct. Though the friend of the learned, of Johnson, of Garrick, of Hawksworth, &c. his circumstances became more narrow, and totally depended upon the exertions of his pen. His distresses at last were such that they produced occasional derangement in a mind which was naturally ardent, and could ill resist the frowns of fortune and of the world, and finally ended in melancholy insanity. A disorder in his liver put an end to his sufferings, 12th May, 1771. He left a widow and two daughters, settled as booksellers at Reading. His works consist of fables, sonnets, odes, prize poems, &c. and have been neatly printed at Reading, 2 vols. 12mo. 1791. He published besides, Horace, translated into English prose—a New Version of the Psalms—Phædrus, translated into verse—Parables, in verse—Old Woman's Magazine, &c. As a poet he possessed originality, animation, and occasional sublimity, and as a man, though too often intemperate, yet he had such a sense of devotion, that in his sacred poems, he wrote several of the passages on his knees.

SMEATON, John, an eminent mechanic and engineer, born 28th May, 1724, at Austhorpe, near Leeds. He early displayed a strong inclination for mechanical pursuits, though his father, an attorney, wished to bring him up to his own business. The law, however, had no charms for him, and his father wisely indulged his inclinations, and permitted him to follow the bent of his genius. In 1750 he commenced mathematical instrument maker in Turnstile, Holborn, and gained so much applause by his machine to measure a ship's way at sea, and by his compass, that in 1753, he was elected fellow of the Royal Society. In 1759 he received the gold medal, for his curious paper on the experimental inquiries concerning the power of wind and water to turn mills, &c. When the Edystone lighthouse was destroyed, in 1752, Smeaton was recommended by lord Macclesfield, as the fittest person to repair the damage, and of this great and astonishing work, completed in 1759, he published a very interesting account in 1791, in a folio volume. In 1764 he was elected one of the receivers of the Derwentwater estate, which he highly improved, and afterwards rose to great eminence in his profession. His abilities were employed in the execution of the great canal of Scotland, in better supplying Greenwich and Deptford with water, in improving and repairing Ramsgate harbour, and in other public works. Besides these meritorious efforts of labour and genius, he made improvements in the air pump, in mills, in the pyrometer, the hydrometer, the steam engine, &c. On the 16th Sept. 1792, he was attacked by a paralytic stroke, at Austhorpe, of which he died 28th Oct. following. His character has been drawn by his friend Holmes, and he is represented not only as a most ingenious man, but as a very benevolent and amiable character in private and domestic life. His Edystone narrative has passed through a second edition. His papers were purchased by sir Joseph Banks, and are to appear before the public.

SMELLIE, William, a surgeon and physician of great eminence. He was born in Scotland, and practised in his native country, and afterwards came to London. As a teacher he was highly respectable, and had nearly a thousand pupils, who assisted him during his lectures, in the delivery of 1150 poor women. He paid great attention to his profession of midwifery, and he was the first writer who considered the shape and the size of the female pelvis as adapted to the head of the fœtus, and his observations from practice and experience were most important. He had, in the height of his celebrity, several able opponents; but the skill and judgment which he displayed, the numerous improvements which he introduced in the theory and practice of midwifery, and the forceps, and other surgical instruments which he used and recommended, are proofs of a great mind happily exerted in facilitating the delivery of the female sex, and in removing erroneous customs and dangerous systems. This eminent practitioner retired, after a long and successful practice, and died some time after, at an advanced age, at Lanerk, in Scotland, 1763. He published his lectures, 8vo. 1752—a volume of cases, 1754—Anatomical Tables, with 36 plates, folio—and five years after his death a second volume of his cases appeared, making together a most valuable collection, and a complete system of midwifery. A printer of the same name at Edinburgh, also secretary to the Edinburgh antiquarian society, published the Philosophy of Natural History, 4to. and a translation of Buffon's voluminous works. He died in 1795.

SMITH, sir Thomas, a learned writer, born at Walden, Essex, 512. He was educated at Queen's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, 1531, and in 1536 he was made university orator. In 1539 he travelled through France and Italy, and took the degree of doctor of civil law at Padua, and on his return received the same academical honours at Cambridge. He was afterwards professor of civil law in the university, and on the accession of Edward VI. was admitted into the family of Somerset, the protector, by whose interest he was raised to the office of steward of the stanneries, provost of Eton, and dean of Carlisle. In 1548 he was made secretary of state, and knighted, and then sent as ambassador to Flanders. The disgrace of his patron removed him from the court; but his abilities were again called into action, and in 1551 he was sent ambassador to France. In Mary's reign he was again dismissed from favour, though not treated with harshness, and under Elizabeth he was restored to confidence and employment. He went to France, 1562, as ambassador, and was engaged in affairs of state till his death, 1597. As a man of learning, and a zealous protestant, he was as respectable as he was as a politician. While at Cambridge, and public Greek lecturer in his college, he united with his friend John Cheke to introduce a new method of pronouncing the language; but though espoused by the best scholars of the university, by Ponet, Roger Ascham, and others, it met with opposition, and was publicly censured by the chancellor, bishop Gardiner. Smith expostulated with boldness, yet with moderation, and his epistle on the occasion was printed at Paris, when he was ambassador there, by Robert Stephens, 1568, 4to. with another, on the pronunciation of the English tongue.

SMITH, Miles, a native of Hereford, educated at Corpus Christi college, Oxford, from which he removed to Brazen-nose. He obtained the canon residentiaryship of his native city, and in 1612, was made bishop of Gloucester. He died 1624. He was a man of great and profound learning, well skilled in oriental languages, and he also assisted in the translation of the Bible, and wrote the preface to it. His sermons appeared in one vol. fol. 1630.

SMITH, John, an able divine, born at Achurch, near Oundle, 1618. He entered at Emanuel college, Cambridge, 1636, and in 1644 was chosen fellow of Queen's. He died Aug. 7, 1652, and was interred in the chapel of his college. He was a man of great learning, and endowed with the most amiable virtues. He wrote ten select discourses on theological subjects, collected together, 1660, in a 4to. volume.

SMITH, Thomas, D.D. a learned writer, born in London, 1638, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford. In 1663 he was appointed master of Magdalen college school, and three years after elected fellow of that college. In 1663 he went as chaplain to the embassy to Constantinople, and returned 1671. He afterwards travelled in France, and was promised a Windsor canonry for collating the Alexandrian manuscripts in St. James's library, but this he did not execute. His learning and abilities were so universally acknowledged, that he was selected to travel into the east, and to visit mount Athos to make a collection of valuable manuscripts, but he declined the offer, and continued at home. He was disappointed in his expectation of preferment from sir Joseph Williamson, secretary of state, and in 1688 he was deprived of his fellowship, by Giffard the catholic president of Magdalen, but though restored to it, he was finally deprived of it, for refusing the oaths to William and Mary. He died in London, 16th May, 1710. He published "Remarks on the Manners, Religion, &c. of the Turks," originally written in Latin in four letters—de Græcæ Ecclesiæ Hodierno Statu Epistola—a Latin Life of Camden—three papers in the Philosophical Transactions—Vitæ Quorundam Eruditissimorum, et Illustrium Virorum, 1707, 4to. including Usher, Cosins, Greaves, Patrick, Young, Dee, Bainbridge, &c.—sermons—Diatriba de Chaldaicis Paraphrastis, 8vo.—Syntagma de Druidum Moribus et Institutis, 8vo. &c.

SMITH, John, an English divine, born at Lowther, Westmoreland, 1659. After being educated partly under his father, the rector of the parish, he was intended for a Scotch university, but at last was sent to St. John's college, Cambridge, 1674, where he took his degree of D. D. 1696. He was chaplain to lord Lansdown, and was afterwards patronised by Crew, bishop of Durham, who presented him to a prebend, and the living of Bishop's Wearmouth. He died 1715, at Cambridge, where he was laboriously engaged in preparing for the press an edition of the works of the venerable Bede, which at last appeared in 1722, under the care of his son George. He had also begun to write the Antiquities of Durham.

SMITH, Edmund, son of Mr. Neale, a merchant, was brought up under the care of Mr. Smith, who had married his father's sister, and, in gratitude for his affectionate treatment, he assumed his name. He was born 1668, and educated at Westminster under Busby, from whence he removed to Christ-church. Here he distinguished himself for his taste, and for his extensive knowledge of classical literature, and in 1707 his tragedy of Phædra and Hippolitus was acted at the theatre royal, recommended by a prologue from the pen of Addison, and an epilogue from the pen of Prior. This play possessed little merit, though for a while supported by the partiality of friends. He prepared besides a plan for a tragedy of lady Jane Grey, and wrote a translation of Longinus, with notes and observations, &c. In his conduct Smith was very irregular and intemperate, and though admired for his wit and his learning, he was yet offensive to the directors of his college, by the impropriety of his conduct, so that at last he was expelled from the society, 1700. He was so negligent in his dress, that he was generally called captain Rag; and he was so careless of his interests, that after dedicating his tragedy to lord Halifax, he, either through pride or indolence, neglected to present it to his patron who had provided for him the grant of a place of 300*l.* a year. He died 1710.

SMITH, John, a most excellent mezzotinter, according to Horace Walpole, flourished at the end of William's reign. He studied under Vander Vaart, and worked in the house of sir Godfrey Kneller, whose pieces he published with great success. His chief works are night pieces after Schalken.

SMITH, George, an eminent landscape painter, born at Chichester, 1714. His abilities gained some prizes at the society of arts. He died 7th Sept. 1776, and was buried in St. Pancras churchyard, Chichester. He had two brothers, William and John, equally distinguished as painters. William, the eldest, excelled as a portrait painter, and in his fruit pieces, and died 27th Sept. 1764, and John, whose landscapes were much admired, died 29th July, the same year.

SMITH, William, an able scholar and divine, born at Worcester, 1711. He was educated at Winchester and New college, and became rector of Trinity church, Chester. He was for one year at the head of Brentwood school, Essex, but resigned in 1749, and, in 1758, was promoted to the deanery of Chester, to which was added, in 1766, the rectory of Handley. His life was spent in the laborious service of literature, and of the church, and he published an elegant and valuable translation of Thucydides, and of Longinus, besides a volume of sermons on the Beatitudes. He died 1787.

SMITH, John, founder of the colony of Virginia, was a native of Lincolnshire, and born in 1579. He was peculiarly courageous, restless, and fond of adventures. He left his native country at the age of fifteen, and travelled through France and the Netherlands. After having returned to England, and devoted some attention to military tactics and history, he went again to France, and embarked thence for Italy with a company of Pilgrims, who regarding him as a heretic, threw him into the sea near a small island off Nice to calm a tempest by which they were overtaken. He swam to the shore, and proceeded thence to Alexandria. In returning, he entered the service of the emperor of Austria against the Turks, in which he soon distinguished himself, and obtained the command of a body of horse. At the siege of Regal, a Turkish nobleman sending a challenge to fight with any Christian captain who would venture a contest for the amusement of the ladies, Smith accepted the offer, and meeting his antagonist on horseback, bore away his head, and gained a similar victory in a second and third contest. He was afterwards taken prisoner, but escaped into Russia. On returning to England he resolved to visit North America; and having persuaded a number of persons to procure a charter of South Virginia, came over thither, in the expedition under Newport, in 1607. He became a member of the council which governed the colony settled at Jamestown; and on Newport's returning, received the chief command, and repeatedly saved the colony from destruction by famine and the hostile Indians. He was at length taken prisoner by Powhatan, who resolved to put him to death. His head was placed on a stone for the purpose of despatching him with a club, when Pocahontas, the king's favourite daughter, threw herself between him and the executioner, and by her entreaties procured his release. He afterwards rendered important services to the colony, particularly by restraining the vices of the inhabitants, and promoting their industry. He at different times explored the coasts of the Chesapeake bay, and of the Atlantic from Cape Henry to Cape Cod, and constructed maps of them. He published an Account of several of his Voyages to Virginia; a History of that colony; an Account of his own life, and several other useful tracts. He died at London in 1631, in his 52d year. ☞ L.

SMITH, Thomas, governor of South Carolina, succeeded Philip Ludwell. He was created a landgrave under the original form of government in 1691, and commenced his administration in 1693. It was at a period when the high-church party distracted the colony by their violence. Smith was a man of prudence and liberality, but wearied by fruitless attempts to satisfy the discontented, he soon asked leave to retire from office, and Archdale, a proprietor, was sent out as governor. ☞ L.

SMITH, William, an eminent lawyer of New-York, was born at Newport Pagnell, Buckinghamshire, in 1696. He came to America in 1715, and received his education at Yale college, where he was graduated in 1719. In 1736 he was appointed recorder of the city of New-York, and was afterwards a member of the council, and a judge of the supreme court of the province. In the political transactions of the time, he took an active part, and few individuals possessed so great influence in determining the course of public affairs. He was one of the original trustees of the college of New-Jersey, and died Nov. 22d, 1769. ☞ L.

SMITH, William, chief justice of New-York, was the son of the preceding, and graduated at Yale college in 1745. He was educated a lawyer, and was one of the first of his time in America. In 1763 he was appointed a judge of the supreme court, and was afterwards chief justice. When the revolution commenced, he adhered to the royal government, and in 1781 was one of Clinton's deputies for receiving acknowledgments of allegiance from the colonists. He was afterwards chief justice of Canada. He published an excellent history of New-York, from its first settlement until 1732, 4to. London, 1757. It was republished at Albany, with additions, 8vo. 1814, and has been continued from 1732 to 1762, by William Smith, Esq. son of the chief justice. ☞ L.

SMITH, Josiah, an American clergyman of great worth, was born in Charleston, South Carolina, in 1704. In 1725 he was graduated bachelor of arts in the university of Cambridge, Massachusetts, and was the first native of Carolina who obtained a degree from a college. Soon after his graduation he began to preach, and not long afterwards was ordained to the work of the ministry, and became a popular preacher, a learned divine, and a voluminous writer. His ministerial life was spent in Bermuda, at Cainhoy, and in Charleston. He died in the city of Philadelphia in 1781, in the 77th year of his age. He was a warm friend to the civil and religious liberties of his country, and was universally regarded as a pious and exemplary divine. ☞ L.

SMITH, Samuel, author of the History of the colony of New-Jersey, to the year 1721, was a resident of Burlington, where his history was published, 8vo. 1765. He died at Burlington in 1776. His work is considered a judicious and faithful compilation. ☞ L.

SMITH, Isaac, judge of the supreme court of New-Jersey, after obtaining the degree of A.B. at Princeton, in 1755, commenced the practice of physic, but at the opening of the war of the revolution, engaged in the cause of his country with distinguished zeal, and rendered much useful service. He received the command of a regiment in 1776, and during the discouraging period that succeeded, conducted with unshaken resolution. After the close of the war he was appointed to a seat on the bench of the supreme court, and discharged the duties of the station with reputation for eighteen years. After the adoption of the present constitution, he was chosen a member of congress. His talents were superior, and his character as a scholar, soldier, gentleman, and Christian, accomplished. He died in 1807. ☞ L.

SMITH, William, D.D. first provost of the college of Philadelphia, was a Scotchman by birth, and educated at Aberdeen, where he was graduated in 1747. He came to America in 1750, and employed himself as a private tutor till 1753, when he was appointed to the care of the college in Philadelphia, and after having returned to England and obtained episcopal ordination, he entered on the duties of the office in May, 1754, and by his fine genius and literary accomplishments, gave much respectability to the institution. After rendering important services to the religious and literary interests of the country, both as a preacher and writer, for the long period of 49 years, he died May 14, 1803, in his 77th year. ☞ L.

SMITH, Samuel Stanhope, D.D. LL.D. a distinguished clergyman of the Presbyterian church, was born at Pequea, in Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, in the year 1750. He was graduated bachelor of arts at Princeton college, in 1769. After serving that institution as a tutor for several years, he was ordained to the work of the ministry, and went to Virginia, where his talents, learning, and influence, enabled him to become the founder of Hampden Sidney college, in Prince Edward county, in that state, of which he was the first president. In 1779, he was recalled to Princeton as professor of moral philosophy. To this professorship was added, in 1783, that of theology. In 1786, he was chosen vice president in the same institution; and in 1795, on the death of Doctor Witherspoon, was raised to the presidency. He discharged the duties of this high trust with dignity and reputation until the year 1812, when, on account of the failure of his health, he resigned, and spent the remainder of his life in retirement. He was removed by death in 1819, in the 69th year of his age. He was distinguished for his acquaintance with ancient and modern literature, his elegance and urbanity as a gentleman, his polished and perspicuous style of writing, and his eloquence and popularity as a preacher. His publications are numerous, and give him a very honourable rank among American writers. His chief works are an Essay on the variety of Complexion in the Human Species—Lectures on the evidences of the Christian Religion—and on Moral Philosophy—and a System of Natural and Revealed Religion. Several volumes of his Sermons have also been published.

SMITH, John Blair, first president of Union college, Schenectady, was born in Pequea, Pennsylvania, June 12th, 1756. He received the degree of bachelor of arts at Princeton in 1773, and devoted himself to the study of theology. In 1779, he settled in the ministry in Virginia, and became principal of Hampden Sidney college in that state, where he was highly useful particularly in the ministry, and employed himself with great diligence in its labours. In 1791, he removed to the third Presbyterian church in Philadelphia, where he continued till appointed to the presidency of Union college, in 1795. He remained at that institution till May 1799, when he returned to the care of the church he had left in Philadelphia, but died on the 22d August of that year. His talents were fine, his attainments in learning respectable, and his zeal in the ministry highly exemplary.

SMITH, Israel, governor of Vermont, was a native of Connecticut, born April 4th, 1759, and graduated at Yale college in 1781. He studied law, and settled in the practice at Rupert, Vermont. He was soon after elected representative of that town in the assembly, and from this period continued to hold a high rank among the public characters of that state. In 1759 he was one of the commissioners appointed to determine the controversy with New-York respecting boundaries, and was active in procuring the admission of Vermont into the union. In 1791 he was elected a representative to congress, and continued in that station till 1797. Having removed to Rutland, he was now elected a representative from that town, and was the same year appointed chief justice of the supreme court. He held the office but one year. In 1800, he was again elected a representative to congress, and in 1802 succeeded Mr. Chipman as a senator in that body. He remained in this office until elected governor of the state in 1807, as the successor of Mr. Tichenor. He was universally esteemed for his integrity and public spirit. His death took place December 2d, 1810.

SMITH, Robert, D.D. was forty-seven years rector of St. Philip's church, at Charleston, South Carolina, and was elected and consecrated the first bishop of the Episcopal churches of that state in 1795. He was also principal of the college at Charleston. In the revolution he shouldered his musket, and was made a prisoner at the surrender of Charleston, and immediately banished. He was eminently distinguished for his liberality to the poor. He died November, 1801, aged 73.

SMITH, Nathaniel, judge of the supreme court of Connecticut, was born at Woodbury, in that state, January 6th, 1762. His means of early education were very limited, and he rose to distinction by the energy of his talents. He commenced the study of law under the care of judge Reeve, about the close of the revolutionary war, and began the practice in his native town in 1789, and soon became eminent in the profession for keenness of discernment, accuracy in investigation, adroitness in argument, and energy in delivery. After having been repeatedly chosen a member of the state legislature, he was in 1795 transferred to a seat in congress, where he continued four years, and on declining another election, was chosen a member of the upper house in the legislature of Connecticut, and continued in that body till 1804. In October, 1806, he was placed on the bench of the supreme court, and was distinguished for the sagacity and uprightness with which he discharged the duties of that station. He held the office till May, 1819, and died March 9th, 1822, in the 61st year of his age. He possessed a mind of a very superior order, his legal knowledge was extensive, and he was greatly esteemed for his integrity, public spirit, and piety.

SMITH, John, D.D. professor of Greek,

Hebrew, and other oriental languages in Dartmouth college, New-Hampshire, was appointed to that office in 1778. He was born at Byfield, Massachusetts, December 21st, 1752, graduated at Dartmouth college in 1773, and died in May, 1809, aged 56. He published the "New-Hampshire Latin Grammar," an edition of Cicero's Orations in Latin, with notes, Walpole, 1804, and a "Hebrew Grammar, without points, designed to facilitate the study of the Scriptures," &c. ¶ L.

SMITH, George William, governor of Virginia, was elected in 1811. He had previously been lieutenant-governor. He lost his life by the burning of the theatre at Richmond, a few months after he assumed the administration, December 24th, 1811. ¶ L.

SMITH, Elihu H. physician, was born at Litchfield, Connecticut, in 1771, and graduated at Yale college in 1786. After attending a course of medical lectures in Philadelphia, he established himself in the practice of medicine in New-York in 1793, and devoted himself with great zeal to the cultivation of medicine and of literature. He soon became distinguished for his attainments, and obtained extensive business. He was elected one of the physicians of the hospital in 1796, and the same year, in conjunction with Drs. Miller and Mitchell, commenced the publication of the Medical Repository, to which he contributed a number of valuable papers. He died of the yellow fever in September, 1798, in his twenty-seventh year. He had accumulated an uncommon mass of medical learning. He possessed poetical talents, and published several pieces, the best of which is an epistle prefixed to the American edition of Darwin. ¶ L.

SMITH, James, one of the signers of the declaration of American independence, was a distinguished lawyer of York, Pennsylvania, and a man of great wit. ¶ L.

SMITH, Elizabeth, an accomplished young lady, was born at Burnhall, the seat of her family near Durham, in 1776. Her education was liberal; and she added to it, by her own application, a knowledge of the mathematics, and an exquisite taste for drawing and poetry. She also studied the French, Italian, Spanish, and German languages, particularly the last, from which she made some excellent translations. She next proceeded to the classics, and made herself acquainted with the Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Syriac, Arabic, and Persian. In biblical literature she gave proof of her ability in a translation of the book of Job. She died of a consumption, August 7, 1806.—W. B.

SMITH, Adam, LL.D. a celebrated writer, born 5th June, 1723, at Kirkaldy, where his father, who died a few months before his birth, was comptroller of the customs. Though of a weak constitution, he had from his earliest years great partiality for books. At the age of three he was stolen by some vagrants, and with difficulty recovered. After receiving instruction at Kirkaldy he was sent to Glasgow university; but as his friends destined him for the church of England, he removed, in 1740, to Baliol college, Oxford, as an exhibitor. Not wishing, however, to embrace the ecclesiastical profession, he left Oxford after seven years' residence, and returned to Scotland, and, in 1751, he was elected professor of logic in the university of Glasgow, and the next year succeeded Cragie in the chair of moral philosophy. In 1759 he published his Theory of Moral Sentiments, and, in 1763, he quitted his professorship to accompany the duke of Buccleugh in his travels on the continent. He visited, with his pupil, Toulouse, Geneva, and the south of France, and on his return to Paris became acquainted with the wits and the learned men of the capital. His travels were continued for three years, after which he retired to the domestic seclusion of Kirkaldy, with his mother, for ten years. Hume and his other friends in vain expostulated against his retirement, but, in 1771, he convinced them that his mind had been actively employed, by the publication of his celebrated work, an Inquiry into the Nature and Cause of the Wealth of Nations, 2 vols. 4to. This excellent book, often republished in 3 vols. 8vo. procured him the appointment of commissioner of the customs in Scotland; and after being some time in London, he, in 1778, retired to Edinburgh, where he enjoyed the rest of life in honourable independence, in the society of the learned, and among the companions of his earliest years. He now occasionally devoted himself to study, but not with that zeal which might have enabled him to add fresh celebrity to his fame; and when at last infirmities came upon him, he found it was too late to think of completing the works on which, in his serious hours, he had meditated. He died July, 1790, of a chronic obstruction in his bowels, and after his death some essays and other miscellanies, which he had not ordered to be destroyed, were published by his executors in 4to. 1795. Of the powers of his mind, and of his comprehensive information, his works will be a lasting memorial to the latest posterity. With all the perfections of a well-cultivated understanding, he did not, however, possess that knowledge of the world which might have adorned a more active life; and though admired for his talents, he was careless in the midst of business, and absent to an extraordinary degree. It is to be lamented that his great qualities were disgraced by notions of infidelity. When he published the "Life of David Hume, written by himself," he added remarks which conveyed to the world how determined a foe he was to Christianity; and though he was attacked with efficacy, and all the powers of wit by Dr. Horne, he never renounced those principles which proved him a deist, and the friend of the infidel philosophers of France.

SMITH, Charlotte, a well-known writer. She was daughter of Mr. Turner, a man of property in Surry and Sussex, and when very young, she married Mr. Smith, whose father was possessed of some valuable estates in the West Indies. The affairs of her husband, however, proved not so prosperous as was expected, and after various persecutions from creditors and from lawyers, and after passing some time in the gloom of a prison with her unfortunate consort, she retired with her family to a chateau in Normandy. But here again persecution attended her; the chicanery of the lawyers, and the ingratitude of her friends reduced her to the greatest indigence: yet, however, though oppressed by domestic sorrows, the exertions of her mind administered to her wants. She wrote several novels which gained her a comfortable subsistence, and the Romance of Real Life, Emmeline, Ethelinda, Celestina, Desmond, the Old Manor House, poems, sonnets, &c. contributed liberally to procure her the public esteem, and a respectable income. This ingenious, but unfortunate woman, died at Thetford, near Farnham, Surry, 28th Oct. 1806. Her novels display great powers of invention, and it is remarkable that in all of them she has interwoven much of her own personal misfortunes, and painted every where in strong colours, the character of those rapacious lawyers, to whose dishonesty she ascribed all her sorrows. Her descriptions are interesting, and her style is elegant; so that she aspired to the reputation, not of a temporary novel writer, but hoped that her compositions would become the ornament of every elegant library. Her sonnets possess peculiar beauty, and all her writings every where display the powers of a fine imagination, correct taste, and strong judgment.

SMITZ, Lewis, an eminent painter, born at Dort. His fruit pieces were highly valued; but though beautiful, the colours proved not of long duration. He died 1675, aged 40.

SMITZS, Gaspar, a Dutch painter. He was very happy in his portraits, and his Magdalens were peculiarly admired. He died at Dublin, 1689.

SMOLLETT, Tobias, M. D. a Scotch physician, more celebrated as an author. He was born near Cameron on the banks of the Leven, 1720. He was brought up for the medical line, and served as a surgeon in the fleet which bombarded Carthage; but as his professional talents did not meet with encouragement, he commenced author. After trying his fortune in plays and poems, he published, in 1748, his Roderick Random, 2 vols. 12mo. which excited much of the public attention, and ensured success to his future publications. Peregrine Pickle appeared in 1751, 4 vols. 12mo. and became very popular, not only on account of its own intrinsic merit, but for the adventures of a lady of quality, lady Vane, and for the entertainment of a republican doctor, supposed to be Akenside, portrayed with all the humour and skill of a most facetious and learned scholar. Ferdinand, Count Fathom, appeared in 1754, and the next year the Critical Review was undertaken, and conducted by him till 1763. In this work he exposed himself to much obloquy, and his censure of admiral Knowles' pamphlet on the Rochefort Expedition, brought on a prosecution against him. He was in consequence fined 100*l.* and imprisoned in the King's Bench three months, during which confinement he wrote his sir Lancelot Greaves, 2 vols. 12mo. In 1762, he enlisted among the periodical writers in defence of lord Bute's administration, and published the Briton, which was immediately followed by the North Briton. In 1763, he went abroad for the benefit of his health, and returned after two years' absence, and published an account of his Travels, 2 vols. 8vo. a work which Sterne, in his Sentimental Journey, ridicules under the name of Smelfungus. His Humphrey Clinker appeared in 1771, and soon after, in consequence of the ill state of his health, and other disagreeable circumstances, he left England for Italy. He died in Italy, 21st Oct. 1771, and an epitaph on his monument by his friend Dr. Armstrong, marks the spot of his interment near Leghorn. Besides those works already mentioned, Dr. Smollett published, 1757, a History of England, 4 vols. 4to. edited also in 8vo. a work which produced him great profit, though regarded as partial, inaccurate, and hastily written—a translation of Gil Blas and Don Quixote into English—a Collection of Voyages and Travels—the Regicide—poems, &c. His life has been written by Dr. Anderson, 1796, and since by Dr. Moore. In his character Smollett was a man of acknowledged virtue and probity, and his abilities rank him high in the list of authors of celebrity. His two best works are Roderick Random and Peregrine Pickle, and in these he introduces great diversity of characters, interesting descriptions, and pleasing variety, though it is to be lamented that some parts of his narrative are more licentious than virtue can approve.

His other novels are inferior performances, though they are not devoid of interesting anecdotes. The persecution and poverty to which he was occasionally exposed, ruffled the disposition of this able writer; and when the conduct of lord Bute, and the unfulfilled promises of other patrons, are well considered, it will be easy to explain why an author speaks with harshness and envenomed acrimony against the ingratitude of false friends, the tyranny of the great, and the insolence of rank. The mortifications and disappointments to which he was exposed by the spirit of faction, and the persecution of enemies, were increased by the loss of his daughter, an only child; and he must be added to the number of those who, after contributing to the amusement, the improvement, and the intellectual pleasures of others, find vexation, disquiet, and neglect, the reward for mental exertions.

SMYTH, James. Vid. MOORE.

SNELL, Rodolphus, a native of Oudewater in Holland, professor of Hebrew and mathematics at Leyden, where he died 1613, aged 67. He is author of some mathematical and philosophical works, now little known. His son Willebrord, was born at Leyden, 1591, and succeeded his father in the chair of mathematics, 1613. He is the first who discovered the true laws of the refraction of light, and he undertook to measure the earth in the same method, which afterwards was adopted by Picard and Cassini. His best works are, Eratosthenes Batavus—and Cyclometrium, 4to. He died at Leyden, 1626, aged 35.

SNORRO, Sturlesonius, a native of Iceland, whose abilities were employed in political affairs, as the minister of state to one king of Sweden, and to three kings of Norway. He retired, in an insurrection, to Iceland, where he was governor, and was at last pursued and put to death by his enemy Gyssurus, 1241. He wrote Chronicon Regum Norwegorum—Edda Islandica, two useful works, the last of which was translated by Mallet.

SNOX, Renier, a native of Ter-gouw in Holland, who studied medicine, and was also engaged in a diplomatic capacity by Charles V. to the courts of Christiern II. of Denmark, and James IV. of Scotland. He died in his native town, 1st Aug. 1537, aged 60. He wrote the History of Holland, in 13 books, in Latin, folio, 1620.—Another of that name, Lambert, was a native of Malines, who devoted himself laboriously to the genealogical history of the Low Countries, and died 1638, aged 64.

SNYDER, Simon, governor of Pennsylvania, was born in Lancaster county, November 5th, 1759, and rose by his personal merit and enterprise, from the humble situation of an apprentice, to the enjoyment of the highest honours of the state. He was a member of the convention which formed the constitution of Pennsylvania, and several years speaker of the house of representatives. In 1808 he succeeded M'Kean as governor. In 1818 he was a member of the senate of the state. He died at Selim's grove, in Northumberland county, November 9th, 1819. L.

SNYDERS, Francis, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp, 1587, and bred under Van Balen. He visited Italy, and settled at Brussels, and was attached to the household of the Spanish court. His hunting pieces, animals, fish, kitchens, &c. were much admired. In some of his pieces he was assisted by Rubens. He died 1657. He also engraved a book of animals of 16 leaves.

SOANEN, John, an eminent French ecclesiastic, born at Rioms, 6th Jan. 1647. After teaching divinity in the provinces, he acquired celebrity as a preacher at Lyons, Orleans, and Paris, and was one of the four distinguished orators who, at that time, were called the four evangelists. He was raised to the see of Senez; but his opposition to the bull Unigenitus was condemned by the council of Embrun, and he was stripped of his episcopal honours, and died an exile at Chaise-Dieu, Auvergne, 25th Dec. 1740. He wrote Pastoral Instructions—Mandemens—letters—sermons, &c.

SOBIESKI, John III. a celebrated warrior, who by merit rose to the throne. His father was James Sobieski, governor of Poland. He received his education at Paris, and rose gradually by valour to the highest ranks in the army, and in 1665, was made grand marshal and general of the Polish armies, and afterwards Palatine of Cracovia. After retaking several cities from the Cossacks in the Ukraine, he at last gained the famous battle of Choczyn on the Nieseter, in 1673, in which the Turks lost 28,000 men. This victory, and a character eminent for every virtue, raised him to the throne on the death of Michael, and in 1683, he marched to the relief of Vienna, closely besieged by the Turks. So great was the terror of his name that the Turks fled with precipitation at his approach, and even left behind the great standard of Mahomet, which the conqueror sent to the pope with these words, in imitation of Cæsar, "I came, I saw, God hath conquered."—This truly great and heroic monarch died at Warsaw, 17th June, 1696, universally regretted, not only by the soldiers, by whom he was beloved, but by men of letters, whom he liberally and judiciously patronised. He was acquainted with most of the languages of Europe. His Life has been written by abbé Coyer, 3 vols. 12mo.

SOCIUS, Lælius, the founder of the Socian sect, was born at Sienna, in 1525, and designed for the civil law by his father, who was himself an able civilian at Bologna. To the study of civil law he united that of divinity, and therefore acquired a knowledge of Greek, Hebrew, and Arabic; but when, by deep investigation, he discovered the fallacy of the Romish church, he sought a safer asylum out of Italy, and after travelling through Germany, France, England, the Netherlands, and Poland, he at last settled at Zurich. In this retreat he became the friend and associate of the celebrated reformers, of Calvin, Bellinger, Beza, Melancthon, and others; but a difference of opinion with respect to the Trinity, soon produced hostile treatment. Calvin reproved sharply the strange opinions of his late friend, and Socinus, in the midst of theological animosity, had the good sense to keep his sentiments, and further to dread the resentment of his opponents, when he saw Servetus soon after dragged to the stake. He afterwards travelled into Poland, and disseminated his opinions where he could be secure and unmolested, and after visiting Venice, he returned to Zurich, where he died, 1562, aged 37. His tenets, though not very widely disseminated by him, were afterwards more fully spread by his nephew.

SOCINUS, Faustus, nephew to the above, was born at Sienna, 1539, and educated under the care of his uncle, who expected from his rising abilities a firm and active supporter of his theological opinions. He was at Lyons when Lælius died, and though only 20 years old, he immediately repaired to Zurich, to obtain possession of his papers, which, however, he for some time disregarded, while for 12 years enjoying the favours and the patronage of the court of Florence. In 1574 he left the palace of the Medici, and came to Germany, and after studying divinity at Basil, he, in 1579, went to Poland, where he began to disseminate his uncle's doctrines, with a few alterations of his own. He was violently opposed by some of the Unitarians, but he found asylum near Cracow, in the house of a Polish lord, whose daughter he married. In 1598 he was exposed to fresh insults from the students and the populace of Cracow, and he escaped with difficulty from their fury. He spent the remainder of his days about nine miles from Cracow, in the house of a Polish gentleman, and died there 1604, aged 65. His sect survived their leader, and still must exist, while opinions contrary to scripture and reason are countenanced, and while religious disputants endeavour to outdo each other in virulence and animosity, and not in the mild virtues and pure benevolence which the gospel of Christ teaches. The Socinians maintain that Jesus did not exist before he was born of the Virgin Mary, that he was a mere man, that the Holy Ghost is no distinct person, and that the Father alone is properly God. They explain away the doctrine of redemption, and the satisfaction made by the sacrifice of Christ, and therefore deny the existence of original sin, of grace, and of predestination. They affirm that the soul sleeps in death with the body, and that both will again rise together, either to the enjoyment of felicity, or the sufferings of punishment; but that whilst future felicity is eternal, the punishments of hell-fire are proportioned only in duration to the demerits and offences of the sinner.

SOCRATES, an illustrious philosopher of Athens. He followed the profession of his father, a sculptor, for some time, till philosophy more fully engaged his attention. After distinguishing himself in the field of battle in the defence of his country, he commenced public instructor of youth, and soon saw his lectures followed by large, respectable, and admiring audiences. The simplicity of his dress, and the innocence and virtues of his life, however, in the midst of a restless and jealous population, soon procured him enemies; and while he directed all the energies of his mind to reform the morals of Athens, he was accused of corrupting the young Athenians, and of making innovations in the religion of his country. Against perjured witnesses, and before prejudiced judges, integrity is of no avail, and Socrates, therefore, was condemned to death. Though he could escape, he bowed before the unjust sentence, and drinking the fatal poison, expired in a few moments, B. C. 400. The Athenians too late repented of their cruelty; but while they punished his murderers with death, the virtues and character of their immortal sage were delineated in the writings of two of his faithful pupils, Xenophon and Plato.

SOCRATES, the scholastic, a native of Constantinople, author of a valuable, though occasionally inaccurate, Ecclesiastical History to the year 400 from the period where Eusebius ends.

SOLANDER, Daniel Charles, a celebrated naturalist, the pupil of Linnæus. He was born in the province of Nordland in Sweden, 28th Feb. 1736, and studied at Upsal, where he took the degree of M.D. In 1760 he visited England, and by the recommendation of his friend Collinson, he was employed to form a catalogue of the natural curiosities preserved in the British museum, and in 1765, was appointed one of the assistants in that valuable establishment. In 1768, he was prevailed upon by his friend Mr. afterwards sir Joseph Banks, to accompany him in Cook's voyage round the world, and without losing his appointment at the museum. By his judicious and indefatigable inquiries during this voyage, a great addition was made to the plants and natural curiosities then known to the Europeans. In 1773, he was advanced to the place of under librarian in the museum, and he died of an apoplexy, 16th May, 1782. He is author of a description of the collection of petrifications found in Hampshire, and presented to the British museum by Mr. Brander, and also of observations on natural history in Cook's voyage, and a letter in the philosophical transactions, &c. He has been celebrated by Dr. Pultney and by others, not only as a man of great abilities as a philosopher and naturalist, but as of modest and unassuming manners, and his visit to this country may be regarded as an important era in the history of botany.

SOLE, Anthony, a painter, born at Bologna. His landscapes are particularly beautiful. He died at Bologna, 1677, aged 80. His son Joseph was also an eminent artist in history and in landscape painting, and died 1719, aged 65.

SOLIGNAC, Peter Joseph de la Pimpie, chevalier of, the secretary and friend of Stanislaus, king of Poland, and author of a Polish History, in 5 vols. 12mo. was born at Montpellier, and died 1773, aged 86. He wrote besides, an Eloge on Stanislaus—a piece on Education—the Amours of Horace—Pieces on the Memoirs of the Academy of Nanci, &c.

SOLIMENE, Francis, an Italian painter, born at Nocera de Pagani near Naples, 1657. He was permitted to study under his father, who was himself a painter, at the persuasion of cardinal Orsini, afterwards Benedict XIII. and by consulting the works of the greatest masters he acquired a correct and elegant style. He settled at Naples where he was universally courted, and the most liberal offers were made to him by the kings of France and Spain, which he declined. He was also received with great distinction by the pope and cardinals at Rome, and by Philip V. and he was knighted by the emperor Charles VI. After living in becoming splendour and deservedly respected, he died at Naples 1747, aged almost 90. His pieces are much admired, and he was equally eminent as a man of letters and a poet.

SOLINUS, Caius Julius, a Roman grammarian, who flourished in the midst of the third century. His Polyhistor is a compilation of historical and geographical remarks, and he is called Pliny's ape, as the close imitator of that great naturalist.

SOLIS, Antonio de, a Spanish writer, born at Placenza in Old Castile, 1610. He studied law at Salamanca, but devoted himself more fondly to literary pursuits. At the age of 17, he wrote a comedy well received, and by his abilities obtained the patronage of the viceroy of Navarre, and then of the king of Spain, to whom he was made secretary. He was afterwards appointed historiographer of the Indies, and in this office, which was as honourable as it was lucrative, he published his History of the Conquest of Mexico, admired as a valuable composition, which he concludes with the subjugation of the Mexicans, that he may not have to record the consequent cruelties of his countrymen. In the latter part of his life he devoted himself more seriously to religious duties, and took orders at the age of 57. He died 1686. He wrote besides some poems and dramatic pieces. His history has been translated into various languages, and into English by Townshend.

SOLOMON, son of David and Bathsheba, was king of Israel after his father. He is celebrated for his wisdom, the fame of which was so widely spread that distant princes came to see and to admire him, and he is equally distinguished for his piety, and for the magnificent temple which he erected at Jerusalem, in honour of the God of Israel, and which he consecrated with the most solemn pomp. The latter part of his life was unhappily disgraced by intemperance and debauchery, and in marrying the daughter of the king of Egypt; and in keeping a great number of concubines, he tarnished that high character of sanctity, and of uprightness, which had rendered his reign so glorious. He died 975 B.C. aged 58. He wrote the books of Proverbs and Ecclesiastes, and the Canticles, to which some add the book of Wisdom, in the apocrypha, though most probably the composition of a more modern pen.

SOLOMON BEN VIRGA, a Spanish physician, and rabbi of the 16th century, author of a History of the Jews, from the destruction of the temple to his own times, of which a Latin translation appeared 1651, at Amsterdam, 4to.

SOLOMON, Ben Job Jalla, an African, born at Bonda near the river Senegal. He was sent by his father, who was a prince of the country, to sell slaves to captain Pyke, an English trader, and not agreeing in price set out across the Gambia, where he was taken prisoner by another race of blacks, enemies to his country, and sold himself as a slave. He was carried to Annapolis in America, and afterwards escaped, and upon making himself known, was ransomed by General Oglethorpe and others, and came to England, 1733. He was in London employed by sir Hans Sloane in translating some Arabic MSS. and during his residence of fourteen months he was much noticed, and after being introduced at court returned to his country loaded with kindness and presents. He had a very retentive memory, and could repeat the Koran by heart at fifteen, and he actually wrote the whole book in England three times by recollection only. Memoirs of him were published by Mr. Bluet, and he is also mentioned in Moore's travels, and Astley's voyages.

SOLON, a celebrated lawgiver of Athens, and one of the seven wise men of Greece. He was called upon by his countrymen in the midst of their turbulent and distracted state to introduce regularity and order into their government, and he established among them his famous laws, which they solemnly bound themselves by an oath to observe. He died in Cyprus 558 B. C. aged 80.

SOLYMAN I. saved himself from the fatal battle of Ancyra, and was proclaimed emperor of the Turks after his father Bajazet 1402. He displayed great valour as a warrior, but his glory was tarnished by his excessive love of pleasure, which at last hastened his end. He was dethroned in consequence of his effeminacy by his brother Musa, 1410, and assassinated.

SOLYMAN II. surnamed the Magnificent, succeeded to his father Selim I. 1520. His reign was useful and splendid, he defeated the rebellious Mamelukes in Egypt, and made peace with Ismael Sophi, after which he carried his arms against Europe, and took Belgrade. In 1522, he attacked Rhodes, which was held by the knights of Jerusalem, and after a vigorous defence he took it, and then invaded Hungary, and defeated the Hungarian army at the celebrated battle of Mohatz, 1526. The conquest of Buda was followed by the siege of Vienna, but after twenty unsuccessful assaults, Solyman retreated from the place, with the loss of 80,000 men. In 1534, he made war against Tauris and Persia, but suffered a defeat, and was disappointed in his attack on Malta, though in 1566, he took from the Genoese the island of Chios. This brave emperor died 30th Aug. 1566, aged 76, at the siege of Sigeth in Hungary, four days before its surrender.

SOLYMAN III. emperor of Turkey, 1687, after the deposition of Mahomet IV. He was a very indolent and superstitious prince, whose affairs were administered by his favourite Mustapha Coprogli. He died 22d June, 1691.

SOMBREUIL, Francis Charles Virot de, a French general, whose attachment to the cause of Lewis XVI. during the revolution produced his ruin. He was imprisoned in consequence of his loyalty, and on the 2d Sept. 1792, as he was going to be assassinated by the murderers of that fatal day, his daughter, young and amiable, rushed into the midst of the bloody assembly, and obtained his release. The next year, however, proved more fatal, and he was condemned to death by the revolutionary tribunal, on some frivolous accusation, and was guillotined with his eldest son by his side. His second son Charles escaped from the murderers, and after distinguishing himself in the Prussian armies and in Holland against Custines, he passed to England, and in 1795, was sent to head the forces which were landed at Quiberon. This expedition was unfortunate, and he was taken prisoner by Hoche, and carried to l'Orient and Vanes, where he was condemned to be shot. In the preparations for death he obtained permission to repair for three days on board the English ships on the coast to settle his affairs, and at the appointed moment this heroic character returned to save his honour and to perish. He gave himself to the soldiers, who shot him, the order to fire, and fell lamented even by those who cruelly shed his blood.

SOMERS, John lord, chancellor of England, son of an attorney, was born at Worcester, 1652. He was educated at a private school, Staffordshire, and then entered at Trinity college, Oxford, from which he removed to the Middle Temple. He united here the study of polite literature with that of the law, and in 1681, he assisted in the publication of "a just and modest Vindication of the Proceedings of the two last Parliaments," which Charles had dissolved with dissatisfaction. He afterwards highly distinguished himself as an able and eloquent pleader, and was, 1638, one of the counsel for Pilkington, lord Gray, and others, who had caused a riot in London, and in 1688, for the seven bishops. In the convention parliament of 1689, he was member for Worcester, and was one of the managers of the commons at a conference with the lords about the word "abdicated." He was soon after made solicitor-general and knighted, and in 1692, appointed attorney-general. In 1697, he was raised to the peerage, and made lord chancellor, but in 1700, he was removed from his high situation, and accused by the commons of high crimes and misdemeanors, of which, upon trial before his peers, he was acquitted. He now abandoned the struggles of political life for studious retirement, and was soon after chosen president of the Royal Society. He, however, occasionally laboured for the prosperity of his country in the house of lords, and projected the union between Scotland and England. In 1708, he was president of the council, but was removed by the change of ministry two years after. He grew so infirm, that he held no office under George I. He died of an apoplectic fit, 26th April, 1716, after surviving for some time the powers of his mind. He was never married. He wrote various pieces, and translated Plutarch's life of Alcibiades, in the lives by several hands, and also Dido's letter to Æneas from Ovid, &c.

His character is deservedly celebrated, not only as a man of learning, but as the patron of the learned; and in the midst of political corruption and court intrigue, he is represented as a patient, mild, and benevolent magistrate, uncorrupted as a statesman and lawyer, as an orator eloquent, possessed of a most refined taste, and a most upright patriot. He was among those who recommended to public notice the Paradise Lost, which party-spirit and false taste seemed desirous to condemn to eternal obscurity.

SOMERVILLE, William, an English poet, born of an ancient family at Edston, Warwickshire, 1692. He was educated at Winchester, and New college, Oxford, of which he was fellow, and when settled on his paternal estate he became known as a justice of the peace, as a poet, and as a country gentleman. The latter part of his life was spent in the midst of distress and poverty. He died 14th July, 1743. He wrote the Chase, a poem, much and deservedly admired, and some other pieces. He also is said to have translated Voltaire's play of Alzire.

SOMMERY, N. Fontette de, a lady, whose parentage is unknown, as she was secretly intrusted to the care of a convent by some person who withdrew immediately all connexion with her. She possessed great powers of mind, with inoffensive gayety, and she was patronised by the wife of marshal Brissac, and by her liberality rendered independent. Her company was in consequence sought by philosophers and men of learning, and her conduct and conversation deserve the respect which she received from the noble and the opulent. She died about 1792, in an advanced age, universally esteemed. Her Doutes sur les Opinions recues dans la Societé, appeared in 2 vols. 12mo. 1784, and she published besides l'Oreille, an Asiatic romance, 3 vols. 12mo.—letters, &c.

SOMMIER, John Claude, a French ecclesiastic of Lorraine. He published l'Histoire Dogmatique de la Religion, 6 vols. 4to. a work of merit, and the History of the Holy See, 7 vols. 8vo. a composition which, though decried in France, procured for him from Benedict XIII. the archbishopric of Casarca. He died 1737, aged 76.

SOMNER, William, an eminent antiquary, born at Canterbury, 30th March, 1606. After finishing his education at Canterbury school, he became assistant to his father, who was engaged in the ecclesiastical courts of the diocese, but antiquities, and not law, were his particular study. In 1640, he published "the Antiquities of Canterbury," a very valuable performance, and by the encouragement of his friend Meric Casaubon, he devoted himself laboriously to the acquisition of the old Gaelic, Irish, Scotch, Danish, Gothic, Saxon, and other northern dialects, that he might with greater accuracy and success develop the records of ancient times. Thus celebrated, he was consulted by the most learned of the nation, and when the Anglicanæ Historiæ Scriptores decem, &c. were published he prepared the Glossary for that valuable work. He was in 1657, at the recommendation of archbishop Usher, nominated to the vacant Saxon lectureship at Cambridge, by Spelman the patron, and in consequence of this appointment he finished his Saxon dictionary, published at Oxford, 1659. Before the restoration he was imprisoned for petitioning for a free parliament, but in 1660, he was made master of St. John's hospital, Canterbury. He published in 1660, in 4to. a treatise of Gavel Kind, &c. a most capital work. He died 30th March, 1669, leaving several valuable papers behind him. His library was purchased for the use of Canterbury church. He was in private life a most respectable and benevolent man, acquainted with the most learned persons of the age. He was twice married.

SOPHOCLES, an Athenian, distinguished as a warrior, and particularly as a tragic poet. He was 20 times rewarded with the poetical prize, and had for his master Æschylus, and for his rival Euripides. Only seven of his plays are extant, to prove how deservedly he was entitled, for the spirit and elegance of his language, and the sublimity of his thoughts, to the applauses of his admiring countrymen.

SOPHONISBA, daughter of Asdrubal, and wife of king Syphax, married afterwards Masinissa on the defeat and death of her first husband. The marriage was displeasing to Scipio, and Sophonisba, obliged to abandon her second lord, poisoned herself in obedience to his commands, B. C. 203.

SORANUS, an Ephesian physician, who settled at Rome, under Trajan and Adrian. Some of his works are extant. Another physician of that name wrote a treatise on the Diseases of Women.

SORBAIT, Paul, imperial physician, and professor of medicine, at Vienna, was born at Hainault. He was author of Commentaries on the Aphorisms of Hippocrates, 4to.; Medicina Universalis, Theoretica et Practica, fol.—Consilium Medicum, &c. and died 1691, at a great age.

SORBIERE, Samuel, a French writer, born in the diocese of Usez, 1610 or 1615. He lost his parents in his youth, and was educated by his maternal uncle, the learned Petit, and afterwards studied divinity at Paris, which he relinquished for medicine. He visited Holland, and wished to settle at Leyden; but in 1653 he abandoned the protestant religion for the popish, and published a Vindication of his Conduct, dedicated to Mazarin. He was at Rome, and was noticed by the pope, and then visited England, and published an account of his voyage thither, though he resided only three months in the country; but his abuse and scurrility were so offensive, that not only Sprat, but Voltaire himself, is severe upon his work; and for this satirical composition he was dismissed from the office of historiographer of France, by the French government. He afterwards paid his court to Clement IX.; but he received no higher preferment, as some suspected the soundness of his faith. He was in general a fair, unblemished character, and died of a dropsy at Bonne, 9th April, 1670. He wrote various publications, about 20 in number, though none of any importance. He was a correspondent of Hobbes, and had the art of sending his letters on philosophical subjects to his friend Gassendi, and then of transmitting, as his own, his answers to the English philosopher, who, thus deluded, admired the abilities, and the profound learning of his French associate.

SORBONNE, Robert de, founder of the celebrated college of that name at Paris, was born at Sorbon, near Rheims, 1201. Though originally poor, yet he acquired celebrity as a preacher, and became chaplain to Lewis IX. and when made canon of Cambrai, he laid the foundation of his college, 1253. He died 1274, and left all his property to the improvement of his college, which has produced many respectable members. He wrote some theological tracts, &c. now little read.

SOREL, Agnes, a native of Fromenteau, in Touraine. She was maid of honour to the queen of Charles VII. of France, who became enamoured of her, and at last abandoned the cares of government for her loved society. Agnes, weak only in the presence of her royal lover, influenced him to deeds of glory, and roused him to attack the English forces, which depopulated his kingdom. She maintained her influence over the heart of Charles till her death, which happened 9th Feb. 1450, in her 40th year, at Mesnel, near Jumieges. Some have reported, but falsely, that she was poisoned by order of the dauphin Lewis XI. From her beauty she was called by the poets of the age, the fairest of the fair, and in the powers of the mind, had she preserved her virtue, she might have equalled the most celebrated of her sex. She bore three daughters to Charles VII.

SORGH, Hendrick, a painter of Rotterdam, who studied under Teniers, and excelled in the representation of fairs, markets, &c. He died 1684, aged 61.

SORRI, Peter, an Italian painter. He was born at Sienna, and died 1622, aged 66.

SOSIGENES, an astronomer of Egypt, whose abilities were employed by J. Cæsar, in the reformation of the calendar. He made the Julian year consist of 365 days, B. C. 45.

SOSTRATES, an architect of Cnidos, who built the celebrated tower of Pharos, in the bay of Alexandria. He flourished B. C. 273.

SOTADES, a Grecian poet of Maronæa, in Thrace. It is said that he was thrown into the sea in a leaden chest by order of Philadelphus, of Egypt, whom he had ridiculed in a satirical poem.

SOTHEL, Seth, governor of North Carolina, succeeded Eastchurch in that office. He became a proprietor by purchase from Lord Clarendon. On his passage to America he was captured by the Algerines, and until his liberation and arrival in the colony the government was administered by Harvey. Sotelh conducted in a manner so intolerably unjust, that the assembly compelled him to relinquish his office, and depart from the colony. He retired to South Carolina, and was made governor there in the room of Colleton in 1690. He proved to be arbitrary and rapacious, and was removed within two years, and died in North Carolina in 1694. Governor Ludwell succeeded him. L.

SOTO, Dominic, a learned Dominican, born 1494, at Segovia, where his father was a gardener. He studied divinity at Alcalá, and at Paris, and entered among the Dominicans on his return to Spain, and was made, in consequence of his abilities, confessor to Charles V. by whom he was sent in 1545, to the council of Trent. Though distinguished for eloquence, he possessed little ambition, and refused the bishopric of Segovia, and early resigned the place of imperial confessor. He died 1560. He wrote a Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans—a treatise, de Justitiâ et Jure—De Pauperum Causâ—De cavendo Juramentorum Abusu, &c. There was another of the same name also, at the council of Trent. He came to England with king Philip, with the intention of restoring the universities to the catholic faith, and died 1563. He was author of some theological tracts.

SOUBISE, John de Parthenai, lord of, of an illustrious house in Poitou, was one of the chief leaders of the protestants. He came from Ferrara, where he had enjoyed the favour of the duke, to France, and was sent by the prince of Condé, his new patron, to defend Lyons, and he behaved there with such bravery, that the duke of Nemours was obliged to raise the siege. This great man, so much loved by the Calvinists, and dreaded by the catholics, died 1566, aged 54, leaving one daughter.

SOUBISE, Benjamin de Rohan, duke of, son of Renatus de Rohan, by the only daughter of the preceding, distinguished himself on the side of the protestants, and ably defended with his brother, the town of Rochelle against the arms of France. In 1621, he long maintained the independence of St. John d'Angeli against Lewis XIII. and when he surrendered, he obtained honourable terms, and a free pardon. The next year he took Oleron, and extended his conquests over Poitou; but a reverse of fortune obliged him to fly, and he retired to England, where he died 1640.

SOUCHAI, John Baptist, a French writer, born at St. Amand, near Vendome. He distinguished himself as a member of the academy of inscriptions, to whose memoirs he made valuable contributions, and he became canon of Rodez, counsellor to the king, and professor of eloquence in the royal college. He translated sir Thomas Browne's Vulgar Errors, 2 vols.—edited Ausonius, 4to.—and Pellison's works, 3 vols. 12mo. and died 1746, aged 59.

SOUCIET, Stephen, a Jesuit, born at Bourges, 12th Oct. 1671. He taught rhetoric and divinity in his society, and afterwards was librarian to the college of Louis the Great, and died at Paris, 14th Jan. 1744. He wrote Astronomical Observations in China and India, 3 vols. 4to.—Critical Dissertations on difficult passages in Scripture, 4to.—Dissertations against Newton's Chronology, 4to. &c. His brother Stephen Augustin died two days after him. He was professor of theology at the college of Louis the Great, and he wrote poems on Comets, 8vo.—Agriculture, with notes, 8vo. in Latin, a pure and elegant style.

SOUFFLOT, James Germain, an eminent architect, born at Trenci, near Auxerre, 1713. His inclinations to study architecture were thwarted by his father; but he left home, and travelled to Italy, where he perfected his knowledge, and returned to France, to give the most convincing proofs of his abilities. He was engaged at Lyons, and afterwards at Paris became comptroller of the buildings of Marly and the Thuilleries, and superintendent of the royal buildings. His greatest work is the church of Genevieve; but it is said that the opposition raised against him, and the consequent vexations, shortened his days. He died 29th Aug. 1780, aged 67.

SOUTH, Robert, a celebrated English divine, son of a merchant, born at Hackney, Middlesex, 1633. He was educated under Busby, and in 1651, was elected to Christchurch, Oxford. Here he greatly distinguished himself by his talents both as a poet and a preacher; but it must be observed that his character, if we may credit Wood, his contemporary, was neither candid or consistent. When Cromwell had made peace with the Dutch he congratulated him in a Latin poem, and abused the independents in the pulpit, whilst he favoured the cause of the presbyterians; but when the restoration approached, he in-veighed with the most eloquent zeal against presbyterians, and every denomination of dissenters. His abilities were so respectable, however, notwithstanding his time-serving character, that he was in 1660, elected public orator of the university, and the next year became chaplain to lord Clarendon, and in consequence of this connexion obtained a sinecure in Wales, and the degree of D.D. conferred by the university. In 1670 he was made canon of Christ church, and in 1676, attended Hyde, ambassador to Poland, and at his return published an account of that kingdom. In 1678, he was made by the chapter of Westminster, rector of Islip; but though some have imagined that he was eager after higher preferment, and dissatisfied, it is asserted that he lived in retirement at Caversham, near Reading, and refused not only an English bishopric, but an archbishopric in Ireland, offered him by Rochester, the lord lieutenant. At the revolution he took the oaths of allegiance, and might have again received a high ecclesiastical dignity. In 1693 he had a controversy with Sherlock about the Trinity, which was carried on with great acrimony, and though the university of Oxford declared in his favour, yet the dispute was not allayed till the king published a decree to forbid the meddling with the subject of the Trinity, except in a manner agreeable to the doctrines of the church of England. This controversy was finally ridiculed in the "Battle Royal," a popular ballad, which exposed to public derision the two disputants, and Dr. Burnet, of the Charter-house. In Anne's reign South did little, though he was a warm advocate of Sacheverell, and of his doctrines. He died 8th July, 1716, aged 83, and was buried in Westminster abbey. Though learned and eloquent, South was not an amiable character; he was morose, overbearing, and haughty, and while his zeal for religion rendered him popular, his disposition, and the violence of his manners, showed him to be a disagreeable man. His sermons have often appeared in 6 vols. 8vo. and possess great merit, and unite, with judgment and erudition, art and a strong vein of satirical moroseness. His Opera Posthuma, &c. appeared in 2 vols. 8vo. 1717.

SOUTHERN, Thomas, an English dramatist born at Stratford on Avon, Warwickshire, 1662. He was servitor at Pembroke college, Oxford, where he took his degree of B.A. and then went to settle in London. He now began to publish plays, and by this employment acquired a very comfortable subsistence. The Loyal Brother, or Persian Prince, appeared in 1682, to compliment the duke of York, who when on the throne gave him a captain's commission. In 1721 he obtained for his "Spar-an Dame" 150*l.* a high price at that time, and he was the first who extended the advantage of play-writing to a second and third night. The most affecting of his plays, and perhaps of all English plays, is his "Innocent Adultery," and the most finished is his "Oroonoko," or the Royal Slave, borrowed from a true story from Mrs. Behn's novel. He wrote besides Isabella, or the Fatal Marriage, and also the Disappointment, and the Rambling Lady, comedies. The last 10 years of his life he lived at Westminster, and was there a regular attendant at the abbey service. He died 26th May, 1746, aged 83. He has been blamed for mixing tragedy and comedy together, a monstrous impropriety, of which, it is said, he was in his latter days fully sensible, though he had thus complied with the vitiated taste of the times. His dramatic works were published by T. Evans, 3 vols. 12mo.

SOZOMEN, Hermias, a native of Palestine, who practised as an advocate at Constantinople, and was author of an Ecclesiastical History from 324 to 439. He died about 450.

SPAGNOLETTO, Joseph Ribera, a painter, born at Xativa, near Valentia, 1589. Though born of poor parents his industry enabled him to travel into Italy, and after studying the best masters at Parma and Rome, and copying the beauties of Caravaggio and Correggio, he settled at Naples, where his abilities were patronised and encouraged by the viceroy, and the great men of Europe. His pencil delighted in works of horror, and therefore scenes of torture, and of martyrdom, the torments of Ixion, and Prometheus, and Cato tearing his own bowels, are painted by him with such great correctness, and such forcible expression, as to astonish and terrify the beholders. He died 1656.

SPAGNOLI, Baptist, a native of Mantua, who became general of the Carmelites, and distinguished himself by the sound and virtuous regulations which he attempted to introduce among the corrupted members of his order. He devoted himself much to studious pursuits, and wrote verses with great facility, but not always with equal success. His works, containing eclogues and other poems, and prose miscellanies, &c. were edited at Venice, 1499, 4to. and at Antwerp 1576, 4 vols. 8vo. He died 20th March, 1516, aged 72.

SPAIGHT, Richard Dobbs, governor of North Carolina from 1792 to 1795. In 1783 he was elected a delegate to congress, and the following year was appointed one of the "committee of the states." He was also a delegate to the convention which framed the constitution of the United States. He was killed in a duel with

SPALLANZANI, Lazarus, a celebrated naturalist. He was born at Scandiano near Reggio, 1729, and studied at Bologna, after which he retired to private meditation. Being elected professor at Pavia he devoted himself to natural history, and made various and important experiments in physiology. In 1779 he began to travel, and in 1785 he visited Constantinople, the plains of Troas, and the islands of Corfu and Cythera. He afterwards came to Vienna, where the emperor Joseph received him with great ceremony and every mark of esteem, and on his return to Pavia he was greeted by the most affectionate respect of his pupils and friends. In 1788 he went to Naples and Sicily, and examined, with philosophical accuracy, the wonders and the productions of the Appenines. He died of an apoplexy 12th Feb. 1799 at Pavia. He published, Letters on the Origin of Fountains—Experiments on the Re-production of Animals—Essay on Animalculæ in Fluids—Microscopical Experiments—Memoirs on the Circulation of the Blood—Observations on the Transpiration of Plants—Travels in the two Sicilies and the Appenines, 6 vols.—Correspondence with eminent Men—Observations on the Influence of Confined Air, &c.

SPANHEIM, Frederic, divinity professor at Leyden, was born at Amberg, in the Upper Palatinat, 1600. He was educated under his father, a learned man, and then studied at Heidelberg and Geneva. He refused a professorship at Lausanne, and in 1631 succeeded to a divinity chair at Geneva, which he left in 1642 to settle at Leyden, where he had been honourably invited. Here he distinguished himself as a professor, and also as a preacher, in the Walloon church, and was respected by the queen of Bohemia, the prince of Orange, and Christina of Sweden. He died May, 1649. He wrote Exercitationes de Gratia Universali, 3 vols. 8vo.—Dubia Evangelica, 2 vols. 4to.—the Swiss Mercury—Life of Count Dhona, 4to. &c.

SPANHEIM, Ezekiel, a learned writer and statesman, eldest son of the preceding, born at Geneva, 1629. He early displayed great abilities, and at the age of 16 he wrote an ingenious defence of Buxtorf against Capellus, in favour of the Hebrew characters which his antagonist declared had been lost by the Jews, but preserved by the Samaritans. This performance he afterwards called unripe fruit, and candidly assented to the opinion of Capellus, which before he had attacked. On his father's death he left Leyden for Geneva, where he was honoured with the title of professor of eloquence, and soon after he became tutor to the son of Charles Lewis, elector palatine. On this new appointment he devoted himself not only to literary pursuits, but to political studies, and was employed by the elector as envoy to the court of Rome, where he was treated with unusual respect by Christina of Sweden and other great characters. After being employed by the elector in several negotiations, especially in Holland, at Mentz, at the congress of Breda, and in Engiand, he next entered into the service of the elector of Brandenburg, and was his envoy extraordinary at Paris, and in London. When the elector of Brandenburg assumed the title of king, he created him his minister, baron of the Prussian dominions, and again in 1702 employed him as his ambassador in England. He spent there the remainder of his days, and died 25th Oct. 1710, and was buried in Westminster abbey. Though so much engaged in political affairs, Spanheim wrote much and with great success and ability. The best known of his works are, De Præstantiâ, et Usu Numismatum Antiquorum, 2 vols. folio—Letters and Dissertations on Medals—Julian's works edited with notes, folio—besides notes on some Classical Authors, published by his friends.

SPANHEIM, Frederic, son of Frederic, and brother to the preceding, was born at Geneva, 1632, and carried to Leyden by his father. He studied under Hereboord, Golius, and Boxton, and after distinguishing himself as a preacher at Utrecht, he was invited to the chair of divinity at Heidelberg, by the elector palatine, 1565. After acquiring reputation here as a professor, he removed in 1670 to Leyden, where he succeeded to the professorship of divinity and sacred history with universal approbation. His laborious studies enfeebled his health, and he died 1701, in consequence of a palsy. He left only one son out of several children whom he had by three wives. His writings are very numerous, and were printed at Leyden, 3 vols. folio. They are chiefly on theological subjects, of which the chief is his Ecclesiastical History.

SPARROW, Anthony, a native of Depden, Suffolk, educated at Queen's college, Cambridge, from which he was expelled for refusing to subscribe to the covenant, 1643. On the restoration of the second Charles, he was placed at the head of his college, made archdeacon of Sudbury, and in 1667 raised to the see of Exeter, from which he was translated to Norwich. He compiled a collection of Articles, Injunctions, Canons, &c. and also published Rationale, or the book of Common Prayers 1657, 8vo. improved afterwards with additions, and again edited 1722. This pious and learned divine died in his diocess, 1685.

SPARTACUS, a Thracian shepherd, who escaped from a school of gladiators, and collected so formidable a number of adherents, that he was enabled to conquer some of the Roman armies. He was at last defeated by Crassus, B.C. 71.

SPARTIANUS, Ælius, a Latin historian, author of the Lives of the Roman emperors from Cæsar to Dioclesian.

SPEED, John, a celebrated historian, born at Farrington, Cheshire, 1555. Though originally a tailor, and of some eminence in his profession, he abandoned the needle for the pen, and in 1596, under the patronage of Mr. Fulke Greville, he published his "Theatre of Great Britain," afterwards improved and enlarged. His History of Great Britain, under the Conquests of the Romans, Saxons, Danes, and Normans, appeared 1614, dedicated to James I. and was recommended by verses from sir Henry Spelman, and other learned men. He published also, 1616, the Cloud of Witnesses, or Genealogies of Scripture, &c. a valuable book of divinity, often bound up with the Bible. He died 28th July, 1629, and was buried in St. Giles's, Cripplegate. He had 12 sons and six daughters by his wife, who died the year before him, after a union of 57 years. He was an able antiquary, and had his education been equal to the powers of his natural genius, as Nicolson observes, he would greatly have outdone himself.

SPELMAN, sir Henry, an eminent antiquary, born at Congham, near Lynn, Norfolk, of a respectable family, 1561. He was two years at Trinity college, Cambridge, and then entered at Lincoln's Inn. He was sheriff for Norfolk, 1604, and became so well known for his abilities, that James sent him three different times into Ireland on public business, and appointed him at home one of the commissioners to inquire into the fees exacted in all the courts and offices of England. He received a present of 300*l.* for his services, and was knighted by the king. When 50 years old, he settled in London with his wife, and devoted himself there totally to literary pursuits, and to the company and correspondence of the great and the learned of the age; of Usher, Williams, Selden, Cotton, Abbot, Laud, Dugdale, Salmasius, Rigaltius, Bignonius, and others. He founded a Saxon lectureship at Cambridge, but the intervention of the civil wars prevented the full execution of his wishes in this respect. He died in London, 1641, and was buried in Westminster abbey, near Cambden. He had eight children, four sons and four daughters, the eldest of which sons, John, was knighted by king Charles I. and was made master of Sutton's hospital. Sir Henry was member of the old society of antiquaries, and wrote several valuable works, the best known of which are, "de non Temerandis Ecelesiis," against sacrilege, or alienating the church lands—Glossarium Archæologicum, of which only the first part to the letter L, was published by himself, 1626; a second volume was collected from his papers, and published by sir William Dugdale after the restoration—an edition of the English Councils, 2 vols. folio, of which the second volume was edited by sir William Dugdale also—Villare Anglicanum, folio—Reliquiæ Spelmaniæ, folio, edited by Gibson, 1698, and again printed by the same learned editor in 1723. Sir John, the son, wrote among other things, two political tracts—Alfred's Life, &c. and died 25th July, 1643, greatly esteemed by the king. His funeral sermon was preached and published by Usher.—Clement, the youngest son of sir Henry, was also a learned man, and made one of the judges of the exchequer after the restoration. He wrote a Discourse on the Time of observing Easter—tracts on Astrology—Rules for judging the Weather, &c. and died June, 1679, and was buried in St. Dunstan's church, Fleet-street.

SPENCE, Joseph, an elegant scholar and divine, born in Northamptonshire, and educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford, of which he was fellow. In 1727 he published "an Essay on Pope's Odyssey," &c. which, though coldly praised by Dr. Johnson, is allowed by Warton to possess great merit; and, indeed, far from irritating the poet, it procured his friendship, and to that connexion the critic owed some of the preferment which he afterwards held. In 1728 he was elected poetry professor at Oxford, and travelled as tutor with lord Lincoln, afterwards duke of Newcastle. In 1742 he was made professor of modern history, and also obtained from his college Great Horwood rectory, in Buckinghamshire, where he never resided, and in 1754 he was promoted to a stall in Durham cathedral. On the 20th Aug. 1768, he was found drowned in a canal in his garden, at Byfleet, and though the particulars of the melancholy accident must remain unknown, it is generally supposed that in a fit he fell with his face downwards into the water, where it was too shallow to cover his head, and was thus suffocated. He published an Account of his friend Stephen Duck, 1731—an Account of the Life and Writings of Blacklock—some pieces preserved in Dodsley's Miscellany, and other compositions; but the work for which he is deservedly admired as a man of genius and of taste, is his "Polymetis," or an Inquiry on the Agreement of the Roman Poets, and the Remains of Ancient Artists, to illustrate each other, folio, 1747. This work, though fastidiously censured by Gray, has met with universal approbation, and has been highly commended by Lowth, Johnson, and Warton. Our amiable author made several communications about Pope, whom he attended in his last moments, to his friend Warton, and as he had formed memorials of his conversation, his assistance must be considered as valuable, and his anecdotes as authentic.

SPENCER, John, an ingenious divine, born in Kent, 1630, and educated at Corpus Christi college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, and in 1667 master. In 1677 he was made dean of Ely, and after a life usefully devoted to literature and religion, he died, May, 1695, and was buried in the chapel of his college. He published some occasional sermons; but his works best known are, a Discourse concerning Prodigies, &c. a learned composition—a Latin Dissertation concerning Urim and Thummin, 1668—and in 1685 his celebrated work, de Legibus Hebræorum Ritualibus, et eorum Rationibus, which has met with opposition from various quarters, because, while he vindicates the ways of God to men, he asserts that many of the rites and ceremonies of the Jews are deduced from the practices of their heathen neighbours. This work was edited with the author's notes by Leonard Chappelow, Cambridge, 1727, folio.

SPENCER, William, fellow of Trinity college, Cambridge, published, in 1658, Origen's eight books against Celsus, &c. in 4to. with annotations, and a Latin version.

SPENCER, Joseph, general in the American army of the revolution, was a native of East Haddam, Connecticut. He entered the northern army during the French war, in 1758, with the rank of major, and was soon advanced to a colonelcy, and served with reputation. In 1775 he was appointed a brigadier-general, and the following year major-general in the continental army. He resigned his commission in 1778, and was the next year elected to a seat in the continental congress. He died in 1789, aged seventy-five years.  L.

SPENER, Philip James, a Lutheran divine of Frankfort on the Maine, born in Alsatia, 1635. He became in 1680 founder of a new sect, called Pictists, which maintained that only persons inspired by the Holy Ghost could understand the Scriptures, a doctrine which produced many enthusiasts, and was at last checked by the interference of the civil power. He settled at Dresden, and afterwards at Berlin, where he held some ecclesiastical dignities, and died 1705, aged 70.

SPENSER, Edmund, a celebrated English poet, born at London, and educated at Pembroke-hall, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree, 1576. He left Cambridge upon being an unsuccessful candidate for a fellowship at Pembroke, and for some time resided with some friends in the North, where he fell in love with his fair Rosalind, whose beauties and cruelty he has laboriously painted. His first publication was the Shepherd's Calendar, which was dedicated to sir Philip Sidney, a great favourite at court, and a fond admirer of good poetry. By means of this worthy patron, he was introduced at court, and appointed poet laureat, with a salary of 50*l.* and his verses pleased Elizabeth so much that she ordered Burleigh to present him 100*l.* to which the sagacious minister objected, as being too much for a song. "Then give him," replied the queen, "what is reason." The gratuity, however, was delayed, till the impatient poet presented to the queen the following lines :

*I was promised on a time,
To have reason for my rhyme ;
From that time until this season,
I received nor rhyme nor reason :*

which were graciously received, and immediately obtained the promised reward. He was afterwards employed by lord Grey de Wilton, the lord lieutenant of Ireland, as his secretary, and for his faithful services he was rewarded with a grant of 3000 acres of land in the county of Cork, and in the mansion on this estate he spent some time, and completed his celebrated poem, "the Faery Queen." The rebellion, however, disturbed his repose ; he was plundered and robbed of his estate, and broken in heart and fortune, he came to London, where he died 1598. He was interred in Westminster abbey, near Chaucer. A monument was erected to his memory by Robert Devereaux, earl of Essex. Though he is said on his monument to have been born 1510, and to have died 1596, these dates are false, according to Camden, who fixes the time of his death 1598. As a poet Spenser is deservedly regarded as little inferior either in invention or in judgment, and in the true fire of the muse, to any author in ancient or modern times. But, with all his beauties, he was, says Rymmer, fanciful and chimerical, and without uniformity, so that his poem is truly fairy land. His language, unfortunately, is becoming obsolete, and the form of his stanzas is heavy and ill-judged ; but though his characters are generally all equal in the possession of moral virtues, and not drawn with sufficient discrimination ; and though for every adventure a hero is raised by the inventive powers of the poet, yet the composition is interesting, grand, and sublime, full of variety, and animated by the happy efforts of a most fertile imagination. The best edition of this valuable poem is that published by Todd, in 6 vols. 8vo. with notes, 1805.

SPERLING, Otto, a native of Hamburg, who studied medicine in Italy, and after travelling in Dalmatia, settled as physician at Bergen in Norway. He afterwards went to reside at Copenhagen, as physician to the king of Denmark ; but he was involved in the disgrace of count Ulfeld, and was sent to prison, 1664, where he died, after a long confinement, 1681. He wrote a Catalogue of the Plants of Denmark, 1642, 12mo. &c.

SPERLING, John, a native of Zeuchfield in Thuringia, professor of medicine at Wittenberg, where he died, 1658, aged 55. He was author of Institutiones Physicæ—Anthropologiæ Physicæ, &c.

SPERONE, Speron, a polite writer, born at Padua, 1500. He lived for some time at Rome, patronised by Pius IV. who knighted him, and employed him in embassies to Venice, France, and Spain. He died at Padua, 1588. His works are written in excellent Italian, and consist of orations, dialogues, letters, dissertations, and a tragedy, called Canace.

SPIELMAN, James Reinhold, a physician born 1722, at Strasburg. After travelling over Europe, and residing some time at Berlin, he returned to his native city, where, as professor of medicine and chymistry, his lectures were attended by numerous and respectable classes. He promoted the establishment of a botanical garden at Strasburg, which is now one of its principal ornaments, and he died Sept. 1782, universally esteemed. He published Elementa Chymicæ, 8vo.—Prodromus Floræ Argentiniensis, 8vo.—Institutiones Materiæ Medicæ—Syllabus Medicamentorum—Pharmacopœia Generalis, 4to. &c.

SPIERINGS, Henry, a native of Antwerp, born 1633, and eminent as a painter of landscapes. His pictures exhibit great skill and judgment, and his trees and rural scenery are particularly admired.

SPIERS, Albert Van, an admired historical painter, born at Amsterdam. He improved his talents by studying in Italy, and afterwards settled in his native country, where he acquired celebrity and fortune. He died 1718, aged 52.

SPICELIUS, Adrian, a native of Brussels, professor of surgery and anatomy at Padua. He died at Brussels, 1625, aged 47. His works were published at Amsterdam, 1645, in folio. The smaller lobe of the liver bears his name, as he is supposed to have discovered it.

SPIILBERG, John, a native of Dusseldorf, first painter to the elector Palatine. His altar pieces, portraits, and historical drawings, possessed great beauty. He died 1691, aged 72. His daughter Adriana excelled as an artist in crayons. She married Vander Neer.

SPILBERG, George, a Dutch admiral, who defeated the Spaniards in the south seas, about 1616. An Account of his Adventures is published among the Dutch voyages.

SPINCKES, Nathaniel, an eminent divine, born at Castor, Northamptonshire, 1654. He entered at Trinity college, Cambridge, and though after his father's death possessed of a respectable fortune, he applied for a Rustat scholarship at Jesus, which he obtained as an honourable proof of his abilities, after a strict and prolonged examination. In 1681 he was chaplain to the duke of Lauderdale, and in 1685 obtained the rectory of Peakirk, Northamptonshire, and afterwards was promoted to a stall at Salisbury, and to the rectory of St. Mary in that city. He, however, lost all his preferments in 1690, for refusing to take the oaths to William, and lived afterwards in some distress, and in dependence upon the contributions of other nonjurors, of whom he was elected one of the bishops. He died 28th July, 1727, and was buried in St. Faith's cemetery, north side of St. Paul's. By his wife, who died seven days after him, he had many children, of whom only two survived him. He wrote various pious books and devotions—the Sick Man visited, a sixth edition of which appeared 1775.

SPINELLO, Aretino, an Italian painter, born at Arezzo, in Tuscany, 1323. His portraits, madonnas, and historical pieces, were much admired, and are highly finished. He died 1420. His son Paris was also an eminent painter, and died 1422, aged 56. It is said of him that, in a picture of the fallen angels, he represented the devil in so hideous a form, that the evil spirit haunted him in his dreams, and demanded with threats what authority he had to give him so horrible a delineation.

SPINOLA, Ambrose, a famous general in the service of Spain, where he was born 1569, but descended from a Genoese family. He distinguished himself in Flanders, and as commander in chief, took Ostend, 1604. His abilities were eminently displayed against Maurice of Nassau, the greatest hero of the age, whom he opposed with skill and military judgment. After the truce of 1608, he lived in retirement, till fresh troubles called him again to take the field, and to make Aix-la-Chapelle, Wesel, and Breda, submit to his arms. In 1629 he was employed in Italy, where he took Casal; but the court of Spain disconcerted his measures, and prevented his obtaining possession of the citadel, in consequence of which he fell sick, and died soon after, 1630, exclaiming, "they have robbed me of my honour."

ter, son of a Portuguese Jew, born at Amsterdam, 1638. He studied medicine and theology, but his religion was so loose, and his inquiries for the reason of every thing which he was to believe, became so offensive to the rabbis, that he was thrust out of the synagogue. In consequence of this he became a Christian, and was baptized; but his conversion was insincere, and though during his life he did not openly profess himself an atheist, his posthumous works plainly proved him such. He died of a consumption at the Hague, Feb. 1677, aged 45. He is the founder of a regular system of atheism, and by his hypothesis he wished to establish that there is but one substance in nature, which is endowed with infinite attributes, with extension and thought; that all spirits are modifications of that substance, and that God, the necessary and most perfect being, is the cause of all things that exist, but does not differ from them. These monstrous doctrines, though not new, were thus built into a regular system by this extraordinary man, who is said in other respects to have been of a good moral character in private life, benevolent, friendly, and charitable. His conduct was marked by no licentiousness or irregularity; but he retired from the tumults of Amsterdam, to a more peaceful residence at the Hague, where curiosity led princes, philosophers, and learned men to see and to converse with this bold asserter of atheism. His works were "Tractatus Theologico-Politicus," 4to. 1670—Opera Posthuma, 4to. Few have studied the abstract and difficult principles of Spinoza, and fewer have followed them. Toland may be said to approach nearest, as a free-thinker, in his "Pantheisticon," to the opinions of the Dutch philosopher, and his sentiments seem in some degree to be the repetition of those of his atheistical predecessor.

SPIRA, Francis, a Venetian lawyer of eminence in the 16th century. Being accused before the papal nuncio of favouring the tenets of the reformation, he was compelled to make a public recantation of his opinions to save his life, and this had such effect upon his spirits, that he was seized with a dreadful melancholy, which baffled all the aid of medicine, and carried him to his grave, under the most poignant agonies of mind, 1548.

SPON, Charles, an ingenious Frenchman, born at Lyons, 1609. He studied at Ulm and Paris, and in 1632, went to Montpellier, to devote himself more attentively to medicine. He took his degree of M.D. there, and settled at Lyons, where he practised with great success, and died 21st Feb. 1684, highly respected. He was an excellent scholar, and had such facility of writing Latin verses, that Bayle says had a copy of some of his iambics, on the Deluge and last Conflagration, which, though written at the age of fourteen, would have done credit to established abilities, if composed in moments of leisure. He had an extensive correspondence with the learned of Europe, and was particularly attached to Gassendus, and to his philosophy. He published the Prognostics of Hippocrates, in hexameter verses, dedicated to his friend Guy Patin.

SPON, James, son of the preceding, was born at Lyons, 1647, and after a careful education, was admitted doctor of medicine at Montpellier, 1667, and member of the Lyons college of physicians two years after. In 1675 he began to travel into Dalmatia, Greece, and the Levant, in company with Mr. Wheeler, of which he published an interesting account. He left France on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, 1685, with the intention of retiring to Zurich, but died on the way at Vevey, on the lake Leman, 1696. He was member of several learned societies, and was a most respectable character, than in whom, says Bayle, the qualities of a learned and of an honest man were never more happily united. He wrote various works, the best known of which are, Recherches des Antiquités de Lyons, Svo. 1674—Ignotorum atque Obscurorum Deorum Aræ, Svo. 1677; Histoire de la Ville et de l'Etat de Geneve, 2 vols. 12mo. 1680; Voyage de la Grece et du Levant, 3 vols. 12mo. 1677—Recherches Curieuses d'Antiquité, 4to. 1683—Miscellanea, &c.

SPONDANUS, John, or DE SPONDE, a learned man, born at Mauleon de Soule in Biscay, 1557. At the age of twenty, he began a commentary on Homer's Iliad and Odyssey, printed at Basil, 1583, folio, full of much erudition, though sometimes trifling. He abjured the reformed religion, and left the court of his patron, Henry of Navarre, afterwards the fourth of France, and retired to the mountains of Biscay. He died 1595, and was buried at Bourdeaux. He published Aristotle's Logic in Greek and Latin, at Basil, with notes, 1583.

SPONDANUS, Henry, younger brother of the preceding, was born 1568, and educated at the reformed college of Ortez. He became early eminent for his knowledge of Greek and Latin, and afterwards studied the civil and canon law, and recommended himself to the notice of Henry IV. of France, then Prince of Bearn, who made him master of the requests at Navarre. He abandoned the protestant religion 1595, and then retiring to Rome, took orders, and obtained, on his return to France, the see of Pamiers from Lewis XIII. He died at Toulouse, 1643. He abridged his friend Baronius's Annales Ecclesiastici, and wrote besides, Annales Sacri a Mundi Creatione ad ejusdem Redemptionem, &c.

SPOTSWOOD, John, archbishop of St. Andrews, was descended from an ancient family, and born 1565. He was educated at Glasgow, where he distinguished himself, and afterwards attended as chaplain the duke of Lenox, in his embassy to France, and when James I. took possession of the English throne in 1603, he was in the number of his attendants. That year he was made bishop of Glasgow, and privy counsellor of Scotland, and in 1615 was translated to the see of St. Andrews. In 1633 he crowned Charles I. as king of Scotland at Holyrood-house, and in 1635 was made chancellor of the kingdom. The troubles of the country obliged him to leave his situation, and he retired to England, where he sunk under his infirmities, and the melancholy state of public affairs. He died in London, 1639, and was buried in Westminster abbey. He wrote an history of the Church of Scotland, published 1655, folio. It was begun at the command of James I. and is regarded as accurate. His second son, sir Robert, was a man of abilities, patronised like his father by James I. and by his successor. He shared the fortunes of the great Montrose, and was put to death with him.

SPOTSWOOD, Alexander, governor of Virginia, succeeded Jennings in 1710. He was a man of uncommon enterprise and public spirit, a friend of learning and religion, and exercised a useful administration. He was succeeded in 1723 by Drysdale. In 1730 he was appointed post-master general of the colonies, and in 1739 commander of the forces raised against Florida, but he died at Annapolis, June 7th, 1740.

SP L.

SPRAGG, Edward, a valiant Englishman, He commanded the Royal Charles in the first engagement with the Dutch fleet in 1665, and behaved with such courage, that the king knighted him in his own ship. The following year he distinguished himself under the duke of Albemarle, in the fight which continued four days with the Dutch, and in 1667 he contributed to the defeat of the same enemy by burning some of their ships when they attempted to sail up the Thames. He was employed in 1671 against the Algerines in the Mediterranean, where he destroyed seven of their men of war; but two years after he was unfortunately drowned in the dreadful engagement with Van Tromp, as he was passing in a small boat from his ship, which was sinking in the fight, to another.

SPRANGHER, Bartholomew, an eminent painter, born at Antwerp, 1546. He was at Rome, and was patronised by cardinal Farnese, and by Pius. V. for whom he painted the "Day of Judgment" at Belvidere. On his return to Germany he was in the service of the emperor Maximilian II.

and was so great a favourite with his successor Rodolphus, that he was honoured with a gold medal, and with a pension, and raised to the rank of nobility. He visited his country in his old age, and every where heard his productions admired. He died at Prague, 1623.

SPRAT, Thomas, an English prelate, born at Tallaton, Devonshire, 1636, and educated at Wadham college, of which he became fellow. He here began to cultivate poetry, and published in 1659 his poem on the death of Cromwell, dedicated to Dr. Wilkins. He afterwards wrote the "Plague of Athens," a poem, and another poem on the death of Cowley. After the restoration he took orders, and was chaplain to Buckingham, and then to the king. He also became an active promoter of the establishment of the Royal Society, of which he was one of the first members, and of whose labours he published the history, 1667. He next wrote Observations on Sorbiere's Voyage to England, and in 1668 edited his friend Cowley's poems. Thus distinguished as a writer, he was amply rewarded by preferments. In 1668 he became prebendary of Westminster, afterwards minister of St. Margaret's church, canon of Windsor, and in 1683 dean of Westminster, and next year bishop of Rochester. In 1685 he was prevailed upon to write the history of the Rye-house plot, and as he had been liberally noticed by James II. and made dean of the chapel royal, he was appointed one of the commissioners for ecclesiastical affairs. In this office he acted with some timidity, and then at last withdrew; but when it was debated whether the throne was vacant by the flight of James, he boldly stood the manly advocate of his master. He, however, submitted to the revolution, and took the oath; but an infamous attempt was made by some unprincipled informers to involve him in trouble by forging his name, and by introducing into his house the plan of a pretended plot, all which, however, proved his innocence, and after some confinement, left him the exercise of his episcopal duties. He died 20th May, 1713. His character is delineated with some degree of asperity by Burnet; but it should be remembered that they were rivals and enemies, and that while Burnet preached before the Commons, he made the pulpit the vehicle of sedition, and Sprat there displayed his zeal and loyalty in favour of the government. Besides the works already mentioned, he wrote a Relation of the wicked Conspiracy of Stephen Blackhead and Robert Young, who united to rob him of his Honour and of his Life—and also sermons, 8vo.—poems, &c. It has been observed that every book of his composition is of a different kind, and has its distinct and characteristic excellence.

SPRING, Samuel, D. D. congregational minister of Newburyport, Massachusetts, was born in Worcester county in that state, Feb. 27th, 1746, and graduated at Princeton college in 1771. He was licensed to preach in 1774, and the following year, became chaplain to a volunteer corps, which marched under colonel Arnold, through the wilderness to Canada. He left the army at the close of 1776, and in August of 1777 was ordained pastor of the North Congregational Church in Newburyport, where he continued until his death, March 4th, 1819. He possessed a vigorous and well-cultivated mind, was distinguished for simplicity, zeal, and energy as a preacher, and was one of the most ardent and efficient friends of the benevolent institutions which adorn his native state, especially of the Theological Seminary at Andover, and the Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. His chief publications were a Dialogue on Duty, and a volume of Disquisitions. 3 L.

SPURSTOW, William, D. D. master of Catherine hall, Cambridge, from which he was expelled in the civil wars for refusing the engagement, was afterwards minister of Hackney, of which he was deprived in 1662, for nonconformity. He was member of the Westminster assembly of divines, and assisted also at the Savoy conference. He was author of a treatise on the Promises, 8vo.—the Spiritual Chymist, 8vo.—the Wiles of Satan, and sermons, and died 1666. He was also engaged in the attack on episcopacy, under the name of Smeatymnus, Vid. NEWCOMEN.

SQUARIONE, Francis, an Italian painter, who acquired such celebrity, that he was called the father of painters. He improved himself by viewing the most valuable antiquities preserved in ancient Greece, and died 1474, aged 80.

SQUIRE, Samuel, D. D. a learned prelate, son of an apothecary at Warminster, Wilts, where he was born, 1714. He was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, and afterwards was successively made archdeacon of Bath, rector of Topsfield, Essex, in 1750 rector of St. Anne's, Westminster, vicar of Greenwich, and in 1760, dean of Bristol. The following year he was raised to the see of St. David's, and died May 6th, 1766. In the various characters of pastor, bishop, husband, father, and friend, he was a most excellent and amiable pattern. He left two sons and a daughter. The best known of his works are, a Defence of the Ancient Greek Chronology—and an Inquiry into the origin of the Greek Language, 8vo.—Inquiry into the Nature of the English Constitution, 8vo.—Indifference to Religion inexcusable, 12mo.—the Principles of Religion made easy to Young Persons, &c.—a character of his first patron Herring, &c.

STAAL, Madame de, a French lady, daughter of a painter called de Launai, well educated in a convent by the favour of the abbess. She was in the service of the dutchess of Maine, and shared her disgrace by being confined two years in the bastille, and afterwards she married de Staal, an officer of the Swiss guards. She died 1750, leaving her memoirs, published afterwards in 3 vols. 12mo. to which a fourth was afterwards added, containing two comedies. She possessed great wit and vivacity, as her memoirs fully prove, and it was this which recommended her to the notice and friendship of la Fontenelle, and other learned men.

STABEN, Henry, a Flemish painter, who studied under Tintoret, and acquired celebrity by his historical pieces, and particularly by his views of perspective. He died 1658, aged 80.

STACKHOUSE, Thomas, a pious divine, for some years curate of Finchley, and afterwards vicar of Beenham, Berks, where he died 11th Oct. 1752. He wrote several things, and among them a History of the Bible, 2 vols. folio, a popular and valuable work, often reprinted—a System of Practical Divinity, fol.—a Tract on the Miseries of the inferior Clergy, 8vo.—a Review of the Controversy concerning Miracles, &c. a complete Body of Divinity—an Exposition of the Apostles' Creed, &c.

STADIUS, John, a native of Loenhout, in Brabant, who became professor of history at Louvain, and afterwards filled the chair of mathematics and history at Paris, where he died 1579, aged 52. His knowledge of mathematics was disgraced by his fondness for astrological calculations. He wrote Ephemerides, 4to.—Tabula Æquabilis et Apparentis Motus Cælestium Corporum—a Latin Commentary on Florus—Fasti Romanorum, &c.

STAEL, Anne Louisa Germaine Necker, baroness de, was the daughter of the celebrated M. Necker, and born at Paris, in 1766. She received a liberal education, and early displayed extraordinary talents; but the new philosophy, as it was called, gave a masculine tone to her mind. In 1786 she married baron de Stael, a Swede, by whom she had four children, two of whom only survived her. In 1789 Madame de Stael began her literary career, in "Letters on the Writings and Character of Rousseau;" and soon afterwards she took an active part in the French Revolution. In 1793, her husband being appointed ambassador to the new republic, gave Madame de Stael an opportunity of exerting herself in those political intrigues to which she had a great propensity. Bonaparte, however, had no esteem for female politicians, and in 1803 banished her from the capital. Upon this she went to Germany, next to Italy, and twice visited England. She died July 15th, 1817. Her principal works are, 1. "On the Influence of the Passions upon Individuals and Nations." 2. On the Influence of Literature upon Society. 3. "Delphine," a novel. 4. "Corinne, or Italy," a novel. 5. Germany, or Observations on that country.—W. B.

STAFFORD, Antony, a writer, descended from a noble family, and born in Northamptonshire. He received his education at Oriel college, Oxford, and was made master of arts, 1623. He was a man of great learning, and died 1641. His works are, Niobe dissolved into Nilus, or his age drowned in her own Tears, 12mo.—Meditations and Resolutions, 12mo.—Life and Death of Diogenes—the Life of the Virgin Mary, or Female Glory—the Pride of Honour—Honour and Virtue triumphant over the Grave, exemplified in the Life and Death of Henry lord Stafford, 4to. His Female Glory proved very offensive to the puritans of England.

STAHL, George Ernest, an eminent German chymist, born in Franconia, 1660. He studied medicine, and was, in 1694, made professor of that science, on the foundation of the university of Hall. His reputation was so great that he was honourably invited to Berlin in 1716, and became there physician to the king, and counsellor of state. He died there 1734. As a chymist, he obtained great and deserved celebrity for nearly 50 years, and was the author of the Doctrine of Phlogiston. As a physician, he was fanciful, and maintained that every muscular action, whether from consciousness or not, proceeded from the will of the mind, which he asserted had at all times absolute power over the body. Of his valuable works these are the best known, Experimenta et Observationes Chymicæ et Physicæ, 8vo.—Theoria Medica Vera, 8vo.—a German Treatise on Sulphur, 12mo.—Opusculum Chymico-Physico-Medicum, 4to.—Fundamenta Chymicæ Dogmaticæ et Experimentalis, 3 vols. 4to.—Negotium Otiosum, 4to.—Commentarium in Metallurgicum Beccheri—a German treatise on Salts, &c.

STAHREMBERG, Conrad Balthasar, count de, governor of Vienna, is celebrated for the brave defence which he made when the city was besieged in 1683, by the Turks. He died at Rome, 1687.

STAHREMBERG, Guido Balde, count de, an Austrian general, who raised himself by merit to the highest military honours. He displayed great gallantry at the battle of Zenta, and by his courage and military skill insured the victory of Saragossa, 1719. He died at Vienna, 1737, aged 80.

STALBENT, Adrian, a native of Antwerp, distinguished as a painter. He is very happy in his delineations of nature, and, to great correctness, unites strong judgment. He died 1660, aged 80.

STAMPART, Francis, a painter, born at Antwerp, 1675. He settled at Vienna, where his abilities recommended him to the notice of the emperor, who made him his cabinet painter. He died there, 1750.

STANDISH, Miles, the first military commander at Plymouth, New-England, was born at Lancashire, about the year 1584. After having served some time in the army in the Netherlands, he settled at Leyden, with Mr. Robinson's congregation, and accompanied them to Plymouth in 1620. He was there chosen captain, or chief military commander, and rendered the most important services to the colony, in the wars with the Indians. Many of his exploits were peculiarly daring, and his escapes extraordinary. In 1625 he went to England, as an agent for the colony, and returned the following year. He lived from that time in Duxbury, holding the office of magistrate. He died in 1656. He was somewhat rough and passionate, but a daring and skilful soldier, and an upright magistrate.

STANHOPE, George, an able divine, born at Hartshorn, Derbyshire, March 1660, of a respectable family, which had suffered much during the civil wars. He was removed from Uppingham school to Eton, and was elected to King's college, Cambridge, where he took the degree of D.D. 1697. He first obtained Tewling rectory, Hertfordshire, and afterwards Lewisham in Kent, by the favour of Lord Dartmouth, in whose family he had been tutor, and soon after he became chaplain to the king. In 1701, he preached Boyle's lectures, and two years after exchanged Tewling for the vicarage of Deptford, and soon after was made dean of Canterbury in the room of Hooper, raised to the see of Bath and Wells. These preferments were due to his integrity, learning, and piety; and as one of our ablest divines, his writings must always be held in high esteem. This worthy man, whose private life was as virtuous and exemplary as his public conduct was useful, died 18th March, 1728, aged 68, and was buried in Lewisham chancel. He was twice married, and by his first wife, Olivia Cotton, he had one son and four daughters. The second wife survived him. The best known of his works are a Translation of Thomas à Kempis de Imitatione Christi, 8vo.—a Translation of Charron on Wisdom, 3 vols. 8vo.—Translation of M. Aurel. Antoninus's Meditations, 4to.—sermons on several occasions—a Translation of Epictetus, with Simplicius's Commentary, 8vo.—Paraphrase on the Epistles and Gospels, 4 vols. 8vo.—the Truth and Excellence of the Christian Religion, in sermons preached at Boyle's lectures, 4to.—Translations of Rochefoucauld's Maxims, 8vo.—of St. Augustine's Meditations—of Bishop Andrews's Greek Devotions—Parsons's Christian Directory, 8vo.—the Grounds and Principles of the Christian Religion, &c.

STANHOPE, James, earl of, of an ancient Nottinghamshire family, was born 1673. He embraced the military profession, and for his services at the siege of Namur, in 1695, king William gave him a company, and the rank of colonel. He served under the great Peterborough in Spain, and distinguished himself at the siege of Barcelona, and at the victories of Almanza and Saragossa; but he was obliged to surrender the citadel of Briheuga to the forces of Vendome, after a very brave resistance. Under George I. he was made secretary of state, and in 1714 went as ambassador to Vienna, and in 1717 was appointed first lord of the treasury, and chancellor of the exchequer. These services to his country were rewarded with an earldom. He died 3d Feb. 1721.

STANHOPE, Charles, the third earl, was grandson of the preceding, and born Aug. 3d, 1753. He received the early part of his education at Eton, and completed it at Geneva, where he applied chiefly to the mathematics, in which he made so great progress as to obtain a prize from the society of Stockholm, for a memoir on the construction of the pendulum. In 1774 he stood candidate for Westminster, but without success. By the interest of the earl of Shelburne, however, he was brought into parliament for the borough of Wycombe, which he represented till the death of his father, in 1786, called him to the Upper House. He distinguished himself at an early period of the French Revolution, by an open avowal of republican sentiments, and went so far as to lay aside the external ornaments of the peerage. He was also a frequent speaker; and on some occasions was left single in a minority. As a man of science he ranked high, and was the author of many inventions, particularly of a method of securing buildings from fire, an arithmetical machine, a new printing-press, a monochord for turning musical instruments, and a vessel to sail against wind and tide. He was twice married, first to lady Hester Pitt, daughter of the great earl of Chatham, by whom he had three daughters; and secondly to Miss Grenville, by whom he had three sons. He died Dec. 16th, 1816. He published some philosophical pieces, and a few political Tracts.

W. B.

STANHOPE, Philip Dormer, earl of Chesterfield, a distinguished nobleman and able writer, born in London, 22d Sept. 1694. After a private education he entered at the age of 18, at Trinity hall, Cambridge, where he studied the classics with great assiduity. In 1714, after two years residence he left the university to make the tour of Europe, and after receiving lessons of gaming at the Hague, and polishing his manners under the tuition of the dissipated belles of Paris, and visiting Italy, he returned home the next year. He became gentleman of the bed-chamber to the prince of Wales, and in the first parliament of George I. was elected member for St. Germain's, and then began his political career. He proved himself an able and accomplished speaker; but after defending the septennial bill, he followed the prince of Wales in his opposition to the measures of the court, and no offers could persuade him to espouse the cause of the ministry. The death of his father in 1726, removed him to the house of lords, and in this place he began to distinguish himself more as an orator than he had done in the house of Commons. Elegant and perspicuous in his delivery, with an inexhaustible command of language, adorned by all the graceful arts of high bred urbanity and sportive facetiousness, he acquired decisive superiority above all other orators, and riveted the attention of his auditors by the dignified and vehement powers of his eloquence, and the fascinating touches of his raillery and humour. When George the second was raised to the throne, Chesterfield, who had faithfully served him, was placed in offices of trust and honour. He was in 1728 sent ambassador to Holland, and for his services there, was rewarded with the garter, and the office of high steward of the household. He returned in 1732, to England; but his determined opposition to Walpole stripped him of his offices, and he desisted from attending the court, where he was now received with coldness and indifference. During 12 years he continued to attack the measures of government from the ranks of opposition; but the coalition of parties, in 1744, restored him to a seat in the cabinet, and the following year he was again engaged in a short embassy in Holland. He hastened back from the continent, to take the office of lord lieutenant of Ireland, and in this high situation he had the happiness by the mildness of his government, to conciliate the affections of the Irish nation. He left Ireland in 1746, and became principal secretary of state, but resigned two years after. Though infirmities and deafness came now rapidly upon him, yet he attended his duty in the house of lords, and in the debates, for the alteration of the style, 1751, he distinguished himself by an eloquent speech in favour of the plan. He lived with increasing infirmities to the 24th March, 1773. As a public character lord Chesterfield is highly esteemed, as from his rank, his influence, and his experience in political intrigues, he was, for many years, a distinguished leader. He wished not only to appear a man of letters, but to be the patron of learned men; and his friendship with Pope, and the other wits of the time, ensured him celebrity. His conduct, however, to Dr. Johnson, from whom he expected an adulatory dedication of his dictionary, exposed him to the reprobation and indignant contempt of that unbending moralist. Lord Chesterfield wrote some papers in the World, and some poetical pieces, inserted in periodical publications; but his fame as an author rests on the celebrated letters which he sent to his natural son. These letters are written in an elegant and fascinating style; but in wishing to form his son for the higher ranks of life, he has shown himself the advocate of hypocrisy, licentiousness, and infidelity. The applause of the world was the governing principle of his life; but it was not by virtue alone that the polished peer endeavoured to command popularity, but by every art which can, without hesitation, sacrifice honour, religion, and morality, to its favourite objects. The publication of his letters prove him to be an excellent scholar; but they display a studied relaxation of principle, and as Johnson says, inculcate the morals of a strumpet with the manners of a dancing master. He was married to Melosina de Schulenburg, countess of Walsingham, but had no children. His favourite son, to whose education he had so ardently and anxiously devoted himself, died Nov. 1768, and left him in a state of deep and lasting despondency. His letters appeared first in 2 vols. 4to. 1774, and his miscellaneous works also, in 2 vols. 4to. 1777, and have since frequently been published in other forms.

STANISLAUS, Leczinski, king of Poland, was born at Leopold 20th Oct. 1676. He was son of the grand treasurer of the kingdom, and to an elegant person joined an insinuating address, which prevailed so much with Charles XII. of Sweden, to whom he was deputed in 1704, by the assembly of Warsaw, that he determined to make him master of the kingdom, which his valour had conquered. Stanislaus was accordingly crowned at Warsaw, 1705, in the room of the deposed Augustus, agreeably to the will of the victorious Swede, and he continued attached to his benefactor, till the defeat of the Swedes at the battle of Pultowa, and the incursions of the Russians rendered his situation dangerous, and obliged him to fly from the kingdom. Augustus was restored to his crown, but on his death, in 1733, Stanislaus, though supported by the interest of Lewis XV. who had married his daughter, was unable to reascend the throne, and re-remained satisfied with the humbler title of duke of Lorraine and Bar, in which character he gained the affection of his new subjects, and deserved the name of the Beneficent. He died Feb. 23, 1766, in consequence of being burnt by his night gown catching fire. Stanislaus was author of "Euvres du Philosophe Bienfaisant," 4 vols. 8vo. in which he delineates the character of a true philosopher, meaning himself.

STANISLAUS AUGUSTUS PONIATOWSKY, king of Poland, was son of a private gentleman in Luthuania, by the princess Czar-torinski, of the illustrious family of the Jagellons, was born 1732. After receiving an excellent education he travelled to Paris, where the friendship of the Swedish ambassador recommended him to the notice of the great, but his expenses were so extravagant that he was liberated from prison only by an act of generosity in the wife of a rich merchant. From Paris he came to London, and became intimately acquainted with sir William Hanbury, whom he accompanied in his embassy to Russia. The elegant person and high accomplishments of Poniatowsky here captivated the heart of the grand dutchess, afterwards Catherine II. which gave so much offence to the empress Elizabeth, that the young favourite was recalled by order of Augustus III. of Poland. The death of Augustus, in 1763, interested Catherine in the fortunes of her favourite, and by her influence, and the terror of her armies he was elected king of Poland, 7th Sept. 1764, in the diet of Wola. The new monarch gained all hearts by the moderation and prudence of his government, but unfortunately religious disputes disturbed the peace of the kingdom, the dissidents or protestants, who had been excluded by the catholics from offices of trust and emolument, laid claim to new indulgences, and were supported in their petition by the ambassadors of England, Prussia, and Russia. Stanislaus favoured their cause, and thus rendered the catholics his most inveterate enemies, so that they formed the plan of taking him prisoner or destroying him. Three bold conspirators at the head of 40 dragoons disguised like peasants, entered Warsaw, 3d Nov. 1771, and seized the unsuspecting king as he was returning in his carriage at ten of the clock of the evening. After much personal violence they mounted him on a horse, and rode away from the town, but during the darkness of the night these assassins lost their road, and on the return of light, Stanislaus exhausted, found himself in the custody of only one of the conspirators, on whom he prevailed to conduct him back to Warsaw. In 1787, Stanislaus visited Kanieff, and after an absence of 23 years had an interview with Catherine, whom he accompanied in her tour through Tauris and Caucasus, to the borders of Persia. Though loaded with presents and honours by this ambitious princess, the Polish king soon saw his dominions invaded by her armies, and in 1792, all his efforts and the valour of Kosciusko were unable to arrest the career of her arms. Wilna and Warsaw were taken, and Catherine, after having frequently declared herself the protectress of the independence of Poland, consented to share the disunited kingdom with the emperor of Germany and the king of Prussia. In 1795, prince Reppin delivered a letter to the unfortunate Stanislaus, which commanded him to descend from the throne, and his people from the rank of nations. Stanislaus retired to Grodno, and forgot the dangers of greatness and of royalty in the obscurity of a private life, and afterwards, on the accession of Paul to the Russian throne, he was sent for to Petersburg, where every mark of respect and attention was paid to him. He died at Petersburg, 11th April, 1798. This unfortunate man, if he had possessed more vigour and decision, might have retarded if not totally averted the dangers which ruined the monarchy; but he was more calculated to shine in private life than adorn a throne, and uphold the fates of a falling empire. He was well informed and the friend of the learned, and he spoke and wrote with ease the seven languages of Europe.

STANLEY, Thomas, an elegant writer, educated at Pembroke hall, Cambridge. He was knighted, and resided at Cumberlowgreen, Herts, where he devoted himself to literature. He wrote poems and other things, but he is better known as the father of the learned Thomas Stanley, with whom he is confounded by Dr. Birch, &c.

STANLEY, Thomas, Esq. son of the above, was born at his father's house, Herts, 1644. He was admitted at Pembroke hall, Cambridge, where he distinguished himself as a polite scholar, and good philologist. After taking his degrees he travelled through France, Italy, and Spain, and on his return entered at the Middle Temple. Not the law, however, but literature was his pursuit, and he published in 1665, an edition of Ælian's Various History with notes. His next work was the History of Philosophy, containing the lives, opinions, &c. of philosophers of every sect, 4to. dedicated to his uncle John Marsham, Esq. a composition of great and acknowledged merit, which passed through four editions, and was translated into Latin for the use of the German literati—and in 1664, appeared his "Eschylus," cum Versione et Commentario. He wrote besides, various remarks on Eurripides, Sophocles, and other classical authors, besides commentaries on Æschylus in 8 vols. fol. which have remained in manuscript. This worthy man, who had thus early given such strong and valuable proofs of his learning and application, died in 1678, when scarce 34.

STANLEY, John, an English musician, born in London 1713. He lost his sight when two years old, and at the age of seven he devoted his attention to music, under the care of Dr. Green, and with such effect that he was chosen organist of All-Hallows church, Bread-street, in his 11th year. In 1723, he was made organist of St. Andrew's, Holborn, in 1734, he was elected by the benchers, organist of the Temple church, and in 1779, he was nominated master of the king's band. His execution on the organ was particularly admired, and his compositions displayed the most correct taste, and the soundest judgment. He died 1786.

STANNINA, Gerard, a painter, born at Florence. He studied under Venetiano, and was eminent for the correctness of his historical pieces. He was patronised by the king of Spain, and died 1403, aged 59.

STANYHURST, Richard, a native of Dublin, son of the speaker of the Irish house of commons, was educated at University college, Oxford. After studying the law in London he returned to Ireland, and married, and became a Roman catholic. He afterwards went abroad, and entering into orders was appointed chaplain to Albert archduke of Austria, governor of the Netherlands. He died at Brussels, 1618, aged about 72. He was universally esteemed as a good divine, an eminent philosopher, and a tolerable poet and historian. He wrote various things, the best known of which are, de Rebus in Hiberniâ Gestis—Harmonia, seu Catena Dialectica in Porphyrium—Vita Sancti Patricii—the four first books of the Æneid translated into English hexameters—the Principles of the Catholic Religion, &c. He was uncle to archbishop Usher.

STAPLEDON, Walter, a native of Devonshire, educated at Oxford. His abilities recommended him to the notice of the court, and he was advanced in the church, and made bishop of Exeter, and treasurer of England. He distinguished himself as a patron of learning, and founded Exeter college, Oxford. His conduct in office rendered him afterwards unpopular, and he was seized in an insurrection in London, and cruelly beheaded at Cheapside cross, 1326.

STAPLETON, Thomas, an eminent controversialist, born at Henfield, Sussex, 1585, and educated at Canterbury and Winchester schools, from which he was removed to New college, Oxford. In Mary's reign he obtained a prebend of Chichester, but on Elizabeth's accession he left the kingdom with his family, and retired to Louvain, where he was made regius professor of divinity, canon of St. Peter's, and dean of Hilverbeck. He died 1598, and was buried in St. Peter's church at Louvain. He was an indefatigable writer in favour of the Roman catholic religion. His works were published in 4 vols. fol. Paris 1620.

STAPYLTON, sir Robert, a native of Carleton, Yorkshire. Though the son of a catholic family, and educated at Douay, he became a protestant, and was gentleman to the prince of Wales, afterwards the second Charles. He was zealously attached to the fortunes of Charles I. and served with valour at the battle of Edgehill, and was knighted. At the restoration he was reinstated in his honours, and died 1669. He was a very intelligent man, and a poet of some merit. He translated Juvenal, and also wrote some plays, &c.

STARK, John, general in the American army of the revolution, was a native of Londonderry, New-Hampshire, and born August 28th, 1728. He removed while young with his father's family to Manchester in that state, where he continued to reside till his death. Soon after the commencement of the French war of 1755, he entered the army with a company of rangers, and immediately distinguished himself by his activity, prudence, and courage. At the opening of the revolution he was placed at the head of the New-Hampshire troops, and rendered important aid at the battle of Bunker's hill. In the following year he was removed to the northern army, and had command of fort Independence. In November he joined the army under Washington, and led the van at the memorable battle of Trenton, and afterwards aided at the battle of Princeton. On the invasion of Burgoyne in 1777 he received the command of the New-Hampshire militia to oppose him, and had the honour by his skill and intrepidity of achieving the first step toward the capture of that general by the defeat of colonel Baum in the battle of Bennington. In 1778 he was intrusted with the defence of the northern frontier, and the two following years served with the main army. He returned to his command in the north in 1781, and continued there till the close of the war. His death took place, May 9th, 1822, in the ninety-fourth year of his age.

STAROVOLSKI, Simon, a native of Poland. He wrote in Latin a geographical account of his country, and lives of an hundred illustrious Polish writers. He flourished in the 17th century.

STATIRA, daughter of Darius, was taken at the battle of Issus, and became the wife of Alexander. She was murdered by Roxana, B.C. 323.

STATIUS, Pub. Papinius, a Latin poet, born at Naples. He was the flatterer of Domitian, and died about 100 A.D. His Thebais, and his Achilles remain, two heroic poems of considerable merit.

STAVELEY, Thomas, Esq. a native of Cussington, Leicestershire, who was educated at Peter-house, Cambridge, and afterwards studied the law at the Inner Temple, and was called to the bar 1654. He succeeded his father-in-law, Onchyé, as steward of the records of Leicester, 1662, but the latter part of his life was clouded by habitual melancholy, probably arising from too intense an application to his studies. He died 1683. He wrote the Romish Horseleech, or a discovery of the enormous exactions of the court of Rome, 8vo.—the History of Churches, and also made collections for the history and antiquities of Leicestershire.

STAUNTON, sir George Leonard, a native of Galway in Ireland. After finishing his education at home he passed into France, and studied medicine at Montpellier, where he took his doctor's degree, and then returned to settle in London. In 1762, he went to Grenada, and became secretary to the governor, lord Macartney, whom, after the capture of the island by the French, he accompanied back to England. When his patron and friend went as governor to Madras, he attended him as his confidential secretary, and so great were his abilities, and so important his services, that on his return to Europe he was raised to the dignity of baronet, and received in the most honourable manner a pension from the East India company. In the embassy of lord Macartney to the court of China, sir George accompanied his noble friend as secretary of legation, and in consequence of the opportunities of information which he had, and the judicious observations which he made, he presented to the world a very valuable and interesting account of that mighty and populous empire, 2 vols. 4to. and three 8vo. Sir George was intimate with men of science and literature throughout Europe, and was made honorary doctor of laws by the university of Oxford. Among other things he published a translation of the medical essays of Dr. Storck, a physician of Vienna. He died in London, 18th Jan. 1801.

STEBBING, Henry, an English divine, known for his attacks on Hoadly in the Bangorian controversy, and on Warburton on the publication of his Divine Legation. He died 1763, chancellor of the diocese of Salisbury. His other works are, sermons preached at Boyle's lecture, 8vo.—Collection of Tracts, 8vo.—Sermons on Practical Christianity, 2 vols.—and Tracts against Dr. James Forster on the subject of Heresy.

STEDMAN, John Gabriel, a native of Scotland, author of a narrative of an expedition against the revolted negroes in Surinam, with 89 plates, 2 vols. 4to. The work is interesting and accurate, as he was present at the transactions of which he relates the history. He died at Tiverton, 1797, aged 52.

STEELE, sir Richard, a celebrated English writer. He was born in Dublin, where his father, a counsellor at law, was private secretary to the duke of Ormond. He came very young to England, and was educated at the Charter-house, where he had Addison for his school-fellow. In 1695, he wrote "the Procession" on Queen Mary's funeral, and afterwards obtained an ensigncy in the guards, he wrote "the Christian Hero," to strengthen his mind in habits of religion and virtue, against those seducing pleasures to which a military life exposed him. This little work, valuable for the morality and piety of its contents, was dedicated to lord Cutts, who in consequence noticed him, and not only made him his secretary, but gave him a captain's commission in Lucas's fusiliers. His first comedy called the Funeral, or Love-a-la-Mode, was acted with great applause in 1702, and the next year the Tender Husband appeared, and in 1704, the Lying Lovers. By the friendship of Addison he was introduced to the patronage of lords Halifax and Sunderland, and obtained the appointment of Gazetteer, and in 1709, under the name of Isaac Bickerstaff, he began the Tatler, the first number of which was published 12th April, and the last 2d Jan. 1711. He next engaged with Addison in the Spectator, which first appeared 1st March, 1711, and afterwards in the Guardian, of which the first number appeared 12th March, 1713. He resigned in 1713, the place of commissioner of the stamp office which he held, to sit in parliament for Stockbridge, but his parliamentary career was short, as his papers in the Englishman and in the Crisis, were voted by the house to be scandalous and seditious libels, and he was therefore, after an able vindication of himself in a speech of three hours, expelled by a majority of 245 against 152. He now engaged in defending the rights of the house of Hannover, and in exposing the arts of the pretender, and in reward for his loyalty he was, on the accession of George I. made surveyor of the royal stables at Hampton court, and governor of the royal company of comedians, and in 1715, knighted by the king. In the first parliament of the new monarch he was elected member for Boroughbridge in Yorkshire, and after the suppression of the rebellion he was made one of the commissioners of the forfeited estates in Scotland. Though engaged in offices of trust and business, Steele did not forget his character as a writer, but occasionally produced political pamphlets. His account of the Roman catholic religion throughout the world appeared in 1715, and it was followed by "a letter from the earl of Mar to the king,"—a second volume of the Englishman—the Spinster—a Letter to Lord Oxford on the Peccage Bill—the Crisis of Property—the Nation a Family, on the South Sea Scheme. During the publication of "the Theatre," a periodical paper, his patent of governor of the comedians was withdrawn 1720, but though he exerted himself against the intrigues of the lord chamberlain, he never could recover it, though he computed the loss occasioned by that arbitrary measure little less than 10,000*l.* His comedy of the Conscious Lovers, appeared in 1722, and was received with great applause, and procured to him a present of 500*l.* from the king, to whom it was dedicated. In the decline of life Steele became paralytic, and retired to his seat of Llangunnor near Caermarthen, in Wales, where he died 1st Sept. 1729, and was very privately interred. He was twice married, by his first wife, from whom he inherited a valuable plantation in Barbadoes, he left no children, and by the second, who brought him the Welsh estate, he had one son and two daughters. As a writer Steele appears a very eminent character. The versatility of his talents, the extent of his information, and the deep acquaintance with polite literature, which he every where displayed, prove him to be an author of no ordinary rank, who would perhaps have shone to greater advantage if not united with the elegant Addison. Sir Richard in his private character was very eccentric, and often exposed himself to difficulties, from which all the interest and the ingenuity of his friends were required to extricate him. Among other methods which he adopted to better his fortune was the bringing fish alive to market, but though he obtained a patent and wrote a pamphlet to vindicate his plan, he failed, and thus heavily narrowed his income.

STEEN, John a painter born at Leyden. He studied under Brouwer, and Van Goyen, and was very happy in his delineation of grotesque and comical characters. He died 1689, aged 53.

STEENWICK, Henry, a Flemish painter, who studied under John de Vries, and excelled chiefly in the representation of architectural subjects and the inside of large buildings. He died 1603, aged 53. His son was also an artist of eminence, and died in London 1640.

STEEVENS, George, a native of London, educated at Kingston school, and King's college, Cambridge. He applied himself to polite literature, and in 1766, published 20 of Shakspeare's plays with notes, in 4 vols. 8vo. and his abilities as an annotator were so respectable, that Dr. Johnson joined him to himself in his edition of the immortal bard, which with their united labours appeared in 10 vols. 8vo. 1773. The text of Shakspeare was particularly familiar to this able critic, and therefore he published another edition of his works in 1793, in 15 vols. 8vo. and afterward assisted in correcting the proofs of Boydell's splendid edition of the great dramatist. He died at his seat, Hampstead, 1800.

STEFANESCHI, John Baptist, a native of Florence, eminent as a painter. He painted historical pieces, and also sacred subjects in miniature, for the collection of the grand duke of Tuscany. He died 1659, aged 77.

STEINBOCK, Magnus, an illustrious Swede. After distinguishing himself in Holland and Germany, he followed the fortunes of his master Charles XII. and contributed by his valour to the victories of Narva and of Poland. During the absence of his master from Sweden he governed the kingdom with wisdom and moderation, and defeated at Gadembusck the Danes, who attempted to disturb the general tranquillity. He afterwards advanced against Altona, but was taken at Tonningen, and died a prisoner of war in the castle of Frederickshaven, 23d Feb. 1717, aged 53. His memoirs have appeared in 4 vols. 4to. 1765. He is improperly called by some writers the last of Swedish heroes.

STELLA, James, an eminent painter, born at Lyons, 1596. He was much noticed by Cosmo de Medicis at Florence, and during a residence of seven years executed some excellent pieces of painting, designing, and engraving. He afterwards went to Rome, where he continued 11 years, and then returned to Paris, with the intention of going to Spain, but he was detained at Paris by the liberal patronage of Lewis XIII. and died there of a tedious consumption 1647. His pieces are much admired, and chiefly exhibit pastoral scenes, and the plays of children. His brother Francis was also eminent as a painter, but inferior to him. He died 1661.

STELLINI, James, a native of Forly in Italy, professor of Divinity at Padua, where he died 1770, aged 71. He was an ecclesiastic, and was respected as a man of learning. He wrote on ethics, a valuable work published 4 vols. 4to. Padua, 1778.

STENO, Nicholas, a Danish anatomist, born at Copenhagen, 10th Jan. 1638. He studied under Bartholin, and afterwards travelled over Germany, Holland, France, and Italy, and obtained an honourable pension from Ferdinand II. grand duke of Tuscany, who appointed him tutor to his son. In 1669, he renounced the protestant religion, but the wish of his sovereign Christian V. to establish him as professor at Copenhagen, proved abortive, and he settled in Italy, and became an ecclesiastic. The pope, in approbation of his conduct, appointed him apostolical vicar for Germany, and bishop of Titiopolis in Greece. He died at Schwerin, 1686. He was author of Elementorum Myologiae Specimen—Anatomical Observations and Discoveries, 1680, 12mo. —Latin Discourse on the Anatomy of the Brain, 12mo.

STEPHEN, St. first Christian martyr, was one of the seven deacons, and had been a disciple of Gamaliel. He was in A. D. 33 stoned by the Jews, on a charge of blaspheming God and Moses, and in his death he exhibited the meek and patient sufferer, who prayed for forgiveness on his murderers.

STEPHEN I. pope, succeeded to the papal chair after the martyrdom of Lucius, 253. He was engaged in a controversy with St. Cyprian and Firmilian, about rebaptizing penitents, who had been baptized before by heretics, and while he considered the imposing of hands upon such persons as sufficient to admit them into the church, his opponents held a contrary doctrine. He suffered martyrdom 2d Aug. 257, in the persecution of Valentinian.

STEPHEN II. a Roman, succeeded to the papal chair 752, after another pontiff of the same name, who lived only three days after his election. He was attacked by Astolphus king of Lombardy, who seized Ravenna, and threatened Rome, and in his distress he applied for assistance to Constantine Copronymus, emperor of the East, who being engaged in a war with Armenia, recommended his fortunes to Pepin king of France. Pepin thus reconciled to the pope, whom before he had offended, marched into Italy, defeated Astolphus, and stripping him of the exarchate of Ravenna, and 22 other towns, he bestowed them on the holy see, and thus laid the foundation of the temporal power of Rome. Stephen died 26th April, 757.

STEPHEN III. a native of Rome, succeeded to the vacant chair, 768. He tore out the eyes of Constantine, who had usurped the chair before him, and died 772.

STEPHEN IV. a Roman, elected pope after Leo III. 816. He again consecrated Louis the Debonair king of France, and died 25th Jan. 817.

STEPHEN V. pope after Adrian III. 885, died after a weak reign, 891.

STEPHEN VI. was elected in the room of the antipope Boniface VI. 896. He rendered himself ridiculous and unpopular by causing the body of his predecessor Formosus to be dug up, and to be tried in his pontifical robes, and to have the head severed from the body because he had been his enemy. This barbarous conduct revolted the affection of the Romans, who rose against their pontiff, and at last strangled him in prison, 897.

STEPHEN VII. successor to Leo VI. died 933, after sitting in the papal chair two years.

STEPHEN VIII. a German, raised to the holy see after Leo VII. 939. He was insulted and his face disfigured by the rebellious Romans, and died 942.

STEPHEN IX. brother of Godfrey, duke of Lorraine, was elected pope 1057, after the death of Victor, and died the next year, 29th March, at Florence.

STEPHEN, of Muret, Saint, son of the count de Thiers in Auvergne, devoted himself to a religious solitude, and passed the last 50 years of his life on the mountains of Muret, where he founded a monastery. He died 1124, aged 78.

STEPHEN I. St. king of Hungary after the death of his father Geisa 997, laboured earnestly to reform the barbarous manners of his people. After defeating some insurgents who opposed his measures, he introduced Christianity into the country, and divided the kingdom into 11 bishoprics. He confirmed the wholesome measures which he had adopted by a wise code of laws in 55 chapters, and he died much and deservedly regretted by the affection of his subjects at Breda, 1038. He was ably seconded in his pious and benevolent labours by the co-operation of his virtuous queen Gisela.

STEPHEN, of Byzantium, a grammarian of the 5th century, author of a Geographical Dictionary, inaccurately abridged by Hermolaus in the reign of Justinian, and published by Gronovius, fol. 1694, Leyden, in Greek and Latin, with the learned notes of Berkelius.

STEPHEN, a waivode of Moldavia, in the 16th century. He expelled the lawful sovereign of Moldavia, and was at last, in consequence of his tyranny, murdered in his tent with 2000 of his attendants, by the indignant Boyards.

STEPHEN, king of England, was third son of Stephen earl of Blois, by Adela the Conqueror's daughter, and was born 1105. By well-concerted measures he seized the English crown 1135, and thus in her absence dispossessed the lawful sovereign, Matilda the daughter of Henry I. who was wife of Henry IV. emperor of Germany. This usurpation was soon resented, Matilda landed with an army, 1139, and Stephen was defeated two years after at the battle of Lincoln, and taken prisoner. He was exchanged for Robert earl of Gloucester, the illegitimate brother of the empress, and on his liberation so managed his affairs that he at last triumphed over all opposition, and Matilda, unpopular on account of her pride, and supercilious conduct to the barons, left the kingdom 1147. Stephen, however, was not long to enjoy peace, and he found a new and powerful competitor in Henry, the son of Matilda, by her former marriage with Geoffrey Plantagenet, earl of Anjou. The kingdom was for a while distracted by civil war, till at last wiser sentiments prevailed, and an agreement was made between the two rivals 1153, by which it was stipulated that Stephen should enjoy the crown during his life, and that at his death, to the exclusion of his son, it should descend to Henry. Stephen died the following year, and Henry peacefully ascended the throne.

STEPHENS, Henry, a celebrated printer, the founder of the family of that name, born at Paris. Of the many valuable books which he printed, the best known is a Psalter, in five columns, published 1509. He died at Lyons, 1520, and his widow married Colinaeus, a printer also of reputation, who continued the business of the family till his death 1547. His three sons were men of extraordinary talents.

STEPHENS, Robert, second son of the preceding, was born at Paris 1503. After receiving a good education he was admitted into the printing-office of his father-in-law, Colinaeus, and in 1522 published for himself a New Latin Testament, which proved very offensive to the Paris divines. He set up for himself, and married soon after the daughter of Badius, the printer, a woman who was well versed in Latin, and could thus converse with the learned correctors of the press whom he kept in his house. His great Latin Bible appeared in 1532, and the clamours raised against him 10 years before were now repeated by the doctors of the Sorbonne, because he had printed the notes of Calvin to his work. Though protected by Francis I. who had appointed him his printer, he found the virulence of his enemies particularly pointed against him, and after the king's death in 1547, he left Paris and retired to Geneva, carrying with him, it is said, the types, and moulds of the royal press. He died at Geneva, 1559. In his business he was most exact and particular, he undertook the printing of none but good books, and so solicitous was he of correctness, that he exposed the sheets to public view, and promised a reward to such as could discover errors. His mark was a tree branched, and a man looking upon it, with the words noli altum sapere, to which he added sometimes sed time. His Hebrew Bible, 8 vols. 16mo. 1544, and his Greek Testament, 2 vols. 16mo. 1546, called mirificam, from the first word of the preface, are much admired. He was not only a good printer, but a learned man, the friend of Calvin, Beza, Rivet, and others, and his Thesaurus Linguae Latinae, 4 vols. fol. is an astonishing monument of his labour and erudition. He wrote also an Answer to the Censures of the Sorbonne Doctors to his Bible. He had three sons, Henry, Robert, and Francis, and one daughter. He had also two brothers, Francis and Charles; Francis worked with Colinaeus, and died at Paris, 1550, and Charles, the youngest of the family, wrote several valuable books. He went into Germany, with Lazarus de Baif, and was tutor to his son. He afterwards studied medicine at Paris, and took his degrees, but he, however, continued the profession of his family, and was appointed printer to the king. He died at Paris 1564, leaving only one daughter, who was very learned. He wrote more than 30 works on various subjects, of which were a Historical, Geographical, and Poetical Dictionary—de Vasculis, 8vo.—de Re Rusticâ, 2 vols. 8vo.

STEPHENS, Henry, son of Robert, just mentioned, was born at Paris, 1528. He was well educated, and considered as the most learned of his learned family, and the best Grecian of his time, after the death of Budæus. Before he applied himself assiduously to his father's business, he travelled into Italy, and afterwards visited Flanders and England. Though his father left Paris for Geneva, he still continued in France, and settled there, and then devoted himself to the correct printing of the Greek classics, and other valuable authors, of which he gave most elegant and learned editions. He was liberally patronised by Henry III. and sent by him to Switzerland, to make a collection of manuscripts; but the troubles which agitated the last years of that monarch's reign, extended to Stephens, who followed his father's example, and retired to Geneva. Stephens paid great attention, and expended large sums for the completion of a Greek Thesaurus; but when he expected his labours to be rewarded, he found that Scapula the printer, whom he confidentially employed, had dishonourably taken a copy of his papers, and offered to the world a Lexicon under his name, which was in some degree well received, and thus robbed the real author of the merit of his performance. This infamous conduct, though it did not lessen the reputation of Stephens, was, however, the cause of his ruin, the money he had spent in the collection was irrecoverably lost, as the Thesaurus did not sell, and the last years of his life were spent in poverty and distress. He died in an hospital at Lyons, 1598, leaving a son Paul, and two daughters, one of whom had married Isaac Casaubon. Besides the Thesaurus, a most valuable work, he wrote Introduction et l'Apologie pour Herodote, 3 vols. 8vo. a popular performance, which severely re-lected on the papists—de Origine Mendorum—a Version of Anacreon in Latin verses—Juris Civilis Fontes et Rivi, &c.

STEPHENS, Paul, son of Henry, was very learned, though inferior to his father. He continued his father's business at Geneva, but did not exhibit the same correctness and accuracy. He died at Geneva, 1627, aged 60, leaving a son Anthony, the last printer of the family. Anthony turned Roman catholic, and left Geneva for Paris; but though he was for some time printer to the king, his inattention and prodigality proved his ruin, and he was supported for the last years of his life in an hospital, where he died, 1674, aged 80. With him expired the glory of a family, which, for five generations, had laboriously contributed to the advancement of literature.

STEPHENS, Robert, an eminent antiquary, born at Eastington, Gloucestershire, and educated at Wotton school, from which he removed, in 1681, to Lincoln college, Oxford. He afterwards entered at the Middle Temple; but as his fortune was easy, and his fondness for polite literature very great, he did not apply much to the study of the law. He was for some time solicitor of the customs, by the influence of his relation Harley, earl of Oxford, and afterwards historiographer royal. He published lord Bacon's letters, with curious notes, and prepared materials for an history of James I. which he did not execute. He died at Gravesend, Gloucestershire, 9th Nov. 1732.

STEPHENS, John, an Englishman, educated at Douay, in the Romish persuasion. He espoused the fortunes of the exiled James II. and was captain in the army which invaded Ireland. After an act of amnesty had passed, he returned to London, and commenced writer. Among other valuable works he published a continuation of Dugdale's Monasticon—and a Dictionary, English and Spanish, folio, &c. He died about 1726.

STEPNEY, George, an English poet and statesman, born in London, 1663. He was educated at Westminster school, and Trinity college, Cambridge, where he formed an intimacy with Charles Montague, afterwards lord Halifax, which proved the source of all his future honours. Though he had paid his court to James II. he warmly embraced the principles of the revolution, and was employed as envoy to various courts in Germany, and though his abilities were not of a superior cast, he was very successful in his embassies. He was one of the commissioners of trade, and died at Chelsea, 1707, and was buried in Westminster abbey, where a pompous inscription marks the place of his remains. He is ranked among the minor poets, and besides some parts of Juvenal, he wrote some short pieces, "where," says Johnson, "a happy line may now and then perhaps be found, though there is neither the grace of wit, nor the vigour of nature."

STERNE, Laurence, an eminent writer, descended from Sterne, archbishop of York. He was born at Clomwell, in the south of Ireland, 24th Nov. 1713, where his father, an officer in the army, was then stationed; and after being nine years at school, at Halifax, Yorkshire, he entered at Jesus college, Cambridge. By means of his uncle, who was prebendary of York, he obtained the living of Sutton, and afterwards a prebend in York cathedral, and by the interest of his wife he added Stillington living to his other preferments. In 1760 he came to London to commence author, and in 1762, he travelled to France, and afterwards to Italy, for the recovery of his health; but a consumption on the lungs could not be removed by change either of air or of occupation. He died 1768, in London, and was buried in St. George's burial ground, Hanover square, and Garrick, his friend, penned these four elegant lines for his epitaph:

*Shall pride a heap of sculptured marble raise,
Some worthless, un mourned, titled fool to praise;
And shall we not by one poor grave-stone learn,
Where genius, wit, and humour, sleep with Sterne?*

The works of Sterne consist of the "Life and Opinions of Tristram Shandy," a sentimental romance, remarkable for its eccentricity, and for an interesting delineation of characters, but not without occasional obscenity—a Sentimental Journey—sermons—letters, published since his death. He is accused of plagiarism by Farrier, who discovers several striking parallel passages in Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy, bishop Hall's works, and other ancient books.

STERNHOLD, Thomas, an English poet, born in Hampshire according to Wood, and educated at Winchester school and Oxford, which he left without a degree. He was groom of the robes to Henry VIII. and had 100 marks left him by that king's will, and he continued in the same office with his successor. In his principles he was a rigid reformer, and was so highly offended at the obscene songs which were then in vogue, that he turned into English metre 51 of David's Psalms for the use of the courtiers, instead of lascivious sonnets. These were gradually introduced into parochial churches, and are still in repute, though the more elegant version of Tate and Brady, and that of Merrick, recommend themselves more powerfully to the attention of the musical ear. Of the rest of the Psalms, 58 were translated by Hopkins, a contemporary poet, and the remainder by Norton and other hands. No other composition of his is now extant. He died in London, 1549.

STESICHORUS, a Sicilian poet, distinguished also as a statesman. He died at Catania, in Sicily, at the age of 80. His compositions have perished.

STEBEN, Frederic William baron de, major-general in the army of the American revolution, was a distinguished Prussian officer, who had served for many years in the army of Frederic the Great, had been one of his aids, and attained the rank of lieutenant-general. He came from France to America in November, 1777, with high recommendations to congress, to which he offered himself as a volunteer to serve in whatever department he could render himself useful. He was soon appointed inspector-general, with the rank of major-general, and was of the greatest service to the army, by introducing a system of uniform manœuvres. He fought as a volunteer at the battle of Monmouth, and had command in the trenches in Yorktown, on the day that concluded the contest with the British. He was an accomplished gentleman, an able officer, and virtuous citizen. He died at Steubenville, New-York, November 28th, 1794.  L.

STEVENS, George Alexander, a native of London. He was brought up to a mechanical profession, but quitted it for the stage. The life of a theatrical hero, however, did not produce him popularity or fame, and he had recourse to a different mode of support. For several years he travelled over the kingdom, and even extended his excursions to America, lecturing on heads, in a style amusing and facetious, but often verging to licentiousness and sarcastic ribaldry; and having thus gained a comfortable income, he disposed of his lectures and of his heads to Lee Lewis. This eccentric character died at last in a mad-house, 1784. He was author of Tom Fool, a novel, 2 vols. 12mo.—some farces, songs, &c.—besides the Dramatic History of Master Edwards, in which he censured and ridiculed his old friend and companion Shuter.

STEVENS, Alexander, an architect of great merit, who died 1796, in a good old age. The bridge over the Liffey in Dublin, the aqueduct over the Lune at Lancaster, and the locks in the grand canal of Ireland, are, among many other public works, lasting and honourable monuments of his skill, perseverance, and ingenuity.

STEVENS, William Bagshaw, a native of Abingdon, educated at the grammar school there, and at Magdalen college, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship, and took the degree of D.D. He became usher, and afterwards master, of Repton school, Derbyshire, and by the patronage of the Harpur family, he was presented to the rectory of Seckindon, Warwickshire, and the vicarage of Kingsbury. He died 1800, aged 45. He wrote Retirement, a poem in blank verse, 1782, 4to.—Indian Odes, 4to.—Idyls in the Topographer—and some poetical pieces in the Gentleman's Magazine, and other periodical works.

STEVENS, Palamedes, an English painter, born in London, died 1638, aged 31. He was descended from Flemish parents, and studied his art at Delft. His battles and encampments possess great boldness and beauty. His brother Anthony excelled in the representation of conversations and in portraits, and died 1680.

STEVIN, Simon, a native of Bruges, who instructed prince Maurice of Nassau in mathematics, and was made superintendent of the dykes of Holland. It is said that he invented the sailing chariots which were for some time adopted by the Dutch. He died 1635. He is author of a Treatise on Statics—Geometrical Problems—Mathematical Memoirs—de Portuum investigandorum Ratione, &c. His mathematical works written in Flemish, have been translated into Latin by Snellius, 2 vols. folio.

STEWART, sir James, a Scotch baronet, who died 1789, aged 76. He is author of an Apology of sir Isaac Newton on Ancient Chronology—and a Treatise on Political Economy, a work of great merit, and replete with much information, though written in a negligent style.

STEWART, Matthew, a native of Rothsay in the isle of Bute, who after studying under his father, who was the minister of the parish, went to Glasgow university, to devote himself to theology. He afterwards studied mathematics at Edinburgh, where he succeeded his master Maclaurin in the mathematical chair. He died at Edinburgh, 1785, aged 68. He was author of tracts, physical and mathematical, on the Theory of the Moon, the distance of the Sun from the Earth, &c. 1761—Propositiones More Veterum Demonstratæ—general Theorems, published when he succeeded to the professor's chair, &c.

STIFELIUS, Michael, a protestant divine of Germany. He was born at Estingen, and died at Jena, 1567, aged 58. He wrote, in German, a Treatise on Algebra—another on the Calendar, &c. He foretold that the end of the world would happen in 1553, but he lived to witness the fallacy of his calculations, and the disgrace of his prophetic knowledge.

STILES, Ezra, D.D. president of Yale college, was born at New-Haven, Connecticut, December 15, 1727, and graduated at Yale in 1746, with a high reputation for talents and acquirements. In 1749 he was chosen a tutor in that seminary, and held the place six years. In the mean time he studied theology, and preached occasionally, but at length he turned his attention to law, and employed himself in its practice at New-Haven, a year or two. In 1755 he returned to the pulpit, and settled at Newport, Rhode-Island, where he continued till his congregation was dispersed by the war in 1776. He then preached for some time at Portsmouth; but being chosen to the presidency of the college in 1777, he went thither, and entered on the duties of the office in July the following year. He remained in that station till his death in May, 1795, in his 65th year. He was one of the most learned men the country has produced. He was critically familiar with the languages of the classics, and with the Hebrew, and had made large acquisitions in the knowledge of the other oriental dialects. He was also well versed in mathematics and philosophy, and a skilful theologian; zealous and impressive as a preacher, and a decided friend to the liberties of his country. His publications were not numerous, but he left more than 40 vols. of manuscripts. ¶ L.

STILLINGFLEET, Edward, an eminent prelate descended from an ancient Yorkshire family, and born at Cranbourn, Dorsetshire, 17th April, 1635. He was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, and by the patronage of his friend sir Roger Burgoyne, of Wroxall, Warwickshire, he obtained in 1657 the rectory of Sutton. He in 1659 published his Irenicum, or Weapon-Salve for the Church's Wounds, which, though written with great ability, gave offence to some of the churchmen of the times, but he added afterwards a discourse to another edition of it, to conciliate the favour of all parties. His greatest work, "Origines Sacræ, or a Rational Account of Natural and Revealed Religion," appeared in 1662, and though produced by a young man only 27 years old, astonished every reader for its erudition, elegance, strength, and clearness of argument. Thus recommended to public favour by his abilities, he was appointed preacher of the Roll's chapel, and in 1665 was presented to the rectory of St. Andrews, Holborn. He afterwards gradually advanced through preferments, became lecturer to the Temple, chaplain to the king, canon of St. Paul's, prebendary of Canterbury, dean of St. Paul's, and in 1689 was raised to the see of Worcester. He died of the gout at his house, Park-street, Westminster, March 27th, 1699, and was buried in his cathedral, where an inscription, written by Dr. Bentley, was placed on his tomb. By his first wife, who lived few years with him, he had two daughters who died young, and a son Edward; and by his second, who died a little before him, he had seven children, of whom only two, Joseph and Anne, survived him. Stillingfleet wrote besides, some controversial books against the deists, Socinians, papists, and dissenters, and he was engaged in the latter part of life with Locke, some part of whose Essay on Human Understanding, seemed to strike at the Mysteries of Revealed Religion. His works are the composition of an able scholar, deep divine, and a sound argumentative philosopher. They were collected and published altogether in 1710, in 6 vols. folio.

STILLINGFLEET, Benjamin, an eminent naturalist and poet, grandson of the Bishop. His father Edward, rector of Wood-Norton, Norfolk, displeased his father by marriage, and the displeasure of the bishop proved injurious to his posterity. He died 1708, and Benjamin, his only son, after being educated at Norwich school, entered at Trinity college, Cambridge, but here he was disappointed of a fellowship, by the interference of Bentley, the master, who had been his father's friend, and his grandfather's chaplain. Thus thrown upon the world, he travelled through Italy, and by the friendship of lord Barrington he obtained the place of barrack-master at Kensington. He also succeeded to some property on the death of his friend Mr. Wyndham of Norfolk, with whom he had travelled abroad, and applied himself assiduously to the study of history and botany. He died at a saddler's in Piccadilly, 15th Dec. 1771, aged 69, leaving some valuable papers behind him. He was never married, in consequence, it is said, of a severe disappointment in his youthful affections. He was buried in St. James's church. His works are "the Calendar of Flora," 1761—Miscellaneous Travels, 8vo.—the Principles and Powers of Harmony, 4to.—Essay on Conversation, 1757, a poem, and other poems in Dodsley's collection—some thoughts concerning happiness, &c.

STILLMAN, Samuel, D.D. minister in Boston, Massachusetts, was born in Philadelphia, February 27th, 1737. His parents removed to Charleston, South Carolina, when he was young, and he received his education at an academy there. In 1759 he was ordained to preach, and soon after settled in a baptist society at James' Island, but the next year he removed to Bordentown, New-Jersey, and two years after to Boston, where in 1765 he was installed pastor of the second baptist church. He continued in that station labouring with great diligence and popularity till his death in March, 1807. He was distinguished for his excellence as a man, and his eloquence as a preacher. He possessed a clear and vigorous mind, a commanding voice, and was zealous, pathetic, and convincing.

STITH, William, president of William and Mary college, Virginia, was born in that colony, and for several years employed in it with reputation as a minister. After having held his office in the college for a considerable time, he retired from it about the year 1740, and in 1747 published a History of the Discovery and Settlement of Virginia to the year 1624. He was a classical scholar, and faithful as a historian, but too minute in his details.  L.

STOBEUS, John, author of a valuable collection of extracts from ancient poets and philosophers, translated into Latin by Gesner, Geneva, 1608, was a learned Greek of the fifth century.

STOCK, Christian, a German orientalist, born at Canburg, 1672. He was professor at Jena, and died 1733, highly respected for learning. He wrote Disputationes de Pœnis Hebræorum Capitalibus—Clavis Linguae Sanctæ Veteris Testam.—and Novi Testam. &c.

STOCKADE, Nicholas de Helt, a native of Nimeguen, 1614, eminent as a painter. He was the pupil of Ryccaert, and excelled as a portrait and historical painter.

STOCKTON, Richard, a lawyer of New-Jersey, who was graduated at Princeton in 1748, and devoting himself to the law, soon rose to unrivalled reputation and success, by his superior talents and integrity. He was appointed to the office of judge, both under the provisional government, and after the adoption of the constitution in 1776, and discharged the duties of the station with distinguished ability and uprightness. He was a member of the congress of 1776, and signed the declaration of independence. He was an accomplished scholar and statesman, a persuasive speaker, and an exemplary Christian. He died on the 1st of March, 1781.  L.

STODDARD, Solomon, minister of Northampton, Massachusetts, was born at Boston, in 1643, and graduated at Harvard college in 1662. He was afterwards a fellow of that institution. In 1672 he was settled at Northampton, where he preached with little interruption till his death in 1729. He possessed extensive learning, was particularly familiar with religious controversies, and an acute disputant on such subjects. He obtained for himself great notoriety in the churches of New-England by his publications in controversy with Dr. Increase Mather, in which he taught that all baptized persons not scandalous in their lives, might partake of the Lord's Supper, and was the instrument of extensively introducing that custom. Mr. Stoddard was a zealous and impressive preacher, and highly successful in his ministry. He was succeeded by the Reverend Jonathan Edwards.  L.

STOFFLER, John, a native of Justingen in Swabia. He taught mathematics at Tubingen with great reputation, but he lost his good name, and the fame of superior knowledge, by terrifying Europe, in the prediction of a dreadful deluge which was to overwhelm the best part of the world, 1524. He was author of various works in mathematics and astrology, and died Feb. 1531, aged 79. He had foretold that he should die by a fall, and in reaching for a book in his library, a large shelf fell upon his head, and he died a few days after.

STOFFLET, Nicholas, a native of Luneville, who for some years served in the army as a private soldier. During the French revolution he warmly espoused the cause of royalty, and assembling a band of men, of similar feelings with his own, he seized Bressuire, and maintained himself with vigour and success against the troops of the convention. Mildness affected what military art could not do, and Hoche prevailed upon this courageous chief to lay down his arms, and to be reconciled to the existing government. Stofflet agreed to an armistice in 1795, but soon after his conduct was interpreted by the suspicious republicans, as subversive of the treaty, and as he was defenceless, he was easily seized and dragged to Angers, where he was shot, 23d Feb. 1796, in his 44th year. This active and heroic leader, who thus fell a victim to the cruelty of the convention, was during the short space of two years, present at 150 battles, where he not only displayed valour, but generally ensured the victory. He showed in his last moments the same intrepidity which had marked the whole of his life.

STONE, John, an English painter, best known as an able copier in the reigns of the two Charles. He studied under Cross, but spent 37 years to improve himself abroad, and was well skilled in several languages. He died 24th Aug. 1653, at London.

STONE, Edmund, a self-taught mathematician, son of the gardener of the duke of Argyle. Though not nurtured by education, he yet acquired, by the feeble assistance of the duke's butler, and his own indefatigable industry, a most correct and extensive knowledge of arithmetic and mathematics. The duke accidentally found him, when 18 years old, reading Newton's Principia, and his grace had the good sense to give encouragement to such powers of genius, and he therefore transplanted him from obscurity and manual labour to a comfortable situation, where he devoted himself to study, and produced some valuable works. He died about 1750. His works are a Mathematical Dictionary—a treatise on Fluxions—an edition of Euclid's Elements, 2 vols. 8vo. &c. He is described by Ramsay as a man of the utmost modesty.

STONE, Nicholas, an able statuary under James I. and his son Charles. He was employed as chief architect in the building of the banqueting house, Whitehall, and, among other works, the gate and porch of St. Mary's church, Oxford, are beautiful specimens of his abilities. The best known of his monuments is that erected for the Bedford family, for which he received 1120*l*. He died 1647, aged 61, leaving two sons, Nicholas and Henry, also eminent in their profession. The younger of these, who died 1653, was also an excellent painter, and copied some of Vandyck's pieces with admirable effect.

STONE, John Haskins, governor of Maryland, entered the army of the revolution at an early period a captain in Smallwood's regiment, and distinguished himself at the battles of Long-Island, White Plains, Princeton, and Germantown, in the last of which he received a wound which disabled him for further service. He was afterwards appointed a member of the executive council of Maryland, and in 1794 governor of that state, in which office he continued three years. He was respected as an amiable, liberal, and upright citizen, as well as a brave soldier and zealous friend of liberty. He died in 1804.  L.

STONE, Thomas, a member of the American congress from the state of Maryland, and one of the signers of the declaration of independence, was a lineal descendant of William Stone, who was governor of Maryland during the protectorship of Oliver Cromwell. He was born in Charles county, in that province, in the year 1743, at Pointon Manor, the seat of his father, David Stone; and received his education under the care of a Scotch gentleman of distinguished erudition and taste, who resided as a teacher in his paternal neighbourhood. After completing his academical course, he studied law under the direction of Thomas Johnson, esquire, in the city of Annapolis, and engaged in the practice of his profession with high reputation. He was a member of the American congress in 1776, when the declaration of independence was signed, and stood forth among the champions of his country's rights and honour at that trying period. Mr. Stone was again member of congress, when general Washington resigned his office as commander-in-chief of the American armies. In the year 1787 he was appointed one of the delegates from Maryland to attend the convention which met in Philadelphia in that year, and formed the constitution of the United States; but domestic circumstances constrained him to decline accepting the appointment, and in the autumn of the same year he died, in the forty-fourth year of his age. This patriotic and worthy man was repeatedly a member of the senate of his native state during the intervals of his congressional service, and was in a variety of ways devoted to the welfare of his country. He was honoured in his life and lamented in his death.  L.

STONE, David, governor of North Carolina, was a native of that state, and after having been a member of the legislature, a judge, a representative, and a senator in congress, was in 1803 chosen governor. He was afterwards again elected to a seat in the United States senate, but resigned in 1814, and died October 7th, 1818.

STONEHOUSE, sir James, a physician and divine of great eminence. He was born at Tubney, in Berkshire, 1716, and after receiving his education at Winchester school, and St. John's college, Oxford, he applied himself to medical studies under the instruction of Dr. Nicholls. He afterwards travelled abroad, and then settled at Coventry, from which he removed to Northampton, where his benevolence was strongly displayed in the erection of the county infirmary. Though for some years inclined to the principles of infidelity, in the defence of which he even wrote a book against revealed religion, three times edited, he gave way to better thoughts, and by reading the books of the best divines, especially Doddridge's Rise and Progress of Religion, he became a convert to the opinions of the English church. In proof of his sincerity, though in full and extensive practice, ensured by an experience of twenty years, he took orders and obtained the lectureship of All Saints, Bristol. He afterwards was presented to the livings of Great and Little Cheverell, in Wiltshire, where he devoted himself not only to the promotion of the spiritual comfort of his parishioners, but the composition of useful works in the cause of religion and virtue. As a preacher he was eloquent and impressive, and his discourses always carried conviction to the heart, and disposed the mind to more than the outward and barren profession of Christianity. In 1791, on the extinction of the elder branch of his family, settled at Radley, Berkshire, he succeeded to the title of baronet, and died at Bristol, 1795. His works are very numerous, and all on religious subjects, and some of them have been recommended by the society for the promotion of Christian knowledge. His friendly Advice to a Patient has been frequently edited. An account of his life was prefixed by Mr. Stedman to his letters, which were published in 1800, 12mo.

STORAGE, Stephen, a musician and composer of eminence. The public have paid deserved approbation to his music for the Haunted Tower, the Siege of Belgrade, No Song no Supper, &c. and to several pieces composed for the Italian opera. This promising musician, who was so rapidly rising in reputation and in opulence, died of a fever, 1796, aged 33.

STORCK, Nicholas, a native of Saxony, who abandoned the tenets of Luther to found the sect of the anabaptists with Muncer. By the most extravagant doctrines, and by assuming the powers of a sovereign, he gained numerous adherents, and when banished from Saxony he retired to Swabia and Franconia, where his opinions were eagerly embraced by the deluded multitude. The military power was at last exerted to silence his preaching, and to disperse his followers, and after being guilty of the grossest excesses, he escaped to Poland, 1527, and afterwards settled at Munich, where his sect again raised its head, and spread its influence into Moravia. He died soon after, in the greatest poverty.

STORCK, Abraham, a Dutch painter, whose sea pieces, sea ports, and other marine views, were greatly admired. He died 1708. His brother was a good landscape painter, to whom the sublime views of the Rhine afforded many objects for the employment of his pencil.

STOUFFACHER, Werner, a native of the canton of Schwitz, who in 1307 joined Furst, Melchtall, and Tell, in the destruction of Grisler, the oppressive governor of the country. This small band of heroes succeeded in their attempts, and overturned the Austrian government, and restored their country to its original independence. Their names are still held in honour, and celebrated in the national songs of Switzerland, and will never fail to excite their posterity to deeds of heroism and glory.

STOUGHTON, William, lieutenant-governor of Massachusetts, was born at Dorchester in 1632, and graduated at Harvard college in 1650. He became a minister, and preached with great acceptance, but leaving that profession, he was in 1671 chosen a magistrate, and in 1677 sent to England as an agent of the colony. After his return he became a member of the council and chief justice of the province, in which office he condemned to death some of the unfortunate persons who were accused of witchcraft. In 1692 he was appointed lieutenant-governor, and for a number of years was commander-in-chief of the province, and exercised a popular administration. He died in 1701. He was distinguished for learning, uprightness, patriotism, and liberality. He presented to Harvard college 1000*l.* with which a hall bearing his name was erected.

Stow, John, an eminent English antiquary, born in Cornhill, London, about 1525. It is supposed that he was bred up to his father's business, which was that of a tailor. He removed from Cornhill to Aldgate, and then settled for the rest of his life in Lime-street ward. In 1560 he began to make a collection for his Chronicle, and whatever was illustrative of the history and antiquities of the country, was the object of his indefatigable researches. These studies, however, were not productive at first of fame, much less of gain, and he would have abandoned them, had not Parker, the primate, stepped to his aid, and honourably contributed to his support and encouragement. His first work was a "Summary of the Chronicles of England, from the coming in of Brute to his own Time," 1573, begun at the request of lord Robert Dudley, whose grandfather Edmund had, during his confinement in the Tower, laid the foundation of this work in his "Tree of the Commonwealth." Afterwards, in 1598, appeared his "Survey of London," containing the original, antiquity, &c. of that city, 4*to.* and in 1600 he published his "Flores Historiarum, or Annals of this Kingdom, from the Times of the Britons to his own," dedicated to Whitgift, the primate. This last work was an enlargement of his "Summary," but even in that state was little less than an abridgment of a larger work, which he had prepared, and which his printer was afraid to undertake. In the latter part of his life Stow was reduced to indigent circumstances; he petitioned twice the corporation of London, whose history he had by his labours elucidated; but the relief he received is unknown. He also obtained a brief from the king, to collect the benevolent contributions of well-disposed people for his support, and after thus devoting himself for upwards of 40 years to develop the history, and to illustrate the antiquities of his country, and suffering the infirmities of old age, added to the horrors of indigence, he fell a victim to the stone-colic, 5th April, 1605, aged about 80, and was buried in the church of St. Andrew Undershaft, where his wife erected a monument to record his name. To the high merits of an able historian, and indefatigable antiquarian, Stow united all the virtues of private life. He wrote for the public, he adhered to truth, and recorded nothing either through fear, or envy, or favour. He had transcribed many valuable MSS. the originals of which he could not obtain, and he travelled afoot to the various cathedrals, in search of authentic papers. Camden purchased some of his MSS. for which he allowed him an annuity of 8*l.*

STRABO, a native of Amasa, in Cappadocia, in the reign of Augustus and Tiberius, celebrated as a geographer and historian. Of his works only his valuable Geography is extant, best edited at Amsterdam, 2 vols. fol. 1707.

STRADA, Famianus, a learned Jesuit, born at Rome. He taught there rhetoric, and wrote several treatises on oratory and other subjects. His Prolusiones Academicæ—and his Historia de Bello Belgico, have been much admired for their correctness, the elegance of the language, and the purity of the style, though he has been attacked and severely censured by Scioppius, Rapin, and even Bolingbroke. He died at Rouen, 1649, aged 77.

STRADA, John, or STRADANUS, a Flemish painter, born at Bruges, 1536. He studied in Italy, and settled at Florence, where he died 1604. His hunting pieces, and his historical pieces also selected from sacred subjects, were much admired, and were thought worthy to rank with those of Salvati, Volterra, &c.

STRAETEN, N. Vander, a Dutch painter, born in 1680, who acquired celebrity by his landscapes. He travelled over Europe as a painter, and as a man of pleasure, and ruined his purse and his constitution by intemperance and debauchery, to which he fell an early victim.

STRAFFORD, Thomas Wentworth, earl of. Vid. WENTWORTH.

STRAHAN, William, a native of Edinburgh. After serving his time with a printer in his native town, he came to London, and by his assiduity soon rose to eminence in his profession. He purchased, in 1770, a share of the patent place of king's printer, and in 1775 sat in parliament for Malmesbury, and in the next parliament for Wotton-Basset. Thus raised by his own merits to distinction and to opulence, he became the friend of the learned, and was ever ready to contribute to the comfort of those whose mental exertions had promoted his elevation. Among his particular friends was Dr. Johnson, and it is no small proof of his discernment and loyalty that he attempted to introduce this great philosopher into the house of commons, though lord North, to whom it was earnestly proposed, did not finally accede to the measure. Mr. Strahan died 1785, aged 70, and left by his will the interest of 1000*l.* to the company of stationers, to be distributed in annuities of 5*l.* each to poor and infirm printers.

STRAIGHT, John, rector of Findon, in Sussex, to which he was presented by Magdalen college, Oxford, of which he was fellow, was author of some poems in Dodsley's collection, much in the style of Prior. He was presented by bishop Hoadly to a prebend in Salisbury cathedral, but injured his property by turning farmer to maintain his family, and died poor about 1740, leaving a widow and six children. His sermons, in 2 vols. 8vo. were published after his death for the benefit of his family.

STRANGE, sir Robert, an eminent engraver, born at Pomona, in the Orkneys, July 14, 1721. He studied the law, but his genius pointed a different path to eminence, and his sketches and other drawings appeared so highly finished, that he was placed by his friends under the care of Mr. R. Cooper, of Edinburgh. His progress to fame was, however, arrested by the rebellion, he joined the pretender, and after the ruin of his affairs, he wandered for some time a fugitive in the highlands, and at last not without alarm returned to Edinburgh, and then passed to London, with the intention of visiting Rome. He was at Rouen, and at Paris, where he studied under Le Bas, and had the first knowledge of the dry needle, an instrument which his genius afterwards so much used and improved. In 1751, he settled in London, and began to be distinguished as an historical engraver, of which art he may be said to be the father in England. In 1760 he visited Italy, where every where he was received with respect and attention, and honourably elected member of the learned schools of Rome, Florence, and Bologna, and made professor of the Royal academy of Parma, and member of the Royal academy of painting at Paris. He was knighted by the king in 1787, and died of an asthma, 5th July, 1792. His works are greatly admired, and about 50 capital plates are still preserved by his family. In private life he was a most worthy and amiable man. A widow, three sons, and one daughter, survived him, and succeeded to a very comfortable independence.

STRAUCHIUS, Giles, a native of Wittemberg. He studied at Leipsic, and afterwards was appointed professor of divinity in his native town, from which he was invited to go and preside over the university of Dantzic as rector and theological professor. The disputes which then prevailed between the protestants and catholics, prevented his settlement, and soon after on his way to Hamburgh, he was arrested by order of the elector of Brandenburg, on account of some improper allusions made by him in the pulpit. He was soon after released, and died 1682, aged 50. He is author of Breviarium Chronologicum, translated into English by Salt—Breviarium Historicum—Geographia Mathematica—Doctrina Astrorum Mathematica, &c.

STREATER, Robert, an English painter, eminent for his pieces in history, architecture, and perspective. At the restoration he was made sergeant painter to Charles II. and died in 1680, in consequence of being cut for the stone, aged 56. His great works are in the Theatre at Oxford—Moses and Aaron in St. Michael's church, Cornhill—The battle of the Giants and of the Gods, at sir Robert Clayton's, &c.

STREEK, Jurian Van, a Flemish painter, whose works are much admired. He was happy in representing death and melancholy subjects. He died 1678, aged 46. His son Henry excelled as an historical painter, and died 1713, aged 54.

STRIGELIUS, Victorius, a native of Kaufbier, in Swabia, one of the first of Luther's disciples. He taught theology and logic at Leipsic, but his disputes with Francowitz, and his opposition to some of Luther's principles, rendered him unpopular, and he was deposed and imprisoned by his enemies. He was afterwards professor of morality at Heidelberg, where he died 26th June, 1569, aged 45. He wrote Notes on the Ancient and New Testament, and other works now little known.

STROBELBERGER, John Stephen, a native of Gratz, in Styria, who took his doctor's degree in medicine, at Montpellier, 1605. He became imperial physician at the baths of Carlsbad, and died 1630. He wrote Galliæ Politico-Medica Descriptio, 12mo. — Historia Montpeliensis, 12mo.

STRONG, Joseph, an English musician, who died at Carlisle, 1798. Though blind from his infancy, he became an able mechanic, and constructed an organ on which he played with astonishing execution. He made all his own garments, and left a great number of figures, &c. as memorials of his extraordinary perseverance and great ingenuity.

STRONG, Caleb, LL.D. governor of Massachusetts, was born at Northampton, in that state, in 1744, and educated at Harvard university, where he was graduated in 1764. He studied law and established himself in practice in his native town. He took an early and decided part in the cause of liberty at the commencement of the revolution, and was in 1775 appointed one of the committee of safety, and in 1776 elected to a seat in the state legislature. He was a member of the convention which in 1779 formed a constitution for the state, and on the organization of the government under it was chosen a member of the senate. He was two years after appointed to a seat on the bench of the supreme court, but declined the office. He was chosen in 1787 a member of the convention which framed the constitution of the United States, and also of the state convention which was appointed to sanction that constitution, and exerted himself to procure its acceptance. On the organization of the new government, he was advanced to a seat in the United States' senate. His first election to the chief magistracy of Massachusetts took place in 1800, and he continued in the office seven years. He was again elected in 1812, and retained the station till 1816, when he retired from public life, and died in November, 1820. He possessed a clear and vigorous understanding, and an excellent judgment, and was an accomplished scholar, jurist, and statesman. He distinguished himself in the various important offices which he sustained by his intelligence, wisdom, uprightness, patriotism, and fidelity, and was justly ranked among the ablest and most useful of his cotemporaries. He was equally eminent in private life for his social virtues, benevolence, and piety.

STRONG, Nathan, a distinguished congregational minister of Hartford, Connecticut, was the son of the Rev. Nathan Strong, of Coventry, in that state. He was educated at Yale college, and was graduated in 1767. He afterwards resided some time at that seminary as a tutor, and was ordained pastor of the first church in Hartford, January 5th, 1774, where he continued greatly respected, and labouring with distinguished assiduity and success until his death, December 25th, 1816, in the 69th year of his age. He held the first rank among his associates in the ministry, in talents, learning, and usefulness. He was especially distinguished for the energy and penetration of his mind, his sagacity, sound judgment, and intuitive discernment of character, and the keenness and vivacity of his wit. He was a profound theologian, a classical scholar, and excelled in his knowledge of the distinguished men and events of his time. His sermons were marked by great ingeniousness and energy of thought, and simplicity of style, and were delivered with dignity and force. His publications were two volumes of sermons—and Benevolence and Misery—a volume in vindication of the doctrine of Future Punishment. He was also editor of the Evangelical Magazine, and contributed largely to its pages.

STRONG, Simeon, LL.D. was appointed a judge of the supreme court of Massachusetts in 1800. He was born at Northampton in 1735, graduated at Harvard college in 1756, and died at Amherst, December 14th, 1805. He was distinguished in early life as an intelligent and industrious student, was several years a preacher, but his health not permitting his continuance in that employment, he engaged in the study of law, and rose to eminence in the profession. He was several years a member of the house of representatives and senate of Massachusetts, previous to his appointment as a judge. He was a man of great excellence of character, and enjoyed in an eminent degree the respect of his acquaintance.

STROZZI, Titus and Hercules, father and son, were Latin poets at Ferrara. Their works, which consist of elegies and sonnets, and possess merit, were published together at Venice, 1 vol. 8vo. 1513. The father died 1502, aged 80, and the son was killed by a rival, 1508.

STROZZI, Cyriaco, a learned Florentine, born 1504, and called a peripatetic philosopher, as he supported the doctrines of Aristotle, to whose eight books on politics he added a ninth, and a tenth, in Greek and Latin, and in the most able manner. He was professor of Greek and of philosophy at Florence, Bologna, and Pisa, and died 1565, aged 61. His sister Laurentia, a nun, was well skilled in the learned languages, and wrote some Latin hymns on the festivals of the church.

STROZZI, Julius, an Italian poet. He wrote Venetia ædificata, 1624, fol. an admired poem, on the origin of Venice, and also another heroic poem. He died 1636.

STROZZI, Nicholas, a native of Florence, distinguished as a poet. His Sylvæ of Parnassus, Idyls, and sonnets, all in Italian, are much admired. He wrote two tragedies, besides David of Trebizond, and Conradin, and died 1654, aged 64.

STRUDELL, Peter, a German painter, born in the Tyrol. He settled at Vienna, where he adorned the churches and other public buildings with his admirable paintings. He died there 1717.

STRUENSEE, Count, a physician, who by his abilities recommended himself to the notice of the king of Denmark. He became prime minister, and maintained his power by great talents in politics and in negotiation; but his imprudent partiality for the queen, Caroline Matilda, proved fatal to him. The queen mother, determined to ruin this favourite, caused by her intrigues his arrestation, and that of his friend Brandt, and Struensee, falsely accused of an improper intercourse with Matilda, but guilty of treasonable practices for the preservation of his power, was conducted to the scaffold, 26th July, 1772. The unfortunate Matilda, banished from the presence and the protection of her husband, was demanded back by her brother, the king of England, and she retired to Zell in Hanover, where she died of a broken heart, 1776.

STRUTT, Joseph, an English antiquary, author of a dictionary of Engravers, 4to.—an historical treatise on the manners and customs of ancient inhabitants of England, 2 vols. 4to. translated into French by Boulard. He died 1737.

STRUVIUS, George Adam, professor of jurisprudence at Jena, and counsellor to the dukes of Saxony, was born at Magdebourg, and died 15th December, 1692, aged 73. He was twice married, and was father of 26 children. He wrote Syntagma Juris Feudalis, and Syntagma Juris Civilis, two works of great merit.

STRUVIUS, Burcard, Gotthelf, one of the sons of the preceding, was born at Weimar, and afterwards settled at Jena, where he engaged in his father's profession, and was equally esteemed. He died 1733, aged 67. He published Antiquitatum Romanarum Syntagma, 4to.—Bibliotheca Historica Selecta, 8vo.—Syntagma Juris Publici, 4to.—Syntagma Historiæ Germaniæ, 2 vols. fol.—Historia Misnensis, 8vo.—a History of Germany, in German.—Introductio ad Notitiam Rei Literariæ, et Usus Bibliothecarum, &c.

STRYTS, John, a Dutchman, who began to travel in 1647, and visited, in three different journeys, Madagascar, Japan, the Levant, the shores of the Mediterranean, Muscovy, and Persia. He wrote an account of his travels which were published by Glanville, Amsterdam, 1681, 4to. and afterwards in three vols. 12mo. at Rouen, &c. He died about 1680.

STRYPE, John, a learned editor, born in London, of German parents. He was educated at Catherine-hall, Cambridge, and in 1669, was presented to the living of Theydon-boys, Essex, which he the same year resigned for Low Leyton. He had also a sinecure, the gift of Tenison the primate, and was lecturer of Hackney, where he died, 13th Dec. 1737, at a great age, having been in possession of his vicarage 63 years. He published the lives of archbishops Cranmer, Grindal, Parker, and Whitgift, of Aylmer, bishop of London, of sir Thomas Smith, of sir J. Cheke, and also ecclesiastical memorials, 3 vols.—Annals of the Reformation, 4 vols. folio—the 2d vol. of Lightfoot's works—Stow's Survey of London.

STUART, Arabella. Vid. SEYMOUR.

STUART, James, an eminent architect, born in London, 1713. The death of his father left him and his mother and three children in very indigent circumstances, but his genius began early to shine forth, and his abilities were successfully exerted and employed to support his orphan family by painting fans for a person in the Strand. While thus honourably engaged, he directed his attention to the acquisition of other branches of science, and by assiduity he obtained a perfect knowledge of anatomy, geometry, painting, the mathematics, and architecture, to which he joined a tolerable acquaintance with Greek and Latin. After his mother's death, he settled his brother and sisters in a comfortable situation, and with scanty resources set out to visit the antiquities of Rome and Athens. He mostly travelled on foot through Paris, and when he reached the capital of Italy, he was so fortunate as to form an intimacy with Mr. N. Revett, an able architect and painter. With this worthy associate he continued his journey to Athens, and there for five years, till 1755, remained laboriously employed in making drawings, and in taking the measures of the remarkable places of this venerable city. Their perseverance was supported and encouraged by the kindness of sir Jacob Bouverie and Mr. Dawkins, who were then at Athens, spectators of the magnificent remains of that classical spot. The result of their useful labours appeared in 1 vol. folio, 1762, under the title of the Antiquities of Athens, measured and delineated by J. Stuart and N. Revett. The merit of this publication recommended Stuart to the patronage of the great, he was taken into the society of Mr. Dawkins, and noticed by lords Anson and Rockingham, and others, and was appointed surveyor of Greenwich Hospital. This respectable character was twice married; by his first wife he had one son, who died an infant; by the second, whom he married in his 67th year, he had four children, the eldest of whom died of the smallpox in 1787, and by his death undermined the feeble constitution of his father, who survived him but a few weeks. He died at his house in Leicester-square, 2d Feb. 1788, aged 76, and was buried in St. Martin's church in the fields. Two more volumes have appeared since his death, one in 1790, published by Mr. Newton, the other in 1794, by Mr. Revely. Mr. Stuart is best known by the deserved surname of the Athenian Stuart.

STUART, Gilbert, a Scotch historian, born in 1742, at Edinburgh, where his father was university professor. He was well educated and intended for the law, which, however, his natural indolence made him abandon for the less laborious pursuit of elegant literature. Before the completion of his 22d year, he published his historical dissertation concerning the antiquity of the British constitution; which was so admired that the university granted him the degree of LL.D. He afterwards published his view of Society in Europe, in its progress from rudeness to refinement, an ably written composition; but his labours did not sufficiently recommend him in his application for the law professorship of the university, and when disappointed, he came to London, where he continued from 1768 to 1774, to write for the Monthly Review. In 1774 he returned to Edinburgh, but his attempts to establish there a Review and Magazine failed, and in 1782 he again visited London, and took a share in the Political Herald, and the English Review. Intemperance brought on here complicated disorders, and when labouring under an attack of the jaundice and of the dropsy, he returned to Scotland by sea, and died in his father's house, 13th Aug. 1786. He published besides, Observations concerning the Public Law, and Constitutional history of Scotland—the history of the Reformation in Scotland—the history of Scotland from the reformation to Mary's death, in which he ably defends the character of that unfortunate queen against Dr. Robertson and other writers. Though popular as an author, and intelligent as a man of letters, Stuart was entitled to little praise for the laxity of his principles, and the dissoluteness of his morals; for as Mr. Chalmers observes, he wantonly considered ingratitude as the most venial of sins.

STUART, Robert, marquis of Londonderry, viscount Castlereagh, was born June 18th, 1769. He commenced his parliamentary career, as member for the county of Dover, Ireland. In 1797, he became chief secretary to the Viceroyalty of Ireland, and assisted to bring about the union of that country with Great Britain. After the union he was appointed privy councillor, and president of the board of control; and in 1805, minister of war, which station he occupied with the exception of two short intervals, during the remainder of his life. His predominant influence in the cabinet is dated from the death of Mr. Percival in 1811; after which event he was virtually at the head of the administration, and represented it as ambassador, in all the most important negotiations on the continent. His life was terminated by his own hand, August 12th, 1822; when it is supposed he was labouring under mental derangement.

STUBBE, L.

STUBBE, Henry, a learned writer, born at Partney, Lincolnshire, 28th Feb. 1631. He was sent to Westminster school, and Busby commended and rewarded his extraordinary abilities. In 1649 he was elected to Christ-church, and distinguished himself there by his zeal and his learning. When bachelor of arts, he went and served in the parliamentary army in Scotland, and after he had been admitted to his master's degree, he was in 1657 appointed under librarian to the Bodleian. As he refused to conform to the orders of government, he was ejected from his offices and retired to Stratford on Avon to practise physic, to the study of which he had formerly applied himself. In 1661 he went to Jamaica as king's physician to the island, but soon returned in consequence of the unfavourable climate. He afterwards settled at Warwick, and then at Bath, where he acquired considerable practice. He was intimate with Hobbes, whom he supported against Dr. Wallis, and against the new establishment of the royal society, and in consequence of this controversy, in which he ably maintained the ancient doctrines of the schools of the Aristotelian philosophy, he made a severe attack on Mr. Glanvill, and charged him and the other members of the society with the intention of undermining the universities, destroying the established religion, and introducing popery. His enemies fairly, however, accused him of inconsistency, as before the restoration he had abused monarchy, universities, churches, and all ancient establishments, while he defended the conduct and principles of his early friend and patron sir Henry Vane. After a life chequered with accidents and controversial quarrels, this extraordinary man was unfortunately drowned, 12th July, 1676, while crossing the river two miles from Bath. The body was taken up the next morning, and when buried in the great church, Bath, a funeral sermon was preached over him, probably with little commendation, by his antagonist Glanvill the rector. As a man of erudition, of extensive information, an accomplished scholar, an able and ready disputant, Stubbe deserves the highest praise. In other respects he was strongly deficient in common discretion, wavering in his principles, occasionally rash and obstinate in his opinions, and regardless of that sobriety and that decorum in conduct, which should accompany great powers of mind. His writings are very numerous, but though they convey much information and deep research, they are distinguished for abuse, satire, and malevolence.

STUBBS, George, an able writer, rector of Gunville, Dorsetshire, and known as the author of some of the best papers of the Free Thinker, with Ambrose Philips and others, 1718. He wrote also the "new adventure of Telemachus," 8vo. an admired performance, founded on principles of liberty, and in opposition to Fenelon's work. He wrote besides some elegant verses, which are still preserved in MS. by his friends. He was twice married. The time of his death is not mentioned.

STUBBS, George, a native of Liverpool, distinguished as a painter and anatomist. At the age of 30 he visited Rome, to improve himself in the study and knowledge of the arts and the monuments of the ancients, and on his return he devoted himself laboriously to the completion of his valuable work, the anatomy of the horse, including a particular description of the bones, cartilages, &c. with most valuable plates, published 1766. In the delineation of animals he particularly excelled, and his pieces stand very high in the public estimation. He undertook another elaborate work, a comparative anatomical exposition of the structure of the human body, with that of a tiger and common fowl, in 30 tables, of which, however, he published only three parts before his death. This excellent artist died in London, 10th July, 1806, aged 82.

STUCKIUS, John William, a native of Zurich, distinguished as an antiquary. He wrote a treatise on the Feasts of the Ancients and their Sacrifices, a learned work in fol.—a Commentary on Adrian—a treatise called Carolus Magnus Redivivus, 4to.

in which he compares Henry IV. of France with Charlemagne. He died 1607.

STUDLY, John, an English poet, educated at Westminster school, and Trinity college, Cambridge. He followed the profession of arms, and served under prince Maurice at the siege of Breda, where he was killed 1587. Among other things he translated several of Seneca's tragedies.

STUKELEY, William, a celebrated antiquary, born at Holbeck, Lincolnshire, 7th Nov. 1687. After receiving his education in the school of his native town, he was, in 1703, admitted of Benet college, Cambridge, where he studied physic and botany with great assiduity. When he had taken his degrees of bachelor in medicine, he settled at Boston, and in 1717 removed to London, where he was soon after, at the recommendation of his friend Dr. Mead, elected fellow of the royal society, and also one of the first members of the antiquarian society. He left London in 1726 to settle at Grantham, in his native county, where his abilities were called into action by his attendance on the noblest, and most respectable families of that neighbourhood. He found himself, however, so much afflicted with the gout that he determined to abandon his laborious profession, for the church preferment, which his powerful friends could command for him, and after being ordained by Wake, the primate, in 1730 he was presented to the living of All-Saints, Stamford. In 1739 he obtained from the duke of Ancaster the living of Somerby near Grantham, and in 1747, he relinquished, at the pressing solicitation of the duke of Montague, his country preferments, for the rectory of St. George, Queen's square, London. He was seized with a stroke of the palsy, the 27th Feb. 1765, and died four days after in his 78th year. He was buried in East-Ham churchyard, Essex, without any monument. He was twice married, but had issue only by his first wife, three daughters. The best known of his works are Itinerarium Curiosum, or an Account of the Curiosities and Antiquities in Great Britain, folio, with copper plates—Palæographia Sacra, or Discourses on the Monuments of Antiquity, that relate to Sacred History, 4to.—Palæographia Britannica, 4to.—an Account of Stonehenge and Abury, folio—History of Carausius, 2 vols. 4to.—Dissertation on the Spleen, folio—a treatise on the Gout, besides other valuable tracts on antiquities, &c. His knowledge of druidical history was so extensive, that he was not improperly called by his friends the archdruid of his age. He was the correspondent and the friend of the most learned and respectable persons of his time.

STUNICA, James Lopez, a Spanish divine and philologist in the university of Alcalá. Besides an account of his journey to Rome from Alcalá, called "Itinerarium dum Compluto Romam Proficisceretur," he wrote against Erasmus, and against James le Fevre's notes on St. Paul's epistles. He died at Naples, 1530.

STURGES, Jonathan, LL.D. one of the most distinguished citizens of Connecticut who espoused and supported the cause of Independence, was born at Fairfield, Aug. 23d, 1740. He was graduated at Yale College in 1759, and became a lawyer. In 1774 he was chosen a delegate to congress, and was repeatedly elected previous to 1792, when he was appointed a judge of the supreme court of Connecticut, and continued in the office until 1805. He died at Fairfield, October 4th, 1819, aged 79, having sustained in his various public stations, and also in private life, a character of eminent excellence.

STURMIUS, James, a learned German, born at Strasburg 1489. His abilities were employed in several embassies to the diets of the empire, to England and the imperial court, and he contributed greatly by his influence to the reformation at Strasburg, and also to the erection of a college there. He assisted Sleidan in the compilation of the History of the Reformation in Germany, which was honourably acknowledged by the author, and died at Strasburg, 30th Oct. 1553.

STURMIUS, Leonard Christopher, a native of Altorf, distinguished as an architect. He published a complete course of Architecture, Augsburg, 16 vols.—and a translation of Bockler's Architecture, and died 1719, aged 50.

STURMIUS, John, the Cicero of Germany, was born at Sleidan, in Eisel, near Cologne, 1507. He studied at Liege and Louvain, and afterwards set up a printing-press with Rudger Rescius, and began the printing of the Greek classics. In 1529, he was at Paris, where he read lectures on Greek and Latin writers, and logic, and then retired to Strasburg in 1537, as he was afraid of the persecution which might attend his attachment to the protestant principles. He settled at Strasburg, which now obtained the title of a university, and he was appointed rector, and saw his pupils numerous and respectable. When pressed on account of his principles he declared himself a Calvinist, and in consequence was deprived of his rectorship. He died 3d March, 1589, aged about 80. He was three times married, but left no children. He published various books, among which were valuable notes on Aristotle's Rhetoric, and other authors, besides a tract called Linguae Latinae resolvendæ Ratio, 8vo.

STURMIUS, John Christopher, professor of philosophy and mathematics at Altorf, where he died 1703, aged 68, was a native of Hippolstein. He published a German translation of the works of Archimedes—Collegium Experimentale Curiosum, 4to.—Physica Electiva et Hypothesica, 2 vols. 4to.—Scientia Cosmica, folio—a Course of Mathematics, translated into English, 3 vols. 8vo.—Mathesis Juvenilis, 2 vols. 8vo.—Physica Conciliatrix Conamina, 12mo.—Prælectiones contra Astrologia Divinatricis Vanitatem, 2 vols. 4to.—Physicæ Modernæ Compendium, &c.

STUVEL, Ernest, a painter born at Hamburg. His prints and flowers were highly admired. He died 1712, aged 45.

STUYVESANT, Peter, the last Dutch governor of New-York, began his administration in 1647, and strenuously endeavoured to arrest the encroachments of the English and Swedes on the territory under his command. In 1655 he took the Swedish fort Casimir, afterwards called New-Castle, in Delaware bay, and compelled the Swedes to swear allegiance to the states general. In 1664, an English fleet, commanded by colonel Nichols, arrived at New-York, and compelled the Dutch to surrender the town to the English, and the whole colony soon came into their hands. Governor Stuyvesant continued at New-York till his death. He possessed a strong mind, was brave, active, and zealously devoted to the interests of his country.

SUARD, J. B. Anthony, a French writer, was born at Besançon in 1733. His works are mostly translations, particularly from the English, with which language he was very familiar. He was also the editor of the Journal de Paris, and in the revolution he conducted another, called "Nouvelles Politiques," which being adverse to democracy, was soon suppressed, and the editor obliged to leave France. He returned under the consular government, and was appointed a member of the legion of honour, as well as of the national institute, and perpetual secretary of the class of French Literature. He now undertook another journal, entitled The Publiciste, which he soon dropped for the "Opuscles Philosophiques," and the "Archives Littéraires." He was likewise the author of the life of Tasso, and had a principal share in the Biographie Universelle. He died at Paris in 1817.—W.B.

SUAREZ, Francis, a Spanish Jesuit born at Granada, 5th Jan. 1548. He was professor at Alcalá, Salamanca, and Rome, and afterwards was invited to Coimbra in Portugal, where he became professor of divinity. He died at Lisbon, 1617, with a great character for piety. He wrote on metaphysics, morality, and theology, and his works amounted to 23 vols. fol. and so extraordinary was his memory that on quoting any passage from his works, he could continue the quotation to the end of the page. His treatise "de Legibus" was an able performance.

SUBLEYRAS, Peter, a French painter, whose portraits and historical pieces were much esteemed. He was a native of Languedoc, and died 1759, aged 60.

SUBTERMANS, Justus, a native of Antwerp, celebrated as a painter. His most admired piece preserved at Florence, represents the Florentines paying their homage to Ferdinand II. He died 1631, aged 84.

SUCKLING, sir John, an English poet, born at Witham, Essex, 1613. His abilities were early displayed, so that he could speak Latin at five, and write it at nine. When his education was completed he went on his travels, and studied the manners and character of foreign nations, without the imitating their vices. He was prevailed upon to attend one of the campaigns of Gustavus Adolphus, and was present at three battles, and five sieges, and on his return, as a proof of his patriotism and military spirit, he raised at his own expense of above 12,000*l.* a troop of horse for the king's service. This troop was more remarkable for finery than valour, so that is said sir John took much to heart their ill conduct against the Scots, and fell a victim to a fever, in his 28th year, 1641. He wrote besides, a few poems, and some letters—an Account of Religion by Reason—a Discourse upon occasion presented to lord Dorset, and four plays which have been edited several times, in 2 vols. 8vo.

SUE, John, a native of Cotte-St.-Pol., who studied surgery at Paris, under De-vaux, and acquired great celebrity. He learned Latin at the age of 45, that he might be enabled to examine students in medicine. He was a very intelligent man, and wrote some useful medical memoirs. He died, 30th Nov. 1782.

SUE, John Joseph, brother of the above, came to Paris in 1729, and studied under the celebrated anatomist Verdier, whom he succeeded in the professorial chair. He died at Paris, 10th Dec. 1792, aged 82. His works are, an Abridgment of Anatomy, 2 vols. 12mo.—treatise on Bandages, 12mo.—Elements of Surgery, 8vo.—An-thropotomia, or the Art of Injecting, Dissecting, and Embalming, 8vo.—Osteology, translated from the English of Dr. Munro, 2 vols. fol. with 31 plates, besides memoirs in the collection of the Savans Etrangers, &c.

SUETONIUS, Caius Tranquillus, a Roman biographer and historian, secretary to Adrian, and the friend of Pliny. Of all his works, only his lives of the 12 first Cæsars, and his treatise of Illustrious Grammarians are preserved, best edited by Ernesti, 1775, 8vo.

SUEUR, Nicholas le, or SUDORIUS, counsellor, and president of the parliament of Paris, was assassinated by some robbers in the night, 1594, aged 55. He published an elegant translation of Pindar, in Latin verse, 1582, 8vo.—re-published at Oxford by Prideaux, 1697, in folio.

SUEUR, Thomas le, of the order of Minims, was born at Rethel, in Champagne, 1703, and taught, with great applause, theology, philosophy, and mathematics, at Rome. He assisted in the education of the infant duke of Parma, and died at Rome, 22d Sept. 1770. He was deservedly patronised by the popes, and from his long and faithful intimacy with father Jacquire arose the composition of a learned commentary on Newton's Principia—a treatise on the Integral Calculus, 2 vols. 4to.—Institutions Philosophiæ, 5 vols. 12mo.

SUEUR, Eustache le, a French painter, born at Paris. He studied under Simon Vouet, and though never out of France, he acquired great celebrity, and carried his art to the highest perfection, on models of antiquity, and after the best Italian masters. He died at Paris, 30th April, 1655, aged 38. His works are preserved at Paris, the most admired of which is the life of St. Bruno, in the Carthusian cloisters, at Paris.

SUFFREN, John, a native of Salon, in Provence, who became an active member of the Jesuits' society, and was confessor to Mary de Medicis. During the disputes between this princess and her son Lewis XIII. he attempted to produce a reconciliation, but without effect, and by the intrigues of Richelieu he was banished from the court, and died at Flushing, 1641, aged 70. He wrote Année Chretienne, 4 vols. 4to. a work of merit, abridged by Frizon in 2 vols. 12mo. Admiral Suffren, who distinguished himself in the East Indies against the English, is supposed to be of the same family, as he was born in Provence. This gallant officer was highly honoured by the French king for his services, and died 1789.

SUGER, Abbé, minister under Lewis VII. and Lewis the Gros, was born at Touri, in Beauce, 1082. He was made abbot of St. Denis, where he died, 1152. This epitaph was placed on his tomb: Cy git l'Abbé Suger. He was of superior talents, and of unshaken integrity. His life has been written in 3 vols. 12mo. by Gervaise, a Dominican.

SUCER, John Gaspard, a learned German, born at Zurich, 1620. He was there professor of Greek and Hebrew, and died at Heidelberg, 1705. His Lexicon, "sive Thesaurus Ecclesiasticus Patrum Græcorum," best edited, 2 vols. fol. 1728, Amsterdam, is a useful work. His son Henry, was also an able professor at Zurich, and afterwards at Heidelberg, where he died, 1705. His Chronology of Switzerland, in Latin, is much esteemed among his other learned works.

SUIDAS, the author of a valuable Greek Lexicon, containing much historical and geographical information, is supposed to have lived in the age of Alexis Comnenus. The best edition is by Kuster, 1705, 3 vols. folio, Cambridge.

SULLIVAN, sir Richard Joseph, an English writer. He went early in life to the East Indies, and after his return to England he published an account of his tour through various parts of the kingdom, 2 vols. 8vo. He afterwards published a letter to the East India Directors—Analysis of the Political History of India—Thoughts on Martial Law—Philosophical Rhapsodies, &c.—a View of Nature, in Letters to a Traveller among the Alps, a work of little merit, though commended by the author of the Pursuits of Literature. In 1790 he obtained a seat in parliament, and continued member of the house of commons till his death. He was created a baronet in 1804, and died at Thames-Ditton, Surrey, 17th July, 1806.

SULLIVAN, John, LL.D. major-general in the army of the American revolution, was born at Berwick, Maine, where his father, who came from Ireland about the year 1723, settled, and lived to the unusual age of one hundred and five years. He was educated by his father, who had some knowledge of the classics and taught a school, and studying law established himself in New-Hampshire, and soon gained distinction by his superior talents and application. He was fond of a military life, and in 1772 received the commission of major in the militia, and in 1775 was appointed a brigadier-general, and during the campaign commanded on Winter Hill. The next year he was sent to Canada, and on the death of general Thomas took command of the army in that province, and conducted it back with skill. On the illness of general Greene at Long-Island he took command of his division, and in the battle of the 29th of August was taken prisoner, but was soon exchanged. He commanded the right wing of the army at the battles of Trenton, Brandywine, and Germantown. In 1778 he commanded the expedition to Rhode-Island, and displayed great bravery and skill, though unsuccessful through want of co-operation from the French. In 1779 he conducted the expedition against the Indians, and having defeated their forces near Seneca lake, laid waste their country. After his return he resigned his command, on account of the displeasure some complaints made in his letters of the government for not meeting his demands for stores had excited, and resumed the practice of law. He had been a member in congress in 1774, and was again chosen after leaving the army. He was president of New-Hampshire in 1786, 1787, and 1789, and during the latter year was appointed district judge of that state. In 1792 he assisted in forming the constitution of New-Hampshire. He died at his residence in Durham on the 23d of January, 1795, in his fifty-fifth year. General Sullivan held a high rank in talents and patriotism among the officers of the army, and the statesmen with whom he was called to act in the several civil offices which he held.  L.

SULLIVAN, James, LL.D. governor of Massachusetts, and a brother of general Sullivan, was born at Berwick, Maine, April 22d, 1744, and was educated by his father. He designed to devote himself to a military life, but being disqualified for it by the fracture of a limb, he studied law with his brother, and soon rose like him to superiority by his fine endowments. He was appointed king's council for the county in which he resided. At the opening of the revolution he took a decided part in favour of the liberties of his country, and in 1775 was chosen a member of the provincial congress. The next year he was appointed a judge of the superior court. He was a member of the convention which formed the constitution of Massachusetts, and resigned his office as judge in 1782, and was the next year elected to a seat in congress. In 1783 he was one of the commissioners appointed to settle the controversy between Massachusetts and New-York respecting their claims to the western lands. In 1787 he was a member of the executive council and a judge of probate, and in 1790 was appointed attorney-general. In 1796 he was appointed by Washington a commissioner for settling the boundaries between the United States and the British provinces. He was chosen governor in 1807, and again the following year, during which he died on the 8th of December, in his sixty-fifth year. He held the first rank among his associates at the bar and in office, in talents, influence, and usefulness. He possessed a mind of great force and originality; his knowledge of law, politics, and science, was extensive, though he was not accomplished in literature; his eloquence was peculiar in its style, and often irresistible, and he sustained in all his public employments in life the reputation of singular integrity, patriotism, and piety.  L.

SULLY, Maximilian de Bethune, baron of Rosni, duke of, celebrated as the friend and minister of Henry IV. was born of an illustrious family at Rosni, 1559. At the age of 11 he was presented to the queen of Navarre, and educated with her son, afterwards Henry IV. of France. He accompanied him to Paris, but must have perished in the dreadful massacre of St. Bartholomew, if not humanely concealed for three days by the principal of the college of Burgundy. Attached by affection to the young king, Sully distinguished himself in the various campaigns in which he was engaged, and at Marmande, Cahors, Coutras, Fosseuse, Arques, Gisors, Dreux, and Ivry, his character as an able, active, and intrepid warrior, was nobly established. But he was born to shine not only in the field, but in the cabinet. Before his master ascended the French throne, he was his envoy at the court of Paris, and by his negotiations with the Swiss, in 1586, he obtained a subsidy of 20,000 men. In 1599 he negotiated the marriage of Henry with Mary de Medicis, and in his embassy at the court of Elizabeth, he displayed the most consummate prudence, and after the decease of that princess, he had the address to settle the wavering mind of James in favour of his master. Raised to the office of prime minister he exerted himself for the prosperity of the kingdom as well as the splendour of the monarchy. The taxes were collected with ease and without oppression to the subject, and all impositions were abolished. Though often thwarted in his views by the intrigues of the courtiers, and of the mistresses of the monarch, he remained firm to his principles, distinguished more as the zealous friend than as the temporizing minister of Henry. Regular in the affairs of his office, he rose every morning at 4, and after devoting some time to business, he gave audience to such as solicited an admission to him, and never rejected the meanest person from his presence. Always attentive to the interests of the kingdom, he prevailed upon his master to change his religion, and to become a catholic to please his catholic subjects of France, but when solicited also to abandon the protestant tenets he firmly refused, and replied to the pope, who in flattering him upon the greatness of his abilities as a minister, artfully pressed him to enter upon the right way, "I never shall ease to pray for the conversion of your holiness." After the murder of Henry, he was disgraced from the court, and when recalled some years after by Lewis XIII. he recommended the banishment of all the buffoons and the flatterers who amused and ruined the effeminate monarch. Sully died at his seat of Villebon, in Pays Chartrain, 21st Dec. 1641, aged 82. The memoirs which he composed in his retreat, and which he called Economies Royales, have been published, and contain a very minute detail of the history of the court, not only during his ministry, but during the reign of Charles IX. of Henry III. and Henry IV. This work has been pruned of its obsolete terms by de l'Ecluse, and published in 3 vols. 4to. and in 8 vols. 12mo. 1745.

SULFICIA, a Roman lady, called the Roman Sappho, in Domitian's reign. Her poem against the emperor is still preserved.

SULPICIUS, Severus, an ecclesiastical writer, born in Aquitaine in the fifth century. He wrote the Life of Martin of Tours—Ecclesiastical History, edited by Le Clerc, 1709, 8vo.

SULZER, John George, an eminent philosopher, born at Winterthur, in the canton of Zurich, Oct. 1720, the youngest of 25 children. His abilities slowly unfolded themselves; at 16 he had no taste for study, till at last a perusal of Wolfe's Metaphysics roused his attention, and called into action all his powers of thought. He became an ecclesiastic, and was the friend of Maupertuis, Euler, and Sack, and in 1747 he was invited to fill the mathematical chair at Berlin, where he died, Feb. 1779, universally respected for modesty, learning, benevolence, and all the milder virtues. His works are numerous, the best known of which are, Moral Contemplations on the Works of Nature—treatise on Education—Universal Theory of the Fine Arts, 2 vols. 4to.—Remarks on Hume's Essays, &c.

SUMNER, Increase, governor of Massachusetts, was born in November, 1746, in Roxbury, and graduated in 1767, at Harvard college. In 1770 he established himself as a lawyer in his native town, and soon became conspicuous in the profession. He was elected in 1776 to a seat in the state legislature, and retained it till 1780, when he was chosen a senator. He was a member of the conventions of 1777 and 1779, instituted for the purpose of forming a constitution, and also that of 1789, assembled to decide respecting the constitution of the United States. He was chosen to a seat in congress in 1782, and also appointed a judge of the supreme court, which office prevented his attending the national legislature. He continued on the bench, discharging his duties with great ability and acceptance till 1797, when he was called to the chair of the chief magistrate, and re-elected the two following years. He died, however, in 1779, on the 7th of June, soon after taking his oath of office, in the fifty-third year of his age. He possessed a vigorous and well-adjusted mind, and was conspicuous for the excellence of his judgment, his integrity, candour, amiableness, and piety. ☞ L.

SUMOROKOF, Alexander, the founder of the Russian theatre, was born at Moscow, 14th Nov. 1727. He was educated at home, and then removed to the seminary for cadets, at Petersburg, where he studied with uncommon assiduity. He was recommended by count Shuvalof to the empress Elizabeth, and at the age of 29 he began to study the plays of Racine, and soon produced his first piece, "Koref," which was acted in private, and then before the court, and received with the most unbounded applause. The public favour animated his muse, and he successively wrote Hamlet, Aristona, Sinaf, and Truvor, Zemira, Dimisa, and other tragedies, besides comedies, and two operas, sonnets, elegies, fables, satires, odes, &c. except epic poetry. Thus supported by national applause, he was not unrewarded by the court; Elizabeth raised him to the rank of brigadier, and made him director of the Russian theatre, with a pension of 400*l.* and Catherine appointed him counsellor of state, and knight of St. Anne. He died universally respected, 1st Oct. 1777. His tragedies possess great merit; but there are some blemishes in them, and in his comedies he displayed much humour, though he sacrifices too much to vulgarity, while he attempts to excite the laughter of his auditors. His satires are the best in the Russian language, but are very unequal. In his elegies he shows great powers of tenderness and animation, and in his idyls, the most pleasing simplicity. He is deservedly regarded with Lomonozof as the honour of the nation; and while he displayed all the softness, the graces, and the harmony of poetry, his illustrious countryman soared to the regions of sublimity and majestic strength. He wrote also some short historical pieces, in a style clear and elegant, but perhaps too flowery.

SUPERVILLE, Daniel de, a native of Saumur, in Anjou, who studied at Geneva, and became a protestant minister at the Walloon church of Rotterdam. He died at Rotterdam, 9th June, 1723, aged 71. He wrote, the Duties of the Afflicted Church, 8vo.—Sermons, of which a 7th edition appeared, 1726—the Truths and the Duties of Religion, &c.

SURENHUSIUS, William, a learned professor of Hebrew at Amsterdam in the 18th century. He is known by his valuable edition of the Mischna of the Jews, with notes, and the Commentaries of Maimonides and Bartenora, published 1703, 3 vols. folio.

SURIAN, John Baptist, a native of St. Chamas, in Provence, who became bishop of Vence, and died 3d Aug. 1754, aged 84. He was a pious and benevolent prelate, an amiable man, and an eloquent preacher. Some of his sermons have been published, of which the best known is that on the small number of the elect.

SURIUS, Lawrence, a native of Lubeck, who studied at Cologne, and embraced the ecclesiastical profession. He died at Co-logne, 1578, aged 56. He wrote some theological tracts, now little read.

SURVILLE, Margaret Eleanor Clotilde de, a French poetess, who celebrated the heroic deeds of her countrymen, and died at a great age at the close of the 15th century. Her language is almost obsolete; but she possessed great vigour of mind, and a fertile imagination. Her poems were published at Paris, in 1803, prepared for the press by one of her descendants, Joseph Stephen de Surville, an officer of merit, who, after distinguishing himself in the wars of Corsica and America, fell a victim to the French revolution, and was shot at Puyen-Velay, 1799.

SUTCLIFFE, Matthew, a learned divine, known for his controversial works—a Treatise of Ecclesiastical Discipline, 4to. 1591—De Presbyterio, 4to.—De Turco-Papismo, or the Resemblance between Mahometanism and Popery, 4to.—De Purgatorio—De Verâ Christi Ecclesiâ, 4to. 1600—De Misâ. He was dean of Exeter, and founder of Chelsea college, and died about 1610.

SUTTON, Thomas, founder of the Charter-house, was born at Knaith in Lincolnshire, 1532. He was educated at Eton and Cambridge, as is supposed, and then studied the law at Lincoln's Inn; but he had no inclination for that profession, and therefore travelled over Holland, France, Spain, and Italy. At his return he became secretary to the earls of Warwick and Leicester, and distinguished himself in the north of England, in the service of Elizabeth. He purchased some estates in the county of Durham, which were found to contain coal mines, and thus produced him an immense income. His property was farther increased by marrying a rich widow, and by engaging in commerce, and with such success, that he is said to have had 30 agents abroad, and to have prevented, for one year, the armament of Philip against England, by draining the bank of Genoa of the money which was intended for that monarch's use. With money and patriotism he possessed courage, and one of his ships, called Sutton, was distinguished among the fleet which defeated the Spanish Armada. After living with great splendour, he retired to private life and solitude, after the death of his wife, 1602, and he determined to render his name immortal by some spirited foundation, though the court tempted him with the honours of a peerage, to divert him from his purpose, and to induce him to make the duke of York, Charles I. his heir. In consequence of this resolution he bought the dissolved Charter-house for 13,000*l.* and founded there a noble hospital and public school. He died 11th Dec. 1611, at Hackney, aged 79, and his remains were deposited in Christ church, London, till removed, in 1614, to a vault in his newly erected hospital. His property, at his death was 5000*l.* a year in land, and above 60,000*l.* in money, an immense fortune in those times.

SUTTON, Samuel, a native of Alfreton, Derbyshire. After serving in the army under Marlborough, he kept a coffee-house in Aldersgate-street, and having strong natural powers as a mechanic, he applied them to various useful projects. His plan, in 1740, of clearing the foul air from the wells of ships, by opening a communication with the fire-places by means of pipes, though recommended by Dr. Mead, was superseded by the more simple invention of ventilators, introduced by Dr. Hales. He died in 1752.

SUWAROFF, Alexander, a Russian general, born of an ancient family, 1730. His father intended him for the magistracy; but the future general preferred the military service of his country, and, in 1742, he entered into the army as a common soldier, and by a gradual rise he, in 1762, was made a colonel. After some campaigns in Poland, he went under the celebrated Romanzoff against the Turks, and behaved with such personal bravery, that he killed with his own hand several of the Janissaries, and as a proof of victory threw their heads into a sack, and emptied the contents at the feet of his general. He next crossed the Danube, near Silistria, and joining Kamcaskoy, he defeated the 40,000 men commanded by the Reis-Effendi, and took all his artillery. In 1783, he obliged the Tartars of Kuban and Budziack to submit to the power of Russia, and to take the oath of allegiance, for which the empress nominated him general in chief. In 1787, he bravely defended Kinburn against the Ottoman fleet, and cut to pieces the Janissaries who had been landed. In 1789, after defeating the enemy at Focksan, he flew, at the head of 10,000 men, to the relief of the prince of Saxe Coburg, who, with the imperial troops, was surrounded by 100,000 Turks, and he obtained so signal a victory, that his services were rewarded with the title of a count of the Roman empire, under the name of Riminiski, in commemoration of the river Riminisk, near which the battle had been fought. Soon after he was sent by Potemkin against the town of Ismailow, which had already resisted its assailants for seven months, and he was ordered to take it in three days, and on the third day the town submitted, after the dreadful slaughter of 40,000 Turks, who refused to give or take quarter. The treaty of Yassy put an end to the war with the Ottomans; but Suwaroff found in Poland a new field of glory. He attacked Prague, and made himself master of Warsaw, after cutting to pieces 20,000 of the Poles who opposed his progress, and for this bold conduct, and his successful campaign, which thus enabled three neighbouring powers to parcel out among themselves the Polish dominions, the conqueror was raised to the rank of field marshal, and rewarded with large domains. In 1799, the general was sent to command the Russian forces in Italy, and to check the career of the French triumphs. After a glorious campaign, in which he restored the fallen fortunes of the allies, he was opposed to the genius of Moreau; but notwithstanding the abilities and the generalship of his enemy, he maintained his superiority, and though obliged at last to give way, his retreat through the snows of Switzerland to the borders of Germany, displayed the most masterly manœuvres. Another campaign would have opened the way to fresh victories, but Paul capriciously changed his politics, and the general, displeased with the want of co-operation on the part of the Germans, retired to Russia. Though honourably received at Petersburg, and created prince Italisky, he fell under the displeasure of his ungrateful master, and died, it is said, of a broken heart, near the capital 1800. In his character, Suwaroff was as singular as he was bold and intrepid. He was the idol of his soldiery, and often on the field of battle, he appeared among them stripped to his shirt, and with one leg booted, and the other with only a sandal. His food was often coarse, like that of the common soldier, and he rested in the camp like his inferior associates, covered with a sheepskin. In his intercourse with the world he affected to be laconic. When he took Toutou-Kai, in Bulgaria, he sent these words to Catherine, "the town is taken, I am there," and when Ismailow fell into his hands, the empress was informed of it by this short sentence, "Madam, proud Ismailow is at your feet." He declined all political and diplomatic employments about the court, observing that the pen is unbecoming the hand of a soldier. In his religious opinions he affected great devotion, and he ordered his officers every evening to repeat a prayer in the presence of their soldiers, and he never began a battle without paying adoration to the image of St. Nicolas, which accompanied him in all his expeditions. Though brave, fortunate, and heroic, Suwaroff must be condemned for his inhumanity; for surely that general sinks below the name of man, who permits his soldiers to ravage and to murder, when the prostrate enemy implores aloud for mercy.

SUZE, Henriette de Coligni. Fid. COLIGNI.

SWAMMERDAM, John, an eminent naturalist, born at Amsterdam, 1637. He imbibed his first ideas of natural history from the occupation of his father, who was an apothecary, and early began to make a collection of curiosities. He employed much time in catching and examining the flying insects of Holland, and to improve a taste so strongly marked for the examination of the works of nature, he studied at Leyden, and became the friend of Steno the celebrated anatomist, and of Van Horne, and in 1667, took his degree of M. D. He had in the mean time visited Paris and Saumur, and improved himself by the conversation and intimacy of Tanaquil Faber, and Thevenot. In 1667, he made his first experiment of injecting the uterine vessels of the human body with ceraceous matter, which he afterwards brought to great perfection. A dreadful ague, however, interrupted his anatomical labours, which he had pursued with his friend Horne, and in consequence he determined to devote himself solely to the study of insects. In 1669, he published a general history of insects, a work of great merit, in 2 vols. fol. but though tempted by liberal offers by the grand duke of Tuscany, he refused to quit his native country, though his father was displeased with his pursuits, and insisted upon his practising physic. In 1673, he became acquainted with Madam de Bourignon, and for her mystical reveries he abandoned the pursuits of natural history, wholly devoted, as he said, in adoring and loving the sovereign good. He continued thus lost to himself and to the world, and died 1680. His other works are, a Treatise on Respiration, 4to.—de Fabricâ Uteri Muliebris, 4to. His works in Dutch, have appeared in an English translation from the Latin version of Gaubius, in folio, with 53 copper plates, 1758.

SWANEFELD, Herman, a Flemish painter, who studied under Gerard Douw and Claude Lorraine. He settled at Rome, and lived in so recluse a manner, that he was called the hermit of Italy. His landscapes, which are very scarce, possess great merit. He died 1680, aged 60.

SWEDENBORG, Emmanuel, a fanatic Swede, born at Stockholm, 29th Jan. 1688. His father was a bishop, of the Lutheran persuasion, and president of the Swedish churches. The son travelled abroad in 1710, and on his return was elected assessor of the Metallic college, an office which he resigned in 1747. He was well acquainted with the business of his profession, and wrote Regnum Minerale, 3 vols. fol. 1734, besides a Treatise on the Tides, and another on the position and course of the Planets. From the pursuit of philosophical objects, he at last withdrew himself to the contemplation of heavenly things, and in his opinions he became the founder of a new sect of enthusiasts, which, though not numerous during his lifetime, has since his death increased rapidly on the continent and in London, where under the title of New Jerusalem Conventicles, they ensnare the superstitious and the unwary. This singular character, who, in his moments of mystical reveries and enthusiastic madness, supposed that he conversed not only with angels, but with the supreme Being, pretended that whatever happens in the world, has already happened in the world of spirits, which is situated between heaven and hell. According to his declaration the final judgment took place in 1756, in this invisible world of spirits, and the result of it was communicated to him by the Redeemer himself. To support his doctrines he published various works, such as books on the New Jerusalem—on Heaven and Hell—Spiritual Influx—the White Horse of the Revelation, &c. This extraordinary character died in London, 29th March, 1772, aged 85. In his younger years he had shared the favours of the king of Sweden, and been ennobled in 1719.

SWIFT, Jonathan, a distinguished divine and able writer. He was born 30th Nov. 1667, in Ireland, descended of an ancient English family. His father died about seven months before his birth, and left him with his mother and a daughter in very indigent circumstances, but the elder branches of the family provided for the maintenance of the future dean. At the age of six he went to Kilkenny school, and eight years after removed to Trinity college, Dublin. At the university he applied himself more to history and poetry than to logic and academical learning, so that after four years' residence he was refused his first degree for insufficiency, and was at last permitted to take it speciali gratiâ, in terms of reproach. This circumstance roused all his attention, and for the seven next years of his life he regularly studied eight hours a day. In 1688, his uncle was attacked by a most severe illness, which deprived him of his speech and memory, and having thus lost a patron and a friend, he passed into England to visit his mother, who had fixed her residence at Leicester, to consult about future means of support. Here he was introduced to sir William Temple, who had married a relation of Mrs. Swift, and in the company of this distinguished statesman he continued about two years, and had frequent opportunities of seeing king William, who once offered to make him captain of horse. Swift's thoughts, however, were bent to the church. He was admitted to his master's degree at Oxford, ad eundem, 1692, with many marks of civility, and afterwards assisted his friend sir William in revising his works; but though he enlarged his political knowledge in the conversation of his patron, he thought himself neglected, and in 1694, a quarrel and separation took place. Swift soon after obtained from Capel, the lord deputy of Ireland, the prebend of Kilroot, in the diocese of Connor, worth 100*l.* a year, but in a little time returned to sir William Temple, who wished for his conversation by any sacrifice whatever; and for four years till sir William's death, the greatest harmony prevailed between them. On his friend's death he inherited a legacy from him, and the right of his posthumous works, which he dedicated to the king, in hopes of receiving some preferment, which the monarch in his gayer hours had liberally promised, but he was disappointed, and soon after followed, as secretary and chaplain, lord Berkeley, one of the lords justices of Ireland. Here again disappointment followed him; he had been promised the deanery of Derry, but when it became vacant his patron gave it to some greater favourite, and presented him to the livings of Laracor and Rathbeggin, in the diocese of Meath. At Laracor he now resided, engaged in all the duties of an active and exemplary parish priest. It was in this place that he was first visited by the celebrated Stella, who was daughter of W. Johnson, steward to sir William Temple, and who inherited from him, for the faithful services of her father, a legacy of 1000*l.* This lady, whom Swift had seen at the house of his former patron, came to Ireland at his pressing invitation, and as she was but 18 she was accompanied by Mrs. Dingley, a female friend 15 years older. These two ladies lived with Swift on terms of the strictest intimacy, but without scandal; in his absence they resided at the parsonage, but on his return they removed to their lodgings in the village, and they were never known to meet but in the company of a third person. In 1701 he took his doctor's degree, and after the death of king William, he came to England occasionally, and embarked in the politics of the time. He became acquainted with Harley, and the leading members of the ministry, and gained so much their confidence, that he was consulted by them in matters of importance, and considered as capable not only of defending, but almost of guiding the public measures. Though thus courted by the great and powerful, he did not receive any preferment before 1713, when he was made dean of St. Patrick, Dublin. A bishopric had before been intended for him by the queen; but on the representation of archbishop Sharp, who declared him to be a man whose Christianity was very questionable, his name was passed by. Soon after he had taken possession of his deanery, he returned to England to attempt to reconcile Harley and St. John, whose enmity seemed to threaten destruction to the whole power of the ministry, but in vain. After the death of queen Anne, he had little connexion with the leading men of England; but, though for some time very unpopular in Ireland, his patriotism soon restored him to the public favour. When Wood obtained, by iniquitous means, a patent to coin 180,000*l.* in copper, for the use of Ireland, a measure which, in enriching the projector, would have ruined the people, the dean boldly opposed the plan, and by the publication of his Drapier's Letters, he prevailed upon the public to reject the use of the money. Thus successful in the suppression of this irregular patent, he became the oracle of Ireland, and nothing was adopted in commercial or political subjects, either at Dublin or in the country, without previously knowing the sentiments of the dean. The last period of his life was spent in retirement, and under the afflictions of melancholy. In 1736 he lost his memory, and as his temper was naturally irascible, he grew violent and peevish, so that few of his friends were permitted to visit him. In 1741, his infirmities were such that he was unfit for conversation, and the next year he became wild and delirious, and at times sunk into such insensibility, that for a whole year he never spoke. After short intervals of reason, he gradually declined, and at last died at the end of October, 1745, aged 78, without the least pang or convulsion. He was buried in the cathedral of St. Patrick. Among the singularities of this extraordinary character, his conduct to Stella deserves the severest reprobation. After an intimate friendship of more than 16 years, he in 1716 married this amiable woman; but still no alteration took place in their mode of living, and she never resided in his house except when fits of giddiness or deafness made her presence necessary. He never acknowledged her as his wife, though she always presided at his table; and this cruel conduct at last broke the heart of this injured woman. Late in life he wished her to be publicly acknowledged as his wife, but hurt by his unkindness, she replied, "that it was too late, and that they must live as they had lived before," and she gradually declined in health, and died 28th Jan. 1727, in her 44th year. But not only Stella experienced the coldness and cruelty of his heart. In his excursions in England, he became acquainted with Mrs. Vanhomrigh, and her two daughters, with the eldest of whom he conversed frequently on literary and poetical subjects. From an occasional instructor, Swift soon became in the eye of the lady an object of admiration and of love, and she at last ventured to propose marriage to him. He affected to ridicule her on her choice, but without a direct and absolute refusal, he continued to indulge her hopes by the frequency of his correspondence. In 1714, this lady, who is better known under the name of Vanessa, passed into Ireland with her sister, and fixed her residence in his neighbourhood, and at last in 1717, she solicited him in the strongest terms not to trifle with her affections, but to declare whether he would accept or refuse her for a wife. The dean, who had hitherto sported with the feelings of this innocent and amiable woman, wrote an answer to her letter, probably intimating his marriage with Stella, and delivered it with his own hands. Vanessa read it, and survived the shock only a few weeks; but before she expired, she altered her will, and left to the bishop of Cloyne and sergeant Marshall, the property which she had designed for her cruel lover. The works of Swift are very respectable. He wrote poems, which possess elegance and beauty, but their humour is often coarse and licentious. His political writings are composed in a forcible and argumentative style, and when published they had a strong effect on the public opinion, and drew on the author the admiration and the applause of the great parliamentary leaders of the time. His Gulliver's Travels, a satirical romance, and his Tale of a Tub, in which he ridiculed popery and puritanism, were very popular works, and are still read with admiration. In his political principles he was a tory, and ably defended the succession of a protestant monarch to the throne. As the friend of Oxford, Pope, Addison, Congreve, Steele, Rowe, and other great and learned men, he was universally respected for the importance which his opinion acquired in the public esteem, and wherever he appeared he was courted and respected as a pleasing companion, and a man of information. Though a great humorist and an excellent punster, he preserved delicacy in his conversation, and was best pleased when ladies were present, as he observed that they would banish whatever was indecorous, profane, or vulgar. As an ecclesiastic he was punctually exact, and as a man of the world he regarded wealth as the proof of independence, and therefore often made his frugality subservient to his avarice. He left by his will 11,000*l.* for the endowment of a hospital for idiots and lunatics, in the city of Dublin. His works have been published in 14 vols. 4to. also in 25 vols. 8vo. in 27 vols. small 8vo. and in 17 vols. 8vo. 1784, with an account of his life by T. Sheridan.

SWIFT, Deane, a near relation of the dean of St. Patrick, was called Deane from the name of one of his maternal ancestors. He published in 1755 an Essay on the Life, Writings, and Character of Dr. Jonathan Swift; in 1765 an eighth quarto volume of the dean's works, and in 1768 2 vols. of his letters. He intended a complete edition of his relation's works, but died before it was finished, at Worcester, 12th July, 1783.

SWIFT, Zephaniah, LL.D. chief justice of Connecticut, was graduated at Yale college in 1778, and established himself as a lawyer at Windham, in that state, where his superior talents and professional attainments soon elevated him to extensive practice and a high reputation. He was early elected to a seat in congress, and in 1800 was secretary to Ellsworth, Davie, and Murray in their mission to France. Soon after his return he was placed on the bench of the superior court, where he continued eighteen years, during the last five of which he was chief justice, and discharged the duties of that station with the most distinguished ability and uprightness. He was afterwards a member of the state legislature, and was appointed one of a committee to revise the statute laws of the state. He published a Digest of the Laws of Connecticut, in 2 volumes, on the model of Blackstone, a work of great learning and reputation. His death took place at Warren, Ohio, October 27th, 1823, in the 65th year of his age.  L.

SWINBURNE, Henry, a native of York. He was educated at Oxford, and took his degree of LL.B. and became proctor and judge of the prerogative court of the archbishop of York. He wrote Brief treatise on Testaments and Last Wills, 4to.—treatise of Sponsals or Matrimonial Contracts, 4to. &c. and died at York, 1620.

SWINBURNE, Henry, a traveller, was born of a catholic family in Northumberland. After going through a preparatory course of education at Scorton school in Yorkshire, he went to Paris, Bourdeaux, and Turin, for improvement. In 1774 he again made a tour on the continent, where he spent six years; and on his return retired to his seat in the bishopric of Durham; but owing to a failure in his circumstances, was obliged to go to the island of Trinidad, where he died in 1803. Mr. Swinburne published "Travels in Spain," in 1 vol.; and "Travels in the Two Sicilies," in 2 vols. 4to.—W. B.

SWINDEN, Tobias, an English divine, author of a curious Inquiry into the Nature and place of Hell, which he places in the sun. This work, first published in 8vo. 1714, appeared again with an appendix, 1727, and was translated into French by Bion, Amsterdam, 1728, 8vo. The author, who was vicar of Cuxton in Kent, died about 1720.

SWINNOCK, George, a native of Maidstone, educated at Cambridge, from which he removed to Oxford, where he took his master's degree. He lost, in 1662, his living of Great Kymbels, Bucks, for non-conformity, and died at Maidstone, 1673. He was author of Heaven and Hell Epitomised, 4to.—the Door of Salvation Opened, 8vo.—the Christian Man's Calling, 3 vols. 4to. a useful work, and other divinity tracts, now little known.

SWINTON, John, B.D. an English antiquary, born 1703, at Bexton, Cheshire. He was originally servitor of Wadham college, Oxford, where, in consequence of his good conduct, he was elected scholar and fellow. When he had taken orders he obtained the living of St. Peter-le-Bailey, in Oxford, and then went as chaplain to the English factory at Leghorn. As the situation did not agree with his health, he returned home through Venice, Presburg, and Vienna. He married in 1743, and in 1747 was elected keeper of the university records. He died 4th April, 1777, and his wife in 1784. They were both buried in Wadham chapel. He published some learned works, the best known of which are an Essay on the Words Δαμιων and Δαίμωνιον, &c.—Inscriptiones Criticæ, &c.—and other curious dissertations, besides some sermons, and parts of the Ancient Universal History, comprehended in the 6th and 7th volumes of that useful work.

SYBRECHT, John a landscape painter, born at Antwerp, 1630. His drawings, especially of views on the Rhine, were much admired. The duke of Buckingham invited him to England, and patronised him. His Derbyshire views possessed great merit. He died at London, 1703, and was buried in St. James's church.

SYDENHAM, Thomas, an eminent physician, born at Winford Eagle, Dorsetshire, 1624. He was of Magdalen hall, Oxford, which, when it was garrisoned by the king's forces, he left for London, but afterwards returned and took his degree of M.B. 1648. He then subscribed to the authority of the parliamentary visitors, and was made fellow of All Souls, and some years afterwards settled as a physician at Westminster, and took his doctor's degree at Cambridge. From 1660 to 1670 he enjoyed a most extensive practice, and a reputation superior to that of his contemporaries, but the gout arrested his progress, and permitted him to go little abroad. He was, however, consulted at home, and his writings continued to improve and enlighten the medical world. He died in Pall Mall, 29th Dec. 1689, and was buried in St. James's church. In his practice he followed experience rather than theory, and observed the nature, properties, and symptoms of disease with such success and discrimination, that he has been called the father of physic among the moderns. He was the first who recommended a cool regimen in the smallpox. His treatises on nervous disorders, and on consumptive fevers are very valuable. His works were written in English, but translated into Latin by his friends, and universally esteemed by the learned of Europe. There were editions of them at Leyden, Geneva, Leipsic and London.

SYDENHAM, Floyer, a learned man, born 1710, and educated at Wadham college, Oxford, where he took his degree of M.A. 1734. He undertook the translation of Plato, for which he was well qualified by his great knowledge of ancient literature, and published some parts; but poverty persecuted him, and clouded the happiest of his hours. He was at last arrested by a victualler, at whose house he had often had a scanty dinner, and he died while in confinement, 1788. The amiable character of the man, his unassuming modesty, and well-known abilities, as well as his melancholy fate, deeply interested the friends of humanity and of science, and to that honourable feeling England owes the institution of the literary fund, a noble establishment, which tends to banish indigence and despair from the humble abodes of the professional favourite of the muses, and to shed a beam of comfort on his declining years.

SYLBURGIUS, Frederick, a learned German born at Marburg, 1546. He was for some time schoolmaster at Licha, but afterwards devoted himself to the study of ancient authors. He published learned editions of Herodotus, Aristotle, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Dion Cassius, Justin Martyr, &c. wrote some Greek poems, and also assisted Stephens in the compilation of his Greek Thesaurus. His Greek Grammar, and Etymologicon Magnum, folio, 1594, are highly valued. He died universally lamented, 1596.

SYLLA, Lucius Cornelius, a famous Roman, who acquired military fame in the armies of Marius and of Catullus. Success in the war against the Marsi, and great popularity among the soldiers, incited him to aspire to the sovereign power under the title of dictator, and though opposed by Marius, he gained his purpose, and cruelly murdered the most powerful of the senators, who wished to curb his authority. After being absolute at Rome, he had the courage to lay down his office, and to retire to the inconsequence of a private life. He died at Puteoli, B.C. 78, aged 60. The last years of his life were spent disgracefully in low debauchery.

SYLVESTER, Matthew, an English divine, educated at Cambridge, and ejected from the living of Gunnerby, Lincolnshire, for nonconformity, 1662. He settled afterwards in London, as pastor to a dissenting congregation, and died there 1708. Besides some sermons, he published Baxter's history of his Life and Times, in fol.

SYLVESTER, Joshua, an English poet, born 1563. He was noticed by Elizabeth and James I. and was for some time engaged in mercantile business. He was poetical pensioner to Henry, James's eldest son

He was obliged to leave his country, for what cause is unknown, and died at Middleberg in Holland, 28th Sep. 1618. He is known as the translator of Du Bartas's Divine Weeks, and works, 4to. and as the author of some poems, but of little merit.

SYLVIVS, Francis, professor of eloquence, and principal of the college of Tournay at Paris, was a native of Levilly near Amiens. He laboured zealously to introduce the right pronunciation of the Latin language in the colleges of France, and to supersede the barbarous jargon of the schools by the more elegant diction of Cicero. Besides commentaries, he wrote Progymnasmatum in Artem Oratoriam, &c. and died 1530. After the fashion of the times, he altered his name of Dubois, to the more classical word Sylvius.

SYLVIVS, Lambert, or VANDEN BOSCH, a Dutch writer, born at Dordrecht. He wrote the Theatre of illustrious men, &c. 2 vols. 4to.—History of his age, from 1667, to 1687.—History of sea heroes, 4to.—with figures, tragedies, poems, &c. He died 1688, aged 78.

SYLVIVS, Francis de le Boe, a native of Hanau in Veteravia, professor of medicine at Leyden, where he ably demonstrated the truth of Harvey's discovery of the circulation of the blood. He promoted also the study of chymistry, and died 14th Nov. 1672, aged 58. His works have been collected by Elzevir, 1679, 4to. and fol. Venice 1708.

SYLVIVS, James, or DUBOIS, an eminent French physician, born at Amiens in Picardy 1479. After receiving an excellent education he devoted himself totally to medicine and to the study of Hippocrates and Galen. He gave lectures on the medical art at Paris with such success, that other physicians, jealous of his fame, exclaimed against him, as he had been graced by no degree. In consequence of this he went to Montpellier, but his avarice was so great that he would not spend money to procure the university honours. He afterwards obtained a degree by interest at Paris, and in 1548 was nominated to the medical chair of the royal college. He died 1555. His great learning was obscured by his uncommon avarice, and he unfortunately was engaged with his pupil Vesalius. His works have often been printed, called Opera Medica, the best edition of which is that of Cologne 1630.

SYMMACHUS, Q. Aur. Avianus, a learned Roman, who warmly opposed Christianity, and wished for the re-establishment of paganism at Rome. He was banished by Theodosius. His epistles are extant.

SYNCELLUS, a monk of Constantinople 792, author of a chronography in Greek and Latin.

SYNESIUS, a native of Africa, made bishop of Ptolemais 410. His epistles and homilies remain, and possess merit. There was a Platonic philosopher of that name, author of a treatise on natural philosophy, &c.

SYNGE, Edward, a pious prelate, second son of the bishop of Cork, was born at Inishonane in Ireland, where his father was then vicar, 6th April, 1659. He was educated at Cork school and then came to Christchurch Oxford, where he took his first degree, and afterwards completed his studies at Dublin university. He distinguished himself for above 20 years, as an active and laborious parish priest in Ireland, and in consequence of his great zeal in favour of the Hanoverian succession was made bishop of Raphoe in 1714, and two years after advanced to the primacy of Tuam. He died at Tuam 1741, and was buried in the churchyard of his cathedral. His tracts are valuable as written in a popular style, and for the active promotion of piety and virtue. They have appeared in 4 vols. 12mo. and often been reprinted, especially by the society for promoting Christian knowledge. Dr. Synge had the singular fortune of being a bishop, the son and the nephew of a bishop, and the father of two bishops.

SYPHAX, a king of Numidia, who revolted from the side of the Romans, to the cause of Carthage, and of Asdrubal, whose daughter he had married. He was defeated by Massinissa, and died in prison at Rome, B.C. 201.

TABOR, John Otho, a native of Bautzen in Lusatia. On the destruction of his country during the wars of Germany, he retired to Giessen where he became counsellor to the landgrave of Hesse Darmstadt. He died at Frankfort 1674, where he had retired a few years before, aged 70. His works, which are all on law, were published 1688, in two vols. fol. An account of his life was written by Paschius his son-in-law.

TABOUROT, Stephen, called Sieur des Accords, a French writer, born 1549. He was king's proctor at Dijon, and distinguished himself by some curious and eccentric publications. He died 1590. His bigarrures, &c. consisting of apophthegms, epitaphs, dialogues, conundrums, &c. not always on the most delicate subjects, were published, 2 vols. 12mo.

TACCA, Peter James, a native of Carrara, who studied sculpture under John of Bologna. He travelled into Spain and France, and acquired great celebrity. He died at Florence, 1640. The best of his pieces is an equestrian statue of Philip IV. at Madrid. His statue of Henry IV. at Paris, his Jane of Austria, his Ferdinand III. of Tuscany, and the four slaves in bronze, in the harbour of Leghorn, are also much admired. His son Ferdinand was also an able sculptor, and his statue of Ferdinand was among his best pieces.

TACHARD, Guy, a French Jesuit, sent in 1686 as missionary to Siam. He, with the ambassadors Chaumont and Choisi, visited Europe, 1688, and then returned and died at Bengal of a contagious disorder, 1694. An account of his voyages to Siam have appeared in two vols. 12mo. Paris, 1686, and 1689, but he is very credulous and inaccurate.

TACITUS, Caius Cornel. a celebrated Roman historian. He was also eminent as a pleader, and as the asserter and the advocate of virtue and innocence, in the reigns of Domitian and Nerva. Of his historical works some have perished. His annals are very valuable. His language and style possess elegance and spirit, purity and nervous strength.

TACITUS, Marcus Claudius, emperor of Rome after Aurelian 275, was a wise, benevolent, and patriotic monarch. He was also distinguished as a warrior, and died 276, aged 70, as he was preparing to go against the Persians.

TACONNET, Toussaint Gaspard, a native of Paris, known for his eccentricities. He was for some time a player, and then a poet, and rendered himself ridiculous by his intemperance. He wrote several farces and plays, of which the heroes are persons of low birth and mean professions. He died in the hospital of charity at Paris, 29th Dec. 1774, aged 44.

TACQUET, Andrew, a Jesuit of Antwerp, eminent for his knowledge of mathematics, and his publications, a Treatise on Astronomy—an edition of Euclid, &c. He died 1660. His works were collected into one volume fol. 1669, and 1707, at Antwerp.

TAFFI, Andrew, a native of Florence, eminent as being the artist who introduced the art of designing in mosaic, which he had learnt from some Greeks. His best piece is a dead Christ, in a chapel at Florence. He died 1294, aged 81.

TALBERT, Francis Xavier, a native of Besançon. He abandoned the law, for which his father, a counsellor of the parliament of Franche-Comté, designed him, and embraced the ecclesiastical profession, and obtained a canonry at Besançon. He was a popular and eloquent preacher at Luneville, Versailles, and Paris, and, in 1791, he quitted France to reside in Italy, and afterwards went with the princess of Nassau into Poland. He died at Lemberg, in Galicia, 4th June, 1803, aged 78. He is author of a discourse on inequality among men, crowned at Dijon, 1755—Panegyric of St. Louis—Eloges of Bonnet, Montaigne. cardinal Amboise, Philip regent of France, Boileau, &c. and some poetical pieces.

TALBOT, John, earl of Shrewsbury, a warlike Englishman descended from a Norman family, distinguished himself in the reduction of Ireland, of which he was made governor by Henry V. He was afterwards in France with the English army, and took Alençon, Pontoise, and Laval, but was repulsed at the siege of Orleans, by Joan of Arc. He was afterwards taken prisoner at the battle of Patay, but when restored to liberty he signalized himself at the siege of Beaumont-sur-Oise, and afterwards invaded Guienne, and took Bourdeaux, and other towns. This brave warrior, who was the terror of the French, and deservedly named the Achilles of England, at last fell in the battle near Castillon, a town of which he was attempting to raise the siege, 17th July, 1453.

TALBOT, Peter, a native of Ireland, almoner to Catherine, wife of Charles II. He was a zealous papist, and was made by pope Clement IX. archbishop of Dublin. He was seized by the protestants, and died in prison, 1682. He wrote de Natura Fidei et Hæresis—Tractatus de Religione, and other works.

TALBOT, Richard, earl of Tyrconnel, brother to the preceding, was made viceroy of Ireland by James II. and he opposed the invasion of William III. He died 1692.

TALBOT, Charles, earl and duke of Shrewsbury, was one of the warmest promoters of the revolution, and for his services he was created a duke. He was afterwards made lord chamberlain, and went to Ireland as viceroy, and afterwards held the office of high-treasurer. He died 1717, aged 57.

TALBOT, William, a native of Lichfield, educated at Oriel college, Oxford, where he entered, 1674. The interest of his relation, the earl of Shrewsbury, opened for him the door of preferment, and he became dean of Worcester 1691, bishop of Oxford 1699, of Sarum 1715, and six years after was translated to Durham. He died 1730. He wrote sermons, which have been published in 1 vol. 8vo.

TALBOT, Charles lord, son of the preceding, rose by his merit to high offices in the law, and was at last made lord chancellor. To the deepest knowledge of law and of politics, he joined the soundest virtue and the most incorruptible integrity. He died 1737, aged 51.

TALHAIARN, a Welsh bard of the sixth century. He composed a prayer which was adopted by the whole body of bards in Wales, and he afterwards retired to the solitude of a hermitage, where he was visited as a saint of superior virtues.

TALIACOTIUS, Gaspar, or TAGLIACOCEI, an Italian surgeon, at Bologna, where he died, 1553, aged 64. He wrote a Treatise "de Curtorum Chirurgiâ per Insitionem," Venice, fol. 1597, which is known in England by the ludicrous allusion to it in Hudibras, "So learned Taliacotus from," &c. In this work he pretended that he could restore the nose, ears, &c. to their original form and appearance in case of mutilation or deformity. He is represented at Bologna in a statue with a nose in his hand, as expressive of the art which he practised.

TALIESIN, a Welsh bard of great celebrity. He flourished about the sixth century. Several of his compositions are preserved in the Archæology of Wales, and are mentioned with applause.

TALLARD, Camille d'Hostun, count de, a celebrated marshal of France, born 14th Feb. 1652, in Dauphiné. He early distinguished himself as a soldier, and in 1672, was under Lewis XIV. in Holland, and soon after gained the approbation and friendship of Turenne, by his noble conduct in the battles of Mulhausen and Turkheim. In 1693 he was raised to the rank of lieutenant general, and 1697, was sent as ambassador to England, concerning the succession to the Spanish crown in the person of Charles II. In 1702 he was placed at the head of the armies on the Rhine, and made marshal of France soon after. He defeated the Imperialists under the prince of Hesse, before the town of Landau, which he took after a short siege; but his pompous ostentation of announcing the victory, rendered him ridiculous. "I have," said he, "obtained more standards than your majesty has lost soldiers." In 1704, he was opposed to the great Marlborough, and at the battle of Blenheim was taken prisoner and brought to England, where he continued seven years. On his return to Paris, 1712, he was created a duke, and in 1726, made secretary of state. He died March 3d, 1723.

TALLIS, Thomas, an eminent English musician in the 16th century. He was organist, it is said, in the chapel of Henry VIII. and of his three successors. Under Mary he was only, it is supposed, gentleman of the chapel, and received for his salary, 7 1-2*d.* a-day, and under Elizabeth he had Bird as his fellow organist. He may be said to be the father of the cathedral style, especially in England. He published, with Bird, a Collection of Hymns, chiefly from the English liturgy, for church service, &c. He died 23d Nov. 1585, and was buried in Greenwich church, Kent.

TAMERLANE, or TIMUR BEG, or TIMUR the Lame, from some defect in his feet, was born in the village of Kesch, in ancient Sogdiana, 1335. Whether the son of a shepherd, or descended from the royal race, is unknown; but, however, the obscurity of his first years was soon forgotten in the glory of his exploits. Distinguished by courage, by intrepidity, and by unbounded ambition, he soon gained a number of faithful adherents, and at their head he seized the city of Balk, the capital of Khorassan, and easily subdued the province of Candahar, the kingdom of Persia, and Bagdad. Elate with his success he now meditated the conquest of India, and though his soldiers at first refused to follow, their hesitation was soon conquered by promises, and the powerful aid of a pretended prophet. Thus seconded by an enthusiastic army, he penetrated to India, took Delhi, with the immense treasures of the Mogul, and returned to conquer Damascus, and to punish Bagdad, that presumed to shake off his yoke. The offending city was given up to the pillage of his soldiers, and 80,000 of her inhabitants put to the sword. Now master of the fairer part of Asia, he interfered, at the request of the Greek emperor, in the affairs of Bajazet, emperor of the Turks, and sent to him a haughty message, commanding him to abandon the siege of Constantinople, and to restore the princes whom he had deposed. The message roused the indignation of Bajazet; he marched against his new enemy, and was defeated by Tamerlane in the plains of Ankyra, in Phrygia, after a dreadful battle, which continued three days. Bajazet fell into the hands of the conqueror, and was treated with great inhumanity, and carried about in mockery in an iron cage. Some writers, however, deny this, and affirm that the conduct of Tamerlane towards the captive prince, was as humane and honourable as fallen greatness merited. To these last conquests Tamerlane added Egypt, and the immense treasures of Cairo, and then fixed the seat of his empire at Samarcand, where he received the homage of submissive princes, and among them of Manuel Paleologus, emperor of Constantinople, and Henry III. king of Castille, by their ambassadors. Tamerlane was preparing fresh victories by the invasion of China, when death stopped his career, April 1st, 1405, in the 36th year of his reign. He appointed his grandson as his successor over that vast empire, which he had acquired with such astonishing success and rapidity.

TANAQUIL, wife of the elder Tarquin, persuaded her husband to go and settle at Rome, where he was elected king. Her memory was held in great respect by the Romans.

TANEVOT, Alexander, first commissary of the finances, was born at Versailles, and died at Paris, 1773, aged 81. He wrote Sethos, and Adam and Eve, two tragedies, besides fables, stories, epistles, songs, &c. which were collected into 3 vols. 12mo. 1766. His style is pure, easy, and flowing, though he occasionally degenerates into a feeble and insipid diction. Though he had the power of enriching himself, he died poor, but highly respected.

TANNER, Thomas, a learned antiquary, born 1674, at Market Lavington, Wilts, where his father was minister. He was educated at Queen's college, Oxford, and became chaplain and fellow of All Souls. In 1701 he was made chancellor of Norwich, and rector of Thorpe, and afterwards prebendary of Ely, canon of Christ-church, and in 1732, bishop of St. Asaph. He died at Christ-church, Oxford, 14th Dec. 1735, and was buried in the cathedral. He is known as the author of Notitia Monastica, or a short History of all the Religious Houses in England and Wales, 8vo. 1695, republished in folio, 1744—Bibliotheca Britannico-Hibernica, the labour of 40 years, published 1748, folio. He also contributed to Wood's Athenæ Oxonienses, last edition, &c.

TANSILLO, Luigi, an Italian poet, born at Nola 1520. The best part of his life was spent in the service of Don Pedro de Toledo, viceroy of Naples, and he was made judge of Gaeta, and died after 1596. He was esteemed as a poet, but his il Vendemiatore, or the Vintager, a poem 1534, was considered so indelicate and licentious, that his writings were put into the index expurgatorius of the pope. He published besides other poems, and reconciled himself to the see of Rome, by his "Tears of St. Peter," which removed the papal interdicts from his writings, except the Vintager. His poems consist of sonnets, songs, comedies, &c. The Tears of St. Peter were translated by Malherbe into French.

TANUCCI, Bernard, marquis de, chief minister of Naples, was born of poor parents at Stia, in Tuscany, 1698. He studied at Pisa, and by his merit rose to the chair of jurisprudence in that university. On the coming of Don Carlos to succeed to the Neapolitan throne, the professor, who had been recommended to the new king, and who had defended the legality of seizing a murderer from the asylum of a church against the opinions of the see of Rome, was raised to the office of minister, and by his firmness and wisdom, deserved the high appointment. For 50 years he continued in this important office, and after contributing zealously to the prosperity of the kingdom, and to establish its independence from the ecclesiastical superiority of Rome, he resigned in 1777, and died 29th April, 1783.

This enlightened minister encouraged literature; and to his zeal in the cause of science antiquarians are indebted for the important discoveries, and the valuable collections made in the subterraneous towns of Herculaneum and Pompeii.

TAPPAN, David, D.D. professor of theology in Harvard college, was born at Manchester, Massachusetts, April 21st, 1752, and graduated at Harvard in 1771. In 1774 he was ordained pastor of a church in Newbury, and laboured there eighteen years. He was elected to the professorship in 1792, and continued in the station till his death in 1803. He was highly useful in the institution. His theological views corresponded essentially with those generally held by the clergy of New-England, and though he insisted less on the doctrines of the gospel, his lectures were fraught with truth, clothed in an attractive style, and enforced with much vigour of argument and warmth of feeling. He was characterized by great amiableness, modesty, and regard for the feelings of others.

TARGE, I. B., professor of mathematics, and author of a general history of Italy, from the fall of the Roman empire, to modern times, 4 vols. 12mo.—translated Smollet's history of England, 19 vols. 12mo.—Barrow's Travels, 12 vols. 12mo.—and died at Orleans, 1788. He wrote also a history of England, from the treaty of Aix la Chapelle to 1763, 5 vols. 12mo.

TARIN, Peter, a French physician, born at Courtenai. He died in 1761, but his age is unknown. His writings were held in great esteem, especially his Adversaria Anatomica, 4to.; Anatomical Dictionary, 4to.; Osteographia, 4to.; the Art of Dissecting, 2 vols. 12mo.; a treatise on Ligaments; Observations on Medicine and Surgery, 3 vols. 12mo; a description of the Muscles, 4to. with figures, &c.

TARLETON, Richard, a native of Conover in Shropshire, who distinguished himself as an actor, and was patronised by Robert earl of Leicester. He performed the character of judge in the play called Henry V. acted at the Bull, Bishopsgate-street, London, before the Henry V. of Shakspeare was written. He was one of the queen's players in 1583, according to Stowe, and he died 1589. The seven deadly sins are mentioned as one of his dramatic compositions, and his jokes are still preserved in several collections.

TARPA, Spur. Mætius, a learned Roman appointed by Augustus to examine, with four others, the compositions of contemporary poets.

TARPEIA, daughter of Tarpeius, the governor of Rome, under Romulus. It is said that she betrayed the gates of the city to the Sabines, and that she was overwhelmed by the bucklers of the enemy thrown upon her as they entered through the street.

TARQUIN, the elder, fifth king of Rome, settled at Rome from Tarquinii the place of his birth, and by liberality and mildness so gained the hearts of the Romans, that on the death of Ancus Martius he was elected king. He was a benevolent prince, and adorned his city with stately buildings, and aqueducts, and added dignity and consequence to the body of the senate and to the magistrates. He was assassinated by the sons of Ancus Martius, B. C. 578, aged 80.

TARQUIN the second, or the Proud, was grandson to the elder Tarquin. He was brave, but his rise to the throne by the murder of his father-in-law Tullius, rendered him deservedly unpopular. The licentious and cruel conduct of his son proved fatal to his interests; and while he was at the siege of Ardea, the Romans took up arms and shut him out of their city. He took refuge among the cities of Etruria, and died there, aged 90.

TARRAKANOFF, N. princess of, daughter of Elizabeth, empress of Russia, by her secret marriage with Alexis Rozoumoffski, was carried away at the age of 12 by prince Radzivil in 1767, and concealed in a convent at Rome. This singular step was taken by the dissatisfied noble, to curb the views of the ambitious Catharine, but they failed, and Alexis Orloff, pretending greater discontent against the government of the empress, prevailed upon the princess, in the absence of Radzivil, to marry him, and by her influence and presence to excite a new insurrection in Russia. The unsuspecting princess no sooner yielded her person to her seducer, than she was seized in the bay of Leghorn, where she had been conducted on pretence of paying her military honours, and cruelly bound in chains and conveyed to Petersburg. In Dec. 1777, a violent rising of the Neva suddenly forced the waters into her prison, and the unfortunate princess was drowned before any assistance could extricate her.

TARRANTIUS, Lucius, a Roman, the friend of Cicero, who is said to have made two curious horoscopes.

TARTAGLIA, Nicholas, a native of Brescia, called the most eminent mathematician of his times. He published an Italian translation of Euclid, with a commentary, fol. 1543—a treatise of Numbers and Measures—Nova Scientia, and other works, 3 vols 4to. 1606. He died about 1557, in a good old age.

TARTINI, Joseph, a musician, called the Admirable by Dr. Burney, was born April 1692, at Pirano in Istria. He studied the law at Padua, but his powers were formed for musical eminence, and by practice and application he became one of the best performers on the violin, and was made master of the band in the church of St. Antony of Padua. He died 26th Feb. 1770, at Padua, universally respected and endeared to the inhabitants, by a residence of 50 years. He wrote, sonatas, a treatise on music, 1754, and other things, and was a great admirer of Corelli.

TARUFFI, Emilius, a native of Bologna, distinguished as a painter. His landscapes were particularly admired for boldness of expression, and for the correctness and animation of his figures. He died 1694, aged 62.

TASKER, William, a native of Devonshire, educated at Exeter college, Oxford, where he took his first degree in arts. He afterwards obtained the living of Iddesleigh, in Devonshire, and died there, 1800. He distinguished himself as a poet, and published Odes of Pindar and Horace, in English verse, 3 vols. 8vo.—Ode to the warlike Genius of Britain—Letter on Physiognomy, &c.

TASMAN, N. a Dutch navigator. He sailed from Batavia, 1642, and discovered New Holland, and New Zealand, which were regarded as a southern continent, till the more minute investigation of captain Cook ascertained their insular form and situation. He visited also Gilolo, New Guinea, and other islands, on his return to Europe.

TASSO, Bernardo, an Italian poet, better known as the father of the illustrious Tasso. The best esteemed of his poems is Amadis, in 100 cantos, and his letters also are regarded as very valuable by the Italians. He died at Rome, in the convent of St. Onuphrius, 1575. The best edition of his letters is that of Padua, 3 vols. 8vo. 1733, and of his poem 1560, 4to.

TASSO, Torquato, a celebrated Italian poet, son of the above. He was born at Sorrento in the kingdom of Naples, 11th March, 1544. His father was secretary to San Severino, prince of Salerno, and he shared his honour and his disgrace. When the prince made a complaint to Charles V. against the viceroy of Naples, who wished to introduce the inquisition into the kingdom, he was condemned, and the cruel sentence was pronounced not only against him but against his secretary, and also his son, the future poet, who was only nine years old. They withdrew from the fatal punishment by flight, and came to Rome, where the young poet already wrote verses, and compared his escape to the adventures of Ascanius and Æneas flying from Troy. From Rome he was sent to Padua to study the law, and there he took his degrees in philosophy and theology, but poetry was his favourite pursuit, and at the age of 17 he produced his Rinaldo. In 1565, he placed himself under the protection of Alphonso duke of Ferrara, and he accompanied his brother, the cardinal, in an embassy from pope Gregory XIII. to the court of Charles IX. of France. On his return to Ferrara he imprudently became enamoured of the sister of his patron, and this passion, joined to the malevolent insinuations of his enemies and persecutors, proved the cause of that melancholy, which embittered his life for 20 years. To fly from the scene of his misery he retired to his sister's house at Sorrento, and there spent a whole summer, but absence increased his flame. He returned to Ferrara, and in the midst of a crowded assembly he had the imprudence to embrace his favourite princess Eleonora. The duke, who was present, with great coolness, ordered his courtiers to remove the poet, whom he pronounced insane, to a place of confinement, and there in the hospital of St. Anne the unfortunate lover mourned his misfortunes, a prey to lingering disease, and at intervals deprived of his reason. The interference of the duke Vincent de Gonzaga, at last restored him to liberty 1586, and he retired to Naples in quest of tranquillity and happiness. His great merits now eclipsed the clouds, which envy and malice had raised around him, and his poetical works began to be regarded as the pride and glory of Italy. Sensible of his deserved reputation, the pope Clement VIII. in a full congregation of cardinals, determined to encircle his brows with the laurel crown, and to honour him with a triumph. The poet was sent for from Naples, and received with all due honours at the distance of one mile from Rome, and the most magnificent preparations were made for the ceremony in the capitol. Vain, however, are the schemes of man, Tasso, as if persecuted by fortune to the last moment of life, was taken ill, and the preparations made for his coronation ended in the melancholy procession of his funeral, as he died the evening before the intended ceremony, 15th April, 1595, aged 51. He derives his celebrity and the palm of immortality from his Jerusalem Delivered, a poem well conducted throughout, and abounding with all the pleasing description of tender scenes, the animated representation of battles, and the majestic flow of language, which so much captivate and overpower the reader in the pages of Homer and Virgil. Besides his Jerusalem, which is familiar to the English reader in the elegant translation of Mr. Hoole and of Miss Watts, Tasso wrote Jerusalem Conquered; Rinaldo; Aminta, a pastoral; Torismond, a tragedy, &c. His life has been written by the marquis Manzo. His works have been published in various forms, the best of which is that of Florence, 6 vols. fol. 1724.

TASSONI, Alexander, an Italian poet, born at Modena 1565. Though early an orphan, his abilities displayed themselves through want and obscurity. He was in the service of cardinal Colonna, and of the dukes of Savoy and of Modena, and died 1635. He wrote "Secchia Rapita, or Rape of the Bucket," a mock-heroic poem, much admired in Italy for its elegance and delicate humour. It was written in consequence of the war between Modena and Bologna. He wrote besides, observations on Petrarch, an ecclesiastical history, &c.

TATE, Nahum, a native of Dublin, born 1652, and educated at the college there. He was befriended by Dryden, and patronised by Dorset, and succeeded Shadwell as poet laureat, with a salary of 100*l.* per annum, and a butt of canary. He wrote nine dramatic pieces, but he is now little known but as the joint translator of the Psalms of David with Dr. Brady. Of his miscellaneous poems, that on the death of queen Anne was most admired. He died 12th Aug. 1715, at the mint, where he resided to escape from the persecution of his creditors.

TATIAN, a Syrian pagan, who was converted to Christianity and became the disciple of Justin Martyr. He still retained the principles of the Platonists, and fell into the errors of Marcion. Of his works nothing remains but an apology for the Christian religion, edited 1700, 8vo. at Oxford.

TATISCHEF, Vassili, a Russian historian, engaged for 30 years in collecting materials for the history of his country. He died before his labours were completed 1750. The work is rather a series of connected chronicles than a regular history. The part published by Muller was 3 vols. 4to.

TATIUS, king of the Sabines, took possession of the Roman capitol, but was reconciled to Romulus, with whom he shared the kingdom. He was murdered at Lanuvium, B.C. 1742.

TATIUS, Achilles, a native of Alexandria, who became a Christian. He is author of a commentary on Aratus's phænomena, and of the loves of Leucippus and Clitophon, a Greek romance.

TAVANES, Gaspard de Saulx de, a French general, born 1509. He was taken prisoner with Francis I. at the fatal battle of Pavia, and afterwards became the companion of the king's second son the duke of Orleans. Called away at last from scenes of dissipation and extravagance, he became an ornament to the military profession. He prevailed upon the rebellious citizens of Rochelle to return to their duty in 1542, and two years after he ably contributed to the victory of Cerisoles. He distinguished himself so much at the battle of Reuti in 1554, that the king seeing him covered with dust and with blood, tore the order of St. Michael which he wore round his own neck, to throw it around that of his valiant general. His courage again was displayed at the sieges of Calais and Thionville, and afterwards at the famous victories of Jarnac and Moncontour; but his character in the eyes of humanity must deservedly suffer for the countenance and support which he gave to the bloody massacre of St. Bartholomew, though he had the magnanimity to save from the horrors of that dreadful day the king of Navarre and the prince of Condé. He died at Sully 29th June, 1573, as he was preparing to go to the siege of Rochelle, which had again revolted. His son William was governor of Burgundy, and espoused the cause of the league, which he maintained at the battle of Ivry, but he was afterwards reconciled to Henry IV. and died 1633. The family long distinguished itself in the military service of France.

TAVARONE, Lazarus, a Genoese painter, the disciple of Luca Cangiagio, and his successor in the service of the Spanish king. He died 1631, aged 75.

TAUBMAN, Frederic, a German critic, born at Wonscisch, in Franconia, 1565. He was well educated at Culmbach, though his father-in-law was but a tailor, and on the foundation of the college of Heilbrun, 1582, he was removed thither among other promising students. Ten years after he went to Wittemberg, and became the favourite of the prince of Saxony, and in 1595, obtained the professorship of poetry and belles lettres, which he kept till his death 1613. His private character was very amiable. He left a widow and five children. He wrote commentarius in Plautum, 1605, and also in Virgilium—de Lingua Latinâ Dissertatio, besides Latin poems, &c.

TAVERNIER, John Baptist, a famous traveller born at Paris, 1605. He acquired a fondness for travelling, in the house and conversation of his father who was a merchant, and after visiting the best part of Europe, before he had completed his 23d year, he meditated more distant excursions in mercantile pursuits as a trader in jewels. In the space of forty years he is said to have travelled six times into Turkey, Persia, and the East Indies, by various routes, and after being ennobled by Lewis XIV. he, in 1668, purchased Aubonne near Geneva, there to spend the rest of his days, in the enjoyment of independence and tranquillity. His affairs, however, were afterwards thrown into disorder by the ill conduct of a nephew, and to repair his losses he began a seventh journey into the East. He died on his way at Moscow, July 1689, aged 84. His travels, 6 vols. 12mo. were published in French, with the assistance of his friends, as he was not a perfect master of the language, and they have been translated into English.

TAYLOR, Jeremy, a celebrated prelate, son of a barber at Cambridge. At the age of thirteen he was admitted at Caius college, Cambridge. And when he had taken orders, he removed to London, where he was introduced to Laud, who admired his abilities as a scholar, and his eloquence as a preacher, and by his influence, procured him a fellowship at All-souls college, Oxford, 1636. He was afterwards made chaplain to his patron, who bestowed upon him the rectory of Uppingham, and in 1642, he was created by royal mandamus doctor in divinity. During the civil troubles he retired to Caermarthenshire, where he maintained himself by teaching a school, till the death of three sons in three months rendered his retirement extremely unpleasant, and therefore he retired to London, and soon after accompanied lord Conway to Ireland, and settled at Portmore. At the restoration he came back to England, and in 1662, he was nominated to the bishopric of Down and Connor, and to the administration of Dromore, and was appointed vice-chancellor of the university of Dublin. He died of a fever at Lisnegarvy 13th Aug. 1667, and was buried in a chapel which he had erected on the ruins of Dromore cathedral. His friend and successor Dr. Rust represents him as a most learned man, of solid judgment, keen sagacity, and the most lively imagination, to which were united all the mild virtues of private life. His writings are universally known and admired, the best of which are, his life and death of Jesus Christ, folio—Holy living and dying, 8vo.—Ductor Dubitantium—Cases of Conscience—Discourse on the liberty of prophesying, &c.

TAYLOR, John, called the water poet, was born in Gloucestershire 1580. From Gloucester school, where he learnt little, he was bound apprentice to a waterman in London, but in the midst of his laborious vocation he often indulged in poetry. In 1642, he came to Oxford, where he kept a victualling house, and assisted the King's service by his facetious songs and ballads against the Roundheads. When Oxford surrendered, he went to London, and kept a public house in Phoenix alley, Long Acre, which he called the Mourning Crown. The sign, however, displeased the government, and instead of it he hung up his own effigy, with these lines under.

*There's many a head stands for a sign,
Then, gentle reader, why not mine?*

And, on the other side, these,

*Though I deserve not, I desire
The laurel wreath, the poet's hire.*

He died 1654, aged 74, and his portrait was given by his nephew, a painter, to the picture gallery Oxford. It is said that he wrote eighty books, more facetious than elegant.

TAYLOR, John, a dissenting minister of abilities, was born near Lancaster. He was settled twenty years at Kirkstead, Lincolnshire, and then removed to Norwich, and afterwards, by pressing invitations, to Warrington, where he was engaged to superintend the academy there. In this situation, where he expected independence and comfort, he soon found opposition and ill treatment, and this weighed so much upon his mind, that it shortened his days. He died 5th March, 1761. He wrote a treatise on Original Sin,—various theological tracts, &c. but his most valuable work is a Hebrew and English concordance, 2 vols. folio.

TAYLOR, John, an eminent critic, born 1703, at Shrewsbury, where his father was a barber. He was educated at the grammar-school there, and at St. John's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow 1730. He soon distinguished himself by his publications, and was appointed, by the university, its librarian, and afterwards registrar. He took his doctor's degree in civil law, and was of Doctors Commons, and afterwards became known to lord Carteret, who intrusted him with the education of his sons. After some hesitation he took orders, and obtained the rectory of Lawford, Essex, the archdeaconry of Bucks, and the residentiaryship of St. Paul's. He died April 4th, 1766, universally and deservedly lamented, and was buried nearly under the litany desk in St. Paul's. His publications were numerous and highly respectable. Besides public orations and other tracts, he published "Elements of the Civil Law," 4to. 1755, and 1769,—valuable editions of Lysias and Demosthenes,—a Latin dissertation on the Marmor Sandvicense, &c.

TAYLOR, Brook, an eminent philosopher and mathematician, born at Edmonton 28th Aug. 1685. He was educated at home, and at the age of fifteen entered at St. John's college, Cambridge, and in 1709, took his degree of LL.B. He became known by his treatise on the Centre of Oscillation, and in 1712, was admitted into the Royal Society, and two years after elected the secretary of that learned body. He took the degree of LL.D. in 1714, and continued to distinguish himself by his philosophical publications. He visited Paris in 1717, and was honourably received by the French literati, and soon after his return he resigned the office of secretary to the Royal Society. He was twice married, and had the singular misfortune of losing both his wives very soon after his union with them, a melancholy circumstance, which in some degree hastened his end.

His first wife died 1723, and the second, whom he married in 1725, died in child-bed 1729, and on the 29th Dec. 1741, he himself fell a victim to a consumptive disorder in his 46th year. He was buried at St. Ann's, Soho. His works on mathematical subjects are very valuable, especially his new Principles of Linear Perspective, which has often been republished and also improved by Colson of Cambridge. He wrote also Contemplatio Philosophica, published by Sir William Young, the son of his only surviving daughter by his second wife.

TAYLOR, George, one of the signers of the declaration of American Independence, was a respectable and wealthy Iron Master of Northampton County, Pennsylvania.

TEILO, a British saint in the fifth century. It is said that he founded a college at Landaff, and erected that church into a bishop's see. Several churches in Wales bear his name.

TEISSIER, Anthony, a native of Montpellier, who quitted France at the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and retired to Prussia. He was made by the elector historiographer, with a handsome salary, and counsellor of embassies. He died at Berlin, 1715, aged 83. He is author of Eloges of learned Men, from de Thou's History, 4 vols. 12mo.—Catalogus Auctorum qui Librorum Catalogos Indices Bibliothecas, Virorum Literator. Elogia, Vitam aut Orationes Funeris scriptis Consignarunt, 8vo.—the Duties of Man as a Citizen, from Puffendorf—Moral and Political Instructions—Calvin's Letters—the Life of Illustrious Princes, &c.

TEKELI, Emmeric, count de, a noble Hungarian, who escaped from the captivity which the Austrians prepared against his father for his attachment to the cause of some rebellious chiefs. From Poland, where he had concealed himself, Tekeli issued forth to head the Hungarian malcontents, and he proved successful against the forces of Austria. Assisted by the armies of the Turks, and by the Transylvanians, he wished to assume the title of king, but the terror which he spread among the Imperialists did not further his views of ambition, nor promote a reconciliation with the emperor. He joined in the siege of Vienna, with the vizier Mustapha; but though the disasters which happened were attributed to him by the suspicious Turk, he hastened to Adrianople to justify himself in the presence of the grand signior Mahomet, who assured him of his protection, and bestowed on him the principality of Transylvania. This was but an empty title, as the province was in the hands of the Austrians, and therefore, after a vain but gallant struggle against Heusler, the governor of the country, he retired from the contest, and lived in a private manner at Constantinople. He was a man of great courage, but though admired for his intrepidity, he wanted judgment, and that commanding presence of mind which often converts dangers into prosperous events in the career of the military hero. He died near Nicomedia, 13th Sept. 1705, aged 47.

TELFAIR, Edward, several years governor of Georgia, was one of the principal promoters of the revolution in that colony, and one of the committee appointed in 1774, to draw up resolutions to be adopted by the friends of liberty. In 1780 he was appointed a delegate to congress. He was employed in various public stations during a long life, and died at Savannah, October, 1807.

TELL, William, a celebrated Swiss, one of the heroes who restored liberty to their oppressed country in 1307. The conspiracy which he had formed with others was suspected, when the Austrian governor, Herman Gesler, more clearly to ascertain the spirit of the people, ordered a hat to be raised on a pole, and homage to be paid to it as to himself. Tell refused, and when seized for disobedience, was directed to shoot an arrow at an apple placed on the head of his own son, or else to be dragged with his child to immediate death. He cleft the apple in two without injuring his son, and declared that the other arrow which he had in his girdle was intended for the heart of the governor if he had hurt his child. This boldness occasioned his confinement, and the governor, afraid of a rescue, carried him across the lake of Lucern; but a violent storm obliged Gesler, who knew the nautical skill of his prisoner, to intrust to him the helm for his own preservation. Tell, freed from his fetters, steered the boat to a rock, still called by his name, leaped ashore, and escaped into the mountains. The governor afterwards was shot by the hand of Tell, and the Swiss, roused to arms by the conduct of their hero, drove away their Austrian masters, and established the independence of their country. Tell, 47 years after this great event, lost his life in an inundation at Burgeln, 1354. His descendants became extinct in the male line in 1684, and in the female 1720.

TELLIER, Michael le, a French lawyer, born at Paris, 19th April, 1603. After filling various law offices about the court, he was in 1640 named intendant of Piedmont, and gained the favour of cardinal Mazarin, who recommended him to Lewis XIII. as a proper person to be secretary of state. He displayed great abilities in this office, and during the political disputes which agitated France after the death of Lewis XIII. he possessed the confidence of the queen-mother and of the cardinal, and contributed much to the restoration of concord and reconciliation among the contending parties. Though he resigned in 1666 his office to his son, he yet continued in the cabinet, and in 1677 was made chancellor of the kingdom. It is to be lamented that his many services were disgraced by a particular hatred against the protestants, whom he represented to the monarch as suspicious subjects. By his influence with Lewis XIV. the famous edict of Nantes was revoked, and the minister, triumphing in the cruel measures which he saw adopted, exclaimed, profanely, "nunc dimittis servum tuum, Domine, quia viderunt oculi mei salutare tuum." He died a few days after, 28th Oct. 1685, aged 83, and his funeral oration was pronounced by Bossuet. To great intrigue of character, and to deep dissimulation, he joined the imposing appearance of simple and austere manners, high talents for business, indefatigable application, and extensive knowledge.

TELLIER, Francis Michael le, marquis de Louvois, son of the chancellor of France, was born at Paris, Jan. 18th, 1641. The elevation of his father, as well as his own abilities recommended him to notice; at the age of 23 he was made war minister, and in 1666 he became secretary of state. He was a great favourite at court, and after the death of Colbert in 1683, he was placed by Lewis XIV. in the office of superintendent of buildings, arts, and manufactures. His attention was likewise directed to military affairs; he introduced more regular discipline into the army, supplied the magazines with provisions, and built the royal hospital of invalids. The consciousness, however, of his own abilities, rendered him proud and arrogant, and he even showed some marks of disrespect to his king. Lewis, in consequence of this, treated him with coldness, and the ambitious and disappointed minister, returning home from the levee, died in his own apartment of vexation and grief, 16th July, 1691. Though at last unpopular in the court, he was a statesman of most splendid talents, who united for the glory of France, promptitude, secrecy, spirit, and magnanimous conduct. Madame de Sevigné has elegantly commented on his death in her letters to her daughter. The "Testament Politique," published in his name, was written by Courtils.

TELLIER, Adrian le, a lawyer of Melun, who was returned as deputy to the national assembly of France, and afterwards to the convention. He was in 1795, sent by the convention to Chartres, to encourage a more free circulation of the corn, but the disaffected raised a violent cry against him, and obliged him not only to sign a decree, to reduce bread to three sous the pound, but to proclaim it, in the public square, mounted on the back of an ass. This indignity had such an effect on the feelings of this honest deputy, that he shot himself on returning to his lodgings, leaving a paper by which he declared the decree which he had signed void, and hoped that no blood but his own might be shed to restore the public tranquillity.

TELLIER, N. le, a faithful servant about the person of Barthelemy. When this virtuous minister was condemned, during the violent measures of the French revolution, to be deported in 1797, the honest domestic demanded to share his captivity, and, from the prison of the Temple, he was conveyed with him to Guyenne, where his attentions and kindnesses administered to his relief under a burning climate, and in the hands of cruel oppressors. When Barthelemy escaped from his dungeon, Tellier accompanied his flight, but this faithful friend died on the passage, before he reached the European shores.

TEMPESTA, Antonio, a Florentine painter, the disciple of Strada. His landscapes, animals, and battles, were much admired for their spirit, and the delicacy of their colouring. He died 1630, aged 75. He also engraved some of his pieces.

TEMPLE, sir William, an eminent statesman, son of sir William Temple, master of the Rolls in Ireland, was born in London, 1629. He was educated under the care of his uncle Dr. Hammond, minister of Penshurst, Kent, and afterwards at Bishop's Stratford school, and at the age of 17 was admitted of Emanuel college, Cambridge, where he had Cudworth for his tutor. He did not continue more than one year at the university, and then travelled through France, Holland, Flanders, and Germany, and returned to England in 1654. He lived in Ireland during the usurpation, devoted to studious pursuits and philosophy; but at the restoration he became a member of the Irish parliament. About 1663 he removed with his family to England, and then began to be employed as an active and penetrating negotiator. He was chiefly instrumental in forming the triple league in 1668 between England, Holland, and Sweden, and also by his means the marriage of the lady Mary with the prince of Orange was effected. After spending twenty years in the affairs of the state, and in advancing her prosperity and consequence by his negotiations with foreign nations, he retired in 1680 from public life, and employed the rest of his time in literary pursuits, and in the cultivation of his grounds. But, though withdrawn from the intrigues of courts, his character for general information and for integrity was too well known to be neglected; his advice and opinions were frequently consulted by the leading men of the nation, and even king William himself visited him to converse with him on political affairs. Sir William died at the end of 1700, at Moor Park, near Farnham, and according to his directions his heart was buried in a silver box under a sun-dial in his garden. Though universally respected as an able negotiator, sir William is censured, and with justice, by bishop Burnet, not only for his vanity and spleen, but for his irreligious and profane principles. His only son John was a man of abilities, and was, in consequence of his merit, and his father's influence, made secretary at war under king William; but he had scarce been in office one week when he drowned himself at London bridge, 14th April, 1689. The cause of this melancholy event is said to have originated in his recommending to the king too warmly, though innocently, general Hamilton, who, instead of reducing to obedience Tyrconnel, the rebellious viceroy of Ireland, encouraged and assisted him in his defection. This misfortune was borne with great composure by the father, whose atheistical opinion it was said was, that a wise man might dispose of himself and make his life as short as he pleases. By his wife, a French lady of the name of Rambouillet, the son had two daughters, to whom he left his property, provided they did not marry Frenchmen. The works of sir William are valuable, and consist of Memoirs of Public Affairs during his public employments—Letters—Miscellanies—Observations on the United Provinces of the Netherlands, 2 vols. folio, &c.

TEMPLEMAN, Peter, M.D. a physician, born at Dorchester, Dorsetshire, 17th March, 1711, and educated at the Charter-house, from whence he went to Trinity college, Cambridge. After taking his first degrees, he went to Leyden, where for two years he studied medicine under Boerhaave, and other celebrated professors, and in 1739 returned to London. Though he settled in London with the intention to practise, yet he was of too indolent a disposition to succeed, and his fondness for literature, and the company of men of science and erudition, left him little time to pursue his original plan. In 1753 he was appointed keeper of the reading room of the British museum, which he resigned in 1760, when elected secretary to the new society of arts. He died of an asthma, 23d Sept. 1769. He was a man of great erudition, and published a translation of Norden's Travels in Egypt—Curious Remarks on Physic, Anatomy, &c. extracted from the memoirs of the French academy of sciences, &c.—besides some poetical pieces.

TEMPLEMAN, Thomas, a writing master of Bury, Suffolk, who published engraved tables, with calculations of the number of square feet and population of the kingdoms of the world, folio.

TENCIN, Peter Guerin de, a native of Grenoble, who was educated at Paris, and embracing the ecclesiastical profession, became grand vicar of Sens. He went in 1721 with cardinal de Bissy, to Rome, and after the election of Innocent XIII. to the popedom he remained in that capital as the envoy of France. His services were rewarded by the archbishopric of Embrun, and in 1739 he was raised to the purple, and soon after made archbishop of Lyons, and prime minister of France in the room of Fleury. This high distinction was not suited to the talents of the new cardinal, who, though he might possess the abilities or the intrigues necessary for an inferior station, was devoid of that firmness, that intelligence, and that unshaken integrity which should adorn the prime minister of a mighty empire. He retired soon after from the helm of affairs, and lived in privacy in his diocess, where he died 1758, aged 80.

TENCIN, Claudine Alexandrine Guorsi de, sister of cardinal Tencin, was born at Grenoble, and took the religious habit at the monastery of Montfleuri. Tired of a religious life, she obtained the pope's permission to quit it, and she came to Paris, and launched into all the extravagances and foibles of the gay world. In consequence of the death of la Fresnaye, a counsellor of state, who was said to be murdered in her chamber, she was thrust into the Chatelet prison, and then into the Bastile, from which she was liberated soon after. She died at Paris, 1749, advanced in years. She wrote the Siege of Calais, a romance of merit; Memoirs of Comminges; les Malheurs de l'Amour, &c.

TENIERS, David, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp, 1582. He learned the rudiments of his art under Rubens, and then travelled to Rome, and studied under Adam Elsheimer. He afterwards returned to Antwerp, where he died 1649. His pieces are much admired for their expression, and contain entertaining scenes taken from country fairs, drinking parties, merrymaking, chymists, &c. He was called old Teniers to distinguish him from his son David, who also excelled as a painter. Young Teniers died at Antwerp, 1694, aged 84. His pieces are highly esteemed. They consist of fairs, drinking and smoking parties, laboratories, &c. but are superior to those of his father in harmony, union, and correctness. Young David was patronised by the prince of Orange, and the archduke Leopold of Austria. He had a brother Abraham, who was also a painter, and chiefly excelled in the knowledge of the chiaro oscuro.

TENISON, Thomas, archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Cottenham, Cambridgeshire, 29th Sept. 1636, and educated at Norwich school, from which he went to Corpus Christi college, Cambridge. Here he became fellow, and took his degrees regularly, and in the first part of his life, during the prevalence of fanaticism, he studied physic, but afterwards applied to divinity. He was presented to the rectory of Holywell, Huntingdonshire, by lord Manchester, and in 1680 he obtained the vicarage of St. Martin in the fields, London. During the reign of Charles II. and his successor, he was an active and zealous writer against popery, and in consequence of his services in favour of the revolution, he was made archdeacon of London by William, 1689, and in 1691 nominated to the see of Lincoln, and on the death of Tillotson, 1694, promoted to Canterbury. Distinguished as a parish priest by his benevolence and liberality, and an assiduous care of his Christian calling, he continued, at the head of the church, the same zeal, mingled with moderation, firmness, and exemplary piety. He died at Lambeth, 14th Dec. 1715, about one year after his wife, daughter of Dr. Love, of Benet college. He published some sermons—the Creed of Hobbes examined, &c.—Baconiana, or Remains of sir Francis Bacon, Svo.—some tracts, &c.

TENNENT, Gilbert, minister of Philadelphia, was born in Ireland in 1703, and came in early life to America. He was educated by his father, who was a clergyman, and taught an academy; and in 1726 was settled at New-Brunswick, New-Jersey, where he was highly useful. In 1740 and 1741, he travelled through New-England at the request of Mr. Whitefield, and preached in many places with great success. In 1743, he established a new Presbyterian church in Philadelphia, of the followers of Mr. Whitefield. In 1753 he went to England to solicit benefactions to the college at Princeton. After a life of uncommon usefulness, he died about the year 1765. He was one of the most conspicuous ministers of his day, ardent in his zeal, forcible in his reasoning, and bold and passionate in his addresses to the conscience and heart.

TENNENT, William, minister of Freehold, New-Jersey, was a brother of Gilbert, and born in Ireland in 1705. The most remarkable event in his history, was an apparent suspension which he experienced for several days, of all the functions of life. He destroyed his health by excessive application to study, and in a swoon apparently expired. His friends prepared to inter him, but were persuaded to postpone the funeral repeatedly, by a physician, who thought he perceived some indications of remaining life, and at length he was restored to animation; but for a considerable time with nearly an entire loss of all the knowledge he had before acquired. After his recovery he related a remarkable dream of the heavenly world which employed his mind during the swoon, and which by many has been mistakenly regarded not as a mere dream occurring according to the ordinary laws of the mind, but as having taken place by an actual migration of his soul to the heavenly regions. After recovering his health, he was settled at Freehold in 1733, where he laboured with great devotedness and success. He died 1777, aged 71 years. He was a man of very eminent piety.

TENTZELIUS, Andrew, an eminent German physician, in the 17th century, author of a treatise on Mummies, &c.

TENTZELIUS, William Ernest, a native of Arnstadt, Thuringia. He devoted himself to literature, and struggled with unusual resignation against the evils of poverty. He died 1707, aged 49. He wrote Saxonia Numismatica, 4 vols. 4to.—Supplementum Historiæ Gothanæ, 3 vols. 4to. works of great merit.

TERBURGH, Gerard, a Dutch painter, born at Zwol near Overysse 1608. He travelled over Europe, and was much noticed and encouraged, especially at the court of Spain, where he was knighted. He settled at Deventer, where he became a magistrate, and died 1681. His subjects are chiefly conversations, persons engaged in games, and other humorous adventures, much inferior however to the performances of Douw, or Mieris.

TERENCE, Publius, an African slave, in the service of Terentius Lucanus. By the kindness of his master he obtained his liberty, and soon distinguished himself as an elegant writer of comedies. By his industry some of the best Greek comedies appeared in a Latin dress; but of all these only six remain, deservedly admired for delicacy of sentiment, and purity of expression. He was drowned, as is supposed, in coming from Greece, B. C. 159.

TERPANDER, a poet and musician of Lesbos, who added three to the four strings of the lyre, B. C. 675.

TERRASSON, John, a French writer, born at Lyons, 1670, and admitted into the congregation of the oratory, which he afterwards left. By the friendship of Bignon, he procured a place in the academy of sciences 1707, and in 1721, was elected professor of the royal college in Greek, Latin, and philosophy. He died 1750, respected, according to Voltaire, as a good practical philosopher. He wrote a dissertation against the Iliad, 2 vols. 12mo. during the dispute between la Motte and Madame Dacier about Homer,—Sethos, a learned political and moral romance, translated into English—a translation of Diodorus Siculus into French with notes and prefaces, an excellent work in 7 vols. 12mo.—Reflections in favour of Law's Mississippi Project, &c.—His brother Andrew was also a priest of the oratory, and died at Paris, 1723, author of sermons in 4 vols. 8vo. much admired. Gaspar, another brother, was also of the oratory, but quitted it. He also published sermons, and died 1752.

TERRASSON, Mathew, a French lawyer, born at Lyons 13th Aug. 1669. He studied law at Paris, and acquired great reputation in the provincial courts. Besides some contributions to the Journal des Savans, he wrote discourses, pleadings, memoirs, &c. published together in 4to. He died at Paris 30th Sept. 1734, aged 66.

TERRASSON, Anthony, son of the preceding, was also distinguished as an advocate. He was born at Paris, 1st Nov. 1705. He wrote, at the request of the chancellor Aguesseau, the history of Roman Jurisprudence, published, folio, 1750, and for this useful and judicious work he was made censor royal, counsellor to the assembly of Dombes, and afterwards advocate to the French clergy, and professor to the royal college. He wrote besides miscellanies in history, literature, jurisprudence, criticism, &c. 12mo. &c. and died 30th Oct. 1752, aged 77, without issue.

TERRAY, Joseph Marie, a native of Boen, near Roanne, who by his merits rose to places of honour and trust in the French government. He was made comptroller general, minister of state, and director general of buildings; and in times of difficulty he maintained his character of integrity, loyalty, and patriotism. He recommended to the monarch, not the laying of fresh taxes on the already overloaded people, but to suppress abuses, to introduce reform and economy, and to make the expenses equal to the resources of the state. He retired in 1774 from public affairs, respected by the virtuous, but hated by those who live upon the distresses of the public, and grow rich by the profusion and the extravagance of the government. He died at Paris, 18th Feb. 1778, aged 63. His collection, Des Comptes Rendus, from 1758 to 1787, has been published. His nephew, who was intendant of Lyons, was dragged with his wife to the guillotine, at Paris, 1793, on the accusation that he had suffered his children to emigrate and to bear arms against the republic.

TERTRE, Francis Joachim Duport du, a French writer, born at St. Maloes 1715. He was of the society of Jesuits, among whom he was professor of the learned languages. He died 1759. He wrote an Abridgment of the history of England, 3 vols. 12mo. a work of some merit—a history of famous Conspiracies, 10 vols. 12mo.—Abridgment of the History of Spain, 5 vols. 12mo.—L'Almanach Des Beaux Arts, &c.

TERTRE, John Baptist, a native of Calais, who after serving his country in the military and naval service, became a Dominican, and set out as Missionary into America. After a zealous discharge of his mission, he returned to Europe 1658, and died at Paris 1687. He wrote a general history of the Antilles belonging to the French, 4 vols. 4to. 1667, and 1671, a work accurate, though not elegantly written. There was a Jesuit of that name, Rodolphus, a native of Alençon, who died 1762, aged 95. He was author of some works on religious subjects, and refuted Malebranche's Metaphysics.

TERTULLIAN, Q. Septim. Florus, one of the fathers of the church, was born at Carthage. When converted to Christianity he came to Rome, and produced his famous apology for the Christians during the persecution of Severus. He died about 216.

TERWESTEN, Augustin, a Dutch painter. He was born at the Hague, and studied the works of the best masters in Italy. By his influence the academy of painting was revived at the Hague, and that of Berlin was established. He died at Berlin, where he had been deservedly patronised, 1711, aged 72. His brothers Matthew and Elias were also eminent painters. The first excelled in the representation of fruits and flowers, and died 1724, and the latter was admired for his valuable historical pieces. He died 1735.

TESTA, Peter, an Italian painter and engraver, born at Lucca 1659. He studied at Rome, under Dominichino, and showed great attachment to his art, though his subjects were not always correct, nor his execution chaste. He was drowned in the Tiber, 1650, while endeavouring to recover his hat, which had been blown into the water whilst he was engaged in taking a landscape.

TESTELIN, Lewis, a painter, born at Paris. He studied under Vouet, and distinguished himself by his historical pieces. His restoration of Tabitha to life, and the scourging of Paul and Silas were the best of his compositions. He died at Paris 1655, aged 40. His brother Henry also excelled as a painter, and was on account of his merits patronised by the French king. He died 1696, aged 50. He was, as well as his brother, member of the French academy.

TESTI, Fulvio, an Italian poet, born at Ferrara. He became prime minister to Francis duke of Modena, but after enjoying the favour of his master, he fell under his displeasure and ended his days in confinement in a fortress 1646. He wrote odes and other poems, printed Venice 1656, 2 vols. 12mo. He was a successful imitator of the best writers of Greece and Rome, and was called by his countrymen the Italian Horace.

TESTZEL, John, a native of Pirn on the Elbe. He became a Dominican, and was empowered by the archbishop of Mayence, to publish the indulgences granted by pope Leo X. for the completion of St. Peter's church at Rome. The zeal with which this holy father executed his commission, drew upon him the attacks of Luther, and at last became the cause of the reformation. Not only in the monasteries, but in taverns and even brothels, these indulgences for the remission of sins were to be bought, and whoever contributed to the filling of the purse of the holy see might be permitted to riot in the greatest debauchery, and even, as Testzel said, might offer violence to the holy virgin, and be forgiven by the power of the pope, whose arms were equal to the cross of Christ. When this bigoted preacher was reproached by Miltitius as being the cause of all the disasters of the church in Germany, he was so afflicted with the imputation that he died of a broken heart, 1519.

TEXTOR. Vid. TEXIEL.

THAIS, a celebrated courtesan of Corinth, who persuaded Alexander the Great to set Persepolis on fire. She afterwards married Ptolemy king of Egypt.

THALES, a famous philosopher of Miletus, who improved himself by travelling, and deserved to be the first of the seven wise men. He first observed the apparent diameter of the sun, and divided the year into 365 days. He also was able to predict eclipses, and died B. C. 545.

THELLUSSON, Peter, a native of Geneva, who settled as a merchant in London, where he acquired, by his industry and labour, an enormous fortune. He died at his seat at Plastow, Kent, 21st July, 1797, leaving three sons and three daughters. From an ambitious desire of posthumous fame, he left his property in an extraordinary manner. To his wife and children he left about 100,000*l.* and the rest amounting to upwards of 500,000*l.* he leaves to trustees to accumulate till the male children of his sons and grandsons are dead. This distant period may extend to 120 years, in which case the property will then amount to 140 millions, and if then he should have no lineal descendants, this astonishing property is to go to the use of the country, for the benefit of the sinking fund. This extraordinary will was disputed by his surviving family, but it was affirmed by a solemn decree of chancery, though afterwards an act was passed, by the means of chancellor Rosslyn, to prevent the recurrence of so extravagant a desire of private accumulation.

THEMISIUS, a Paphlagonian philosopher in the fourth century, made prefect of Constantinople by Theodosius. He wrote commentaries on Aristotle and Plato, and died 410 A. D.

THEMISON, an ancient physician, author of the sect called Methodists in Medicine before the Christian era.

THEMISTOCLES, an illustrious Athenian general. He was brave in war, and in the invasion of Greece by Xerxes, his prudence and perseverance contributed to the naval battle and victory of Salamis. After strengthening and improving the resources of his country, he was treated with suspicion and ingratitude by his fellow-citizens, and sought an asylum in the territories of his Persian enemies. He died at Magnesia, 449 B. C. aged 65.

THEOBALD, Lewis, the editor of Shakspeare, was born at Sittingbourne, Kent, and educated at Islington. He studied the law, which he soon relinquished for poetry. He was for some time engaged in the Censor, published in Mist's Journal, and by his severe censure on the wits of the age, drew down their resentment upon his own head. Pope made him the hero of his Dunciad, but afterwards bestowed the honour on another character. He, in 1720, introduced on the stage the Double Falsehood as the production of Shakspeare, which was attacked by Pope and other critics. He wrote in 1726, Shakspeare Restored, and besides, above 20 dramatic pieces of little merit. He is chiefly known as the editor of Shakspeare's plays, 8 vols. labours which, though abused by some critics, and especially Warburton, are not devoid of merit. He died 1742.

THEOCRITUS, a famous Greek poet of Syracuse, patronised by Ptolemy Philadelphus. He wrote Idyllia, in a very interesting style of sweetness and simplicity, besides epigrams.

THEODATUS, king of the Goths, was placed on the throne of Italy by his aunt Amalasontha, whom he married, and afterwards destroyed. He was defeated by Belisarius, the general of Justinian, and then put to death by his own soldiers, A. D. 536.

THEODORE, king of Corsica, was son of Anthony, baron de Newhoff and de Stein, in Westphalia. He was born 1696 at Metz, where his father then held an office at the court of Lorraine, having left his country in consequence of marrying a merchant's daughter against the wishes of his family. Young Theodore was for some time in the suite of baron Gortz, the Swedish minister, but after his execution he left the Swedish for the Spanish service.

He afterwards visited France, Holland, and England, and in 1736 landed in Corsica, while the inhabitants of that island were in a state of rebellion against their tyrannical masters the Genoese. His character for boldness and enterprise was such that he was treated with unusual respect by the heads of the insurrection, and as he had brought with him supplies of arms and money, he was soon regarded as the future deliverer of the oppressed Corsicans, and solemnly declared king of the island, 15th April, 1736. In this new capacity he displayed great vigour; though denounced as a traitor by the Genoese, he collected an army of 25,000 men, and laid siege to Bastia, which he took. Assistance from abroad was also expected, to give weight and consequence to his measures; and to render his power more united, he established a military order, called the Order of Deliverance, but his popularity at last began to vanish when the promised succours from France and England did not arrive. His subjects grew dissatisfied, and threatened to reduce him to a private station; but Theodore, not trusting to the negotiations of ambassadors, determined in person to solicit the crowned heads of Europe for assistance, and after appointing a regency of 47 to manage the public affairs in his absence, he left the island. He now travelled in disguise; but when he reached Paris, he was ordered to leave the kingdom; and after retiring to Amsterdam, where he met with some protection, he embarked for the Mediterranean, but was soon after seized at Naples, and imprisoned in the fortress of Cueta. His circumstances were now so desperate, that when he regained his liberty, he could not venture to visit his subjects, but fled to England for an asylum. His creditors prosecuted him also in England, and in the midst of his distresses, though a charitable contribution was made for his relief, he was thrown into the king's-bench prison, from which in 1756 he extricated himself, by the privilege of an act of insolvency, after registering his kingdom for the benefit of his creditors at Guildhall. He died soon after, Dec. 11, 1756, at the house of his tailor, and was buried in the churchyard of St. Anne's, Westminster. In 1757 a marble monument was erected to his memory, by Horace Walpole, with these concluding lines:

*The grave, great teacher, to a level brings Heroes and beggars, galley slaves and kings.
But Theodore this moral learned, ere dead,
Fate poured its lesson on his living head;
Bestowed a kingdom, and denied him bread.*

THEODORET, a father of the church, deposed from his bishopric by the council of Ephesus, but restored by the assembly of Chalcedon. He died about 460. He wrote an Ecclesiastical History, Lives of Saints, Commentaries, &c.

THEODORIC, first king of the Goths in Italy, was the natural son of Theodomir, king of the Ostrogoths. He was given up as a hostage by Welamir, his father's brother, to the emperor Leo I. 461, and he distinguished himself by the importance of his services to Zeno, who had been driven from his throne by Basiliscus. He became consul, 484, and was sent by the emperor to Italy, against Odoacer, whom he defeated and put to death. Thus become master of all Italy, he strengthened his power by marrying, in 509, the sister of Clovis, king of France, and by making a treaty of alliance with Anastasius, emperor of the East, and with the Vandals of Africa. In the enjoyment of peace, he devoted himself to the improvement of his dominions, and to the happiness of his people, and his noble plans were warmly and ably seconded by his active secretary, the celebrated Cassiodorus. New edifices were raised to beautify Rome; her walls were repaired, and Pavia and Ravenna also equally shared the kindness of their munificent prince. While, however, he promoted commerce, encouraged the arts, and patronised literature, Theodoric grew suspicious and cruel, and he caused to be put to death Symmachus and Boethius, two of the most illustrious of his subjects. This inhumanity, it is said, preyed upon his mind, and he died soon after, under the severest tortures of conscience, 30th Aug. 526.

THEODORUS, a bishop of Cilicia, who died 428. His works were condemned by a general council, as heretical. His commentaries on the Psalms, &c. are extant.

THEODOSIUS, a noble Roman, raised for his valour and services, to a share of the imperial throne, by Gratian. When sole emperor, he waged successful war against the Goths; but he disgraced himself in causing the people of Thessalonica to be put to the sword, a cruel action which drew down upon him the censures of St. Ambrose, and exclusion from the church till he made due atonement for the crime. He afterwards defeated the barbarians that invaded Thrace, and proved equally fortunate in his war against Maximus and Eugenius. He died at Milan, 395.

THEODOSIUS II. grandson of the preceding, succeeded his father Arcadius on the imperial throne, 408. Though a weak prince, he defeated the Persians on the borders of the Euphrates; but in his expedition against the Huns, he was obliged to purchase a dubious peace. He married Eudocia, the daughter of the philosopher Leontius, and died 450.

THEODOTUS, a tanner of Byzantium, who abandoned the Christian faith to save his life, under the persecution of M. Aure-lius. His apostacy drew down upon him the censures of the church, and in consequence he became the founder of a new sect, which denied the divinity of Christ. Another of that name became the head of the Melchisedeckians, who supported that the Messiah was inferior to Melchisedeck.

THEOGNIS, a Greek poet of Megara, of whose works only a few fragments remain. He flourished B.C. 544.

THEON, a Greek sophist, author of a Treatise on Rhetoric, edited Leyden, 1726, 8vo.

THEON, a mathematician of Alexandria in the age of the great Theodosius. His Commentary on Euclid was printed Oxford, 1672, in 4to.

THEOPHANES, George, a native of Constantinople, known as a historian, and as an ecclesiastic at the seventh general council. He was banished into Samothrace by the jealousy of Leo the Armenian, and died there, 818. He is author of a chronicle, extending from the period where Syncellus finishes, to the reign of Michael Curpalatus, of which the best edition is that of the Louvre, 1655, folio.

THEOPHANES, Prokopowitch, a Russian historian of eminence, born at Kiof, 9th June, 1691. After studying under his uncle, the rector of a convent school, the learned languages, he went to Rome, where he imbibed a taste for the fine arts and works of genius. He returned to Kiof, and assumed the monastic habit, and became professor of philosophy. He was noticed by Peter the Great, attended him in his campaigns, and, under his direction, was employed in reforming the clergy, and abolishing the patriarchal dignity. His services were duly rewarded; he was made bishop of Plescof, and under Catherine, raised to the dignity of metropolitan of all Russia, as the archbishop of Novogorod. He died 1736. Besides sermons, disquisitions, and a treatise on rhetoric, he wrote, a Life of Peter the Great, which terminates at the battle of Pultowa, a most candid and valuable performance.

THEOPHILUS, archbishop of Antioch, the first who used the word Trinity, to express the three persons in the Godhead. He flourished in the second century, and wrote a Defence of Christianity.

THEOPHRASTUS, a Greek Philosopher of Lesbos, educated under Plato and Aristotle. He was a popular teacher, and had not less than 2000 pupils. His works have been best published by Heinsius, Leyden, 1613, folio.

THEOPHYLACT, a native of Constantinople, metropolitan of Bulgaria, in the 11th century. He was author of Commentaries on the Gospels, and Acts, and also the Prophets, and the Epistles, &c.

THERAMENES, an Athenian philosopher, one of the 30 tyrants appointed over Athens by Sparta. He was condemned to death by Critias, because he refused to assent to the violent and cruel measures of his colleagues, and took poison, B.C. 403.

THERMES, Paul de la Berthe, lord of, a native of Conserans, who early devoted himself to arms, and served under Francis I. and his two successors. The victory of Cerisoles, in 1544, was attributed to his great valour, and he acquired fresh glory at the taking of Saluces and Ravel. He afterwards passed into Scotland, to invade the English territories, and in 1551, was sent as ambassador to Rome, and soon after he headed the French forces in Italy. His capture of Dunkirk, and of St. Venox, was followed by his defeat at the battle of Gravelines, in which he was taken prisoner. The peace of 1559 set him at liberty, and he died at Paris, 6th May, 1562, aged 80, without posterity.

THESPIA, a Greek poet of Attica, called the inventor of tragedy, B.C. 536. His theatre was a cart dragged from town to town, where two men with besmeared faces entertained the people with uncouth dialogues and rustic songs.

THEVENOT, Melchisedec, librarian to the king of France, was born in Paris, 1621. He was actuated, from his youth, with the strongest desire of seeing foreign countries, and from the voyages published by others, as well as from his own personal observations, he gave to the world his voyages and travels. His account of an instrument for ascertaining the longitude, and the declination of the needle, is considered as the best part of these books. Thevenot was, for some time, ambassador of France at Constantinople, and also assisted at the conclave assembled after the death of Innocent X. and was afterwards envoy at Genoa. He died of a slow fever, Oct. 1691. He was a curious collector of rare and valuable books and manuscripts, but the most noble part of his library, was the marbles presented to him by M. Nointel, with bas reliefs, and inscriptions, two thousand years old. His travels have been translated into English. He wrote also the Art of swimming, 12mo.

THEVENOT, John, another traveller of reputation, who died 1667. It is said that he was the first person who brought coffee to Paris. He travelled into Asia, of which an account was published, 3 vols. 4to. and at Amsterdam, 1727, 5 vols. 12mo.

THIELIN, John Philip, a painter of Mechlin, born 1618. Though of noble birth, and a man of considerable fortune, he studied painting under Daniel Segers, and produced some beautiful pieces for the king of Spain. His flowers were particularly admired, as painted with native delicacy, and grouped with taste. His three daughters were also eminent as artists.

THIERRY I. king of France, third son of Clovis II. ascended the throne of Neustria, and Burgundy, 670, by the interest of Ebroin, the mayor of the palace, by whom he suffered himself to be governed. He was defeated at Testri in Vermandois, by Pepin, of Austrasia, and he died four years after, 691, aged 39. He is called by Henuault, the third of that name.

THIERRY II. or IV. son of Dagobert III. was taken from a cloister to ascend the throne of France. He was a king only in name, as his minister Charles Martel governed the kingdom at pleasure. He died 737, aged 25.

THIERRY I. son of Clovis I. obtained as his share of the kingdom of France, the kingdom of Austrasia, of which he made Metz the capital. The best part of his reign was occupied in repelling the invasion of the Danes, and in quarrels with his brother Childebert, king of Paris. He died 534, aged about 51, after a reign of 23 years.

THIERRY II. second son of Childebert, was king of Burgundy and Austrasia. He was engaged in disputes with his brother Theodebert, in consequence of the intrigues of his mother-in-law, Brunehaut, and at last he took him prisoner, and suffered him to be cruelly put to death. He was afterwards reconciled to Brunehaut, at whose instigation he had disgraced himself by the murder of his brother, but this inhuman princess, soon after, caused him to be poisoned, 613.

THIERRY, of Niem, a native of Paderborn, in Westphalia, who was secretary to the popes at Rome, and was employed by them at the council of Trent. He died 1417. He wrote history of the schisms of the popes, fol. and other works now little known.

THIERRY, Henry, a printer of eminence at Paris, in the 15th century. His family became celebrated in France for several generations as printers, and some most valuable works at various times have issued from their press. One of their descendants who was bookseller to Boileau, and was immortalized by the poet in his epistle to his verses, died at Paris, 1762.

THIERS, John Baptist, a doctor of the Sorbonne, born at Chartres, 1536. He was professor of belles lettres at Paris, and afterwards curate of Vivray, in the Mans, and of Champrond, in the diocese of Chartres. He died Feb. 25th, 1703. He wrote a treatise on Superstitions, concerning the Sacraments—de Fastorum Dierum Immunitione Liber—and other things, besides the History of Perukes, a curious book, in which he says the year 1629 was the epoch of Perukes in France, and that no clergyman wore them before 1660.

THIRLBY, Styán, an able critic, born at Leicester, 1692. He was of Jesus college, Cambridge, where he took his degree of LL.D. but the most promising abilities were clouded by great indolence of disposition, a quarrelsome temper, and a strong fondness for intemperate drinking. He studied physic, and afterwards applied himself to the civil law, and then the common law, but with this he soon grew dissatisfied, and at last obtained a sinecure place of about 100*l.* a year as king's waiter in the port of London, by the interest of his friend Sir Edward Walpole, who had been his pupil. For some time he resided in the house of his friend, but he rendered himself disagreeable by keeping a journal of whatever he observed or heard in the family, incompatible with his unsocial ideas, and he spent the remainder of his life in private lodgings, where he died, Dec. 19th, 1753. He wrote some notes on Shakspeare's plays, which appear in Johnson's edition, but he is chiefly known as the author of an able tract against Whiston on the Trinity, and as the publisher of a valuable edition of Justin's works, folio, 1723, the dedication to which is considered as a masterly production.

THOMAS, St. surnamed Didymus, was a Galilean, and one of the apostles of the Redeemer. When after the resurrection, he disbelieved the appearance of his Master, he was convinced of the truth, and required by our blessed Lord to examine his wounds, and to put his finger into the print of the nails, upon which he expressed his belief by the exclamation of, my Lord, and my God! After the ascension he went to Parthia, to preach the gospel, and penetrated into the Eastern countries as far as India, where it is said that he suffered martyrdom.

THOMAS, an obscure individual, from a common soldier obtained the command of the troops of Leo, the Armenian, after whose death he aspired to the throne of the Cæsars. He caused himself to be proclaimed emperor, but was soon after defeated by Michael the successor of Leo, who caused him to be impaled alive, 823.

THOMAS, James Ernest, a native of Haglestein, who studied painting in Italy, and was the friend and imitator of Estheimer. His landscapes possessed great merit. He died 1663, aged 65.

THOMAS, William, D.D. bishop of Worcester, was born at Bristol, 2d Feb. 1613. He was educated at Caermarthen school, and then entered at St. John's college, Oxford, from which he removed to Jesus, of which society he became fellow. He was then chaplain to the earl of Northumberland, from whom he obtained the vicarage of Laugharn, and Lansedurnen rectory, and during the troublesome times of civil war, he continued here to discharge his duties, and became an active and benevolent parish priest. At last, however, he was deprived of his living by the parliament, and had in consequence to struggle with many difficulties and with poverty, till the restoration replaced him in the confidence of the government and the possession of his living. He was afterwards chaplain to the duke of York, and made dean of Worcester, 1665, and in 1677, raised to the see of St. David's. In this diocese he rendered himself popular by his affability and attention, he often preached in Welsh; and gained the good opinion of his clergy, but his attempts to remove the cathedral of his diocese from the unfrequented town of St. David's, to the more populous and commercial town of Caermarthen, proved abortive. In 1683, he was translated to Worcester, where he behaved with exemplary attention towards his clergy, and promoted the prosperity of his diocese. In 1687, he entertained the king in his progress through the country, grieved indeed at the sight of his popish attendants, but hospitably respectful to him as became a subject. On William's accession he was unwilling to take the oaths to the new monarch, and prepared to resign all his preferments, and to retire to the house of his friend Martin, vicar of Wolverly. He died, however, before the time fixed for his departure, of a violent fit of the gout, 25th June, 1689. He was buried in the cloisters of his cathedral. By his wife, who died 1677, he had eight children, four sons and four daughters, but only two survived him. Respectable as a man and as a prelate, he was also a good writer, but more nervous than elegant. He wrote an Apology for the Church of England, 1678-9, 8vo.—Letter to the Clergy—some sermons—Roman Oracles Silenced, published after his death.

THOMAS, William, grandson of the bishop, by John Thomas and Mary Bagnall, was born 1670, and was educated at Westminster school, from whence in 1688, he was elected to Trinity college, Cambridge, where he took his degrees. By the interest of lord Somers he obtained the living of Exal in Warwickshire, and in 1721, he removed to Worcester, for the better education of his family, which consisted of nine daughters and five sons. In 1723 he was presented by bishop Hough to the rectory of St. Nicholas, Worcester, and died July 26th, 1738. He was buried in the cloisters of the cathedral near his grandfather. He was distinguished as a man of letters and as a good antiquary. He published Antiquitates Prioratus Majoris Malverne—Dugdale's Warwickshire improved, 2 vols. fol.

1730—a Survey of Worcester Cathedral, and prepared materials for a history of Worcestershire, which have been handsomely noticed by Dr. Nash.

THOMAS, Elizabeth, better known by the name of Corinna, was born 1675. She was known as a writer of considerable abilities, but her misfortunes arose in the death of Mr. Gwynnet, to whom she was to have been married, 1711. After this, ill health and affliction were her constant companions, and she sunk into the grave 3d Feb. 1730, and was buried in St. Bride's church. She incurred the severest displeasure of Pope, because she had suffered Curl the bookseller to publish some of the poet's letters with those of Henry Cromwell, and for this offence she was placed in a conspicuous situation in the Dunciad. Her poems were published after her death together with 2 vols. of letters which passed between her and her lover Gwynnet.

THOMAS, Anthony Leonard, a member of the French academy, distinguished as a writer and a poet. He was born at Clermont in Auvergne, 1732, and educated with great care by his mother. He was intended for the law, but his abilities were called into action by the offer of a professorship in the college of Beauvais at Paris, which was more congenial with his disposition. He rose gradually by his merit, and was at last secretary to the duke of Orleans. He died of a fever 17th Sept. 1785, at the house of the archbishop of Lyons, and was buried in the village of Oulius. Respected and beloved as a man, he was highly esteemed as a writer. In 1756, he published his reflections, historical and literary, on Voltaire's poem of natural religion, in which he ably defended Christianity. In 1759, his eloge of marshal Saxe was crowned by the academy, and he deserved public applause also by his eloges on d'Aguesseau, Du Guay Trouin, Des Cartes, Sully, and Marcus Aurelius. He wrote also an Essay on Elogies, 2 vols. 12mo.—an Essay on the Character, Manners, and Mind of Females, 8vo. and some poems, and he was at his death engaged on a poem on Peter the Great. His works were published together 1802, 7 vols. 8vo. Paris.

THOMAS, Sir George, governor of Pennsylvania, was appointed in 1733, and continued in office until 1747, when he was succeeded by James Hamilton. He was previously a wealthy planter of Antigua, and a member of the council there. His administration was less popular than that of his predecessor Gordon, because he was less indulgent to the Quakers. In 1752 he was appointed governor of the Leeward and Caribbee Islands, where he was succeeded by governor Woodleye in 1766. On retiring from this office he was created a Baronet. He died in London, January 11th, 1775.

THOMAS, John, a major-general in the army of the United States, who served with reputation in the war against the French and Indians, and was one of the most conspicuous of the officers of the army at the opening of the revolution. He was appointed a brigadier-general in 1775, and commanded a division of the provincial troops during the siege of Boston. In 1776 he was advanced to the rank of major-general, and on the death of general Montgomery, appointed to the command in Canada. He joined the army at Quebec on the first of May, and soon retreated thence to Chamblee, where he died of the small-pox on the 30th of June. He was brave and judicious as an officer, and amiable in private life.

THOMAS, Josiah, an English divine, was educated at Cambridge, where he took the degree of master of arts, entered into orders, and became successively rector of Kingston Deverell in Wiltshire, and of Street-cum-Walton in Somersetshire. He was also made archdeacon of Bath, and chosen minister of Christ church in that city, where he died May 27th, 1820, aged sixty. He published—1. A poetical Epistle to a Curate. 2. Strictures on subjects relating to the established religion and the clergy. 3. Remarks on some popular principles and notions. Mr. Thomas made himself conspicuous about a year or two before his death by opposing the bishop of Gloucester, at a missionary meeting of the evangelical clergy, as they are denominated, at Bath.—W. B.

THOMASIIUS, James, a native of Leipsic, of an ancient family. He became there professor of eloquence, belles lettres, and philosophy, and had among his pupils the celebrated Leibnitz. He was a man of mild manners and great benevolence of heart, and he died 1684, aged 62, at Leipsic. He wrote the Origin of Philosophical and Ecclesiastical History—several dissertations, &c. all in Latin in 11 vols. 8vo. His son Christian was born at Leipsic, and took his doctor's degree at Frankfort on the Oder 1676. He published a German journal, which drew upon him, in consequence of the severity of some of his remarks, the displeasure of government, and he retired to Berlin, and was made by the king of Prussia first professor of law, in the newly founded university of Halle. He attracted much of the public attention by asserting in a thesis that concubinage is not contrary to the laws of God. He died 1728, aged 73. He wrote an Introduction to the Philosophy of the Court—History of Wisdom and Folly—on the Defects of the Roman Jurisprudence, &c.

THOMPSON, Edward, a native of Hull,

in Yorkshire. He was educated under Dr. Cox, at Hampstead, and early went to the East Indies. He was afterwards pressed into the navy, and by his good conduct rose, in 1757, to the rank of lieutenant. At the conclusion of the war he retired on half pay, and then turned his thoughts to literary pursuits. He published successively the Meretriciad, a licentious poem—the Soldier, a poem, 4to. 1764—the Courtezan, and the Demirep, two poems, 1765—and Sailors' letters, 2 vols. 12mo. 1767. His Trinculo's Trip to the Jubilee, a ludicrous performance, in which he gave an account of the jubilee celebrated at Stratford on Avon, in honour of Shakspeare, appeared in 1769, and also his Court of Cupid, 2 vols. which contained a collection of the immoral pieces which he had already obtruded upon the world. He altered the Fair Quaker from Shadwell, in 1773, and produced it on the Drury-lane stage, with some effect, and he afterwards published Paul Whitehead's works, and also Marvell's, 3 vols. 4to. On the breaking out of the American war he obtained, by the interest of Garrick, a captain's commission, and the command of the Hydra, in which he had the good fortune to capture a valuable French East Indiaman. He died in 1786, on the coast of Africa, on board the Grampus, a ship to which he had been appointed the preceding year. He published proposals for maritime observations, collected from 1753 to 1763, but the work never appeared.

THOMSON, William, a miscellaneous writer, was born in 1746, at Burnside, in Perthshire. He was educated at St. Andrews, for the church, after which he became librarian to the earl of Kinnoul, and minister of Monivard; but being dissatisfied with that situation, he left Scotland, and settled in London, where he kept an academy, and exercised his pen as an author by profession. His compilations were numerous; and he was also the editor of several periodical publications, as the English Review—the Political Magazine—the Whitehall Evening Post—and the Annual Register. His original works are, The Man in the Moon, a novel—Memoirs of the War in Asia, 2 vols.—Mammuth, or Human Nature displayed, a romance, 2 vols. &c. He obtained a doctor's degree at St. Andrews, and died at Kensington in 1817.—W. B.

THOMSON, James, a celebrated English poet, son of a Scotch minister, and born at Ednam, in Roxburghshire, 11th Sept. 1700. He was educated at Jedburgh school, and then entered at the university of Edinburgh. He here distinguished himself by the elegance and spirit of his compositions, and when he had been directed by the divinity professor, Hamilton, to write an exercise on a psalm, descriptive of the greatness and majesty of God, his paraphrase was much admired for its fire and its poetical beauties. He then studied divinity, but soon relinquished it, as he considered the profession too confined for the expansion of his abilities. He determined to seek in London the patronage which might be extended to merit, and the publication of his "Winter," 1726, soon introduced him to the notice of the great and of the learned. By the friendship of Dr. Rundle, afterwards bishop of Derry, he was recommended to lord chancellor Talbot, and attended his son as a companion in his travels on the continent. The popularity of "Winter," produced Summer in 1727, Spring 1728, and Autumn in 1730; and other pieces were also published to prove the diligence, the patriotism, and the creative powers of the poet. The death of his noble pupil was soon after followed by that of the chancellor, and Thomson was thus reduced from a state of comfort and independence, to a narrow and precarious subsistence. The place of secretary of the briefs, which he had obtained from the chancellor, fell at his death, yet the generosity of his friends was kindly exerted; he was, by the recommendation of lord Lyttleton, noticed and patronised with a pension by the prince of Wales, and by the influence of the same noble friend he obtained, in 1746, the office of surveyor-general of the Leeward islands. He died of a fever, 27th Aug. 1748, and was buried in Richmond church, Surrey. His executors were lord Lyttleton and Mr. Mitchel. Besides his Seasons, Thomson wrote an elegant poem to the memory of sir Isaac Newton, 1727—Britannia, a political poem, occasioned by the quarrels of the Spaniards with England, with respect to America—Liberty, a poem in five books, containing ancient and modern Italy compared, Greece, Rome, Britain, the Prospect—the Castle of Indolence, an allegorical poem, after Spenser's manner—besides some tragedies, which were received on the stage with reiterated and deserved applause—Agamemnon, acted 1738—Edward and Eleanora, a tragedy, not acted in consequence of the dispute between the prince of Wales, his patron, and the king—the Masque of Alfred, written jointly with Mallet—Tancred and Sigismunda, from Gil Blas, acted 1745—and Coriolanus, acted after his death for the benefit of his sisters. Thomson in private life was an amiable, pious, and benevolent character, with great goodness of heart and the most virtuous disposition. As a poet he possessed powers and perfections peculiarly his own. His Seasons display the most glowing, animated, and interesting descriptions of nature, in language at once elegant, simple, and dignified. They bring before us, as is well observed, the whole magnificence of nature, whether pleasing or dreadful. The gayety of spring, the splendour of summer, the tranquillity of autumn, and the horrors of winter, take each in turn the possession of our minds. In the midst of a florid and luxuriant flow of imagery, some exuberances perhaps may be found by the fastidious critic, but the merits of the poet are built on too solid a foundation to be shaken, and while the delightful changes of the varied year continue to convey pleasure to the eye, so long must the verse of the poet entertain the mind with the most seducing powers of well-managed description and of animated portraiture. The works of the poet have been edited in various forms.

THORESBY, Ralph, an eminent antiquary, born at Leeds, Yorkshire, 1658. As his father was a merchant, he was intended for the mercantile line, and was in consequence sent to Rotterdam to learn the Dutch and French languages. On the death of his father, 1680, he succeeded to his business, but he paid at the same time great attention to the study of history and to antiquarian researches. Though bred among the presbyterians, he was induced by reflection to conform to the rites of the church, and to participate in her sacraments. He was not only a learned man, but the friend of the learned, and to his kindness and communications the most respectable writers of the times have acknowledged themselves indebted, such as Gibson, Walker, Calamy, Collins, Lister, Gale, Hearne, &c. He died 1725, aged 68, and was buried in St. Peter's church, at Leeds. He was fellow of the Royal Society, and wrote Ducatus Leodiensis, or the topography of Leeds, and the parts adjacent, with a catalogue of the antiquities and curiosities of his cabinet. He intended to publish a view of the state of the Northern parts of the kingdom in the times of the Romans and Britons, but his age prevented the completion, and his history of the church of Leeds alone, as a part, appeared, 1724, containing an account of some remarkable characters, Matthew Hutton, Edwyn Sandys, Tobie Matthews, John Thoresby, archbishop of York, &c.

THORIUS, Raphael, a physician, much admired at the court of James I. He was a French protestant, and was remarkable for his learning, but more for his love of wine. He died of the plague in London, 1629. He wrote a poem on tobacco, published, 12mo. 1644, and a letter de Causâ Morbi et Mortis Is. Casauboni.

THORNDIKE, Herbert, an able divine, educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, where he took his degree of B.D. He obtained the mastership of Sidney college, 1643, but was soon dispossessed for his attachment to the royal cause. His sufferings during the civil wars were rewarded at the restoration by the gift of a prebend of Westminster. He wrote Epilogus, fol. in which he ably defends the tenets of the church of England—treatises on Weights and Measures—on Ecclesiastical Censures, and he also assisted Waiton in the completion of his Polyglott Bible. He died 1672.

THORNHILL, sir James, an eminent painter, born 1676. Though of a respectable family in Dorsetshire, his circumstances were low through the ill conduct of his father, but by the friendship of his uncle, Dr. Sydenham, he was enabled to attend to his favourite pursuit, painting. He travelled on the continent, and there greatly improved himself, and made a valuable collection of some of the pieces of the best masters. His merits were noticed by the great; queen Anne intrusted to his care the beautifying the dome of St. Paul's with the history of that saint, which he executed in a grand style on eight panels; and his abilities were also called into action on other works at Hampton-court, Greenwich hospital, and other places. He was made chief historical painter to the queen, and knighted by George I. and he acquired a very handsome fortune. He died 1732, aged 56, and left besides a son, a daughter married to Hogarth. Sir James was for some time member of the house of commons, and also fellow of the Royal Society. He chiefly excelled in historical and in allegorical pieces, though his portraits and landscapes also possessed great beauty.

THORNTON, Bonnel, an English poet, born in Maiden-lane, London, 1724. He was educated at Westminster school, and in 1743 was elected to Christ church. He wished to study medicine, and accordingly took his degree of M.B. in 1754, but he preferred a literary life to the labours of the medical profession. The first publication, in which he was engaged with Smart and others, was the Student, or Oxford and Cambridge Miscellany, in monthly numbers, which was collected, 2 vols. Svo. 1748. In 1754 the Connoisseur was undertaken jointly with Colman, and was continued for two years. In 1766, after the example of his friend Colman, who had translated Terence, he published 2 vols. of a translation of Plautus, which, though possessing merit, and admired by Warburton for its pure and elegant style, has not been very popular. In 1767 he published as an additional canto to Garth's Dispensary, the Battle of the Wigs, to ridicule the quarrels then kindled between the fellows and licentiates of the college of physicians. He died 9th May, 1768, aged 44, of the gout in his stomach, leaving behind him a widow with two sons and a daughter. His epitaph.

was written in Latin by his friend Dr. Warton, and placed on his grave in Westminster abbey. He wrote, besides, the "Oxford Barber," and some periodical essays, &c. in the Public Advertiser, and other publications.

THORNTON, Matthew, one of the signers of the declaration of American independence, was a native of Ireland, and came to America at an early age. He first settled in the eastern part of New-Hampshire, afterwards at Londonderry, from whence he removed to the bank of the Merrimack about 1780. Before the revolution he was considerably eminent as a physician. He was also a colonel of militia, and in 1775 was president of the convention which assumed the government in the name of the people of the colony. He was elected a delegate to congress in September, 1776, and although not present on the fourth of July, subscribed his name to the declaration of independence. He did not take his seat until November, and was but a short time in Congress. He held the office of chief justice of the county of Hillsborough, and afterwards that of judge of the supreme court of the state for several years, until 1782. Subsequently he was a member of the house of representatives, and of the senate, and in 1785 of the council. He died at Newburyport, June 24, 1803, aged 88 years. He possessed uncommon powers of mind. His memory was surprisingly tenacious, and he had made large acquisitions of useful knowledge.  L.

THOYNARD, Nicholas, a learned Frenchman, born at Orleans. He was well skilled in history, and in the knowledge of medals. He wrote a concordance of the four evangelists, in Greek and Latin, 1707, folio, with learned notes, and died at Paris, 5th Jan. 1706, aged 77.

THRASYBULUS, an Athenian general, celebrated for his bravery and his bold attack and expulsion of the 30 tyrants. He united the highest benevolence to personal courage, and passed an act of amnesty for the reconciliation of all parties. He was at last killed in a battle against the Aspensians, B.C. 394.

THUANUS, Jacobus Augustus, or DE THOU, a celebrated French historian, born 9th Oct. 1553, at Paris, where his father was first president of the parliament. His infancy was passed in debility and disease, and while all possible care was bestowed to improve his constitution, little was done for the cultivation of his mind; his powers, however, shone forth early, and with unusual splendour. He was at first educated under private tutors, and then studied the law at Orleans, but as he was destined for the church, he was placed near his uncle, the bishop of Chartres, who resigned some of his preferments in his favour. In 1573 he visited Italy, and after devoting himself to the pleasures of retirement and study, he was employed in various negotiations in the Low Countries, and in 1578 made counsellor clerk to the parliament. The death of his brother, in 1579, induced him to give up the ecclesiastical profession, and he now gradually rose to offices of trust and honour. In 1581 he was sent to administer justice at Guyenne, with other counsellors, and in 1584 was made master of the requests. During the violence of the league he attached himself to Henry II. and was usefully employed in various negotiations by him. He afterwards enjoyed the favour of Henry IV. who appointed him his first librarian, and intrusted him with the negotiations with the duke of Guise, and with the protestants. Under Mary de Medicis he was one of the general directors of the finances. After a life spent honourably in the service of literature, and of his country, this great man died 17th May, 1617, universally respected, not only as an historian, but as a man, and was buried in the chapel of St. Andrew of the Arches. He was twice married; by his first wife, who died 1601, he had no children, and by the second he had three sons. He is particularly distinguished for his history of his own Times, from 1545 to 1608, written in pure, elegant, and classical Latin, and admirable for its fidelity, correctness, and accuracy. It has been much and deservedly praised by Grotius, Casaubon, Perrault, and others; but as it speaks with freedom and truth of men and of manners, it never appeared, but in a mutilated and partial form, till Dr. Mead undertook its publication, free from all omission, in 1733, in 7 vols. folio. Thuanus wrote besides some poetical pieces, a Paraphrase on the book of Job—on Ecclesiastes—the Lamentations of Jeremiah, &c.—Miscellanies, &c. The eldest of his sons, Francis Augustus, was librarian to the king; but he unfortunately did not reveal a conspiracy with which he was acquainted, made by the marquis d'Effiat against Richelieu; and the cardinal, resenting the levity, and contemptuous manner in which he had been mentioned in the pages of the historian, most inhumanly sacrificed the son to his mean revenge, and caused him to be beheaded at Lyons, 1642.

THUCYDIDES, a celebrated Greek historian of Athens. He was in the military service of his country, and during a temporary disgrace, through the jealousy of his countrymen, he devoted himself to the composition of his famous History of Grecian Affairs in his own Times. He died 391 B.C. The best edition of his work is that of Duker. It has been ably translated by Dr. Smith.

TIVILLIER, Dom Vincent, a native of Coucy, in Laon, distinguished among the members of the congregation of St. Maur. He was eminent as a preacher and as a man of letters. He died 12th Jan. 1736, aged 51. He wrote Letters of an ancient Professor of Theology on the Bull Unigenitus, &c. besides a translation of Polybius into French, in 6 vols. 4to.

THUNBERG, Charles Peter, an eminent Swedish botanist, the pupil and the friend of Linnæus. He visited France in 1770, and soon after, by the interference of his friend Burmann, he was sent by the Dutch company to Japan, to make observations and discoveries in botany. After a delay of three years at the Cape of Good Hope, where he made himself perfect in the Dutch language, he, in 1775, set out for Japan; but the jealousy of the inhabitants, and the mistrusting conduct of the government, limited his excursions, and he made few botanical discoveries. In 1776 he quitted Japan for Ceylon, and after some valuable observations on this island, he returned to Europe, and was appointed professor of botany at Upsal. He died at the end of the last century, leaving his valuable cabinet of natural history to the university. His Flora Japonica appeared at Leipsic 1784, 8vo. with 39 plates, and gave an account of above 300 unknown plants.

THURLOE, John, secretary to the Cromwells, during their usurpation, was born 1616, at Abbots-Roding, Essex, where his father was rector. He was educated for the law, and by the influence of judge St. John, he obtained some offices, and in 1645, was secretary to the parliamentary commissioners at the treaty of Uxbridge. Though connected with the great republican leaders, he was not accessory to the king's death; but he favoured with all his might the affairs of the commonwealth, and in 1653, became secretary of state to Cromwell. In 1656 he was member for Ely, and the next year deserved the thanks of the commons for discovering Harrison's plot. On Cromwell's death, he continued in his office under Richard, the next protector, over whom he had great influence, and at the restoration he made a tender of his services to the new monarch, who, however, did not accept them. He was accused, soon after, of high treason by the Commons, but released, and then he retired to his seat at Great Milton, Oxfordshire. His knowledge of political affairs was such, that Charles solicited him in vain to take a share in the administration, which he declined. He died suddenly at his chambers, Lincoln's Inn, 21st Feb. 1668, aged 51. He was twice married, and left, by his second wife, four sons and two daughters. In his character he was very amiable, and remarkable for his courtesy and mildness to persons of all parties. His State Papers, in 7 vols. folio, have been published, and they are valuable not only for conciseness and perspicuity, but for the general and important matter which they contain.

THURLOW, Edward lord, a celebrated lawyer. He was born in 1735, at Ashfield, Norfolk, where his father was rector, and after passing some time at Cambridge, he came to London, to study the law. He was called to the bar 1758, and raised himself to professional notice by his manly and successful opposition to sir Fletcher Norton. In the famous Douglas cause, in which he was accidentally engaged, he displayed such abilities, such eloquence, and such a command of arguments, that the public attention was turned towards him, as towards a man who was formed to fill the highest stations in the law. In 1770 he was appointed solicitor-general, and the next year succeeded sir William de Grey as attorney-general; but in the house of Commons he neglected the cultivation of his oratorical powers, till in the beginning of the American war, he stepped forth with the most commanding language of eloquence in support of the measures of administration. In June 1778, he was created a peer, and the day following he was nominated lord high chancellor of Great Britain. This dignified office he resigned in 1783, during the temporary triumph of the coalition ministry, but on the re-admission of Mr. Pitt into the cabinet, he again was promoted to the seals, and kept them till 1793, when a dispute with the premier occasioned his resignation. Since that time he lived in retirement, and seldom engaged in the political disputes of the day. He died after an illness of two days at Brightelmstone, 12th Sept. 1806, and was buried in the Temple church. His character as a lawyer is fixed on the firmest basis of extensive knowledge, quick penetration, correct judgment, and the most undeviating integrity. Though overbearing in his manners, harsh and uncivil, he was zealously attached to his party, and inflexible in his opinions, and loyal in his conduct. As a patron of church preferment, he was the friend of persevering industry, and active merit, and though lax in his private conduct, and in his moral principles, he was ever anxious to reward virtue and to encourage learning. In his court he displayed all the wisdom, and nothing of the low cunning of the lawyer, and with a powerful mind which quickly comprehended and discussed with clearness the most intricate cases, he pronounced his judgment by the strictest rules of equity and justice, alike anxious to protect the rights and the privileges of the poor, as the immunities of the great. He was, as has been well observed, among lawyers and orators, in the senate and in the courts, what his contemporary Johnson was among wits and authors, a mighty genius proudly elevated above the littleness of common minds. As he was not married his titles descended to the issue of his brother the bishop of Durham. He left three natural daughters, to two of whom he left 70,000*l.* each, and to the third, because she married against his consent, he, with the most uncharitable caprice, and studied cruelty, bequeathed only an annuity of 50*l.* per month, and on the condition that she never returned to her husband.

THYSIUS, Anthony, a Dutch philologer, born 1603, at Harderwyck. He became professor of poetry and eloquence at Leyden, and librarian to the university, and died there 1670. He published "Historia Navalis," a History of Naval Wars between the Dutch and Spaniards—Compendium Historiæ Bataviæ, 1645—Tracts on the Government and the Laws of Athens, besides valuable editions of Paterculus, Sallust, Valerius Maximus, Seneca's tragedies, Lactantius, Aulus Gellius, &c.

TIARINI, Alexander, a native of Bologna, eminently distinguished as a painter of portraits and historical pieces. He succeeded in happily expressing the passions. The best of his pieces are preserved in the church of St. Michael in Bosco. He died 1668, aged 91.

TIBALDI, Pelegrino, a native of Bologna, who became eminent as a painter, sculptor, and architect. He studied at Rome under Vasari, and was patronised by Philip II. of Spain, who raised him to the dignity of marquis. He died at Bologna, 1592, aged 70. His son Dominico, was also distinguished as an architect. He built the palace of Magnani, at Bologna, and other public edifices in that city which are still deservedly admired. He died 1583, aged 42.

TIBERIUS, Claudius Nero, emperor of Rome after Augustus, promised a happy reign on his succession, but soon disgraced himself by debauchery, cruelty, and the most flagitious excesses. He died A.D. 37, aged 78.

TIBERIUS, Constantine, emperor of the East, was appointed by his merits, colleague on the throne by Justin the younger. He was a wise, valiant, and benevolent prince, and died 582.

TIBULLUS, Aulus Albius, a Roman poet, in the age of Augustus. His elegies are much admired for ease, elegance, and simplicity, and they are generally published with Propertius and Catullus.

TICKELL, Thomas, an English poet, born at Bridekirk, Cumberland, 1686. He was educated at Queen's college, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship, 1710, which he vacated by marrying at Dublin, 1726. He was early introduced to the notice and the patronage of Addison, who employed him in Ireland, and when secretary of state made him his under secretary. In 1724 he was secretary to the lords justices of Ireland, and continued in that honourable office till his death, which happened 23d April, 1740, at Bath. As a writer Tickell obtained some celebrity, and he must rank high among the minor English poets. His "Prospect of Peace," written during the negotiations with the French government under queen Anne, was a popular work, and passed quickly through six editions. He wrote "the Royal Progress" on the arrival of George I. and published a translation of the first book of the Iliad, in opposition to Pope's version. This work, which some have regarded as the labour of Addison, was not without merit; but while it was approved by the literati at Button's, Pope, no way dismayed, boasted that he had the town, that is, the mob, in his favour. "The Letter to Avignon" is a party poem of great merit, and expresses contempt without vulgarity, and maintains its dignity without insulting arrogance. Tickell published the works of his friend Addison after his death, and wrote also a very beautiful funeral poem in honour of his memory.

TICKELL, Richard, an eminent writer who first appeared before the public 1778, in his "Project," and soon after in his "Wreath of Fashion," two poems of some merit and celebrity. The most admired of his performances was the "Anticipation," in which he imitated with great success and humour the principal speakers in the parliament, and thus in some degree disarmed the opposition of the force of their argument. He altered Ramsay's Gentle Shepherd for the stage, 1781, and wrote also the Carnival of Venice, a comic opera. He was killed Nov. 4, 1793, by falling from the window of his apartments in Hampton-court. He had been one of the commissioners of the stamp-office. He was twice married, and by his first wife, Miss Linley, had three children.

TIDEMAN, Philip, a painter, born at Hamburgh. He was the pupil of Lairesse, and excelled in mythological and allegorical representations. He died 1705, aged 48.

TIEDEMANN, Dietrich, a native of Bremervorde, in the dutchy of Bremen, educated at Gottingen. By the recommendation of his friend Heyne, he obtained, in 1766, the professorship of Greek and Latin, at Cassel, which he quitted, in 1786, for the chair of philosophy at Marburg. He wrote Essay on an Explanation of the Origin of Language—System of the Stoic philosophy—Investigation of Man—Spirit of Speculative Philosophy—the First Philosophers of Greece—Argumenta Platonis; works of great merit, and deep erudition. He died 1803, aged 55.

TIGNY, G. de, a French naturalist. He published the Natural History of Insects, 10 vols. 8vo.—a work of great merit. His collection of insects was large, curious, and valuable. He died 1803.

TIGRANES, king of Armenia, opposed the power of Rome, but was easily conquered by Lucullus. He preserved his dominions by a large bribe, and maintained himself against the rebellion of his son, and the insurrection of his subjects. Pompey afterwards conquered him, and sent him in chains to Rome.

TILINGIUS, Matthias, a native of Westphalia, who studied medicine, which he professed at Rinteln. He was also physician to the court of Hesse Cassel, and died 1615. He wrote de Rhabarbaro, 4to.—Lilii Albi Descriptio, 8vo.—de Laudano Opiate, 8vo.—Opiologia Nova, 4to.—Treatise on Malignant Fevers—Anatomie de la Rate, 12mo.

TILLEMANS, Peter, a landscape painter, born at Antwerp. He came to England in 1708, with Casteels, and was patronised by the great, of whose horses, seats, races, &c. he drew very pleasing views. He died of an asthma, at Norton, Suffolk, 5th Dec. 1734, aged about 50.

TILLEMONT, Sebastian de Nain de, a French writer, born at Paris, 1637. He was educated in the school of Port-royal, and distinguished himself as an accurate and elegant author. He was an ecclesiastic, but of such humility of deportment, that he refused to succeed to the bishopric of Beauvais, and preferred obscurity, retirement, and literature, to all dignities. His indefatigable application proved at last too much for his constitution. He died 1698, aged 61. His Histoire des Empereurs, et Histoire Ecclesiastique, are two works valuable for accuracy, correctness, precision, and elegance.

TILLET, N. du, a native of Bourdeaux, who devoted himself to agricultural pursuits, and published various works of merit for the destruction of insects in corn, and for the improvement of the produce of the earth. This active and ingenious author, who was member of the academy of sciences at Paris, and director of the mint, at Troyes, died 20th Dec. 1791, aged 60.

TILLI, John Tzerclaes count de, a native of Brussels, of an illustrious family. He quitted the order of the Jesuits for the military profession, and after signaling his courage against the Turks, in Hungary, he commanded the troops of Maximilian, duke of Bavaria, at the battle of Prague, 1620.

He contributed to the capture of Breda, and of Heidelberg, and defeated Mansfeld, one of the rebel chiefs, and afterwards routed the forces of the duke d'Halberstadt, at Stavelo, and took Minden. In 1626, he obtained a great victory over the army of Denmark, at the battle of Lutter, and three years after went to Lubbeck to settle the articles of peace with the Danish ministers. When placed at the head of the imperial armies, he took Brandenburg, Magdeburg, and Leipsic; but he was soon after defeated by Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, and received a mortal wound in defending the passage of the Leech, at Ingoldstadt, 30th April, 1632.

TILLI, Michael Angelo, a native of Florence, educated at Pisa. He studied medicine, and became physician to the grand duke, and professor in the university of Pisa, inspector of the botanical garden, and fellow of the London royal society. He published Catalogus Horti Pisani, fol. Florence, 1723, with 50 plates, and died 1740, aged 85.

TILLOTSON, John, archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Sowerby, Yorkshire, Oct. 1630, son of a clothier, descended from an ancient Cheshire family. Though his father was a strict Calvinist, Tillotson was educated at Clare-hall, Cambridge, of which he was chosen fellow, 1651. The perusal of Chillingworth's works, and the friendship and conversation of Cudworth, Whichcot, Worthington, Smith, Wilkins, and other learned divines, soon removed those principles which he might have imbibed from puritanical instructors, and fitted him for the more active scenes of life. In 1656, he was tutor to the son of Mr. Pridaux, of Devonshire, and was afterwards curate to his friend Dr. Wilkins, at St. Lawrence, Jewry. After the restoration, he was curate of Cheshunt, and, in 1663, was promoted to the rectory of Keddington, Suffolk, which he immediately resigned for the preachment of Lincoln's-inn-society. In 1664, he was chosen Tuesday lecturer at St. Lawrence, Jewry, and as being a popular preacher, he exerted himself strenuously against popery and atheism. In 1666 he took his degree of D. D. and afterwards was promoted to a prebend in the church of Canterbury, and also of St. Paul's, and in 1672, was made dean of Canterbury. He attended his friend lord Russel, when condemned to die in consequence of the Ryehouse plot, and he strongly urged him to admit the doctrine of non-resistance, a measure for which he was greatly censured, and for which he censured himself. At the revolution he was confidentially consulted by the princess Anne of Denmark, and for his integrity and loyalty, he was held in high esteem by the new king, and by his queen. In 1689,

He was made clerk of the closet to William, and upon the suspension of Sancroft in consequence of his refusal to take the oaths, he was nominated by the king to fill the vacant see of Canterbury. His elevation gave great displeasure to the non-jurors, who directed all their virulence and malice against him; but he exhibited in his conduct the persevering and conscientious prelate, intent upon the reformation of all ecclesiastical abuses, and eager to introduce greater regularity, and a more strict residence among his clergy. The reproaches which were hurled against him, though they depressed his spirits, did not alter the mildness of his manners; and after his death were found some bundles of papers, and letters, full of invective and malicious insinuations against him, on which he wrote with his own hand, "these are libels, I pray God forgive them, I do." The cares attendant upon an elevated situation were felt and recorded by him, with all the resignation of a Christian philosopher; and in his commonplace book he inserted some strong and striking remarks, to remind the reader that what appears to a distant spectator real grandeur and perfect happiness, is too often experienced by the unhappy possessor, a source of misery, vexation, and trouble. This great and good man was attacked by a palsy, which proved fatal, and he died in the arms of his respected friend Mr. Nelson, 24th Oct. 1694. His death was sincerely lamented. Dr. Burnet, bishop of Salisbury, preached his funeral sermon, and Locke was also in the number of those who regarded his departure as a great loss to the church, and to the nation. He left nothing to his widow but the copy of his posthumous sermons, which sold for 2,500 guineas, to which the king added an annuity of 400*l.* in 1695, and in 1698, an addition of 200*l.* more. His sermons have been frequently published, in 10 vols. 8vo., and in 3 folio. These volumes have been, and continue to be, universally read, and they have been translated also into various languages. They are the composition of an able divine, who displays throughout sound reasoning, strong sense, and solid piety, in a clear, elegant, unaffected style. Though abused by some critics for inharmonious periods, and undignified metaphors, he is deservedly commended for his noble simplicity, and great copiousness; and not only Dryden attributed his own perfect knowledge of prose writing to the frequent perusal of Tillotson's works, but Addison, who was a judge of writing, regarded them as the chief standard of our language, and actually projected an English dictionary to be illustrated with particular phrases to be selected from the sermons. Dr. Birch has prefixed a copious life of the learned prelate to his edition of his sermons.

TIMÆUS, a philosopher of Locris, the pupil of Pythagoras, and author of a Treatise on the Nature of the Soul. He supposed that there is a universal motion in the universe.

TIMAGENES, a native of Alexandria, known as an historian. He was the slave of Sylla's sons, and afterwards was in the service of Augustus, but burnt the history of that emperor's reign, when he was discarded from his protection.

TIMOLEON, an illustrious Corinthian, who went to the assistance of Syracuse, when oppressed by the tyranny of Dionysius. He became there a most benevolent and popular character, and died B. C. 337.

TIMON, a misanthrope, born at Athens. He declared himself the enemy of the human race, and in his conduct exhibited the savage character of a man-hater. He said he loved Alcibiades, because he would prove one day the ruin of Athens.

TIMOTEO, da Urbino, a painter of eminence, born at Urbino. He died 1524, aged 54. His landscapes, historical pieces, and portraits, possessed particular beauty, and all the striking effects of taste and genius.

TIMOTHEUS, a musician of Miletus, splendidly rewarded by the Ephesians for a poem in honour of Diana, the protecting goddess of their city. He died about 557 B. C.

TIMOTHY, the disciple of St. Paul, was a native of Lystra in Lycaonia, and the son of a pagan by a Jewish woman. He laboured earnestly with Paul in the propagation of the Christian faith, and he was made by him first bishop of Ephesus, and received, for the guide of his conduct in the ministry, the two excellent epistles which are still preserved in the New Testament. It is supposed that he was stoned to death, 97, for opposing the celebration of an impious festival in honour of Diana.

TINDAL, Matthew, a deistical writer, born 1657, at Beer-ferres, Devonshire, where his father was minister. He entered at Lincoln college, Oxford, 1672, and afterwards removed to Exeter, and thence was elected fellow of All-souls. In 1685 he took the degree of LL.D. and under James II. declared himself a papist, but afterwards renounced the Roman catholic tenets, and took the oaths to secure his fellowship. He died in London, Aug. 1733. He is particularly known for two publications, the first, published 1706, the Rights of the Christian church asserted against the Romish and all other priests, &c. 8vo. —and the other, published 1730, in 8vo. Christianity as old as the Creation, or the Gospel a republication of the Religion of Nature. In the former of these works, the intention of the author was, in subtle and insinuating language, to destroy the authority of the church; and in the latter, his design, in the most plausible and artful manner, is to set aside revealed religion, and to establish that there is no other revelation but that of the law of nature imprinted upon the heart of all mankind. These works were deservedly censured, and among the ablest opponents of his tenets, he had Dr. Hickes, who had been his tutor at Lincoln, Dr. Conybeare, afterwards bishop of Bristol, Leland, Foster, and others. He wrote some tracts besides, on civil and religious liberty, and he left at his death a second volume to his Christianity as old as the Creation, the publication of which was prevented by Gibson, bishop of London.

TINDAL, Nicholas, nephew to Matthew, was educated at Exeter college, Oxford, where he took his master's degree 1713. He was afterwards fellow of Trinity college, and obtained the livings of Alverstoke, Hants, and of Great Waltham, near Chelmsford, and afterwards succeeded to the rectory of Colbourne, in the isle of Wight. He died at Greenwich, where he was chaplain to the hospital, at an advanced age, 27th June, 1774. He published two quarto numbers of an intended history of Essex, in 3 vols. which, however, he relinquished for the translation of Rapin's History of England, in which he was assisted by Mr. Morant. This last work succeeded so well that, in addition to his agreement, his booksellers, the Knaptons, handsomely gave him a present of 200 guineas. He published besides Cantemir's History of the Ottoman Empire, folio—and Polymetis abridged, a Guide to Classical Learning, a useful work.

TINDALL, William, an English divine, author of Juvenile excursions in Literature and Criticism, 12mo.—History and Antiquities of the Abbey and Borough of Evesham, 4to.—Plain Truth in a Plain Dress—Evils and Advantages of Genius contrasted, a poem, &c. He was educated at Trinity college, Oxford, where he took his master's degree 1778, and he was admitted into the Antiquarian society, and appointed chaplain to the Tower, where, in a fit of melancholy, he shot himself, 1804, at the age of 50.

TINELLI, Tiberio, a native of Venice, admired for his abilities as a historical and portrait painter. He was honoured with the patronage of Lewis XII. and made knight of St. Michael. He died 1638, aged 52.

TINTORETTO, James, a famous painter, so called, as son of Robusto, a dyer at Venice, where he was born 1512. He studied under Titian, who observed his rising talents, and therefore dismissed him as afraid of a powerful rival. Tintoretto studied the works of his predecessors, especially of Michael Angelo, with judgment, and deserved the surname of Furious, from the boldness of his paintings, the rapidity of his genius, and the vivacity of his spirit.

He died 1594, leaving behind him a son and daughter, who also inherited his genius and his powers in the use of the pencil. The daughter married a German, and died 1590, aged 30, and the son, eminent as a historical painter, died 1637, aged 75. The pieces of Tintoretto are deservedly admired, and though he is censured for the incorrectness of his outlines, and some other irregularities, his colouring, and the expression of his figures are particularly striking.

TIPPOO SAIB, succeeded his father Hyder-Ally, as king of Mysore, and of the Mahrattas, and he ably maintained his independence against the Great Mogul. During the American war, he joined the French in hostilities against the English; but after the breaking out of the French revolution, he was alone exposed to the fortunes of the war. In 1790 he was defeated at Travancore; Bengalore was afterwards taken, and yielding to the superior force of the British arms, he consented, in 1792, to make peace with lord Cornwallis by delivering up his two sons as hostages, and paying, besides the loss of part of his dominions, above three millions sterling. His intrigues with the French government, and his secret machinations to destroy the English power in India, renewed the war in 1799. He was quickly attacked by the British forces in his very capital, and in the storming of Seringapatam, the Mysore monarch was killed whilst bravely defending himself on the ramparts. He was 52 years old. Though oppressive and capricious in his government, he patronised the arts, and his fondness for literature was displayed in the valuable collection of books found in his palace, consisting of various works in the Shanscrit language in the 10th century, translations of the Koran, MSS. of the history of the Mogul victories, and historical memoirs of Hindostan, all of which have been carefully deposited in the library of the university of Calcutta.

TIRABOSCHI, Jerome, a native of Bergamo, who entered among the Jesuits, and became professor of rhetoric at Milan. He was in 1770 made librarian to the duke of Modena, and was enrolled in the number of the nobility by the unanimous voice of the people, who thus honoured his virtues and his merits. He died June 1794, aged 62. He wrote Memoirs on the Ancient Order of the Humiliés, 3 vols. 4to.—Catalogue of the Writers of Modena, 6 vols. 4to.—History of Italian Literature from the days of Augustus, 13 vols. 4to. a work of great merit. His eloge was written by Lombardi in Italian, and translated into French by Boulard.

TIRAQUEAU, Andrew, a French lawyer, counsellor of the parliament of Bourdeaux, and afterwards of Paris, was born at Poiyou. His abilities were usefully employed by Francis I. and Henry II. and in their service he displayed great integrity and sound judgment, and exerted also all his influence to banish intrigue and chicane from the French bar. He died at an advanced age, 1574. He wrote various books and commentaries, and it was observed that he produced every year a child and a book, till the number of each was 20, some say 30; as it is recorded in a jocular epitaph, which mentions his being a water-drinker; "Hic jacet, qui aquam bibendo, viginti liberos susceit, viginti libros edidit. Si merum bibisset, totum orbem implevisset."

TISSOT, S. A. D. a celebrated Swiss physician, a warm advocate of inoculation, and of experimental, rather than theoretical systems of medicine. He was, in consequence of his great reputation, member of the medical societies of London, Berne, Basil, &c. He died at Lausanne, 15th June, 1797, aged 70. His works, which are valuable, have been collected in 10 vols. 12mo. His Advice to Men of Letters, and to the people on the subject of health, and other smaller pieces, possess high merit, and are deservedly popular. He also edited Morgagni's works, 3 vols. 4to. 1779.

TITIAN, or TITIANO, a celebrated painter, descended from the ancient family of Vacelli, and born at Cadore in Friuli, 1477. His fondness for painting was early observed, and he was placed under the care of Bellino; but he improved himself more by the laudable emulation between him and his fellow-pupil Giorgione, than by the instruction of his master. His abilities, and the execution of his pencil soon recommended him to the notice of the great; he was patronised by Charles V. who knighted him, made him a count palatine, assigned him a pension, and bestowed on him several handsome presents, which he gave him as a mark of his esteem, and not for his pictures, which he declared to be above any price. He died at Venice, of the plague, 1576, aged 99. His character as a man as well as a painter, was so universally respected, that he received the strongest marks of esteem and friendship from the greatest and most eminent persons in Europe. His pieces are much admired for their colouring, delicacy, and correctness. His best pieces are a Last Supper in the Escurial—a Christ crowned with thorns, at Milan—and a portrait of himself, with his mistress combing her hair, in the Paris collection. He left two sons, one of whom, Horatio, was also eminent as a painter, till allured by the hopes of discovering the philosopher's stone, he applied himself to chymistry, and died of the plague with his father. Titian's brother, Francesco, was also a painter, and besides employed himself in making cabinets of ebony, adorned with figures, &c.

TITLEY, Walter, a polite scholar, educated at Westminster, and Trinity college, Cambridge, where he held a lay-fellowship. He was employed by the court as envoy extraordinary to Copenhagen, where he died, highly respected, 1754. He had been for some time resident in bishop Atterbury's house, as tutor to his son. He wrote an Imitation of Horace, and other Latin pieces, preserved in the Reliquiæ Galeanæ.

TITON DU TILLET, Everard, a native of Paris, educated at the Jesuit's college, after which he followed the military profession. At the peace of Ryswick, he purchased a place in the royal household, and afterwards travelled into Italy as a man of letters and an antiquarian. He formed in 1708 the plan of erecting a brazen Parnassus in honour of Lewis XIV. and the work was completed in 1718. In this singular monument the monarch was represented in the figure of Apollo holding a lyre, while below the graces are personified by de la Suze, des Houlières, and de Scuderi, three learned French ladies, and the nine muses appear under the name of P. Corneille, Molière, Racan, Segrais, la Fontaine, Chapelle, Racine, Despreaux, and the musician Lully. Medallions in this celebrated groupe are given to less known poets, and every person distinguished for literature or the fine arts, had due honours paid to his talents. Titon published in 1727 a description of this poetical monument, and of the characters of the personages represented, and as he continued additions to his Parnassus, he likewise added supplements to the lives and accounts of his heroes up to the year 1760. He died 26th Dec. 1762, aged 86.

TITUS, a Greek disciple of St. Paul, converted from the errors of paganism by that great apostle. He was the attendant and amanuensis of his master, and was appointed by him bishop of Crete, where he died in a good old age.

TITUS VESPASIAN, a Roman emperor, distinguished at the siege of Jerusalem, under his father Vespasian, and deservedly celebrated for reforming the profligacy of his youth by the most correct morals when raised to the throne. He was so anxious to do good to his subjects, that he exclaimed one day, on discovering that he had granted no favour, "my friends, I have lost a day." He died A. D. 81.

TIXIER, John, called also RAVISIUS TEXTOR, lord of Ravisy in Nivernois, was an elegant scholar, and taught polite literature in the college of Navarre at Paris, where he died 1522. He wrote, among other things, epistles—dialogues—epigrams—an edition of Opera Scriptorum de Claris Mulieribus, folio, &c.

TOALDO, Joseph, an Italian physician, who taught mathematics in the university of Padua, and bestowed much attention on subjects of electricity, astronomy, and meteorology. He published a Journal Astro-Meteorological—Memoirs on the Application of Meteorology to Agriculture—Cycle of 123 Moons, &c. He died at Padua, 11th Nov. 1797, aged 79.

TOBIN, John, a dramatic writer, was the son of a West India merchant, and born at Salisbury in 1770. He was educated partly at Southampton, and next at Bristol; after which he was articled to a solicitor in London. On the expiration of his term, he was admitted to practice; but devoted more attention to the play-house than to business. He wrote several plays, which were all rejected, except a farce, called "All's fair for Love," acted for the benefit of one of the performers. A pulmonary complaint at length compelled the author to seek a milder climate; but he died on his voyage to the West Indies, and was buried at Cork, in 1804. After his death the "Honey Moon," and "Curfew," were acted with success.—W. B.

TODD, Hugh, D.D. a divine, born at Blencow, Cumberland, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford. He was elected fellow of University, 1678. He was chaplain to Smith, bishop of Carlisle, and vicar of Stanwix, and accumulated his degrees, 1692. He published various things, and died about 1710. The best known of his works are, the Description of Sweden, fol.—the Life of Phocion, &c. He left in MS. a History of the Diocese of Carlisle, &c.—Notitia Prioratus de Wedderhall—Notitia Ecclesiæ Cathedralis Carlilensis, &c.

TOIRAS, John Caylard de St. Bonnet, marquis de, a native of St. Jean-de-Cardonnenques, who embraced the military profession, and served under Henry IV. and Lewis XIII. He distinguished himself at the sieges of Montauban and Montpellier, and at the taking of Rhé, and when governor of the Montserrat, he acquired new glory by his gallant defence of Casal, against marquis Spinoia. He was, in consequence of his services, made marshal of France; but the attachment of his brothers to the party of Orleans, and the mean jealousies of Richelieu brought on his disgrace, and he retired from France, and found in Italy, at Naples, Rome, Venice, and other places, that respect for his talents and meritorious services, which his ungrateful country refused to acknowledge. He afterwards became a general in the army of the duke of Savoy, and was killed before the fortress of Fontanette, in the Milanese, 14th June, 1636, aged 51. His reputation for courage was such, that after he expired, the soldiers dipped their handkerchiefs in the blood which issued from his wound, exclaiming, that so long as they carried that with them, so long would they prove victorious over their enemies.

TOLAND, John, one of the founders of modern deism, was born 30th Nov. 1669, in the north of Ireland, and educated at Redcastle school, near Londonderry, from which he went to Glasgow, 1687, and 3 years after to Edinburgh. Though brought up as a papist, he renounced that religion, and at the age of 15 declared himself a zealous protestant dissenter. He afterwards went to study at Leyden, and then returned to England, and visited Oxford, and in 1696, published at London his Christianity not mysterious, which excited great clamour against the writer, and even occasioned its presentation as dangerous by the grand jury of Middlesex. At this time he went to Ireland, but here the fame of his book was spread, and not only his company was shunned as infectious, but his work was attacked by the parliament, and ordered to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman. He, upon this, returned to England, and was engaged in various publications. His Life of Milton was published in 1698, and some other works on political or religious subjects followed. He was abroad in 1703, at the court of Berlin and Hanover, where he was received with great respect, and on his return to England, he was for some time patronised by Harley, earl of Oxford. In 1718, he published his Nazarenus, or Jewish, Gentile, or Mahometan Christianity, &c. which was a violent attack against revelation, and in 1720 appeared his Tetradymus, in four parts. He died at Putney, near London, where he had retired for some time, 11th March, 1722. It must be fully acknowledged that Toland possessed vast erudition, and great powers of mind; but, unfortunately, these were misapplied in the support of atheism. The wish of being known in the world, and the strong passion of vanity, with which he was influenced, led him to adopt opinions which, probably, sober reflection disapproved; and the ambition of being singular, hurried him to oppose whatever is held as most sacred and solemn among mankind. His works were very numerous; those which were posthumous were published in 2 vols. Svo. 1726, and republished 1747, with an Account of his Life and Writings by Des Maizeaux.

TOLLET, Elizabeth, an English lady, eminent for her knowledge of mathematics, of history, of French, Latin, and Italian. She published some poems, besides Susannah, or Innocence Preserved, a sacred drama, and died unmarried 1754, aged 60.

TOLLIVS, Jacobus, a physician, born at Ingra, in the territory of Utrecht. He was, in 1684, made professor of eloquence, and Greek at Brandenburg, by the elector, and died 1696. He possessed great learning, but favoured the notion of discovering the philosopher's stone. He edited Ausonius, in 8vo. and Longinus, in 4to., and wrote Epistolæ Itinerariæ. His brother Cornelius was at first an amanuensis to Isaac Vossius, and then became professor of eloquence and Greek at Harderwyck, and published an appendix to Pierus Valerianus's treatise de Infelicitate Literatorum, 12mo. Another brother, Alexander, published a useful and valuable edition of Appian.

TOLOMMEI, Claudio, a native of Sienna, who distinguished himself as a poet and orator, and was, in consequence of his abilities, made bishop of Corsala. The best known of his works is a speech, which he delivered in the presence of Pope Clement VII. in consequence of the peace made with Charles V. in 1529. This truly learned and virtuous man died 1557, aged 62.

TOMPION, Thomas, a celebrated mechanic. His name is mentioned with those of Graham, and other ingenious men, as an able clock and watch maker. He died 1696.

TONSTALL, Cuthbert, a native of Tackford, Hertfordshire, who studied at the universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Padua, and distinguished himself for his knowledge of mathematics and divinity. He was employed in several embassies by Henry VIII. and for his services was made bishop of London 1522, lord privy seal 1523, and in 1530, translated to Durham. He was deprived of his honours by Elizabeth, for denying her supremacy, though he had formerly supported her father in the work of the reformation, and he died in confinement, 1559, aged 84. He was author of a treatise de Arte Supputandi, Lon. 1522, 4to.—on the presence of Christ in the Eucharist, 4to.—Aristotle's Morals abridged, &c.

TOOKE, Andrew, an English writer, born in London, 1673. He was educated at the Charter-house, and Clare-hall, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts. In 1695 he was made usher of the Charter-house, and in 1704 professor of geometry at Gresham college, and though he inherited much property from his brother, the bookseller in Fleet-street, he was so attached to his habits of life that he accepted the headship of the school, 1728. He died of a dropsy, 20th Jan. 1731, aged 58, and was buried in the Charter-house chapel. He published Synopsis Græcæ Linguæ—Ovid's Fasti, the Pantheon, or History of the Heathen Gods translated without acknowledgment from the Latin of Pomey, a Jesuit.

TOOKE, George, of Popes in Hertfordshire, was born 1595. He went as captain of a band of volunteers in the expedition against Cadiz, in 1625, of which he wrote a poetical account. He retired to his seat, and devoted himself, during the civil wars, to literary pursuits, and the conversation of his friends, the learned Selden, Hales, John Greaves, &c. He lost his wife 1642, and wrote various canzonets to her memory. He died 1675, aged 80.

TOOKE, John Horne, a politician, was the son of a poulterer named Horne, and born in Newport-street, Westminster, in 1736. He was educated partly at Westminster, and partly at Eton; after which he became a member of St. John's college, Cambridge. In 1670 he was inducted to the chapelry of New-Brentford; but his conduct ill-suited the clerical profession, and he became the partizan of Wilkes; till, on founding the "Society for supporting the Bill of Rights," a quarrel arose between them, each charging the other with venality and hypocrisy. In 1771, he took his master's degree, though with great difficulty; and about this time he had a controversy with Junius, in which he was supposed to have the advantage. Soon after this he resigned the living of Brentford, and entered as a student in the Temple, but was refused admission to the bar. In 1775 he was imprisoned for a libel on the king's troops in America; which gave occasion for his "Letter to Dunning," containing the outline of the philological system, which he published at large in 1786, under the title of "The Diversions of Purley." Having rendered some services to Mr. Tooke, of Purley, in Surrey, that gentleman made Horne his heir, who, out of gratitude, assumed his name. When, however, Mr. Tooke died in 1803, his will only contained a legacy of five hundred pounds to our author, and one hundred to each of his daughters. In 1790 Horne Tooke offered himself as a candidate for Westminster, but without success. His next appearance before the public was on a charge of high treason, at the Old Bailey, in 1794, when he and his associates were acquitted. In 1796 he again stood for Westminster, and failed; but a few years afterwards he obtained a seat in parliament for Old Sarum, on the nomination of lord Camelford. A motion was brought forward to expel him, on the ground of his being in orders; but this measure was dropped; and a bill brought in to prevent the admission of clergymen in future. He died at Wimbledon, March 19, 1812.—W. B.

TOOKE, William, an English divine, was born in 1744 at Islington. He was originally a printer; but in 1771 he obtained episcopal ordination, and was appointed minister of the church at Cronstadt. In 1774 he became chaplain to the factory at St. Petersburg; and after residing there many years, he returned to his own country, where, however, he enjoyed no preferment. He was a fellow of the Royal Society, and died Nov. 17, 1820. His prinprincipal works are—1. "Varieties in Literature," 2 vols. 8vo.—2. A translation of Zollikoffer's Sermons.—3. The Life of Catherine II.—4. A View of the Russian Empire.—5. A General History of Russia.—6. A translation of Lucian, 2 vols. 4to.—W. B.

TOPHAM, Thomas, a publican of Islington, of whose prodigious strength curious particulars are related in Hutton's History of Derbyshire. It is said that he could squeeze together a pewter quart pot at arms' length; lift over his head with his little finger a weight of 200lbs. and with his teeth raise an oak table six feet long, at the extremity of which was suspended half a hundred weight. He raised with apparent ease, and with one hand, a man who weighed 27 stone, and so powerful was the strength of his arm, that he broke against it the largest sticks. He stabbed himself in 1749, in consequence of a quarrel with his wife, and after wounding her in a dangerous manner.

TOPHAM, Edward, an ingenious gentleman, was the son of Dr. Topham, judge of the prerogative court at York. He was educated at Eton and Trinity college, Cambridge, on leaving which, he obtained a commission in the guards, where he rose to the rank of major. He was at one time the proprietor of a fashionable paper, called "The World," in which he inserted several lively pieces in prose and verse, particularly the curious memoir of John Elwes, the miser, which afterwards was published in a separate form, and went through two editions. His other works are, "Letters from Edinburgh," 8vo.; "Address to Edmund Burke, Esq." 8vo.; "Account of a stone which fell from the clouds on his estate in Yorkshire," 4to.; and some dramas. He died at Doncaster in 1820.—W. B.

TOPLADY, Augustus Montague, a native of Farnham in Surrey, educated at Westminster school and Dublin university. He became in 1768 vicar of Broadhembury, Devon; but finding the air of the place unfavourable to his constitution, he settled in London, and officiated in a chapel, Orange-street, Leicester-fields. He was author of Historic Proofs of the Doctrinal Calvinism of the Church of England, and other theological Works, which have been collected together in 6 vols. 8vo. with an account of his life. He died in London, 1778, aged 41.

TORFÆUS, Thormodus, a native of Misnia, historiographer to the king of Denmark. He is known for his History of the Orcales from 850 to 1206, published 1715, folio—and his History of Norway, 4 vols. folio, 1711, two works written in Latin, and possessing great merit. He died 1720, aged 81.

TORRE, N. a native of the Milanese, who from low beginnings, rose to eminence as a chymist, and as an artist in fireworks. By his great application, he became acquainted with experimental philosophy, and the friendship of Reaumur, rendered him expert in the construction of barometers, and in the knowledge of pneumatics. His artificial fireworks, exhibited at Paris, on the marriage of Lewis XVI. were much admired, and in his experiments in pyrotechny, it is said, that he discovered the method of preparing an unextinguishable fire, which might consume an enemy's fleet. This dreadful secret was revealed to the French government, who refused to practise it against the English fleet, and the inventor at last, sensible of the terrible consequences of this powerful engine of destruction, expressed great contrition for his discovery. The sudden death of his wife had such an effect upon him, that he soon followed her to the grave, 30th April, 1780. Though an intelligent man, he wasted much of his time in the foolish attempt of transmuting metals into gold.

TORRENTIUS, Lævinus, a learned man, born at Ghent in Flanders 1525, and educated at Louvain. He studied the civil law at Bologna, and on his return home was employed in some embassies. He afterwards took orders, and died bishop of Antwerp, 1595. He published Latin poems—Commentaries on Suetonius and Horace, &c.

TORRENTIUS, John, a painter of Amsterdam. He possessed merit, but unfortunately was so lascivious in his ideas, that all the powers of his art were employed in delineating naked and obscene figures, in the most licentious and disgusting attitudes. Not satisfied to corrupt the youthful and unwary by the extravagant efforts of his pencil, he became the founder of a sect of Adamites, and for his heretical opinions was seized by the magistrates, and tortured. He expired under the severity of his torments, 1640, and his offensive pieces were burnt by the hands of the hangman.

TORRICELLI, Evangeliste, an eminent mathematician, born at Faenza, 1608. He was well educated, and he learned philosophy under Castelli, who had been the pupil of the great Galileo. His progress in science was so great that he was recommended to Galileo, and went to live with him as an assistant and friend; but the death of that venerable philosopher three months after left him to his own pursuits. He settled at Florence, where he was patronised by the duke Ferdinand II. and he devoted himself to the construction and improvement of telescopes and microscopes. To his ingenious experiments we are indebted for the discovery of ascertaining the weight of the atmosphere by quicksilver in the barometer or Torricellian tube. He died after a few days' illness, 1647, aged 40. He published Opera Geometrica, 4to. 1644.

TORY, Geoffrey, a native of Bourges, who settled at Paris as professor of philosophy in the college of Burgundy, and afterwards became printer. He greatly improved the art of printing, and published a useful book on the Proportion and Distance of Letters called Champ Fleuri, 4to. and 8vo. He also translated the Hieroglyphics of Horus Apollo, 8vo. and wrote Ædiloquium, &c. He died 1550.

TOSCANELLA, Paul, an able astronomer, who erected in Florence cathedral a famous gnomon, of which a description has been published by father Ximenes in 4to. 1757. It is said to be the largest of the kind in Europe. Some supposed that Toscanella formed an idea of the possibility of a passage to the east by the Cape of Good Hope, and by mentioning the circumstance to Martenz of Lisbon, the Portuguese, it is said, were animated in their endeavours to improve navigation and to make discoveries. He died about 1490.

POSTATUS, Alphonso, a doctor of Salamanca, bishop of Avilla, who distinguished himself by his eloquence at the council of Basil, and died 1454, aged 40. He wrote Commentaries on Eusebius's Chronicle, 5 vols. folio—Commentaries on Scripture, &c. His works were printed together at Venice 1596, in 13 vols. folio, a ponderous mass.

TOTILA, king of the Goths, defeated the troops of the emperor Justinian, and obtained possession of Italy, Corsica, Sardinia, and Sicily. He sacked Rome, and was at last killed in battle by one of the soldiers of Justinian, 552, in the 11th year of his reign.

TOTTIE, John, a learned divine, who became canon of Christ-church, and archdeacon of Worcester. He was an able and eloquent preacher, and was much admired at St. Mary's, Oxford. His Sermons have been published, and are deservedly esteemed. He died after 1775.

TOULMIN, Joshua, a dissenting minister of the Baptist persuasion, and a Unitarian, was born in London. He officiated many years to a congregation at Taunton in Somersetshire, where also he carried on the business of a bookseller. On the emigration of Dr. Priestley to America, he was chosen minister of the united congregations at Birmingham, where he died in 1815, aged 73. Dr. Toulmin, for he had obtained a degree from an American college, was an indefatigable compiler, and published several works, the principal of which are—1. The Life of Socinus, 8vo. 2. Dissertations on the Evidences of Christianity, 8vo. 3. Life of John Biddle. 4. History of Taunton, with a supplement, 4to. 5. A new edition of Neal's history of the Puritans, 5 vols. 6. Biography of Dr. Priestley. 7. Memoirs of Samuel Bourne. 8. Historical view of the Protestant Dissenters, 8vo.—W. B.

TOUP, Jonathan, a learned critic, born at St. Ives, in Cornwall, 1713. He was educated in the school of his native town, and at St. Merryn's, and then entered at Exeter college, Oxford, where he took his bachelor's degree. His master's degree was taken at Cambridge 1756. His "Emendationes in Suidam," which first appeared in 1760, and were continued in another volume, 1764, recommended him to the notice of Warburton, by whose means bishop Keppel bestowed on him a prebend in Exeter cathedral, and the vicarage of St. Merryn's. He published his Appendiculum Notarum in Suidam, 1775, and in 1778 his edition of Longinus in 4to. and afterwards in 8vo. He passed his life in retirement, devoted to literary pursuits; but though unacquainted with the world, he was the correspondent of the learned of the age, of Ernestus, Brunk, Valknaer, Runkenius, Larcher, &c. He died 1785, aged 72, and was buried in St. Martin's church, Exeter, of which he was rector. He was never married.

TOURNEFORT, Joseph Pitton de, a celebrated French botanist, born at Aix in Provence, 5th June, 1656. From his very youth he showed a strong passion for collecting plants, and though devoted to theological pursuits by his father, he did not abandon his favourite studies, and when become his own master, he applied himself most assiduously to botany, philosophy, and medicine. In 1678 he explored the mountains of Dauphiné and Savoy in quest of plants, and in 1679 perfected himself in anatomy and medicine at Montpellier. In 1681 he set out for Spain, and after visiting attentively the mountains of Catalonia and the Pyrenees, frequently in the midst of danger from the uncivilized inhabitants, he returned to France with the intention of exploring also the Alps, to enrich his botanical curiosities. In 1683 he was at Paris, where his merit began to be known, and he was appointed botanical professor in the king's garden. He afterwards travelled over Spain, Portugal, Holland, and England, and in 1700 was sent by the king to examine the plants of Greece, Asia, and Africa, and to make observations on the manners and the natural history of those countries. He returned after an absence of three years, and brought with him 1356 species of plants. He was soon after made professor of physic in the college royal, and admitted into the academy of sciences. He received an injury from the wheel of a cart which passed by him, and neglecting the proper remedies, he was seized with the spitting of blood.

which after some months carried him off, 28th Dec. 1708. This most celebrated botanist of the age published, Elements of Botany, 3 vols. 8vo. enlarged to 3 vols. 4to.—History of Plants near Paris, 12mo. enlarged to 2 vols.—Voyage to the Levant, 2 vols. 4to. and three in 8vo.—a treatise on the Materia Medica, 2 vols. 12mo. besides several papers in the history of the academy of sciences

TOURNELY, Honore, a French ecclesiastic, born at Antibes 28th Aug. 1658, of obscure parents. He gradually rose by his great application from the mean office of a swineherd, to become professor of theology at Douay, and a popular preacher. He was much engaged in the controversy about the bull Unigenitus, which he defended with great ability. He died of an apoplexy, 26th Dec. 1729. The best known of his works is a Course of Theology in Latin, 16 vols. 8vo. a composition of great merit.

TOURRETTE, Mark Anth. Lew. Claret de la, a native of Lyons, who studied in the Jesuits' college at Lyons, and afterwards at the Harcourt college at Paris. He became one of the magistrates of his native city, and devoted himself much to the study of natural history. He formed a valuable collection of insects and of herbs, and cultivated in his garden not less than 3000 of the rarest and most curious plants. This amiable man, whose zeal in the investigation of natural curiosities and in botanical pursuits was indefatigable, and whose correspondence was extended to all the learned of Europe, was attacked by an inflammation in the lungs at the siege of his native town in the autumn of 1793, and he survived it but few days. He died aged 64. He published, Demonstrations Elementaires de Botanique, 2 vols. 8vo.—Voyage au Mont Pila, 8vo.—Chloris Lugdunensis, 8vo.—Memoires sur les Monstres Vegetaux, &c.

TOURVILLE, Anne Hilarion de Costentin de, a French admiral, born at Tourville, near Contances 1642. He first distinguished himself against the Algerines, and afterwards at the battle of Palermo, and against the Spanish fleet. He defeated in 1690, the combined fleets of England and Holland, but the battle of la Hogue, two years after, proved fatal to his glory, and to the honour of the French flag, by the loss of 14 of his largest ships. He was honoured in 1701, with the staff of marshal of France, and died the same year, 28th May, aged 59.

TOUSSAINT LOUVERTURE, a mulatto of St. Domingo, who by his courage and abilities rose to command in the French army, under Rochambeau, in 1796. The influence which he possessed among the blacks, induced him to aspire to sovereign power, and the cruelties which the French began to exercise against the natives, served to increase the numbers which flocked to his rebellious standard. After establishing a constitution in the island, and being acknowledged the head of all power civil and military, he consolidated his authority, by the wisest, and most humane regulations; but his confidence in the friendly professions of the French, who still kept an army in the province, proved fatal to him. He trusted his person among them, and instead of being respected as an independent chief, he was seized as a criminal, and sent to France by le Clerc. Immured in a prison, his sufferings were disregarded, while his countrymen, indignant at his treatment, rose to repel their ferocious invaders. This ill-treated, but truly valiant chieftain, died in his prison 1803, and it is said that either poison, or violence, hastened his death.

TOWERS, Joseph, a dissenting minister, born at Southwark 1737. He followed the printing business with Goadby, of Sherborne, and then settled as a bookseller in London, and in 1774 became pastor of a presbyterian congregation at Highgate. Four years after he was associated with Dr. Price, in Newington-green meeting, and in 1779 was honoured, by Edinburgh university, with the degree of LL. D. He wrote, British Biography, 7 vols. 8vo.—Observations on Hume's History of England—the Life and Reign of Frederic III. of Prussia, 2 vols. 8vo.—a *Vindication of Locke—Sermons—*an Answer to Burke's famous pamphlet, and other political tracts. He also assisted Dr. Kippis in the new edition of the Biographia Britannica. He died 1799.

TOWNLEY, Charles, an eminent English collector of antiquities, born at Townley-hall, Lancashire, long the residence of his ancient family. With genuine taste in the knowledge of antiquities, and with the command of an independent fortune, he zealously devoted his labours to the formation of a noble collection, and his house, in Park-street, became the depository of the bulky fragments of Egyptian architecture, and the more pleasing and beautiful specimens of the Grecian and Roman models. His medals were also numerous and valuable, and among his choice manuscripts was a Homer, which he permitted to be collated, in a late edition of that poet. The Etruscan vases, and other antiquities of his collection, were illustrated in 2 vols. 4to. by d'Ancerville, a French antiquarian, who has explained the mythological representations and inscriptions, with ingenious observations. Mr. Townley, who was fellow of the antiquarian and royal societies, and one of the trustees of the British museum, died at his house, Park-street, 3d Jan. 1805, aged 67. By his will he left 4000*l.* for the building of a museum, at Standish, for the reception of his valuable antiquities, but as the bequest has not been complied with, the whole collection is, agreeable to his further directions, now deposited in the British museum, for which purpose parliament have granted a very liberal allowance to the trustees.

TOWNSEND, Joseph, an English divine, was originally destined for the profession of physic, and educated at Caius college, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship and took his master's degree. He then studied under Dr. Cullen at Edinburgh; but on hearing the Methodists he took another turn, was ordained and presented to the rectory of Pewsey in Wiltshire. He also became chaplain to lady Huntingdon, and preached in her chapel at Bath; but after some time his Calvinistic zeal abated, and he settled on his living, where he died in 1816. He published—1. A Journey through Spain, 3 vols. 8vo. 2. The Physician's Vade Mecum. 3. Dissertation on the Poor Laws. 4. A Guide to Health. 5. Thoughts on Despotism and Free Governments. 6. Sermons. 7. The character of Moses as an Historian established, 2 vols. 4to.—W. B.

TOWNSON, Thomas, D.D. an able divine, born in Essex, 1715. From Christ-church, Oxford, he removed to Magdalen college, where he obtained a fellowship, and afterwards was presented successively to Hatfield Peveral, in Essex, Blithfield, Staffordshire, the lower moiety of Malpas, Cheshire, and by the patronage of bishop Porteus, Richmond archdeaconry, Yorkshire. He is eminently known for his valuable discourses on the four gospels, and three tracts in answer to the Confessional, and since his death, which happened in 1792, a discourse on the Evangelical History has appeared with his life.

TOZZETTI, John Targioni, an eminent botanist born at Florence, 11th Sept. 1722. He was educated at Pisa, and succeeded in 1737 his master Micheli in the care of the botanic garden of Florence. In 1737, he was made professor of botany there, and consulting physician to the government. He was engaged with Cocchi in making a catalogue of the famous library at Florence, and in consequence of his fame as a physician and botanist he was admitted into several of the learned societies of Europe. He was one of the first who introduced inoculation in Tuscany. He died at Florence 1780, of an atrophy. His publications in Latin, as well as in Italian, are very respectable. He published a thesis "De Præstantia et Usu Plantarum in Medicina," fol.—a work on the Improvement of Medicine in Etruria, in 4 vols. 4to. &c.

TRACY, Uriah, a distinguished lawyer, was born at Norwich, Connecticut, February 2d, 1755, and educated at Yale college, where he was graduated in 1778, with an uncommon reputation for talents. Having studied law he established himself in 1780 at Litchfield, and soon rose to a high rank in the profession. He was elected a representative in the state legislature in 1787, and was for several succeeding years speaker of that body. In 1793 he was transferred to the house of representatives in the national legislature, where he continued for six years, when he was elected to a seat in the senate, and continued a member of that body, greatly admired for his legal and political knowledge, wit, and eloquence, till his death on the 19th of July, 1807, in the fifty-third year of his age. He possessed a mind of uncommon strength, acuteness, and vivacity; was distinguished for frankness, generosity, and richness and sprightliness of humour; and enjoyed the highest esteem and respect of his fellow-citizens, both on account of the amiableness of his private character, and the fidelity with which he discharged his public duties.

TRADESCANT, John, a Dutchman, who travelled over the best part of Europe, Greece, Turkey, Egypt, and Barbary, and at last settled in England, where he became superintendent of the gardens of Charles I. It is said that he was the first who formed in England a collection of medals and objects of natural history. His son was also a great traveller. They had a large garden at Lambeth, well stocked with various plants and trees from foreign countries. An account of their valuable collection appeared under the name of Museum Tradescantium. The father died 1652, and the monument of the family is still seen in Lambeth churchyard.

TRAJAN, M. Alpinus Crinitus, a Roman emperor. After serving under Vespasian and Titus in their Asiatic campaigns, and after supporting by his valour the power of Nerva, he was associated with him on the throne. He was a brave and popular prince, though he persecuted the Christians. He died in Cilicia, 117 A.D.

TRALLIAN, Alexander, a native of Tralles, in Lydia, eminent as a medical writer. He first used cantharides for the cure of the gout, and practised phlebotomy with success, about 550 A.D. His works, all on medical subjects, have appeared at Basil, Paris, and London.

TRAPP, Joseph, an able divine, born 1672, at Cherington, Gloucestershire, where his father was rector. He was educated by his father, and then entered at Wadham college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He was the first poetry professor on the Birkhead foundation, and he published the lectures which he delivered under the title of Prælectiones Poeticæ, a very elegant and ingenious work. As he had given excellent rules for the forming of a poet, he afterwards attempted to act up to those rules in the translation of the Æneid, but in this he totally failed. Virgil, as has been well observed, viewed through the medium of Trapp, appears an accurate writer, and the Æneid a well-conducted fable; but discerned in Dryden's page he glows as a fire from heaven, and the Æneid is a continued series of whatever is great, elegant, pathetic, and sublime. Dr. Trapp was rector of Harlington, Middlesex, of Christ church, Newgate-street, and St. Leonard's, Foster-lane, and lecturer of St. Lawrence, Jewry, and St. Martin's in the Fields. Though acquainted with the great, he obtained no higher preferment. He died 22d Nov. 1747, and left behind him an excellent character as a critic, a scholar, a preacher, and as a man. He published Milton's Paradise Lost, in Latin verse—4 vols. of sermons—Abraham, a tragedy—a treatise on being over righteous—besides 2 vols. of his Prælectiones—a poem in the Musæ Anglicanæ, and, among other poems, one on the duke of Ormond, of which only 11 copies were sold.

TRAVERSARI, Ambrose, a monk, born at Cameldoni, near Florence, 1386. He translated into Latin Diogenes Laertius, which he inscribed to Cosmo de Medici, and the work possessed merit, and has often been reprinted. He was for some time interpreter between the Greeks who fled from Constantinople, and the Italians, who hospitably received them.

TRAVIS, George, a native of Royton, Lancashire, educated at Manchester school, and St. John's college, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree. He afterwards was promoted to Eastham vicarage, and Handley rectory, Cheshire, and obtained the archdeaconry of Chester, and a prebend in that church. He ably attacked Gibbon's History, and showed himself a strenuous assertor of the genuineness of the famous passage in 1 John v. 7, about the three witnesses, against Griesbach, Porson, Marsh, and Pappelbaum. He died at Hampstead, 24th April, 1797.

TREADWELL, John, LL.D. governor of Connecticut, was born at Farmington, in that state, November 23d, 1745, and was graduated at Yale college in 1767. He studied law, though not with the design of practising, and settled in his native town, where he was early introduced into civil employments, for which his education, sound judgment, public spirit, and integrity, rendered him peculiarly qualified, and passed successively through many of the most important offices in the state. He was elected a representative in the legislature in 1776, and thence annually, with the exception of one year, till 1785, when he was transferred to a seat in the council. He continued a member of that body till 1798, and was then advanced to the chair of lieutenant-governor. On the death of governor Trumbull, in the autumn of 1809, he was appointed by the legislature to succeed him, and was elected by the people to the office in the ensuing spring. He had also been, antecedently to 1809, twenty years judge of probate, three years a judge of the county court, twenty a judge of the supreme court of errors, and nineteen a member of the corporation of Yale college. He had likewise the honour of a principal agency in establishing the school fund of that state, assisted in negotiating the sale of the lands from which it was raised, drew the bill for its appropriation, and was until 1810 one of the board to which its management was intrusted. The duties of these several stations he discharged with ability, and with an exactness and disinterested regard to the public good, most honourable to his character. He was a warm, consistent, and intelligent Christian, and rendered important services to the cause of religion, not only as an exemplary and active member of the church at home, but as a frequent member of ecclesiastical councils, a trustee of the Connecticut Missionary Society, and as president of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, which office he filled from the organization of that body till his death on the 19th of August, 1823. He possessed a sound and vigorous mind, and beside law and politics, to which his public employments called his attention, was extensively acquainted with literature, science, and theology.

TREAT, Robert, governor of Connecticut, was a native of Milford, in that state, and was elected a magistrate in 1673. During the war with king Philip he commanded the troops of Connecticut, and defeated the Indians at Springfield and Hadley. In 1676 he was chosen deputy-governor, and from 1683 to 1698 chief magistrate of the state. He again held the office of deputy-governor in 1698 and 1708. He was a brave and cautious military officer, and an able magistrate, and rendered the most important services to the colony in both capacities. He died in 1710, in his eighty-ninth year.

TREAT, Samuel, first minister of Eastham, Massachusetts, was the son of governor Treat, and educated at Harvard college, where he was graduated in 1669. He was ordained in 1672. He studied the language of the Indians who lived in his neighbourhood, and devoted himself with great zeal to their instruction, many of whom were led by his instrumentality to adopt the arts of civilization, and a considerable number to embrace Christianity. He preached for many years to about 500 Indians, and employed four native teachers to instruct them. After having devoted near half a century to these benevolent exertions, he died in 1717, in his sixty-ninth year.

TREMBLEY, Abraham, a native of Geneva, who retired to Holland, not to embrace the ecclesiastical profession, according to the wishes of his father. After being private tutor to some persons of distinction in Holland, he came to London, and undertook the education of the duke of Richmond. He returned to Geneva, 1757, where he married, and became a useful member of the republic. He died there, 1784, aged 74. His works are Memoirs on Polypos, 4to.—Instructions from a Father to his Children, on Natural Religion, 2 vols. 8vo.—Instructions on Natural Religion, 3 vols. 8vo.—Inquiries on Virtue and Happiness, &c.

TREMELLIUS, Immanuel, a protestant divine, born at Ferrara, 1510, of Jewish parents. He was converted by Peter Martyr, and after visiting England and Holland, he settled at Heidelberg, where he was appointed Hebrew professor. He was afterwards professor of Hebrew at Sedan, where he died 1590. He published a translation of the Bible, much esteemed by Matt. Poole and others, and also a Latin version of the Syriac Testament.

TREMOILLE, or TRIMOUILLE, Louis de la, viscount de Thouars, a French general of illustrious birth, born 20th Sept. 1460. He so early displayed his valour, that at the age of 18 he was made general of the French forces, and at the battle of St. Aubin-du-Cormier, in 1488, he took prisoner the duke of Orleans, afterwards Lewis XII. He possessed equal abilities as a negotiator, and was successfully employed as an ambassador at the courts of Britany, of Vienna, and of Rome. Lewis XII. when raised to the throne, forgot the injuries which he had received from this powerful subject, and intrusted him with his armies in Italy, and rewarded his services with several honourable appointments. Tremoille was wounded at the battle of Navarra, but bravely defended Dijon against the Swiss, and protected Picardy and Provence against the attacks of invading armies. He fell gloriously at the fatal battle of Pavia, 24th Feb. 1525, aged 65. An account of his life was published by Bouchet, 4to. His grandson Francis was taken prisoner at the battle of Pavia, and recommended himself to the favour of his sovereign by his attentions to him during his captivity. He died at Thouars, 1541, aged 39. There were others of this family distinguished for their fidelity and services to the crown.

TREMOLLIERE, Peter Charles, a native of Chollet, in Poitou, who died at Paris 1739, aged 36. He studied under J. B. Vanloo, and after a residence of six years in Italy he settled at Paris. His shipwreck of Ulysses, his golden age, and his altar pieces are much admired.

TRENCHARD, John, an English patriot, born 1669. He was bred to the law, but never followed it as a profession. He was commissioner of forfeited estates in Ireland, and enjoyed independence and comfort, by the offices he held, and by marriage. He began publishing in 1697, and distinguished himself as a political writer. In 1720 he began, with Thomas Gordon, to publish in the London, and the British Journal, letters under the name of "Cato," which were popular, and attracted much attention. He was a member of parliament for Taunton, Somersetshire, and died 1723, of an ulcer in his kidneys. He published some pamphlets now forgotten. He is described by his friend Gordon as a man of extraordinary talents, and great probity, and one of the worthiest, ablest, and most useful men this country ever produced.

TRENCK, Francis, baron de, a Prussian nobleman, who by his imprudent conduct drew upon him the displeasure of his government, and was imprisoned. After a long captivity he escaped, and published his memoirs, which contain a curious account of his adventures and sufferings, but not always in the language of truth. He came to France during the revolution, and wishing to acquire popularity among the leaders of the state, he was arrested as a suspected person, and by the revolutionary tribunal sentenced to the guillotine. He suffered in the summer of 1794, aged 70.

TREVISANI, Francis, a native of Trieste, eminent as a painter. He married a Venetian lady of illustrious birth, and afterwards settled at Rome, where he acquired celebrity and opulence. His historical pieces and his landscapes are deservedly admired. He died at Rome, 1746, aged 90.

TREVISI, Jerome, a native of Trevisi. He came to England, and recommended himself to the notice of Henry VIII. to whom he was appointed painter, and chief engineer. He was killed at the siege of Boulogne, 1544. He chiefly excelled in history and in portraits.

TRIMMER, Sarah, an ingenious lady, was the daughter of Mr. Joshua Kirby, clerk of the works at Kew, and author of some treatises on Perspective, in which art he instructed their late majesties, as well as the present king. Sarah was born at Ipswich, Jan. 6, 1741, and received an excellent education under the eye of her father. At the age of twenty-one she married Mr. Trimmer, by whom she had twelve children, to whose education she devoted herself with exemplary assiduity. She was also an active encourager of Sunday schools; and published several useful books for the benefit of youth; some of which are in the list of publications dispersed by the Society for promoting Christian Knowledge. She died Dec. 15, 1810.—W. B.

TRISSINO, John George, an Italian poet, born at Vicenza, 1478. He studied at Milan and at Rome, and devoted himself to literary pursuits. He married in 1503, and retired to the enjoyment of domestic happiness and learned ease. The death of his wife, by whom he had two sons, drew him into public life, and at Rome he soothed the sorrows of his domestic misfortunes by writing a tragedy, Sophonisba, which was received with universal applause, and acted before pope Leo. X. with unusual pomp and magnificence. He was afterwards employed in some embassies by the pope, and universally respected for his talents as a negotiator. His second marriage, 1526, and his fondness for a son, the fruit of this marriage, proved the source of misery to him. His eldest son was jealous of his partiality for this younger child, and sued his father for the property of his departed mother, in which he prevailed. This had such effect upon Trissino, that he died of chagrin, at Rome, 1550. His works were published, 2 vols. fol. Verona, 1720. His chief poem is Italy delivered from the Goths by Belisarius, in Italian, a work which displays genius and felicity of invention, though it does not possess the flights or beauties of Tasso. If he was not the greatest modern poet, he was the first who attempted an epic poem in blank verse, and in a language as yet unclassical.

TRIVULCE, John James, a native of Milan, banished from his country for his attachment to the Guelfs. He next entered into the service of the king of Arragon, and afterwards of Charles VIII. king of France, and for his meritorious actions was promoted to the rank of marshal of the kingdom. He greatly distinguished himself at the battle of Aignadel, in 1509, but the defeat of the French before Navarra was attributed to his negligence, and therefore his character suffered much in the public estimation, till his services to Francis I. in the crossing of the Alps, 1515, restored him to popularity. He afterwards distinguished himself at the battle of Marignan, and died at Arpajon, 5th Dec. 1518, aged about 80. His relation, Theodore, was also marshal of France, and distinguished himself at the battle of Aignadel. He was made governor of Genoa by Francis I. and when obliged to surrender through famine to a besieging army, he retired to Lyons, where he died, 1531. His brother Anthony was a cardinal, and four others of that family also were raised to the rank of cardinals in the 16th and 17th centuries.

TROGUS POMPEIUS, author of a valuable history of the world to the age of Augustus, flourished about 41 B.C. The work was epitomized by Justin, and the original is lost.

TROMMIUS, Abraham, a protestant, born at Groningen 1633. He wrote a valuable Greek concordance of the Old Testament, 2 vols. fol. 1718, and died the next year.

TROMP, Martin Happertz, a native of Brille, who at the age of eight embarked for the Indies in the naval service of his country. He distinguished himself before Gibraltar, 1607, and by degrees rose from the lowest station to the chief command, and was made admiral of Holland. He defeated a numerous Spanish fleet in 1639, and signalized his valour in the service of his country in 32 other naval battles. He was killed on the quarter deck while commanding the fleet which engaged the English ships under Albemarle, 10th Aug. 1653, and he was honoured by his countrymen with a most splendid funeral in Delft church, where his remains were deposited. This brave man refused all titles, except that of father of the sailors.

TROMP, Cornelius, son of the above, distinguished himself also in the naval service of the republic, against the corsairs of Barbary in 1650, and against the English in 1653, and 1665. He behaved with great valour in the two naval battles fought with the English fleet in 1673, and three years after he succeeded Ruyter as admiral of the fleets of the United Provinces. He died 21st May, 1691, aged 62.

TRONCHIN, Theodore, a physician, born at Geneva 1704. He came to England with lord Bolingbroke his relation, and after studying at Cambridge he went to Leyden, where he devoted himself to medicine, under the care of the great Boerhaave. After taking his degrees he settled at Amsterdam as physician, but returned to Geneva in 1754, and two years after removed to Paris, where he inoculated some of the Royal family with great success. He was much respected in this capital, and acquired great celebrity and equal independence. He died there 1781, deservedly lamented for his benevolence and humane attention to the diseases of the poor. He wrote de Nymphâ, Svo.—de Colicâ Pictorum, Svo. besides an edition of Baillon's works, and various communications to the Encyclopedia.

TROOST, Cornelius, a native of Amsterdam, distinguished as a historian and a painter. He died 1750, aged 53. His chief piece is preserved in the school of surgery at Amsterdam, where he represents an anatomical professor in the act of dissecting a body before his attentive pupils.

TROTT, Nicholas, LL.D. by birth an Englishman. After having been governor of the Bahama Islands, became a resident of South Carolina, near the close of the seventeenth century. He was elected speaker of the house of assembly of that province in the year 1700. Three years afterwards his name appears in the list of counsellors of the province. After this he became a judge, and in the discharge of the duties of this office displayed a profound acquaintance with law, and an extent of general erudition truly rare. He was deeply versed in the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages, as well as in the principles of jurisprudence, and for nearly forty years, was among the most influential men in South Carolina. He died in that province in the year 1740.

TROWBRIDGE, Edmund, judge of the supreme court of Massachusetts, was born at Newton in 1709, and graduated at Harvard college in 1728. He became a lawyer of the first rank in Massachusetts, was appointed attorney general in 1749, and a judge of the supreme court in 1767, and presided at the trial of captain Preston of the British troops in Boston, for murder, on the 5th of March, 1770. He was attached to the royal government, though he disapproved of many of its measures. Alarmed by the aspect of the times he resigned in 1772. He was the most profound common lawyer in New England before the revolution, and pursued his legal disquisitions long after he had ceased to be actively engaged in the profession, and employed himself in writing essays and forming elaborate readings upon abstruse and difficult points of law, many of which are now extant in manuscript and print, and prove the depth of his learning, and diligence and patience of his research. He lived in retirement from the time of his leaving the bench, and died at Cambridge in April 1793, aged 94.

TROY, Francis de, a native of Toulouse, who studied painting under his father and under le Fevre. He became professor, and afterwards director of the academy of painting, and was patronised by the royal family. His female figures were particularly pleasing, so that it was said of him, that he had stolen the cestus of Venus. He died at Paris 1730, aged 85.

TROY, John Francis, son of the above, died at Rome 1752, aged 76. He also excelled as a painter, and was made rector of the academy of painting at Paris, afterwards director of that of Rome, and a knight of the order of St. Michael. His Niobe changed into a rock, his Esther and his Jason, are admired pieces.

TROYEN, Rombrud, a Flemish painter, who travelled in Italy, and excelled in the representation of grottoes, caves, ruins, and all objects of a dark and melancholy appearance. He died 1650.

TRUBLET, Nicholas Charles Joseph, a native of St. Malo, who became member of the French academy, of the Berlin academy, and treasurer of the church of Nantes. He published Reflections on Telemaachus, which introduced him to la Mothe and Fontenelle, and he enjoyed the patronage of cardinal de Tencin, but preferred retirement and privacy to the honours which the court might have heaped upon him. His essays on literature and morality, 4 vols. 12mo. possess great merit, and have been translated into various languages. He wrote besides, memoirs of la Mothe and Fontenelle, &c. and died March 1770, aged 73.

TRUCHET, John, a native of Lyons. He applied himself to philosophy and divinity, but mechanics proved his favourite pursuit. Under the patronage of the great Colbert, he paid attention to geometry and hydraulics, and his superior knowledge was consulted in the construction of canals and aqueducts. He also improved the mode of bleaching, and invented various machines for purposes of commerce, and for the promotion of the arts. This ingenious man, who had embraced the order of the Carmes, died at Paris, 5th Feb. 1729, aged 72. As he was member of the academy of sciences at Paris, he enriched their memoirs with valuable communications.

TRUMBULL, William, LL.D. an eminent statesman, born in Berkshire. He was of St. John's college, Oxford, and afterwards fellow of All Souls, where he took his doctor's degree 1667. He was advocate in doctors' commons, was knighted 1684, and the next year sent envoy extraordinary to France. He was member for East Loo, and afterwards for Oxford university, and in 1695 was appointed secretary of state, but resigned two years after. The time of his death is not fully ascertained. He is described by Burnet as a most able civilian, and a very virtuous man. He is, however, chiefly known as the friend and correspondent of Pope the poet.

TRUMBULL, Jonathan, governor of Connecticut was born in Lebanon in 1710, and graduated in 1727, at Harvard college. He possessed a mind of superior endowments. He at first devoted himself to theology, and preached for a number of years; but at length turned his attention to law, and became eminent in the profession. He was employed in many offices in the state, the chief of which were those of chief justice of the supreme court, lieutenant governor, and chief magistrate, the latter of which he held from 1769 to 1783, when he resigned on account of his age, and died August 17th, 1785. He rendered, by his wisdom and firmness, the most important services to the state and nation during the war of the revolution, enjoyed the highest confidence of Washington, and was pronounced by him to be among the first of patriots. He was distinguished for amiableness, modesty, prudence, uprightiness, the love of freedom, and piety.  L.

TRUMBULL, Jonathan, governor of Connecticut, and son of the preceding, was born and resided at Lebanon in that state. He was educated at Harvard college, where he was graduated in 1759. In 1775 he was appointed by congress paymaster in the northern department, and not long after, secretary and aid to general Washington. He was for several years a member of the state legislature, and speaker of the house, and in 1790, was elected a representative in congress. In 1791, he was chosen speaker of the house of representatives, and continued in that station till 1794, when he was transferred to a seat in the senate of the United States. In 1796 he was elected lieutenant governor of Connecticut, and in 1798 governor, and continued in the office till his death in 1809, in the seventieth year of his age. He held a high rank in talents and acquirements, was eminent for his social virtues, stability, uprightiness, and piety, and discharged the duties of his various public stations, with distinguished fidelity and intelligence.  L.

TRUXTON, Thomas, an American naval commander, was born on Long Island, New-York, February 17th, 1755. He commenced a seafaring life at the age of twelve, and was impressed and served a short time on board a man of war. He commanded a vessel as early as 1775, and during the revolution distinguished himself by his depredations on the commerce of the enemy. After the war he was extensively engaged in the East India trade till 1794, when he was appointed to command the frigate Constellation. Being sent with a squadron to protect the American commerce in the West Indies, while cruising alone he fell in with the French frigate L'Insurgente on the 9th February, 1799, and captured her though of superior force; in consideration of which he received a service of plate from the merchants of Lloyd's coffee-house. In February of the next year he obtained a victory over the La Vengeance of 54 guns, and 500 men, though she afterwards escaped from him. After the close of that war with France he retired from service, and resided at Philadelphia till his death on the 5th of May, 1822.  L.

TRUSLER, Dr. John, a literary compiler, was born in London in 1735. He was brought up to physic in a very humble line; but contrived to get into orders, and for some time officiated as a curate. At length, in 1771, he began to publish abridgments of popular sermons, printed in imitation of manuscript; and next he established a bookselling business upon an extensive scale. Having thus acquired a fortune, he purchased an estate at Englefield-green, where he died in 1820. His compilations are too numerous and contemptible to deserve farther notice. The best are his "Hogarth Moralized," 8vo.; and a "Compendium of Chronology," 12mo.—W.B.

TRYPHODORUS, a Greek poet, whose poem on the destruction of Troy has been printed by Merrick, with an English translation, Oxford, 1742, 8vo.

TUCKER, Abraham, author of "the Light of Nature Pursued," 9 vols. 8vo. published under the assumed name of Search, was possessed of an affluent fortune, and died at his seat, Betehworth castle, near Dorking, Surrey, 1775. By his wife, daughter of E. Barker, esq. he had two daughters, one of whom married sir H. St. John. He was an amiable man in private life.

TUCKER, Josiah, an able divine. He was born at Laugharn, Caermarthenshire, 1711, and educated at St. John's college, Oxford, where he proceeded D.D. 1759. His first ecclesiastical preferment was a curacy at Bristol, and afterwards he became rector of St. Stephen's, then prebendary of the cathedral, and in 1758 dean of Gloucester. During the American war he drew much of the public attention upon himself by his pamphlets, in which he asserted the necessity of granting independence to the colonies, rather than to attempt to subdue them by arms, and though he was abused by the friends of the minister, his deductions proved prophetically true. As a writer on subjects of government, of commerce, and of politics, his opinion was highly respectable, and ensured him the good opinion of the world. In his celebrated treatise on civil government he opposed the system of Locke, and proved himself no mean antagonist in the field of philosophy and reasoning. He published some sermons, &c. and died at an advanced age 1799.

TUCKEY, James Hingston, a nautical writer, was born at Greenhill, in the county of Cork, in 1776. He entered the navy at an early age; and in 1794 went to India, where he was made a lieutenant. In 1803 he sailed to New South Wales, where he made several surveys of the coast, which with the account of his voyage, have been published. In 1805, he was taken, and kept in confinement in France, till the downfall of Buonaparte. He was then selected to command an expedition for exploring the river Congo, where he died in September, 1816. While a prisoner in France, he compiled a work, entitled "Maritime Geography," which was published in 4 vols. 8vo.—W.B.

TULDEN, Theodore Van, a native of Bois-le-duc, eminent as a painter and engraver. His fairs, markets, village feasts, &c. were subjects in which he displayed superior abilities and unparalleled excellence. Some of his historical pieces are much admired, and his engraving of the labours of Hercules by Nicolo possesses merit. He died 1676, aged 69.

TULL, Jethro, a gentleman, descended from an ancient Yorkshire family. He is ever to be celebrated as the first Englishman who bestowed particular attention to agriculture, and endeavoured to reduce it to a regular system, and on consistent principles. He is the inventor of the drill plough. He travelled into France, and visited other parts of Europe, earnestly attentive to the improvements made in agriculture in foreign countries, and he introduced into practice his own plans in his farms in Oxfordshire and Berkshire. Though in some degree baffled by the stupidity and obstinacy of his labourers and the mechanics whom he employed, he demonstrated that by careful labour, and due arrangement, the ground would produce in the course of thirteen years more plentiful crops than by the usual methods of manuring and of fallow. His neighbours, who observed the rapid improvements of his land, prevailed upon him to publish his theory, which appeared in 1733. His essay on Horse-Boeing Husbandry, fol. was so popular that it was translated into French by du Hamel. He published other agricultural tracts, and died 3d June, 1740.

TULLUS HOSTILIUS, third king of Rome, after Numa, was successful in his war against the people of Alba and the Latins. He died B.C. 640.

TULLY, Thomas, a native of Carlisle, educated at Queen's college, Oxford, where he became tutor and fellow. He was in 1642, elected master of Tethbury grammar-school, but he soon quitted the appointment for a college life. He was made head of St. Edmund hall 1657, and at the restoration he took his degree of D.D. and became chaplain to the king. He was made dean of Rippon 1675, and died the next year aged 56. He was author of Logica Apodictica, 8vo. and some other theological tracts, besides controversial pieces against Bull and Baxter on the subject of justification.

TULLY, George, a relation of the preceding, born also at Carlisle, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford. He was author of a Discourse on the Government of the Thoughts, 8vo.—and published a Translation of Plutarch's Morals—of Miltiades's Life by Corn. Nepos, and of Julius Cæsar by Suetonius, with notes. He published besides some sermons and theological tracts. He obtained a prebend of Rippon, and the rectory of Gateside near Newcastle, and the subdeanery of York cathedral. He died 1695, aged 42.

TUNSTALL, James, an able divine, born 1710, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, where he became fellow and tutor. He was presented 1739, to Sturmer rectory, Essex, and in 1741, elected public orator of the university. He was chaplain afterwards to Potter the primate, who gave him Great Chart rectory in Kent. He died universally respected, 28th March, 1772. He wrote Epistola ad Virum Erudit. Conyers Middleton, &c.—Academica, or Discourses on Natural and Revealed Religion—a Vindication of the Power of the State to prohibit Clandestine Marriages, &c.

TURBIDO, Francis, a native of Verona, who studied painting under Gorgione and Veronese, and acquired eminence in the execution of historical pieces, in fresco and in oil. His transfiguration is much admired. He died 1581, aged 81.

TURENNE, Henry de la Tour d'Auvergne, viscount de, second son of the duke of Bouillon, by Elizabeth daughter of William I. of Nassau, prince of Orange, was born at Sedan 11th Sept. 1611. He was alive from his earliest years to military glory, and found particular delight in reading Curtius on the exploits of Alexander the Great. He learned the art of war under his maternal uncle Maurice of Nassau, and first distinguished himself at the siege of la Mothe in Lorraine, in 1634. In 1635 he reduced with great rapidity the castle of Solre in Hainault, with a garrison of 2000 men; and the next year so signalized himself at the taking of Brisach, that Richelieu admiring his valour, offered him his niece in marriage, an honour which, as he was a protestant, he declined. Italy was in 1639, the scene of his valour, and in 1642, he assisted at the conquest of Rousillon, and two years after, in reward for his able services, during 17 years under various generals, he was made marshal of France, and appointed commander-in-chief of the army in Germany. He crossed the Rhine with a small force, and though defeated at Mariendal 1645, he recovered, three months after, at the victory of Northlingen, the honour of his army. In 1645, he re-established the elector of Treves in the possession of his dominions, and the following year he formed a union with the Swedish army under Wrangel, after a march of 140 leagues, and by this masterly manœuvre, obliged the duke of Bavaria to sue for peace. When the duke soon after violated the peace which he had made with France, Turenne again attacked him, and gaining over him the famous battle of Zumarthausen, he obliged him to quit his dominions. In the civil wars which soon after distracted France, Turenne at first embraced the party of the rebellious princes, and was defeated near Rhetel in 1650, by du Plessis Prassin, but the following year he was reconciled to the court, and obtained the command of the royal army. He was successfully employed in checking the progress of Condé, to whom he was opposed, and after some skilful manœuvres on the Loire, the Seine, and the Marne, he went in 1654 to raise the siege of Arras, which was pressed by the Spaniards, and the following year he took Condé, St. Guillan, and other towns. In 1657 he took St. Venant and Mardick, and joined the forces of Cromwell in taking Dunkirk, which was followed by the fall of Oudenarde, Ypres, and other Flemish towns. The peace of the Pyrenees in 1659, put an end to the war between France and Spain, but in 1667, it was renewed, and Turenne, again placed at the head of military operations, had the honour of instructing the king his master in the art of war. His success was so rapid, that the Spaniards sued for peace the next year, and about this time the general renounced the tenets of the protestants for the catholic faith. In the war against Holland the experienced general took 40 Dutch towns in 22 days, in 1672 and the following year, he pursued to the gates of Berlin the elector of Brandenburg, who had come to the assistance of the Dutch, and obliged him to sue for peace. His conquest of Franche Comté in 1674, occasioned a powerful league in the empire against Lewis XIV. but Turenne, ever active in the service of his master, suddenly marched into the Palatinate, and defeated at Sintzein a German army under the duke of Lorraine, and laid waste the country so effectually, that from the top of his castle at Mannheim the elector Palatine could see two cities and 25 villages around him in flames. After this campaign, in which more cruelty was exercised than humanity could defend, Turenne retreated to Lorraine, and defeated the Imperialists at Mulhausen, and again in a more terrible battle at Turkheim, and compelled them to recross the Rhine 1675. These disasters did not dishearten the cabinet of Vienna, who determined to place at the head of their armies Montecuculli, a general worthy to oppose the victorious Turenne, and these two illustrious characters were going to decide the valour of their troops and their own superiority near the village of Saltzbach, when the French hero, examining a spot on which to erect a battery, was unfortunately killed by a cannon ball, 27th July, 1675, aged 64. This celebrated character, deservedly reckoned as the first general of his age, was honoured with a most splendid funeral by the gratitude of his master, and he was buried among the French kings at St. Denys. In 1781 a superb trophy was erected on the very spot where he fell at Saltzbach, by cardinal de Rohan. In the midst of his victories, Turenne was particularly attentive to the comforts of his soldiers; he not only watched for their glory, but their welfare was the greatest wish of his heart. In his private conduct he was modest and unassuming, and when at the treaty of the Pyrenees, the kings of Spain and France introduced to each other the chief persons of their court, Turenne was found concealed among the crowd, and when presented to the Spanish monarch, Philip observed to his sister, Ann of Austria, "that is the man who has made me pass so many sleepless nights."

TURGOR, Michael Stephen, president of the parliament at Paris, was an active and popular magistrate. He contributed much to adorn Paris, and to promote the comforts of its inhabitants. He left three sons, and died 1751, aged 52.

TURGOR, Anne Robert James, an eminent statesman, youngest son of the preceding, was born at Paris, 10th May, 1727. He studied divinity at the Sorbonne, where he pronounced two Latin discourses with great applause, one on the advantages derived from the Christian religion, and the other on the progress of the human mind, and at the age of 24 he began a translation of the Georgics of Virgil. His abilities recommended him to the court, and for 12 years he was intendant of Limoges, where he promoted commerce and industry, and opened sources of opulence by the making of new roads, and the digging of canals. Called by the favour of Lewis XVI. to the office of comptroller-general of the finances, he devoted himself zealously to improve the resources of the kingdom, and to lessen the burdens of the people without diminishing the revenues of the state. His plans were grand, liberal, and useful; but unfortunately he was opposed by those who were possessed of power rather than of an enlightened mind, and his measures were ridiculed by the profligate and the vicious, who rioted on the miseries of the people, and he at last retired from a situation which he had adorned by his talents and his integrity. His ministry was, indeed, short, but very popular and useful, and he carried into his retirement the good wishes and the regret of the people. He died of the gout, 18th March, 1781, aged 49. Memoirs of his life and of his works were published by Condorcet, in 1782, 8vo. He was a warm admirer of the principles of the economists, a society at the head of which was placed Quesnay.

TURNEBUS, Adrian, a French critic, born 1512, at Andely in Normandy. He studied at Paris, and acquired great reputation for his application, learning, and critical knowledge. He taught polite literature at Toulouse, and in 1547 became Greek professor at Paris, where his lectures were most numerously attended. In 1552 he superintended the royal press for Greek books, but resigned three years after. He died 12th June, 1565, leaving his wife pregnant of her sixth child. Not only his extensive erudition, but his amiable manners, entitled him to the general praise which has been bestowed upon his character, and from the Scaligers, Scioppius, Huetius, Montaigne, and others, he has been deservedly mentioned as possessing great powers of mind. His works, all in Latin, were printed in 1 vol. folio, Strasburg 1600, and his Adversaria, an excellent book in 3 vols. folio, Paris. His works chiefly consist of valuable notes on Cicero, Varro, Thucydides, Plato, &c.—Latin poems—translations from Aristotle, Theophrastus, Plutarch, and other authors, &c.

TURNER, William, a native of Morpeth, Northumberland, educated at Pembroke-hall, Cambridge. He warmly embraced the tenets of the reformation, and preached to various congregations, till Gardiner, jealous of his popularity, imprisoned him. When liberated he went to the continent, and took his doctor's degree of medicine at Ferrara. He returned to England, on Edward's accession, and was made dean of Wells, but he went into exile, under Mary, till the elevation of Elizabeth recalled him, and restored him to his ecclesiastical honours. He wrote a treatise on the baths of England and Germany—a complete Herbal, or History of Plants, fol.—Historia de Naturis Herbarum, Scholiiis et Notis Vallata, 8vo.—and other botanical works, and died 1568.

TURNER, Thomas, an able divine, born at Reading, Berks, and educated at St. John's college, of which he became fellow. He was in 1629 made residentiary of St. Paul's, and chaplain to Charles I. whom he accompanied in his expedition to Scotland, and in 1641, he was made dean of Rochester, and soon after of Canterbury. These dignities, and particularly the favour of Charles, rendered him very suspected to the parliament, and during the civil wars, he was stripped of his preferment, with every mark of cruel insult, and meditated ignominy. The restoration replaced him in his ecclesiastical offices, and he died 1672, aged 81.

TURNER, Francis, son of the above, was educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford, and he afterwards obtained a prebend of St. Paul's, and the deanery of Windsor. He was in 1683 made bishop of Rochester, and the next year removed to Ely, but his opposition to the king's measures rendered him unpopular at court, and he was one of the seven bishops sent to the Tower. At the revolution he refused to take the oaths to William, and was consequently deprived of his preferment. He wrote some sermons, besides religious poems, and the life of Nicholas Ferrar, and died in privacy, 1700.

TURNER, Robert, an English divine, who quitted the kingdom to preserve his attachment to the Romish church. He was for some time in the service of the duke of Bavaria, who employed him in negotiations, and he afterwards became canon of Breslaw, and died at Gratz 1597. He wrote commentaries on Scripture and other theological works.

TURPIN, F. H. a native of Caen. He became a professor of belles lettres in his native town, and afterwards at Paris, and acquired some celebrity as a writer. He published the lives of the great Condé, and of marshal Choiseul—History of the Government of Ancient Republics—Life of Mahomet, 3 vols. 12mo.—Civil and Natural History of Siam, &c. 2 vols. 12mo.—Universal History, 4 vols.—History of the Alcoran, 2 vols.—The French Plutarch. He died at Paris 1799, aged 90.

TURRETIN, Benedict, of an ancient family at Lucca, was born at Geneva, where he became professor of theology, and where he died 4th March, 1631, aged 43. He wrote a defence of the Genevese translation of the Bible, sermons, &c.

TURRETIN, Francis, son of the above, was born at Geneva, 1623. He was professor of theology at Geneva, 1653, and went in 1661 as envoy from the republic to Holland. He died 28th Sept. 1687. He wrote Institutio Theologiæ Elenctica, 3 vols. 4to.—Theses de Satisfactione J. C. 4to.—De Secessione ab Ecclesiâ Rom. 2 vols.—Sermons, &c.

TURRETIN, John Alphonsus, son of the preceding, was born at Geneva, 1671. In encouragement of his great talents, a professorship of ecclesiastical history was founded for him at Geneva. After travelling over Holland, France, and England, much respected by the learned and the great, he died at Geneva 1st May, 1737. He wrote, Dissertations, 3 vols. 4to.—Sermons—An Abridgment of Ecclesiastical History—treatises on the Truth of the Jewish religion, &c.

TUSSER, Thomas, a native of Raven-hall, Essex, educated at Eton and Cambridge. He was introduced to the court of queen Elizabeth, but he preferred the peace and retirement of a rural life to the intrigues of ambition. His five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry, 4to. 1586, is an interesting picture of the agricultural progress made in those days. He died about 1580.

TWEDDELL, John, an accomplished scholar, was born June 1st, 1769, at Threepwood, near Hexham, in Northumberland. He was educated first at Hartforth school in Yorkshire, next under Dr. Parr, and lastly at Trinity college, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship in 1792. He gained prizes at the university for his compositions, which he published in 1794, with the title of "Prolusiones Juveniles." He became a student in the Temple; but in 1795 he set out on his travels, and died while at Athens, July 25th, 1799. As it was known that he had amassed large materials for publication, the learned world anxiously expected the result of his labours; but unfortunately, though his manuscripts were left in the care of the English ambassador at Constantinople, none of them came to the hands of his friends. A volume of his correspondence, with some of his remains, and a biographical memoir, appeared in 1815, 4to.

THWINING, Thomas, an elegant Greek scholar, well known for his translation of the Poetics of Aristotle, in one volume, 4to. He was a native of London, and finished his education at Sidney college, Cambridge, where he proceeded M.A. 1763. He was presented to the living of St. Mary's, Chichester, by Dr. Porteus, bishop of London, and he died there in 1804.

TISS, William, a native of Newbury, Berks, educated at Winchester school and New college, Oxford. He became a zealous defender of the tenets of the presbyterians, and was made president of the Westminster assembly of divines, and rector of St. Andrew's, Holborn. He wrote Vindiciæ Gratiæ Potestatis et Providentiæ Dei, fol.—Four Dissertations de Scientiâ Medicâ, fol.—Riches of God's Love, and other theological works which tended to prove his strong attachment to the doctrines of Calvin. He died 1645.

TYE, Christopher, musical preceptor to Edward VI. and organist of the royal chapel under Elizabeth, was born at Westminster, and educated at Cambridge, where he took his doctor of music's degree 1545. As a musician he was very eminent, and set to music the Acts of the Apostles, and other things. To his diligence in some degree may be attributed the restoration of church music, which had nearly perished with the dissolution of the abbeys. The time of his death is not known.

TYERS, Thomas, a writer, known as the friend of Johnson, and as the proprietor of Vauxhall gardens. He was brought up to the bar, but never practised. He possessed some genius and taste, though for his celebrity he was indebted to the partiality of his friends. He died 1787. He wrote some sonnets, pastorals, besides political tracts, &c. 8vo.

TYLER, John, governor of Virginia, was elected in 1808. He was one of the leading revolutionary characters of Virginia, was many years a member of the house of delegates, and in 1791 succeeded Mr. Benjamin Harrison as speaker. After being governor he was judge of the district court of the United States for Virginia, and died at his seat in Charles county, January 6th, 1813. He was simple in his manners, distinguished for the uprightness and fidelity with which he discharged his official duties, and enjoyed in an uncommon degree the esteem and confidence of his fellow-citizens.  L.

TYNDALL, William, an English reformer. He was born on the borders of Wales, and educated at Magdalen hall, Oxford, where he imbibed the doctrines of Luther. He afterwards went to Cambridge, and then settled on the continent that he might with greater security print his translation of the New Testament into English. His translation was well received in England, though the catholics exerted themselves with the aid of a royal proclamation to suppress it. He afterwards translated the five books of Moses, and intended further labour, but the papists of England were so enraged against him that they employed a spy of the name of Philips to betray him, and he was seized as a heretic at Antwerp, where he had fixed his residence. Philips was so active that though the English merchants in Antwerp interested themselves in his favour, and lord Cromwell wrote for his release, he was condemned to die. He was first strangled, then burnt near Filford castle, 18 miles from Antwerp, 1536. He was a man of persevering spirit, and great zeal as a reformer, and was therefore called the apostle of England. His history is mentioned in Fox's Martyrs. He wrote some other things.

TYNTE, Edward, governor of South Carolina, succeeded sir Nathaniel Johnson. He was commissioned in 1709, and died the following year. He was a man of taste and genius.  L.

TYRANNION, a surname of Theophrastus, a grammarian of Pontus, from the severity of his discipline. He was taken prisoner by Lucullus, and came to Rome, where he had Cicero and other illustrious Romans among his friends and pupils.

TYRTÆUS, a poet of Athens about 684 B.C. He animated the Lacedæmonians, who were dispirited in their war against the Messenians, and such was the effect of his poetical numbers that they obtained the victory over their enemies.

TYRWHITT, Thomas, an eminent scholar, born 1730. He was sent from Kensington to Eton, and then entered at Queen's college, Oxford, from whence he was, in 1755, elected fellow of Merton. He was, in 1756, under-secretary at war to lord Barrington, and in 1761 became principal clerk of the house of Commons, which office he resigned, six years after, to Mr. Hatsell. In 1784 he was elected curator of the British museum, and died 1786, universally respected, as well for learning as for gentleness and amiableness of temper, seldom equalled. His works, 12 in number, display labour, as well as taste and judgment. The best known of his publications are Observations on some passages in Shakspeare—Poetical translations of Pope's Messiah, of Philip's Splendid Shilling, into Latin, and Pindar's eighth Isthmian ode into English—Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, 5 vols. Svo.—Rowley's poems, written by Chatterton, with a vindication against Bryant, the dean of Exeter, and others—de Lapidibus, a Greek poem attributed to Orpheus—an oration of Isæus against Meneclæus—Aristotle's Poetics, &c.

TYSILIO, a Welsh bard about the 7th century, author of a chronicle of Britain, from which it is said that Geoffrey of Monmouth derived much of his information.

TYSON, Edward, a native of Bristol, educated at Magdalen hall, Oxford, where he studied medicine, and took his degrees. Dr. Tyson afterwards settled in London, and acquired a very extensive practice. He became physician to Bethlehem and Bridewell hospitals, and died very suddenly, 1708, aged 58. He was fellow of the Royal Society, and communicated some valuable papers to its transactions. His works are Phocæna, or anatomy of a porpoise, 4to.—Ephemeris Vita, or the natural history of the Ephemeron, 4to.—Ourang Outang, or comparison of the anatomy of the Pigmy, the Ape, the Monkey, and Man, &c. 4to.

TYTLER, William, an able antiquary, born at Edinburgh 1711. He published the poetical remains of James I. of Scotland—a dissertation of Scottish music—an inquiry into the evidence against Mary queen of Scots, &c. an able work, which in reflecting on the conclusions of Robertson and Hume, endeavoured to turn away the tide of unpopularity from that unfortunate queen. This last work passed through several editions. He died advanced in life, and highly respected for his private and public character. He left two sons.

TZETZES, John, a celebrated grammarian of Constantinople. He shone as a great scholar and a most accomplished man, and it is said his memory was so retentive that he could repeat all the Scriptures by heart. He wrote valuable commentaries on the Alexandria of Lycophron, published by Potter, in his edition of that poet, 1697. He wrote also "Chiliades," an elaborate work—Scholia on Hesiod—epigrams and poems—pieces on grammar, &c.—Allegories on Homer, dedicated to the empress Irene, who died 1158, which proves the author to have flourished in the middle of the twelfth century.

ULF

UBALDINI, Petruccio, a celebrated illuminator on vellum. The book in which he wrote, and illuminated, in beautiful letters, various sentences from Scripture, at the request of Nicholas Bacon, for the use of lady Lumley, has been long preserved in the library of Gorbamby. He died about the middle of the 16th century.

UDINO, John d', an Italian painter, the disciple of Raphael. His animals and landscapes were much admired. He died 1564, aged 70.

UGHELLI, Ferdinand, a native of Florence, who entered among the Cistercians, and distinguished himself by his learning, his humility, and his other virtues. He died at Rome 19th May, 1670, aged 75. He published Italia Sacra, 9 vols. fol. 1662, and 10 vols. fol. 1722.

ULACO, Adrian, author of a treatise on Trigonometry in Latin, fol.—Logarithmorum Chiliades Centum, fol. 1628, was a native of Ghent, and died in the middle of the 17th century.

ULFELD CORNIFIX, count de son of the

ULL

Danish minister, was patronised by Christian IV. king of Denmark, whose natural daughter he married. His ambition and his intrigues rendered him suspected to the next monarch, Frederic III. and he fled to Sweden, where Christina received him with open arms. After that queen's death he returned to Copenhagen, but his intentions were interpreted as hostile to the government, and he was again obliged to fly for protection abroad. He lived for some time in disguise at Basil, but being discovered, he sailed down the Rhine, and died of cold in the vessel in which he had embarked, Feb. 1664, aged 60, and was buried at the foot of a neighbouring tree.

ULLOAY PEREIRA, Lewis de, a Spanish poet, born at Toro, in Leon. He gained the protection of Philip IV. by his sonnets and other poetical pieces, and by the friendship of the duke of Olivares, he obtained the government of the province of Leon. He died 1660. Though great in the comic and the burlesque, he was equally successful in the grave and the serious. The best of his poems is Rachael, or the Loves of Alphonso VIII. His works were printed together, 1674, in 4to.

ULLOA, Dom Antonio, a Spanish mathematician, sent with others to Peru, to measure a degree of the meridian. On his return to Europe he was taken by the English, and when released was again sent to America, as governor of Louisiana. He died 1795, aged 79. His Historical Voyages in South America, have appeared 2 vols. 4to. and have been translated into French.

ULPIAN, Domitius, an eminent lawyer, minister of state to the emperor Alexander Severus. He was very hostile to the Christians. He was assassinated by the soldiers, 226. Some fragments of his works are extant.

ULRICA, Eleonora, second daughter of Charles XI. of Sweden, was born 1688, governed the kingdom during the absence of her brother Charles XII. and after his death she was proclaimed queen, 1719. The following year she resigned the crown to her husband Frederic of Hesse-Cassel, with whom she shared the honours of royalty; but such was the ascendancy of the nobles, that they obliged their sovereigns to acknowledge their right to the throne as the unbiased election of the people. Ulricea, by a wise administration, contributed to restore peace and prosperity to the nation, and died much respected, 1741. The wife of Charles XI. of Sweden, and the mother of the preceding, also bore the name of Ulricea, and died 1693, in consequence of the chagrin which her husband's treatment had occasioned. When she supplicated his compassion in favour of those whom his government oppressed, he spurned her from him, observing, "that he had taken her to give him children, not advice."

ULUG-BEIG, a Persian prince celebrated for his knowledge of astronomy. His catalogue of fixed stars, rectified for 1434, was published by Thomas Hyde at Oxford in 1665 in 4to. with learned and useful notes. This worthy prince was put to death by his own son 1449, after reigning 40 years at Samarcand. Another learned work on Chronology, in Arabic, has been attributed to him, and it has been edited in the original with a Latin translation by John Greaves, London, 1650, in 4to.

UNDERHILL, John, one of the first planters of Massachusetts, was sent by sir Henry Vane to command the colony's troops at Saybrook in 1637. He accompanied captain Mason in the expedition against the Pequots, and conducted, as did all on that occasion, with the greatest bravery. He was chosen in 1641 governor of Exeter Dover. He was extremely eccentric. He

UPTON, James, a native of Cheshire, elected from Eton to a fellowship at king's college, Cambridge. He obtained the headship of Taunton grammar-school, Somersetshire, and died there, 1749, aged 79. He was an excellent scholar, and published a valuable edition of Aristotle's Art of Poetry, and also Ascham's Schoolmaster, 1711, with notes, 8vo. His son James, born at Taunton, received his education at Exeter college, Oxford, and obtained Risington rectory, Gloucestershire, and a Rochester prebend. Besides Observations on Shakspeare, 8vo. he published an edition of Epictetus, 2 vols. 4to.—and Spenser's Faery Queen, 2 vols. 4to. and died 1760.

URBAN I. pope after Calixtus I. 223, was beheaded seven years after under the persecution of Alexander Severus.

URBAN II. Odon, a priest of Cluni, made a cardinal by Gregory VII. and chosen pope after Victor III. 1088. He held the council of Clermont, where the crusade against the infidels was first published. He died at Rome, 1099, respected for his wisdom, moderation, and courage.

URBAN III. Hubert Crivelli, archbishop of Milan, was elected pope after Lucius III. 1185, and died two years after.

URBAN IV. James Pantaleon, a native of Troyes, who rose from obscurity to consequence in the church, and on the death of Alexander IV. was elected pope, 1261. He published a crusade against Manfred, king of Sicily, and died 1264.

URBAN V. William de Grimoald, was born at Grisac in the Gevaudan, and was elected pope, 1362, after the death of Innocent VI. He removed in 1367 from Avignon, where the popes had constantly resided since 1304, and by fixing his abode at Rome he became popular. In 1370 he again retired to Avignon, and died there at the end of that year. He was a liberal patron to learned and religious bodies, and founded several churches and colleges. He also reformed abuses, and was not, like other popes, lavish of the treasures of the church in enriching his family.

URBAN VI. Bartholomew Prignano, a native of Naples, made archbishop of Bari, and elected to the popedom without the ordinary forms, in a popular sedition, 1378. The cardinals soon after chose Robert de Geneva, who assumed the name of Clement VII. and this double election was the source of a schism in the church. Urban, supported by England, Hungary, Bohemia, and the empire, exercised the severest cruelties upon his enemies, so that his death, 1389, was regarded by the people as a happy event.

URBAN VII. John Baptist Castagna, was elected pope after Sixtus V. 1590, and died 12 days after, much lamented, in consequence of the happy days which the Romans expected from his many virtues.

URBAN VIII. Maffeo Barberini, a native of Florence, elected pope after Gregory XV. 1623. He united the duchy of Urbino to the holy see, and published a bull against the tenets of the Jansenists. He died 29th July, 1644. He was an excellent poet, and so good a Grecian, that he was called the Attic Bee. His poems, consisting of paraphrases from the psalms, odes, hymns, epigrams, &c. have been published at Paris, fol.

URCÆUS, Codrus Anthony, a native of Rubiera, near Reggio, professor of belles lettres at Forli, and of languages at Bologna. He wrote harangues, satires, epigrams, eclogues, &c. and died 1500, aged 54. His works appeared again, 1515, in 4to.

URSINS, Anne Mary de la Tremouille, took for her second husband Flavio des Ursins, and became lady of honour to the queen of Spain. She was a woman of great powers of mind, very intriguing in her conduct, and possessed of such influence in the court, that she guided the affairs of the nation. She was banished from Spain, 1712, on the marriage of Philip V. with Elizabeth Farnese, and after seeking in vain an asylum at Paris, Genoa, and Avignon, she at last settled at Rome, where she died, 5th Dec. 1722, aged 80.

URSINUS, Zachary, a native of Breslau, in Silesia. He studied at Wittemberg, and attended Melancthon at the conference of Worms, 1557. The next year he was appointed over the academy of Breslau, but when he declared himself a Calvinist he was exposed to severe persecution, and with difficulty found an asylum at Zurich. He was in 1561 invited by the university of Heidelberg to fill the chair of theology, but on the death of his patron, Frederic, the elector palatine, he was obliged to abandon his situation. From Heidelberg he removed to Neustadt, where he was appointed divinity professor, and where he died soon after, 1583, aged 49. He was a man of great learning, but in his disposition was violent and passionate. His works have been edited in 3 vols. fol.

URSINUS, John Henry, a Lutheran divine, eminent for his learning in sacred and profane history. He was superintendent of the churches of Ratisbon, and died there, 14th May, 1667, author of Exercitationes de Zoroastro, Hermete, &c. Svo.—Sylvæ Theologiæ Symbolicæ, 12mo.—de Ecclesiarum German. Origine, &c. Svo. 1664. His son George Henry was author of Diatribæ de Taprobanâ, Cernæ, &c.—Disputatio de Locustis—Observationes Phi- logicæ, &c.—Critical Notes on Virgil, &c. He died 10th Sept. 1707, aged 60.

URSINUS, George, a Danish divine, author of Hebrew Antiquities, a work of merit.

URSUS, Nicolas Raymarus, a Danish mathematician. Though originally a swineherd, and unacquainted with the letters of the alphabet, before his 18th year he made the most rapid progress; and with scarce any instruction he became a very eminent astronomer. He taught mathematics at Strasburg, and afterwards removed, at the solicitation of the emperor, to Prague, where he died about 1600. He published some mathematical works, and made some discoveries in astronomy, in consequence of which he disputed for a time with Tycho-Brahe, about the priority of the discovery of his celestial system.

USHER, James, an illustrious prelate, born of an ancient family at Dublin, 4th Jan. 1550. He was educated at Trinity college, Dublin, which had been founded by his uncle Henry Usher, archbishop of Armagh, and here he acquired so much knowledge, and studied with such assiduity, that before his 16th year he had completed a chronicle of the Bible as far as the book of Kings, which became the foundation of his great work the Annals. To be more perfectly acquainted with the true doctrines of Christianity, he applied himself to the reading of the Fathers, and in 18 years, in his 38th year, after astonishing perseverance he completed this laborious undertaking. Though his friends wished him to follow the law, he preferred divinity, and after his father's death he devoted himself to his favourite pursuits, and gave up the whole of his patrimony, with little exception, to his brothers and sisters, to avoid the troubles of law-suits and family quarrels. Soon after he was admitted into orders, he visited England to purchase books and MSS. for Dublin college, and in 1607, he was appointed chancellor of St. Patrick's church, and divinity professor to the university. He was, in 1610, unanimously elected provost of Dublin college, but he declined the honour. Though represented by some of his enemies as a puritan, he was, in 1620, nominated, by James I. to the see of Meath. His reputation was now so great as an author, and as the champion of the protestant church, that the king, a little before his death, promoted him to the see of Armagh, and in this elevated situation he showed himself vigilant and active against the extravagant claims of the catholics, and maintained, by his zeal and exemplary conduct, the dignity of the churchman, and the meekness of the Christian. He visited England, with his family, in 1640, but the breaking out of the rebellion, the next year, prevented his return to his diocess, where his palace was nearly destroyed, and all his property plundered. To compensate his losses, the king granted him the bishopric of Carlisle; but as the Scotch armies were quartered there, he derived little or no benefit from the appointment. From Oxford, where he had removed, he retired, in consequence of the ruined state of the king's affairs, to Cardiff, and then to the castle of St. Donate's, in Wales, where he was afflicted with an almost fatal disease. So great was his attachment to his unfortunate master, that he was consulted by him in the treaty of the Isle of Wight, about the government of the church; but though his zeal for the royal cause was unshaken, he remained unmolested. During the usurpation, Cromwell desired once to see him, and treated him with great civility; but never fulfilled the promises which he had made to him in favour of the church. This truly great and virtuous man died 21st March, 1655-6, at the house of lady Peterborough, at Ryegate, Surrey, aged 80, and though he directed to be buried privately, Cromwell ordered his remains to be deposited in Westminster abbey, with great funeral pomp. His valuable library, consisting of 10,000 volumes, printed and manuscript, though solicited by the king of Denmark, and by cardinal Mazarin, was, as he wished, bestowed on Dublin college. As a scholar, Usher was highly respectable, acute as a critic, well informed as a divine, and as a prelate meek but dignified; the friend of order, religion, and morality. His reputation was so well established for classical knowledge and deep erudition, that, during the civil wars, which distracted his country, he was solicited to accept a professor's chair at Leyden, and invited by Richelieu to settle in France, with a promise of protection, and the free exercise of his religion. His works are, Annals of the Old and New Testament, best edited at Geneva, 2 vols. fol. 1722—a Body of Divinity, folio—the History of Goteschale, in Latin—Antiquitates Ecclesiarum Britannicarum, fol. editions of the Letters of Ignatius, Barnabas, and Polycarp, with learned notes, 2 vols. 4to.—a treatise on the London Edition of the Septuagint—sermons, &c. His life has been written by Richard Parr, and is found prefixed to his 300 letters, edited at London 1686, in folio.

USHER, John, lieutenant-governor of New-Hampshire, was, for a considerable time, a counsellor, and treasurer of Massachusetts, and rendered important services to the province in purchasing the district of Maine. He was at length appointed lieutenant-governor of New-Hampshire, but was not popular. He favoured the ambitious designs of the British ministry on the colonial rights. On being dismissed from the government he returned to Massachusetts, and died at New-York.

UTENBOGAERT, John, one of the chief supporters of the Remonstrants, was born at Utrecht, and died at the Hague, 1644, aged 87. Though inferior to his friend Episcopius in genius and penetration, he was his superior in neatness and elegance of style. He published an Ecclesiastical History, fol.—History of his own Life, 4to. &c.

UTENHOVIUS, Charles, a native of Ghent, who studied at Paris, and afterwards went to England, where he defended the government, and the religion of Elizabeth, for which he was liberally rewarded. He returned to Cologne, where he died of an apoplexy, 1600, aged 64. He was the friend of Turnebus, and published Latin poems—Epistolarum Centuria—Mythologia Æsopica Metro-Elegiaco, 8vo. 1607, &c.

UXELLES, Nicholas Chalons du Blé, marquis d', a French general, distinguished for his defence of Mayence, for 56 days, against a powerful besieging army. He was afterwards plenipotentiary at Gertruydenberg and Utrecht, and was made marshal of France. He continued long a favourite at the court of Lewis XIV. and at that of the regent, and died 1730, in a good old age.

VACHER, N. a native of Moulins, author of Observations on Surgery, 12mo.—Dissertation on Cancers, &c. He died 1760.

VACHET, John Anthony le, a French ecclesiastic, born at Romans in Dauphiné. He devoted the riches which he inherited from his noble family, to charitable purposes, and died 6th Feb. 1681, aged 78.

much respected for his works of piety. He wrote various treatises on religious subjects.

VACHET, Peter Joseph de, an ecclesiastic, born at Beaune. He is known as the author of some Latin poetry of merit, published 1664, 12mo. He died about 1655.

VACQUERIE, John de la, first president of the parliament of Paris, is celebrated for the firmness of his address to Lewis XI. when he wished to enforce some unpopular taxes. Sire, exclaimed he, at the head of the parliament, we resign our offices into your hands, and we are determined rather to endure the severity of your displeasure, than wound our consciences.

VACQUETTE, John, sieur du Cardonnoy, a native of Amiens, known for his knowledge of jurisprudence, but more for his love of literature. He clothed some stories in a poetical dress, and died much respected, Oct. 1739, aged 81.

VADE, John Joseph, a native of Ham, in Picardy, who made amends for the irregularities of his youth by the excellence of his poetical productions. He is the author of that kind of poetry which the French called Poissard, which paints in low, but natural characters, the various occupations of vulgar life. He was, among poets, what Teniers is among painters, and his parodies, songs, bouquets, fables, epistles, &c. possess great merit, with all the vivacity and boldness of the rustic muse. The dissipated life which he led shortened his days, so that he died 4th July, 1757, at the early age of 37. His works have been collected in 4 vols. 12mo.

VADIAN, Joachim, a native of St. Gal, in Switzerland, well acquainted with literature, mathematics, medicine, and philosophy. He was honoured with the laurel crown for his literary merits, by the emperor of Germany, and died 1551, aged 66. He wrote, Commentaries on Pomponius Mela, fol.—a treatise on Poetry, and other works in Latin.

VAILLANT DE GUELLIS, OF VALENS, bishop of Orleans, was patronised by Francis I., and died at Meun-sur-Loire, 1587, in a good old age. He wrote, a Commentary on Virgil, fol.—a Latin poem, &c.

VAILLANT, John Foy, a celebrated French medalist, born at Beauvais, 24th May 1632. He studied jurisprudence, and afterwards medicine, in which he took his doctor's degree; but the sight of a number of medals, which a peasant had found in digging in a neighbouring field, roused all his attention, and fixed the bent of his genius. On a visit to Paris he was noticed by Seguin and other antiquarians, and introduced to Colbert, who patronised him, and engaged him to travel over Italy, Sicily, and Greece, in quest of medals to enrich the king's cabinet. On a second voyage from Marseilles, he was taken by pirates, and instead of visiting Rome, he was carried as a slave to Algiers; but after five months of cruel slavery he was permitted to return to France for his ransom. At sea, the sight of another pirate threatened fresh slavery; but he determined to preserve the medals which he had collected at Algiers, and swallowed them. He landed soon after at the mouths of the Rhone, and with some difficulty, nature discharged the favourite medals. Undismayed by former misfortunes, he undertook another voyage, and visited Egypt and Persia, and returned loaded with valuable curiosities. His labours in the cause of science were liberally rewarded by Lewis XIV.; he was made associate of the academy of inscriptions 1701, and soon after pensionary. He died of an apoplexy, 23d Oct. 1706, aged 76. The best known of his works are, Numismata Imperatorum Roman. Præstantiora a J. Cæsar. ad Posthumum et Tyrannos, 4to. afterwards enlarged to 3 vols. 4to.—Seleucidarum Imperium, &c. 4to. a valuable work—Numismata Ærea Augustorum et Cæsar. in Coloniais, &c. 2 vols. fol.—Numismata Imperatorum, &c. apud Græcos, &c. fol.—Historia Ptolemæorum, &c. fol.—Nummi Antiqui Familiarum Roman. &c. 2 vols. fol.—Arsacidarum Imperium, &c. 4to.—Achæmenidarum Imperium, &c. 4to. &c. He contributed also some valuable communications to the memoirs of the academy. His son John Francis was born at Rome, and educated at Paris among the Jesuits. He took his degrees in medicine, but studied, like his father, the science of medals. He died 17th Nov. 1708, aged 44, of an abscess in the head occasioned by a fall. He is author of a treatise on the Nature and Use of Coffee, and a Dissertation on the Cabiri.

VAILLANT, Sebastian, a French botanist, born at Vigny, near Pontoise. From an organist at a convent at Pontoise, he became surgeon and secretary to Fagon, the king's physician, and by the friendship of this worthy patron he obtained the place of director of the royal gardens. He enriched the garden by the addition of several curious plants, and, for his services to botany, was honoured with a seat in the academy of sciences. He published, remarks on Tournefort's institutions of Botany—Botanicon Parisiense, containing an account of the plants which grew near Paris, with 300 plates, published by Boerhaave, fol.—a Discourse on the Structure of Flowers and their use—a small Botanicon, or abridgment of the larger work in 12mo. He died of an asthma, 22d May, 1722, aged 53.

VAILLANT, Walleran, a native of Lisle, eminent as a painter and engraver. He was patronised by the emperor and by the French king, and died at Amsterdam 1677, aged 54. His brother was also eminent as a portrait painter in crayons.

VAISSETTE, Don Joseph, a native of Gaillac, who quitted the office of king's procureur in Albigeois, to embrace the ecclesiastic profession, as member of the congregation of St. Maur at Toulouse. He came to Paris, 1713, and applied himself in company with Claude de Vic, in writing a history of Languedoc, of which the first volume appeared in 1730, folio. After the death of his coadjutor he published four other volumes, and the sixth has been presented to the public by his historical successor Bourotte. He wrote besides, an abridgment of his great work, 6 vols. 12mo.—Universal Geography, 4 vols. 4to. and 12 vols. 12mo. He died at St. Germain-des-prés, 10th April, 1756, aged 71.

VALADE, James Francis, a native of Toulouse, known as an intelligent printer and bookseller. He published some valuable catalogues, and died at Paris, 24th June, 1784.

VALART, Joseph, a native of Hesdin, author of a supplement to the general grammar of Beauzee, 8vo.—and of translations of the New Testament, Cornelius Nepos, &c. He died 1779.

VALAZE, Charles Eleonore Dufriche, a native of Alençon, who after being engaged in the military profession, was called to the bar, and on the breaking out of the French revolution was sent as deputy to the convention. He was violent in his reflections against the unhappy Lewis, but as he was attached to the Girondists, he was soon marked for slaughter by the sanguinary Marat. He was condemned 30th October, 1793, at the age of 42, but as the sentence was pronounced, he stabbed himself to the heart and immediately expired. He was an intelligent man on subjects of law, commerce, and agriculture, and published Lois Penales, 8vo. 1784—le Reve, conte philosophique—a Mon Fils, 8vo.—Defense des Accusés au 31 Mai, &c.

VALDO, Peter, a native of Vaux, in Dauphiné, who became in 1180, the head of a sect called from him Vaudois. Lewis VII. endeavoured in vain to convert these fanatical men to the tenets of the catholic faith, and his son Philip Augustus considering the sword as a more powerful engine of persuasion than the tongue, destroyed their houses, and put above 7000 to the sword. These persecuted men, though dispersed through Languedoc, Dauphiné, Bohemia, &c., nevertheless adhered to their principles; and their sect, regarded as the fore-runners of the Calvinists, still maintains their original opinions.

VALENS, Flavius, son of Gratian, shared the imperial throne with his brother Valentinian. He defeated the Goths, but after making a treaty of peace with them, he permitted them to settle in Thrace, in consequence of which they were better enabled to attack their new allies. Valens, defeated by these barbarian invaders, was pursued and burnt to death in a tower where he had taken refuge, A. D. 378.

VALENTIN, a Roman, pope after Eugenius II. He died 40 days after his election, Sept. 827.

VALENTIN, a heresiarch of the 2d century. He was an Egyptian by birth, and a follower of Plato's philosophy, but he was so offended because he was refused a bishopric, that he separated from the church, and gave rise to new errors. He maintained after the Gnostics the existence of Æons, whose numbers composed the Godhead, and that by them the world had been created, and was still governed. These wild doctrines were spread with rapidity over Gaul and the western world. He died 160.

VALENTIN, Basil, the assumed name of an able chymist in the 16th century, who was a Benedictine of Erford. His works are in German, and so popular that they have been translated into Latin and English. The best known are Currus Triumphalis Antimonii, Amsterd. 1671, 12mo.—Æzoph of philosophers with the twelve keys of philosophy, 8vo.—Relation des Mysteres des Sept Metaux, &c. 4to.—Testament of Basil Valentin, 8vo.

VALENTIN, Moses le, a native of Colomiers in Brie. He studied painting under Vouet, and improved himself much at Rome, and successfully imitated the manner of Caravaggio. His concerts, players, soldiers, and low scenes are very valuable, as he paints nature with great correctness, and powerful effect. He died in consequence of bathing imprudently when his body was too hot, near Rome 1632, aged 32.

VALENTIN, Michael Bernard, a native of Giessen, who studied botany and became professor of medicine in his native town. He died 13th March, 1729, aged 72. He is author of Historia Simplicium Reformata, with 23 plates, 1723—Amphitheatrum Zootomicum, in German, 3 vols. fol. translated into Latin by Becker—Medicina Nova Antiqua, 4to.—Cynosura Materiae Medicæ, 3 vols. 4to.—Viridarium Reformatum, fol.—Corpus Juris Medico-legale, fol.—Physiologiæ Bibliæ Capita Selecta, 4to.

VALENTINE, daughter of John Galeas, duke of Milan, married Lewis, duke of Orleans, who was basely murdered by the duke of Burgundy. Unable to avenge the death of her lord, she died of a broken heart, 5th Dec. 1408, recommending to her children, and especially to John, count of Dunois, the natural son of her husband, the vindication of their father's reputation and glory.

VALENTINIAN I. son of Gratian, rose by his merit to the imperial throne, after the death of Jovian, and while he kept the west for himself, he bestowed the eastern empire on his brother Valens. He defeated the Germans, and restored tranquillity to his African provinces. His next expedition was against the Quadi, whose territories he laid waste with fire and sword, and afterwards, when giving an audience to their ambassadors, he, while speaking in a fit of passion to them, burst a blood-vessel, which proved fatal, 17th Nov. 375, aged 55.

VALENTINIAN II. son and successor of the preceding, was stripped of his dominions by Maximus. In his distress he applied to Theodosius, emperor of the east, who cut off the head of the usurper, 338, and restored him to his throne. He was afterwards strangled by order of Arbogastes, his rebellious general, 15th May, 392. He was a most virtuous and benevolent prince.

VALENTINIAN III. Flavius Placidus, son of Constantius, and Placidia, the daughter of the great Theodosius, was acknowledged emperor, 425, when six years old. His mother directed the administration during his minority, and though she was obliged to yield Africa to the Vandals, she ably maintained the dignity of the empire by the valour of her general, Ætius. When of age the young emperor gave loose to the most licentious passions, and at last was assassinated by order of Petronius Maximus, to whose wife he had offered violence, 455. He was succeeded by his murderer.

VALERIANUS, Publius Licinius, a Roman, proclaimed emperor of Rome, after Æmilianus, 253. He made his son Gallienus his partner on the throne, and after persecuting the Christians, and waging war against the Goths and Scythians, he marched against Sapor, king of Persia. The Persians were victorious, and Valerian, carried about in derision, was at last ordered by his cruel conqueror to be flayed alive, 263. His skin, tanned red, was hung up in one of the Persian temples in derision of the Romans.

VALERIANUS, Pierius, an Italian writer, born at Belluno, in the Venetian states. He was educated by the kindness of his uncle, and studied under Valla and Lascaris, and he acquired such celebrity as a classical scholar, that he was intrusted with the care of the two nephews of Leo X. Though thus patronised by the pope, he had the modesty and firmness to refuse two bishoprics, and remained satisfied with the office of apostolic notary. After the death of his pupils, he retired to the enjoyment of literary ease at Padua, where he died, 1558, aged 83. He was author of various treatises on curious and interesting subjects, both in Italian and Latin, and he also published 2 vols. of Latin poems, which were possessed of great merit.

VALERIUS MAXIMUS, a Latin writer. His entertaining work, in nine books, containing various anecdotes of great men, is dedicated to Tiberius, in whose age he flourished. The best edition is that of Leyden, with notes, &c. 2 vols. 4to. 1726.

VALESIO, Francis, a Spanish physician, patronised by Philip II. of Spain. He published a treatise de Methodo Medendi, 1647—Controversiarum Medic. et Philos. Libri Decem, 1625, 4to. &c.

VALESIUS, an Arabian, who in the third century became the head of a new sect. He made himself an eunuch, and recommended the same operation to his followers, to avoid giving loose to those violent passions which, under a warm climate, and with a heated imagination, might tempt them to disobey the precepts of chastity, and endanger their salvation.

VALESIUS HENRICUS, or HENRY DE VA-LOIS, a native of Paris, who, after studying under the Jesuits at Verdun, and afterwards at Paris, and at Bourges, embraced, to please his father, the profession of the law. Literature, however, had greater charms for him, and he applied himself assiduously to the study of history, and antiquities. He published, at the request of the clergy of the diocese of Toulouse, the ancient ecclesiastical historians, for which he received the honourable reward of a pension from the liberality of his employers, and in 1670 he was appointed, by the king, historiographer of France, with a stipend, in consequence of his publication of Eusebius. His intense application at last proved fatal to his sight, but he relieved his increasing infirmities by marrying, at the age of 60, a young woman by whom he had seven children. He died 9th May, 1676, aged 73. Besides his Ecclesiastical Historians, published, Amsterdam, 1639, 3 vols. fol. and at Cambridge, 1720, he edited and improved with valuable notes, Ammianus Marcellinus, &c. He was a critic of vast erudition, profound learning, and solid judgment, but in his character peevish, suspicious, and vain. His brother Adrian distinguished himself also as a learned historian, and acute critic. He published Gesta Francorum from 254 to 752, 3 vols. fol. a work of great labour and merit. He published, besides, Notitia Galliarum, fol.—a second edition of Ammianus Marcellinus—a Panegyric on the king, &c. He was historiographer to the king with his brother, and also received a pension. He likewise married in his old age, and died July 2d, 1692, aged 85.

the island against the attacks of Solyman II. and an army of 80,000 men. After a siege of four months, and the loss of 20,000 men, the Turks retreated in dismay, and the Maltese raised anew, from its ruins, their demolished city, to which they gave the name of their heroic defender. This great patriot died 31st Aug. 1568.

VALETTE, John Lewis de Nogaret, duke d'Epemon, a French general. He was the friend and favourite of Henry III. whom he served with fidelity, and after his death, though for a while attached to the interests of the enemies of the new king, Henry IV. he was reconciled to him, and deserved his confidence. He was loaded with all the honours which the monarch could bestow, and he maintained the same influence in the court of Lewis XIII. in spite of the intrigues of Richelieu, and the jealousy of new favourites. His violent attack upon the person of the archbishop of Bourdeaux, whom he struck, exposed him to the severest censures of the church, but the interference of his friends, and his own submission, restored him to favour. He died at Loches, 13th Jan. 1642, aged 88. His brother Bernard shared his honours, and distinguished himself in the military service of his country. He was killed at the siege of Roquebrune, near Frejus, 1592.

VALGULIO, Charles, a native of Brescia, in Italy, who published, in 1507, a Latin translation of Plutarch's treatise on Music, 4to. He also translated some of the other moral works of Plutarch.

VALIN, René Joshua, a learned native of Rochelle, author of a Commentary on the Costume de la Rochelle, 3 vols. 4to.—L'Ordonnance de la Marine, 2 vols. 4to.—Traite des Prises, 2 vols. 8vo. This intelligent writer died 1765.

VALINCOUR, John Baptist Henry du Troussel de, a French writer, born in Picardy, 1653. He was secretary of Marine to admiral de Toulouse at the battle of Malaga, in which he was wounded, and he was appointed by Lewis XIV. his historian, in the room of Racine. He died at Paris, 5th Jan. 1730, aged 77, universally respected. He was author of a Letter to la Marquise de . . . 12mo.—the Life of Francis de Lorraine, duke of Guise—Critical Observations on the Œdipus of Sophocles, 4to. besides some translations from Horace's Odes.

VALKENBURGH, Theodore, a native of Amsterdam, eminent as a painter. He unfortunately lost all his property in a voyage to the West Indies, and died in indigent circumstances in Holland, 1721, aged 46. His dead game and fruit pieces are admired. There was also an artist of that name, whose fairs, public exhibitions, &c. were much esteemed. He died 1623.

VALLA, George, a native of Placentia, professor of medicine and belles lettres at Venice, died suddenly, 1460. He wrote de Expetendis et Fugiendis Rebus, 2 vols. fol. a curious work, now little read.

VALLA, Laurentius, a learned native of Placentia, born 1415. He possessed great powers as a critic, and his severest censures were directed against the barbarism in the Latin tongue, which the ignorance of the age still tolerated. Violent in his remarks, and contentious and contradicting in his character, he raised against himself a host of enemies, and without confining the bitterness of his reflections to subjects of literature, he ventured to attack the traditions of the church, and to declare that in his quiver he had arrows even against Christ himself. He was kindly patronised by Alphonsus, king of Naples, who at the age of 50 learned Latin of him; and when he was persecuted by the virulence of his enemies, for the boldness of his opinions, before the inquisition, and condemned to be burned alive, he was saved from the flames by the interference of his royal protector, and submitted only to a private correction in the convent of the Jacobines. He was invited from Naples to Rome by Nicholas V. who knew his literary merits, and who relieved his necessities by the honourable grant of a pension. He died at Rome, 1st Aug. 1465, aged 50, after teaching belles lettres and rhetoric with great reputation at Genoa, Pavia, Milan, Naples, and other cities of Italy. Though censured by Poggius and others, Valla has had among his defenders the impartial Erasmus, and if he cannot be exculpated from asperity of language, he yet possesses the merit of indefatigable zeal in the cause of science, of correct judgment, and acute discernment. The following epigram was written upon him by some of those who regarded him as superciliously nice in the choice of words:

Nunc postquam manes defunctus Valla pe-tivil,

*Non audeo Pluto verba Latina loqui;
Jupiter hunc cæli dignatus parte fuisset,
Censuram linguæ sed timet ille sua.*

His works are, Elegances of the Latin Language, a valuable work, printed Venice, 1471, folio, Paris, 1575, 4to. and Cambridge, 8vo.—Treatise against the False Donation of Constantine—History of the Reign of Ferdinand, king of Arragon, 4to.—translations of Thucydides, Herodotus, Homer's Illiad, &c. not of much value—Notes on the Greek Testament—Fables—Facetious Stories—a Treatise on Truth and Falsehood, &c. all printed together at Basil, 1540, in folio.

VALLE, Peter della, a native of Rome, who for twelve years, from 1614 to 1626, employed himself in visiting Turkey, Egypt, the Holy Land, Persia, India, and other Eastern countries, of which he published an interesting account in a series of 54 letters. He died at Rome, 1652, aged 66. The best edition of his voyages is that of Rome, 1662, in 4 vols. 4to. which was translated by Carneau.

VALLEE, Geofroi, a native of Orleans, known for the absurdities and the improprieties of his Beatitude des Chretiens, a work which drew upon him the severest punishments of the inquisition. He was burnt at Paris, 8th Feb. 1574.

VALLEE, Simon, a French engraver of merit. His Venus in her car from Troy—the Resurrection of Lazarus, by Raphael—Jesus bearing his cross, from Sacchi, are much admired. Lewis XIV. granted him a pension, but the artist, then lying on his death-bed, declined it, exclaiming, "it is too late," and expired.

VALLEMONT, Peter le Lorraine de, an ecclesiastic, who died at Pont-Audemer, his native town, 30th Dec. 1721, aged 72. He wrote Elements of History, 5 vols. 12mo. a work of merit—Curiosities of Nature and Art in the Vegetation of Plants, 2 vols. &c.

VALLIERE, Louise Francoise, duchesse de la, a French lady, born of an ancient family. She was one of the maids of honour to Henrietta of England, the wife of the duke of Orleans, and she became mistress to the voluptuous Lewis XIV. by whom she had a son and a daughter. When the charms of Madame de Montespan alienated the affections of her fickle lover, she retired from the distinctions of a court which she had enjoyed with great moderation, tempered with beneficence, to the solitude of a cloister, where, for 35 years, she atoned by acts of piety and devotion, for the guilt and the licentiousness of her youth. She died 6th June, 1710, aged 66.

VALLISNIERI, Anthony, an Italian naturalist, born at Tresilico, near Reggio. He studied under Malpighi, and was appointed by the Venetian republic professor of medicine at Padua, and, on account of his celebrity, was admitted member of the learned societies of Italy, and of the London Royal Society. He died 28th Jan. 1730, aged 69. He wrote in Italian, Dialogues on the Origin of various Insects, 8vo.—Experiments on the Worms of the Human Body—Histoire de la Generation de l'Homme et des Animaux, 4to.—de Corpi Marini che su Monti si Trovano, 4to.

VALOIS. Vid. VALESIIUS.

VALOIS, Yves de, a Jesuit, born at Bourdeaux, 2d Nov. 1694. He became professor of hydrography at Rochelle, and published various useful works. The time of his death is unknown.

VALSALVA, Anthony Marie, a physician, born at Imola. He studied under Malpighi, and taught anatomy with great reputation at Bologna. He died 1723, aged 57. His works are, Anatomical Dissertations in Latin, 2 vols. 4to. edited at Venice, 1740, by Morgagni—de Aure Humane, 4to. a valuable composition, the labour of sixteen years.

VALVERDA, John, a Spanish physician, the pupil of Realdus Columbus. It is said that he introduced the knowledge of anatomy from Italy into Spain, where he published the Tables of Vesalius, with Remarks, &c. in Spanish. Indefatigable more than ingenious, his labours were highly useful in propagating anatomy in Spain. He wrote a Treatise on Anatomy, published Venice, 1589—et de Animi et Corporis Sanitate Tuenda, 1553.

VANAKEN, Joseph, a native of Antwerp, eminent as a painter. His satins, velvets, lace, embroidery, &c. possessed peculiar beauty. He died 4th July, 1749, aged 50.—Another of that name, Arnold, excelled in the representation of small figures, and he published a set of prints of fishes, or the wonders of the deep.

VANBRUGH, sir John, a native of Cheshire, highly distinguished for his poetical talents, and his knowledge of architecture. He was for some time in the army, and in 1697, produced his first play, the Relapse, or Virtue in Danger, which was received with such applause, that the following year he again claimed the public approbation by his Provoked Wife. Soon after, his Æsop, a comedy abounding with satire and morality, appeared at Drury-lane, and in 1702, the False Friend. His character was now become so respectable, that he was knighted by queen Anne, and appointed Clarendon king at arms, and afterwards he held successively the offices of surveyor of the works at Greenwich hospital, of comptroller general of his majesty's works, and of surveyor of the gardens and waters. Nothing, however, could compensate the want of economy, and the poet, suffering under indigent circumstances, exerted the powers of his genius to amuse the town, and to retrieve his fortunes. He had undertaken the building of the new theatre in the Haymarket, but the plan did not succeed, though he rapidly produced for public representation, the Triumph of Love—the Confederacy—the Cuckold in Conceit—Squire Treeloby—and the Mistake. Sir John died of a quinsy, 26th March, 1726. Though ridiculed by Pope, sir John is yet acknowledged by the satirist to be a man of wit and of honour. The most remarkable monument of his architectural abilities is Blenheim house, which, though admired by some as a perfect whole, must be considered as a heavy pile, with scarce an apartment of magnitude sufficiently proportioned to the size of a splendid mansion, or adequate to the expectations formed at the sight of a noble edifice raised by national gratitude. The dramatic pieces of Vanbrugh, from their wit, ease, and vivacity, possess great merit; but they must be condemned for that licentiousness and immoral tendency, which, though palliated by the corrupt and indelicate taste of the times, are yet unbecoming a man of pure virtue, of refined sense, and of honourable principles.

VAN-CEULEN, Ludolph, a mathematician of Leyden, of great merit, in the 17th century. He published Fundamenta Geometriæ, translated by Snellius, 4to.—de Circulo et Adscriptis, 4to. 1619. The 36 ciphers by which he expressed the proportion of the circumference and the diameter of a circle, were, in honour of his laborious calculations, engraved on his tomb in St. Peter's church, Leyden.

VAN-CLEVE, Joseph, a sculptor of eminence, the pupil of Anguier. He embellished Marly, Versailles, Trianon, Paris, &c. with his beautiful groupes, and died at Paris, 1733, aged 89.

VANCOUVEUR, George, an English navigator. He was captain in the navy, and made a voyage in the North Pacific ocean, and round the globe in 1790-5, of which he published an interesting account in 4to. He died 1797.

VANDALE, Anthony, a Dutch physician, born 8th Nov. 1638. From his earliest years he showed great fondness for literature; but his parents engaged him in commercial pursuits, which at last he quitted, at the age of 30, to study medicine. He practised with great reputation at Haerlem, where he died universally respected, 28th Nov. 1708. He wrote Dissertations on the Heathen Oracles, best edited 1700, Amsterdam, and ably abridged and improved by la Fontenelle—a Treatise on the Origin and Progress of Idolatry, 4to.—Dissertations on Important Subjects, 4to.—Dissertatio super Aristeâ de LXX. Interpretibus, 4to.

VANDEN-ECKOUT, Gerbrandt, a painter of Amsterdam, the pupil of Rembrandt. His historical pieces, as well as his portraits, possess great merit. He died at Amsterdam, 1674, aged 53.

VANDEN-VELDE, Adrian, a painter of Amsterdam. His animals, landscapes, &c. were represented with taste, ease, and delicacy. He died 1672, aged 33.

VANDEN-VELDE, Isaiah, a Flemish painter, whose battles and attacks of robbers are highly admired. He resided at Haerlem, and afterwards at Leyden, and died about 1640. His brothers, John and William, were also eminent artists. The former excelled as an engraver, and the latter was particularly commended for his representation of sea views and sea fights, for which he was patronised by Charles I. He died in London, 1693. The son of William, also called William, possessed the genius and supported the reputation of his family. He was patronised by Charles II. and his brother. His water pieces are finished in the highest characters of grace, correctness, and nature.

VANDER-DOES, Jacob, a Dutch painter, who died at the Hague, 1673, aged 50. His animals and landscapes were highly finished, and as his temper was of a gloomy cast, he infused the melancholy feelings of his mind into his pieces with peculiar effect.

VANDER-HEYDEN, John, a painter, born at Gorcum. He chiefly excelled in the representation of ruins, temples, distant towers, &c. He was correct in the most minute circumstances, and in an open Bible, only four inches high, which was introduced in one of his pieces, the characters of the whole page were perfectly legible. He died at Amsterdam, 1712, aged 75.

VANDER-KABEL, Adrian, a painter and engraver, born at Ryswick, near the Hague. He excelled in sea views and in landscapes, but his colouring was bad. He was in his conduct fond of low company, and as his resources were narrow, he, in one instance, like another Morland, painted a sign to pay his host's reckoning. He died at Lyons, 1695, aged 64.

VANDER-LINDEN, John Antonides, professor of Medicine at Leyden, was descended from an ancient and respectable family. His grandfather Henry, who was master of the learned languages, and who, in the Spanish massacre at Naerden, lost several of his relations, was minister at Enckhuysen, and afterwards divinity professor at Franeker, where he died 1614, aged 68. His son Anthony was rector of Enckhuysen college, and afterwards practised physic at Amsterdam, where he died 1633, leaving Antonides. Antonides, who was born at Enckhuysen, 13th Jan. 1609, studied at Leyden and Franeker, and finished his medical studies at Amsterdam under his father. His abilities were such that for 12 years he filled the professorial chair of medicine at Franeker, with universal approbation, and next removed, 1651, to Leyden, where his reputation and success followed him. He died at Leyden, 4th March, 1664. He was distinguished not only as a professor, but as a writer. His works are, de Scriptis Medicis, 8vo.—Selecta Medica, 4to.—editions of Hippocrates, Celsus, and Spigelius.

VANDER-MEER, John, a painter of Haerlem, who resided in Italy, and perished in a short excursion on the sea-coast, 1690, aged 62. He was the pupil of Nicholas Berghem, and chiefly excelled in his sea views and landscapes. His brother was also an eminent artist. His representations of animals, especially the wool of his sheep, possessed peculiar grace and spirit.

VANDER-MERSCH, general of the insurgents of Brabant, in 1789, against the imperial forces, distinguished himself by his valour and prudence. When insulted and betrayed by his countrymen, he retired to Brussels, and was imprisoned by his enemies in the citadel of Antwerp. He was afterwards restored to liberty, and died at Antwerp, 14th Sept. 1792.

VANDER-MEULEN, Anthony Francis, a painter of Brussels, the pupil of Peter Sneyers. His pieces exhibit all the graces, the spirit, and delicacy of the most admired performances of Teniers. The subjects are chiefly hunting parties, sieges, battles, &c. He attended Lewis XIV. in his military expeditions, and gave an accurate representation of the towns which he besieged, and the actions which he fought. He married the niece of le Brun, and Lewis XIV. became sponsor to one of his children. He died at Paris, 1690, aged 56. His brother Peter was distinguished as a sculptor. He was in England in 1670.

VANDER-MONDE, Charles Augustin, a physician, born at Macao in China, of European parents. He became censor royal of the university of Bologna, and died at Paris, 1762, aged 35. He published a Collection of Observations on Medicine, and Surgery, 12mo. which were the Origin of the Journal of Medicine—Essay on the Perfecting of the Human Species, 2 vols. 12mo.—Pocket Dictionary of Health, 2 vols. 12mo. &c.

VANDER-MONDE, N. a French mathematician, born at Paris. He studied under Fontaine, and was member of the national institute, and died at Paris, 1st Jan. 1796, aged 61. He contributed much to the memoirs of the academy of sciences, in his observations on equations, on music, &c.

VANDER-NEER, Eglon, a native of Amsterdam, eminent as a painter. Like his father, who was also a good artist, he chiefly excelled in his representations of nature, and his views by moonlight possessed peculiar merit. He died at Dusseldorf, 1697, aged 53.

VANDER-SPIEGEL, a Dutch statesman of great eminence, whose services from 1785 to 1795, tended much to establish order and regularity, and to repress the schemes of political innovators. He left Holland in consequence of the persecution of his enemies, and died an exile at Lingen, in Westphalia, 1800.

VANDER-ULFT, James, a painter of Gorum, born 1627. As he painted only for his amusement, his pieces are few, but they possess great merit. He became burgo-master of his native town.

VANDER-VELDE. Vid. VANDEN-VELDE.

VANDYCK, Anthony, a celebrated painter, born at Antwerp, 1599. He was the pupil of Rubens, and afterwards travelled into Italy, where he studied the beauties of the Venetian school. On his return to Flanders, the reputation of his historical pieces procured him honourable invitations from Richelieu and the court of France; but he preferred the patronage of Charles I. and came to England. The monarch, pleased with his merits, knighted him, and allowed him a pension, and the painter, flattered by the favours of the court, and grown rich by the exertion of his pencil, married the beautiful daughter of earl Gowry, and supported the dignity of her rank by the ostentatious display of a magnificent equipage, numerous servants, and a splendid table. He died in 1641, aged 42, and was buried in St. Paul's church, where his monument, on which was inscribed an epitaph by Cowley, perished at the dreadful conflagration of 1666. The most celebrated of his pictures is a Descent from the Cross, preserved in the great church of Antwerp. His pieces in England are numerous, but chiefly portraits, and from them he derived a more rapid and substantial remuneration than from the exertion of his powers on historical subjects. Of all the pupils of Rubens, he, according to Fresnoy, best comprehended the rules and general maxims of his master. He even excelled him in the delicacy of his colouring, and in his cabinet pieces, though his gusto in the designing part was not superior to that of Rubens. His pictures preserve in high perfection the dress and the costume of the times. After his death his widow married a Mr. Price.

VANDYCK, Peter, a Dutch painter. His portraits of the Stadtholder and his family are much admired, and he also excelled in his history and conversation pieces. He was born at Amsterdam, and died at the Hague 1758, aged 78.

VANE, sir Henry, eldest son of sir Henry, the secretary of state to Charles I. was born 1612. From Westminster school he removed to Magdalen hall, Oxford, and afterwards visited Geneva. He displayed on his return sentiments so hostile to the church, that to avoid his father's displeasure he went to New-England, 1635, but came back to Europe two years after. He soon after married, and by his father's interest obtained the place of treasurer of the navy with sir William Russel; but a quarrel with the earl of Strafford, who had assumed, in a new created title, the name of their family seat, engaged the father and the son in measures of opposition to the government. Eager to ruin his political enemy, Vane united with Pym and the more violent members of the commons, and during the civil wars he ably promoted the views of the republicans, and assisted at the conferences with the king at Uxbridge and in the Isle of Wight. Though he disapproved of the violence offered to the king's person, he accepted afterwards of a seat at the council board; but his opposition to Cromwell's usurpation was so determined that he was sent a prisoner to Carisbrook castle. At the restoration, though both houses voted for an act of indemnity in his favour, his conduct to Strafford, and the perseverance with which he had supported the republican cause, were not forgotten, and therefore he was arraigned and condemned on pretence of having compassed the late king's death. He was beheaded on Tower-hill, 14th June, 1662, and suffered with great firmness and resignation. He is represented by Clarendon as a man of deep dissimulation, of quick conception, and great understanding; but Burnet speaks of him as a fearful man, whose head was darkened in his notions of religion. From his fanatical mode of preaching he and his adherents were called Seekers, and in his writings, which were on moral and theological subjects, he clothed his thoughts in such affected language that his meaning was totally unintelligible. His only son Christopher was created baron Barnard by king William, and he is the ancestor of the present Darlington family.

VAN-EFFEN, Just, a native of Utrecht, known as the translator of Robinson Crusoe, 2 vols. 12mo.—of the Modern Mentor, 3 vols. 12mo.—of Swift's Tale of a Tub, &c. died 18th Sept. 1735.

VAN-EVERDINGEN, Albert, a painter and engraver, born at Alkmaer. His landscapes and water-falls possessed peculiar beauty, and especially his agitated seas. He died 1675, aged 54. His brothers John and Cæsar, who both died 1679, were also eminent artists, whose works are preserved chiefly in their native city.

VAN-HUYSUM, John, a painter, born at Amsterdam, 1662. He studied under his father, but instead of seeking reputation in the various branches of his profession, he applied all the powers of his genius in the delineation of flowers, fruit, and landscapes. He was so successful, that in the representation of the down and bloom of fruit, and the varied tints of flowers, no painter ever possessed greater delicacy, more exactness, or more taste in tracing the beauties of nature through all her various refinements. His pieces were so much admired that he sold them for a very high price, and at last only princes and nobles could afford to become purchasers. The violent temper of his wife, and the ill conduct of his son, ruffled his spirits in the last part of life, and produced habits of intemperance and of melancholy, from which he was seldom able to recover. He died at Amsterdam, 1719, aged 57. His brothers were also good artists. Juste excelled in the representation of battles, and died at the age of 22, and James, who was an able copyist, died in London.

VANIERE, James, a Jesuit, born at Causes in the diocess of Beziers, 9th March, 1664. He studied under Joubert, and soon after being admitted among the Jesuits, he displayed great poetical powers. The best known of his poems is his Prædium Rusticum, in 16 cantos, a work in imitation of Virgil's Georgics, though not always interesting and free from tedious descriptions. The best edition is that of Paris, 1756, 12mo. He wrote besides, eulogues, epistles, epigrams, hymns, &c. and a Poetical Dictionary, in Latin, in 4to. He died at Toulouse, 22d Aug. 1739, aged 76. His nephew, who died at Paris, 1768, was author of a Cours de Latinité, 2 vols. Svo. and also translated some of Horace's odes.

VANINI, Lucilio, a well-known atheist, born at Taurozano in Otranto 1585. After studying at Rome, Naples, and Padua, and taking the degree of doctor in civil law, he entered into orders, but soon disregarded divinity for the writings of Aristotle, Averroes, Cardan, and Pomponatius. In the pages of these philosophers it is supposed, that he drew his principles of atheism, which he laboured so earnestly to disseminate through Europe. After visiting part of Germany and the Low Countries he came to Geneva, and afterwards passed into England, from which he returned to Italy and next to France, where he propagated his opinions sometimes openly, and sometimes under the imposing garb of the friend of truth and religion. Though for a while patronised by Bassompierre he preferred the freedom of a wandering life, and quitting Paris he gained some celebrity as a professor of physic, philosophy, and divinity, at Toulouse. The impious tenets, however, which he instilled into the minds of his pupils, soon drew upon him the public indignation, and he was tried before the parliament and condemned to be burnt as an irreligious and immoral atheist. The sentence was executed 19th Feb. 1619. His works are Amphitheatrum Æternæ Providentiæ, Svo. 1615—de Admirandis Naturæ, Reginæ, Dæque Mortalium Arcanis, 8vo. 1616, works which abound with impiety and profaneness—a treatise of Astronomy in MS. The best account of his life is by Durand, 12mo. Rotterdam, 1727.

VAN-KEULEN, John, a Dutchman, who edited the Flambeau de la Mer, 5 vols. fol. Amsterdam, 1687, with a supplement in 1699 in folio, with 160 maps.

VANLOO, John Baptist, a famous painter, born at Aix. He was honoured with the patronage of some of the princes of Europe, but he preferred a settlement at Paris, where his pencil was successfully employed on portraits and on historical pieces, which are preserved in the churches and the palaces of France, &c. He died at Aix 1745, aged 61. His sons Lewis Michael, and Charles Amadeus Philip, were also good artists; the former was a painter to the king of Spain, and the latter to the king of Prussia.

VANLOO, Charles Andrew, brother and pupil of the preceding, was born at Nice 1705. After visiting Italy, and studying under Lutti, and le Gros, he settled at Paris, and became painter to the king, and professor in the academy of painting. He was also made knight of St. Michael. The best of his pieces are a lame man healed by St. Peter, Jesus washing his disciples' feet, the graces, the sacrifice of Iphigenia, &c. He died 15th Feb. 1765, aged 61. His life was written by d'Andre Bardon.

VAN-MENDER, Charles, a native of Courtray, eminent as a landscape and historical painter. He died 1606, aged 58. His best pieces are Adam and Eve in Paradise, and the deluge.

VANNI, Francis, a painter born at Siena. He studied the manner of F. Barroche, and of Corregio, and chiefly excelled in devotional subjects. He was also an able architect and good mechanic. He died at Rome 1609, aged 46.

VANNIUS, Valentin, a native of Swabia, who warmly espoused and defended the tenets of the Lutherans in his Judicium de Missâ, published at Tubingen 1557, and Missæ Historia Integra 1563, 4to.

VAN-OBSTAL, Gerard, a sculptor of celebrity, born at Antwerp. He died rector of the royal academy of painting and sculpture at Paris 1668, aged 73.

VAN-OORT, Adam, a Dutch painter. His landscapes and historical pieces were admired. He died in his native town of Antwerp, 1641, aged 84.

VAN-ORLAY, Bernard, a painter, the pupil of Raphael. He was patronised by Charles V. and died at Brussels, 1550.

VAN-OSTADE, Adrian, a native of Lubeck, eminent as a painter. His taverns, stables, &c. possessed great merit. He died at Amsterdam, 1689, aged 75. His brother Isaac, was also an artist, but of inferior merit.

VANSOMER, Paul, a native of Antwerp, known as a painter. He was for some time resident in England, where his abilities were patronised by the nobility. He died 1621, aged 45.

VAN-SWIETEN, Gerard, a celebrated physician, born at Leyden, 7th May, 1700. After finishing his education under the great Boerhaave, he left his native country, and declining the liberal offers of patronage in England, settled at Vienna, where he became first physician to the empress Maria Theresa. To an extensive practice he joined the labours of a public professor, and it may truly be said that to his indefatigable zeal and to his enlightened mind, medicine is indebted for its present flourishing state in the capital of Germany. The most celebrated practitioners of Vienna regard him still as the cause of their eminence, and his experiments and his successful mode of treating diseases laid the foundation of that superiority which his school has so justly acquired over the other medical institutions of the continent. Though branded with the appellation of the tyrant of the mind, and the assassin of the body, by those extravagant philosophers of France, whose works he censured with merited severity, it is universally admitted that to encourage merit, and to patronise rising talents, he employed with alacrity the powerful influence which he possessed at the court of the empress. This truly great and virtuous character died 18th June, 1772, leaving two sons. His chief work is Commentaries on Boerhaave's Aphorisms de Cognoscendis et Curandis Morbis, 5 vols. 4to. Paris, 1771-3, which has been translated separately, into French, and also into English.

VAN-TULDEN, Theodore, a painter and engraver, born 1620, at Bois le Duc, and the pupil of Rubens. He chiefly excelled in the representation of fairs, markets, and village sports.

VAN-ÛDEN, Lucas, a native of Antwerp, eminent as a painter. His landscapes are particularly worthy of admiration, as his trees, his figures, and other objects are represented with all the delicacy and correctness of nature. He died 1660, aged 65.

VARCHI, Benedict, a native of Fiesole, who became professor of morality at Padua. He preferred the patronage of Cosmo de Medicis to the honourable invitations of Paul III. and showed himself so correct and elegant a speaker of his native tongue that the Florentines said if Jupiter wished to talk Italian, he would speak the language of Varchi. Though admired and publicly applauded, he was not without enemies who censured him, perhaps with justice, for obstinacy of opinion, and for debauchery of morals. He died at Florence 18th Dec. 1666, aged 63. He wrote a history of the Principal Events of his time in Florence and Italy, published Cologne 1721. He wrote besides some poetical pieces called Capitoli, 2 vols. 8vo. ofensive for their indelicacy—sonnets, 2 vols. 8vb.

Lewis XIV. As he was well acquainted with the debaucheries of his master, he had the imprudence to reveal them to the queen in a letter supposed to come from her mother the queen of Spain, but after procuring the disgrace of the duke of Noailles by fixing the suspicion of this perfidious conduct upon him, he was at last discovered and sent to ignominious exile. He was afterwards pardoned and died at Paris 1688.

VARENIUS, Augustus, a native of Lunenburg, well known for his deep acquaintance with Hebrew, and his extensive learning as a Lutheran divine. It is said that he could repeat the Hebrew Bible by heart, and that he was so conversant with that language that he spoke it with greater fluency than his own. He wrote, among other things, a Commentary on Isaiah, 4to. and died 1684, aged 64.

VARENIUS, Bernard, a Dutch physician, author of a Description of Japan and Siam, 8vo.—and of Geographia Universalis, 8vo. translated into English with notes by sir Isaac Newton, 1672, and from the English translated into French by Puisieux, 4 vols. 12mo.

VARENNE DE FENILLE, P. C. a native of Brescia. He was an intelligent agriculturist, and published observations on the causes why fishes die in pools, memoirs on forests, &c. 2 vols. 12mo. He was guillotined at Lyons in consequence of false accusations before sanguinary judges in 1794.

VARGAS, Alphonso, a native of Toledo, who died archbishop of Seville 1366. He was author of commentaries on the first book of the Master of Sentences, fol.

VARGAS, Francis, a Spanish lawyer, employed by Charles V. and Philip II. in various embassies. He protested in his master's name against the transferring of the council of Trent to Bologna, and after being ambassador at Rome he became counsellor of state in Spain, and some time after retired, disgusted with the world, to the monastery of Cissos, where he died about 1560. He wrote on the jurisdiction of the pope and of bishops, a work which gave offence at Rome—and memoirs of the council of Trent.

VARGAS, Lewis de, a painter born at Seville. He studied for some years at Rome, and in the Italian schools, and acquired great celebrity among his countrymen. The best known of his pieces are, a Jesus bearing his Cross, and Adam and Eve, still preserved at Seville. Some of his portraits also possessed superior excellence. He died at Seville 1590, aged 62.

VARIGNON, Peter, a native of Caen, known as an architect and mathematician. He was member of the academy of inscriptions at Paris, and of that of Berlin, and professor of mathematics in the college of Mazarine. This able writer, equally admired for his virtues and his modesty, died suddenly at Paris 22d Dec. 1722, aged 68. He wrote Nouvelle Mécanique, 2 vols. 4to.—Conjectures on Gravity—Elements of Mathematics, 4to.—Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences, &c.

VARILLAS, Anthony, a native of Gueret, who was patronised by Gaston duke of Orleans, and appointed one of the librarians to the king 1655. He wrote a history of France from the birth of Lewis XI. to the death of Henry III. 15 vols. 4to.—History of the Revolutions in Religion through Europe, 6 vols. 4to.—la Politique de Ferdinand the Catholic, 4to.—la Politique de la Maison d'Autriche, 4to.—Anecdotes of Florence, 12mo. and other works which betray great partiality, ignorance, and inaccuracy. He died 9th June, 1696, aged 72.

VARIUS, a Latin poet the friend of Horace. He was one of those to whom Augustus intrusted the revision of Virgil's Æneid. Some fragments of his poetry remain.

VARNUM, James Mitchell, was appointed a brigadier general in the American revolutionary army in February, 1777, and resigned in 1779. In 1786 he was elected a delegate to congress from Rhode-Island. He resided at East Greenwich. In October, 1787, he was appointed one of the judges of the territory northwest of the Ohio, and died at Marietta, January 10th, 1789.

VARRO, Marcus Terentius, a celebrated Roman writer, the friend of Pompey and of Cicero. His treatise de Re Rusticâ is extant. He died B.C. 29.

VARRO, a poet of Gaul, who wrote a poem on the war of the Sequani, and translated into Latin verses the Argonautics of Apollonius Rhodius.

VASARI, George, a native of Arezzo, known as a painter and an architect. He studied under del Sarto and Michael Angelo, but though he paid much attention to the noblest monuments of antiquity, he was deficient in the colouring of his pieces, though his knowledge of architecture was respectable. He was patronised by the Medicis, and published some useful works. His memory was so retentive that at the age of nine he could repeat the whole of the Æneid. He wrote the lives of the most illustrious painters, sculptors, and architects, 3 vols. 4to. 1568, published at Rome 1755. He died at Florence 1574, aged 62. His nephew George published a treatise on painting in 4to. Florence, 1619.

VASCONCELLOS, Michael, a Portuguese statesman, devoted to the interests of the court of Spain. When a conspiracy was formed by the nobles to place the duke of Braganza, on the throne of Portugal, this minister, who possessed great talents, but a character cruel and ferocious, was the first sacrificed to the safety and the liberty of the state, and his body was thrown into the street with exultation by his murderers, 1st Dec. 1640.

VASCOSAN, Michael de, a native of Amiens, eminent as a printer at Paris, where he married one of the daughters of Badius. Among the most valuable of his editions are Plutarch's lives and moral works translated by Amyot, 13 vols. Svo.—Cicero's Works—Diodorus Siculus—Quintilian, &c. He died 1576.

VASSELIER, Joseph, a native of Alsace, who became member of the academy of sciences at Lyons, and administrator of the post, and died there 1800. He is known in France for his poetical pieces, which were published 3 vols. 12mo. but do not always possess delicacy of sentiment, or language friendly to virtue.

VASSOR, Michael le, a native of Orleans, who quitted the congregation of the oratory and retired to England, where he embraced the protestant tenets and received a pension from the prince of Orange. He was patronised by the duke of Portland and by bishop Burnet, and died 1718, aged 71. He published an history of Lewis XIII. 20 vols. 12mo. 1710-21 and 7 vols. 4to. 1756.—Treatise on Religion, &c.

VATABLUS, Francis, a native of Gammaeh in Picardy, made Hebrew professor of the royal college by Francis I. The observations which he made in his lectures on the Scriptures were ingenious and learned, and they were presented to the public from the notes of Robert Stephens, and though censured by the divines of Paris they were applauded by the university of Salamanca. The most correct edition of these valuable commentaries is that of 1729, in 2 vols. fol. Vatablus translated also some parts of Aristotle into Latin, and he encouraged Marot in the completion of his version of David's psalms. He died 1547.

VATTEL, N. a native of Neufchatel in Switzerland, author of some valuable treatises on metaphysics and jurisprudence. The best known of his works is the Right of Nations, or the Principles of the Natural Law applied to the conduct of nations and of sovereigns, 1758, 2 vols. 4to. From this composition, which abounds with singular ideas of modern philosophy, and treats religion as merely a political system, the author has derived great celebrity, and ranks with Grotius and Puffendorff, among the most intelligent writers on subjects of legislation, and of general policy. It is said that in consequence of the popularity of his work he applied in 1765 to the Austrian government to introduce a reformation in the public administration of affairs at Brussels, but his solicitations were received not only with indifference but jealousy by Maria Theresa. He died about 1770.

VAVASSEUR, Francis, a Jesuit, born at Paray in the diocese of Autun 1605. After teaching rhetoric and belles lettres for seven years, he came to Paris, where during 36 years he read lectures on the Holy Scriptures, and cultivated poetry and classical literature. He died at Paris 14th Dec. 1681. He wrote de Ludicra Dictione, 1658, a work of great merit, in which, with fine criticism and deep and learned research, he asserted that the Greeks and Romans knew nothing of the burlesque style—de Epigrammate, 1669, a work opposed and censured by Rapin, another Jesuit, who declared that an epigram is the most insipid of all poetry except it be admirable, and that the composition is so rare, that to make an excellent one is sufficient for the whole of a man's life. He published besides, Job, a heroic poem—the miracles of Jesus Christ, a poem—Elegies—Epic poetry—3 books of Epigrams—a Commentary on Job, &c.

VAUBAN, Sebastian le Prestre, Seigneur de, a celebrated French engineer. He was born 1st May, 1633, and early entered into the Spanish army, under Condé. He was taken prisoner by the French, and prevailed upon by the interest of Mazarine to enter into the service of the French king, and he soon distinguished himself at the sieges of St. Menchould, Stenai, Landrecies, Valenciennes, Montmedi, &c. His abilities were seen and acknowledged by the government, and his superior knowledge of fortifications, and of the defence of towns, was employed in raising impregnable ramparts around the French monarchy. He was honourably appointed governor of Lisle, which he had strongly fortified, and his genius next planned citadels for the defence of Verceil, Verue, Turin, &c. In the wars of 1672, and of 1683, he contributed much to the glory of the French arms and the victories of Lewis XIV. by the manner in which he conducted the sieges of the towns of Flanders; and for his many and eminent services, he was rewarded with the rank of marshal of France. This illustrious character, who had during his laborious and useful life been engaged in 140 actions, had conducted 53 sieges, had assisted in repairing the fortifications of 300 ancient citadels, and had erected 33 new ones, died 30th March, 1707, aged 74. Immortalized as an engineer, he was remarkable for his attachment to his country, and for his heroism in danger, and in the midst of victory he displayed the man of benevolence and humanity. From the suggestions of an active mind, always eager to add to his knowledge and to increase his resources of information, he had collected 12 large MS. volumes of observations, thoughts, &c.

which he called his Oisivetés. His works are a treatise on Fortification, or the French Engineer, 8vo.—new treatise on the Attack and Defence of Places, 8vo.—Essays on Fortification, 12mo.—Project of a Royal Tithe for abolishing the Established Taxes, and by other means increasing the Public Revenue, 4to.—Political Testament of M. Vauban, 12mo.—He was member of the academy of sciences at Paris, and his eulogy was pronounced by Fontenelle. He left only two daughters who were both married.

VAUCANSON, James de, a native of Grenoble, celebrated in France for his knowledge of mechanics. He constructed with wonderful ingenuity various automata, and improved and simplified the machinery of silk-mills, and advanced the interests of commerce and of science by many other curious and useful inventions. He declined the honourable offers of a settlement and a pension from Frederic king of Prussia, 1740, and died at Paris, 21st Nov. 1782, aged 73.

VAUDREUIL, Marquis de, governor of Canada, was appointed to the government of Montreal in 1689, and, in 1703, to that of the whole province of Canada, which he retained till his death, October 10th, 1725. He was distinguished for bravery, firmness, and vigilance, and gave the English colonies incredible trouble by the long war he maintained against them, by exciting the savages to perpetual inroads on their frontier.

VAUGELAS, Claude Favre lord de, a native of Bourg in Bresse. He was member of the French academy, and was engaged in the completion of their famous dictionary. In his style he was unusually elegant and accurate, and his translation of Quintus Curtius, 4to. in which he was employed for 30 years, was regarded in his time as the most correct composition in the French language, so that Balzac, a judge of literary merit, said that the Alexander of Curtius was invincible, and that of Vaugelas inimitable. He wrote besides Remarks on the French language, afterwards enriched with the notes of T. Corneille, 3 vols. 12mo. He died 1650, aged 65, in indigent circumstances, though he had received a pension from the king; but his attachment to the fortune of Gaston duke of Orleans, to whom he was chamberlain and companion, embarrassed and ruined his affairs.

VAUGHAN, sir John, an English lawyer, author of "reports," published by his son Edward. After the restoration, Clarendon offered him his patronage, but he refused it, and soon after joined his enemies, and was raised to the office of chief justice of the common pleas. Though a man of abilities, he was haughty and overbearing, and more admired for his talents, than beloved for his courteous manners. He died 1674, and was buried in the Temple church, near the remains of his friend Selden.

VAUGHAN, George, lieutenant-governor of New-Hampshire, who succeeded Usher in 1715, was the son of major William Vaughan, a wealthy merchant of Portsmouth, who was many years a member of the council, and was distinguished for his public spirit, and the firmness with which he resisted the claims of the proprietors of New-Hampshire. George was graduated at Harvard college in 1696, and was agent for the province in England before his appointment as lieutenant-governor. Having offended the governor and disgusted the council and assembly by his imprudence, he was displaced in 1717, and succeeded by Wentworth. He died in 1724. A son of the governor was a brave and enterprising officer in the expedition against Cape Breton, and died in England, whither he went to seek a reward for his services.

VAUMORIÈRE, Peter Dortigue Sieur de, a French writer born at Apt, in Provence. He was an intelligent writer, pleasing in his conversation, and beloved by his friends. He died 1693. He wrote, l'Art de Plaire dans la Conversation, 12mo.—Lettres, &c. 2 vols. 12mo.—le Grand Scipion, 4 vols. 8vo.—Diane de France, 12mo.—Adelaide, and other romances, &c.

VAUVENARGUES, Luke Chapier de, a French writer of Provence, who died 1747, aged 35. He lost, in his youth, his eyesight by the smallpox, and supported the rest of his life, in the most Christian resignation, in the midst of his friends and family. His introduction to the knowledge of the Human Mind, with reflections, and maxims, 12mo. possesses merit. This and others of his works, were republished by Fortia, in 2 vols. 12mo. 1797.

VAUVILLIERS, John Francis, professor of Greek, for 20 years, in the royal college of France, struggled through the storms of the revolution, and at last when proscribed fled from the country. In his voluntary exile, he was invited by Paul I. to Russia, but the climate of Petersburg proved too rigorous for his delicate constitution, and he died there 23d July, 1800, aged 64. He published Essay on Pindar, 12mo.—Letters on Horace, 12mo.—Examen Historique of the Spartan government—notes to Brotier's Plutarch, &c.

VAUX, Nicholas lord, son of sir William Vaux of Harrowden, Northamptonshire, after finishing his university education, distinguished himself at the battle of Stoke, near Newark, 1487, and was knighted on the occasion. He continued such a favourite at the court of Henry VIII. that he attended his master in his interview with Francis I. and was afterwards raised to the rank of baron. He wrote poems called the Paradise of Dainty Devices, and died in Northamptonshire, 1522.

VAUX, Noel Jordan de, a French general descended from a noble family in Gevaudan. He early embraced the military profession, and distinguished himself by his valour and discipline in the wars of Italy. He was at the battles of Parma and Gueftalla, of Fontenoy and Rocroux, and at the sieges of Prague, Oudenarde, and Bergen-op-Zoom, at which last place he was wounded by the bursting of a shell. In 1769 he was made governor of Corsica, and completed the conquest of the island; but in his administration, he was charged with cruelty and oppression, though the French defended his conduct as just and politic. He was in consequence of his many services raised to the dignity of marshal of France, 1783, and in 1788 he was sent to Dauphiné to quell the troubles of that province. He died the same year, 14th Sept. at Grenoble, aged 83. He had been present at 19 sieges and 14 battles. He left 2 daughters.

VECELLI, Francis, a native of Cadore, the brother of Titian, and also himself an able artist. His brother, who saw the genius with which he executed his pieces, dreading in him a powerful rival, persuaded him to apply himself to commercial pursuits. His nephew Horace, the son of Titian, was also an eminent artist, some of whose pieces are attributed to the pencil of his father. He died young, of the plague, 1576.

VEENINX, John Baptist, a native of Amsterdam, distinguished as a painter. He was the pupil of Abraham Bloemaert, and he painted, with great spirit and success, historical pieces, landscapes, flowers, animals, portraits, &c. He died near Utrecht, 1660, aged 39.

VEGA, Lopez Felix de, a Spanish poet, born of a noble family at Madrid, 25th Nov. 1562. From an humble office in the bishop of Avila's household, he entered at the university of Alcalá, and afterwards became secretary to the duke of Alva. He embarked in the celebrated Armada of Philip II. to invade England, but escaped the dangers of the sea, and of war, though his brother perished in the expedition. He next was in the service of the count of Lemos, and though unfortunate in the levities, and the immoral conduct of his first wife, he took another, whose early death so deeply affected him, that he quitted the world. When admitted into orders, Urban VII. in reward of his great poetical celebrity, bestowed on him the degree of D.D. the cross of the order of Malta, and a lucrative office in the apostolic exchequer. He died 27th Aug. 1635, aged 72. His compositions are very numerous, and form upwards of seventy volumes of prose and lyric pieces. His muse was so prolific, that he often wrote a play in the course of one day, and some of his comedies even in the short space of five hours, and in a style correct, elegant, and animated. His dramatic pieces were so popular and successful, that he acquired by them above 150,000 ducats. His poetical pieces are said to amount to the number of 1800.

VEGETIUS, Flavius Renatus, a Latin writer, author of Military Institutions, which give a satisfactory account of the Roman tactics. He wrote also a treatise on the Veterinary Art, preserved in the Rei Rusticæ Scriptores, 2 vols. 4to. Leipsic. His institutions, which are written in very elegant Latin, are best edited at Paris, 2 vols. 4to. 1783, with Turpin's Commentaries. They have been translated into French by Bourdon. He flourished in the fourth century, and in Valentinian's reign.

VEIL, Charles Marie de, son of a Jew at Metz, was converted to Christianity by Bossuet, and entered among the Augustines, and became canon of St. Genevieve. After giving public lectures on theology at Angers, and in other universities, he came to England, 1679, where he abjured the catholic faith, and after marrying the daughter of an anabaptist, became a preacher of that persuasion. He wrote, Commentaries on Matthew and Mark, 4to.—on the Acts of the Apostles, 8vo.—on Joel, 12mo.—on the Song of Solomon, and the Minor Prophets. He died about the end of the century. His brother Lewis was also a protestant, and became known as the author of Catechismus Judæorum in Disputatione et Dialogo Magistræ et Discipuli, a R. A. Jagel Monte Silicis Oriundo, Hebrew and Latin, 1679, and other works.

VELASQUEZ, Don Diego de Sylva, a Spanish painter, the pupil of Herrera and Pacheco. He was born at Seville, and died at Madrid, 1660, aged 66. His abilities were noticed by Philip IV. who appointed him his first painter, knighted him, and bestowed on him a liberal pension, and on his death, honoured his remains with the most magnificent obsequies in the church of St. John at Madrid. His pieces are preserved in the churches and palaces of Spain, and one of the most celebrated is the representation of a man returning from a well, with bare breast, and giving water to drink to a little boy.

VELLEIUS PATERCULUS, a Roman historian, in the age of Tiberius. He was author of an elegant epitome of Grecian and Roman history, part of which only is extant. As he was the friend of Sejanus, it is supposed that he shared the disgrace and the misfortunes of that guilty favourite.

VELLUTELLO, Alexander, a native of Lucca, author of some commentaries on the works of Dante and of Petrarch. The best edition of these works, which were once much esteemed in Italy, is 1545, in 4to. He died at the end of the 16th century.

VELLY, Paul Francis, a Jesuit, born near Nismes, in Champagne. He wrote a History of France, of which he completed only 8 vols. in a plain but correct style, with every mark of candour and accuracy. He died 4th Sept. 1759, aged 48.

VELSERUS, Mark, a native of Augsburg, distinguished as a civilian, and author of Rerum Augusto-Vindelicarum, Libri octo. fol.—Rerum, Boicarum, Libri quinque, 4to. He died 13th June, 1614, aged 56.

VELTHEIM, A. F. count, a native of Brunswick, appointed in consequence of his knowledge of mineralogy, superintendent of the mines of Hartz, and made a count by the king of Prussia, and doctor of laws in the university of Helmstadt. He wrote dissertations on the Formation of Basaltes—on the vases of the Ancients—on Memnon's Statue—on the Barberini Vase—on making Glass, and other valuable works. This ingenious man died 1801.

VELTHUSEN, Lambert, a native of Utrecht, who studied medicine and philosophy, and was an able defender of the opinions of Des Cartes against Voet. He died in retirement 1685, aged 63. His works, consisting of theological, philosophical, and medical pieces have been collected in 2 vols. 4to.

VENCE, Henry Francis de, a French ecclesiastic, author of some Dissertations and Analyses of the Old Testament, much and deservedly commended by Calmet. This pious author was preceptor to the children of the duke of Lorraine, and died at Nancy, 1st Nov. 1749.

VENDOME, Cæsar, duke de, son of Henry IV. and Gabrielle d'Estrées, was made governor of Bretagne by his father, whose courage and virtues he inherited. He died 1665, leaving two sons and a daughter. His grandson Louis Joseph, also duke of Vendome, who was born 1st July, 1654, was distinguished as an able warrior. His valour was first displayed at the taking of Luxemburg, Mons, and Namur, and when raised to the rank of general, he was sent into Catalonia, where he took Barcelona, 1697. In 1702 he was sent to Italy to succeed Villeroy, who had been unfortunate, and his presence turned the tide of victory in favour of the French. The imperialists were defeated at St. Vittoria, and Luzara, Mantua was relieved, Savoy was invaded, Eugene was defeated at Cassano, at Raventlau, and Calcinito, and Turin was going to open its gates to the conqueror, when he was recalled to head the armies in Flanders. From Flanders he passed to Spain, and Philip V. who had neither troops nor resources, soon saw himself surrounded with soldiers at the call of his generous defender, and replac'd on his throne at Madrid. The English forces were next pursued by the active Vendome, and lord Stanhope, and his army of 5000 men, surrendered prisoners of war, and on the morrow, 10th Dec. 1710, Stahremberg and the imperialists were defeated at the battle of Villaviciosa. These important services were honourably rewarded by the gratitude of Philip, who created him prince of the blood, and bestowed on him the most valuable presents. Vendome continued his services against the imperialists in Spain, but died suddenly of an indigestion at Tignaros, 11th June, 1712, aged 58. His remains were magnificently interred in the Escorial, and the Spanish nation put on mourning in honour of his meritorious services to their monarch.

VENDOME, Philip de, brother to the preceding, was born at Paris, 23d Aug. 1655. He distinguished himself in the army under Lewis XIV. in the conquest of Holland, at the passage of the Rhine, and at the sieges of Mæstricht, Valenciennes, Cambray, &c. He afterwards served with honour under his brother in Catalonia, but he fell under the displeasure of the French king for not having joined the army at the celebrated battle of Cassano. He retired to Rome, but afterwards returned to France, and died at Paris, 24th Jan. 1727, aged 72.

VENEL, Gabriel Francis, a native of Pezenas, known as an able and intelligent physician, and professor of medicine at Montpellier, where he died 1776 aged 53. He wrote an Account of the Mineral Waters of Passi—Instructions on the Use of the rouille—Analysis of the Waters of Seltz, &c.

VENERONI, John, a native of Verdun, in the 17th century, who altered his name of Vignerone to the Italian word Veneroni. He taught Italian at Paris with great success, and contributed much to render the Italian poets popular in France. He wrote Method to learn Italian, 12mo. 1770—a Dictionary, French and Italian, 4to. 1768—Fables Choisies—Letters of Loredano—Bentivoglio's Letters, &c.

VENETIANO, Dominic, a Venetian painter. He was basely murdered by Castagno, to whom he had communicated the secret of painting in oil, when first introduced into Italy.

VENETTE, Nicolas, a French physician, who died at Rochelle, his native town, 1698, aged 65. He wrote treatises on the Scurvy—on the Human Calculus—Tableau de l'Amour Conjugal, with plates, 2 vols. 12mo. a work of licentious tendency.

VENIERO, Dominic, a Venetian noble, known as a poet. His Puttana Errante, in three cantos, is a composition very dishonourable to his character as a moral man. He had also three brothers, Jerome, Francis, and Lewis, who wrote some poetry and some prose works. He died 1581.

VENIUS, or VEEN, Otho, a painter of Leyden, who studied at Rome under Zuccharo. He was patronised by the emperor, and by the German electors, and from his attachment to his native country, he declined the liberal offers of Lewis XIII. He settled at Antwerp, and afterwards retired to Brussels, where he died 1634, aged 78, leaving two daughters, who inherited his great abilities. He was well acquainted with the claro obscuro, and very correct and animated in his pieces, the best of which are his Triumph of Bacchus, and the Last Supper, preserved in the cathedral of Antwerp. He was the master of the celebrated Rubens. He published Bellum Batavicum ex Tacito, with plates—Horace, with plates—Amorum Emblemata, 4to.—Emblemata Ducenta, &c.

VENN, Henry, a native of Barnes in Surrey, educated at Jesus college, Cambridge. He became fellow of Queen's, and in 1759, obtained the living of Huddersfield, Yorkshire, which he exchanged in 1770 for Yelling, Huntingdonshire. He published Sermons on various Subjects, 8vo.—Mistakes in Religion Exposed, 8vo.—the Complete Duty of Man, and other tracts in which he showed himself strongly attached to the doctrines of Calvin. He died at Clapham, 1796, aged 71.

VENNER, Tobias, author of Via Recta ad Longam Vitam, a popular work—of a treatise on the Bath Waters—and of a Censure on British Water, was a native of Pether-ton, near Bridgewater. He studied medicine at St. Alban's hall, Oxford, and took his doctor's degree, 1613, after which he settled at Bridgewater, and afterwards at Bath, where he died respected, 26th March, 1660, aged 83.

VENNER, Thomas, a wine-cooper, who, not satisfied with the business of his profession, became a fanatical preacher, and persuaded his followers, who were called fifth monarchy men, that all human government was soon to cease, to make room for the coming of Christ and his saints. From preaching he proceeded to violence, and after representing Cromwell and Charles II. as usurpers, he headed a mob, and proclaimed the kingdom of king Jesus. This popular insurrection called for the interference of the civil power, and Venner and twelve of his followers, who considered themselves as invulnerable, were executed Jan. 1660-1, exclaiming, "that if they were deceived, the Lord himself was their deceiver."

VERDIER, Anthony du, a native of Montbrissin in Forez, who died 25th Sept. 1600, aged 56. He was historiographer of France, and author of Bibliothèque des Auteurs François, and other works.

VERDIER, Cæsar, a native of Molières, near Avignon, eminent as an anatomical professor. He was in his character an amiable and benevolent man, and died at Paris, 19th March, 1759. He wrote an Abridgment of Anatomy, 2 vols. 12mo. published with the notes of Sabatier—Memoirs on the Hernias of the Bladder—Medical Observations, &c.

VERDUC, Laurence, an able surgeon of Toulouse. He was a popular professor on surgery, and died at Paris, 1695. He wrote an excellent Treatise on Healing by Means of Bandages, &c. His son, John Baptist, was a physician, and wrote the Operations of Surgery, &c. 3 vols. 8vo. &c.

VERE, Edward, earl of Oxford, received his education at St. John's college, Cambridge, and was one of the judges in the trial of the unfortunate Mary of Scotland, 1588. He displayed great valour and judgment in the destruction of the Spanish armada, and was also admired for his poetical talents. Some of his poems are preserved in Percy's Reliques, and in England's Parnassus, printed 4to. 1600. He died 1604.

VERE, sir Francis, an English general. He served under Leicester in the English expedition to Holland, 1585, and was made governor of Flushing in 1596. He greatly distinguished himself at the siege of Bergen-op-Zoom, at the battle of Nieuport, in the defence of Ostend, and against the Spaniards. He died governor of Portsmouth, 28th Aug. 1608, aged 54, and was buried in Westminster abbey. His brother Horace, served under him on the continent, and also shared his honours by his bravery at the battle of Nieuport. He was intrusted by James I. with the forces sent to the assistance of the duke Palatine, and his retreat from Spinola, the Spanish general, was regarded as a most glorious exploit. He was created baron Tilbury by Charles I. in reward for his meritorious services, and he died 2d May, 1635, and was buried in Westminster abbey.

VERELST, Simon, a Flemish painter, who resided for some time in England, and excelled in the representation of fruits and flowers. He died 1710.—A woman of that name, was also eminent for her knowledge of music and painting, and the facility with which she spoke the several languages of Europe. She was born at Antwerp, 1680, and she settled in England, where her pencil was engaged with success in historical pieces and portraits.

VERGENNES, Charles Gravier, count de, a French statesman, born of a noble family in Burgundy. His abilities recommended him to the court, and in 1755 he was sent as ambassador from France to Constantinople, where his good conduct and sound policy merited the thanks of his master, and the friendly approbation of Maria Theresa, and of Catherine of Russia. He was sent in 1771 ambassador to Sweden, and promoted the revolution which made Gustavus master of his country, and on the accession of Lewis XVI. to the throne, he was recalled to share in his councils as minister for foreign affairs. Whilst he spread the influence of France through Europe, he eagerly promoted general tranquillity, and the peace of Teschen, the reconciliation of the emperor and the Dutch, and the commercial treaty with Russia, are important proofs of his wisdom and sagacity. In his politics toward the English government he, however, greatly erred, and by supporting the American colonies against the parent country, he laid the foundation of a system which hurled his master from his throne. His treaty of peace with England in 1783, was followed by a commercial treaty, which proved beneficial to both countries. He died at Versailles, 13th Feb. 1787, aged 68, and was magnificently buried by the order of Lewis XVI. who shed tears of regret and affection on the ashes of his favourite minister. A Historical and Political Memoir on Louisiana, 8vo. published, 1802, has been attributed to him.

VERGER DE HAURANE, John du, abbé de St. Cyran, an eminent French ecclesiastic, who was born at Bayonne, 1581. He obtained in 1620 the abbey of St. Cyran, and by reading the works of the fathers and the History of Ancient Councils, he formed a new system of faith. At Paris his insinuating manners, his learning, and his virtues, procured him adherents, and while he regarded confession as useless, and absolution unavailing, except it was attended with the total reformation of the penitent sinner, he failed not to inculcate that confirmation was a more important and more powerful ceremony than baptism, or the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. His maxims, though committed only to the secrecy of tried friends, soon became popular, and at last drew upon him the jealousy and resentment of Richelieu, who caused him to be imprisoned in 1638. The death of his persecutor restored him to liberty, but he soon after himself fell sick, and died at Paris, 11th Oct. 1643, aged 62. His works are la Somme des Fautes, &c. de Garasse, 3 vols. 4to.—Spiritual Letters, 2 vols. 4to.—Apology for Roche-Posay, &c.—Question Royale. Among the friends and pupils of St. Cyran were Jansenius, Arnauld, Nicole, Pascal, &c.

VERGIER, James, a native of Lyons, who possessed great poetical talents, and was patronised by Colbert. His fondness for dissipated and licentious pleasures, however, stood in the way of his advancement. He was shot dead at Paris by some robbers in the night of the 23d Aug. 1720, aged 63.

His works are odes, sonnets, madrigals, epigrams, fables, parodies, &c. edited together, 2 vols. 12mo. 750.

VERGNE, Louis Elizabeth de la, a French general, born at Mans, 1705. He was the friend of Voltaire, Fontenelle, and other learned men, and shared the glories of the campaigns of Lewis XV. in Flanders. He died at Paris, 31st Oct. 1782, aged 77. His works are numerous, consisting chiefly of Romances, &c.

VERGNIAUD, Peter Victorin, a native of Limoges, who left his profession of advocate at Bourdeaux, to attend the meeting of the national assembly. With commanding eloquence he recommended the violent measures against the emigrants, he proposed the suspension of the monarch, and suggested the convoking of a national convention. By degrees, however, his virulence abated, and in the convention he showed himself moderate and the friend of order, but his views did not escape the penetration of Robespierre, who saw in him a powerful rival aspiring to the sovereign power. He was accused before the revolutionary tribunal, and sent to the scaffold. He suffered, 31st October, 1793, aged 35.

VERHEYEN, Philip, son of a peasant at Verrebrouck in Waes, was born 1648. After working in the fields with his father till the age of 22, he was drawn from this low occupation by the curate of the parish, who observed the superior powers of his mind, and he made such rapid progress at the college of Louvain, that he soon obtained the degree of doctor of medicine, and a professorship of anatomy. He published Treatise de Corporis Humani Anatomia, 2 vols. 4to. translated into German,—de Febribus, and other medical works. This worthy character died at Louvain, 15th Feb. 1710, aged 62, universally regretted, leaving by his second wife four children, who inherited little besides their father's reputation.

VERKOLIE, John, an eminent painter and engraver of Amsterdam, who died at Delft, 1693, aged 43. His Venus and Adonis, his tempest, his kneeling penitent, and particularly his pieces on which little light is thrown, are particularly admired.

VERMANDER, Charles, a native of Meulebeck, in Flanders, known as a painter and a poet. He died 1607, aged 59. His landscapes and grotesque pieces were deservedly admired. He wrote a poem on painting—Figures of Antiquity—Lives of celebrated Painters, &c.

VERMEYEN, John Cornelius, a painter, born near Haerlem. He was surnamed the Bearded, because he wore his beard so long that it touched the ground. He was patronised by Charles V., whom he accompanied in his Tunis expedition. He died at Brussels, 1559, aged 59.

VERNES, Jacob, a native of Languedoc, who died at Geneva, where he was minister, 1788, aged 60. He wrote la Confiance Philosophique, 2 vols. 8vo.—Choix Littéraire, 24 vols. 8vo.—Letters on Rousseau's Catechism—an elegant work on the death of his wife, &c.

VERNET, Joseph, a native of Avignon, who from a common cart painter became the first marine artist in France. He visited the different seaports of France which he painted with astonishing effect. He died at Paris, Dec. 1789, aged 77, and it has been said of him that his genius had neither infancy nor old age.

VERNEUIL, Catherine Henrietta de Balzac, Marquise de, a French lady who so captivated the heart of Henry IV. that he promised to marry her. When the monarch gave his hand to Mary de Medicis, this haughty mistress was so offended that she conspired with the Spanish court to dethrone him, and to place the crown on the head of her own son, whom she had borne to Henry. Their intrigues were discovered, and her accomplices punished. She died in exile, 1633, aged 54.

VERNEY, Guichard Joseph du, professor of anatomy in the royal gardens, was born at Feurs en Forez, 5th Aug. 1648. He acquired great celebrity at Paris as a professor, and died there 10th Sept. 1730. He wrote an excellent Treatise on the Ear, 12mo. &c. His works appeared together in 2 vols. 4to. 1762.

VERNON, Edward, an English admiral, born at Westminster. After serving with distinction in the navy, he was sent, 1739, against Porto-Bello, which he took, and with a small force, as he had often boasted in the house of Commons, but he was unsuccessful in his attack on Carthagea two years after. His name is beautifully introduced in the most pathetic lines written by Thomson. He died suddenly, 29th Oct. 1757, aged 73.

VERNULEUS, Nicholas, professor of belles lettres at Louvain, was author of a Latin History of Louvain University, 4to.—Historia Austriaca, 8vo.—Latin Tragedies—and Institutiones Politicæ. He died at Louvain, 1649, aged 79.

VERONESE, Paul Caliarì, a celebrated painter, born at Verona, 1532. He studied under his uncle, and soon acquired such reputation as to rival Tintoret and the most illustrious artists. The most celebrated of his pieces are the marriage of Cana and the supper in the house of Simon the leper. From the rich resources of a strong imagination, he painted with all the truth of nature, his characters were represented with dignity, his female figures exhibited grace and elegance, and in his draperies appeared splendour and magnificence. In commendation of his great abilities, Guido said that he wished to be what Veronese was rather than acquire the celebrity of any other artist, for as he observed, others display their art, but he paints nature in all her real charms. This admired painter, equally great as a good Christian and as an amiable man, died at Venice 1588, aged 51.

VERONESE, Alexander Turchi, a painter born at Verona. In his pieces he drew the beauty of his female figures from the charms of his wife and daughters. He died at Rome 1670, aged 70. As he suffered much from indigence in consequence of the luxurious extravagance of his wife, many of his pieces were hastily finished.

VERONESE, Carlo, a Venetian who acquired some reputation at Paris as an actor, and as a dramatic author. He died 1760, aged 58. His daughter Anna was also eminent as an actress and an elegant dancer on the French stage.

VERROCHIO, Andrew, a native of Florence, who united in his own person the various knowledge of the painter, the goldsmith, the geometrician, the sculptor, the engraver, &c. He first introduced the art of taking casts in plaster of the faces of dead or living persons. His heads of Alexander, Darius, &c. in bronze are much admired, but his paintings possessed not equal merit. He died 1488, aged 56.

VERSCHURING, Henry, a native of Gorcum, who studied painting under John Bois of Utrecht, and afterwards in the Italian schools. He followed the Dutch army in 1672, and drew views of its various encampments, &c. He was made public magistrate at Docum, but did not abandon his profession. He was drowned in a storm on the coast near Dordrecht 1690, aged 63.

VERSE, Noel Aubert de, a native of Mans, who embraced the Calvinistic doctrines and afterwards became a Roman Catholic. He was rewarded with a pension by the French clergy for his theological works. He died 1714.

VERSKOVIS, James Francis, a Flemish artist, who settled in England and died there 1749. His vases and figures in wood, ivory, &c. were much admired. His son was eminent as a painter.

VERSTEGAN, Richard, a native of London. His parents were of Flemish descent, and after studying at Oxford he went to settle at Antwerp, where he died 1625. He wrote a restitution of decayed intelligence in antiquities concerning the noble and renowned English nation, 4to. a curious work, reprinted London 1634, and again 1674, 4to.—The Regal Government of England,—Antiquitates Belgicæ, 12mo.—Theatrum Crudelitatum Hæreticorum, 4to. &c.

VERT, Dom Claude de, an ecclesiastic of the order of Cluni. He studied at Avignon, and travelled into Italy, and devoted himself to inquiries on the ecclesiastical ceremonies of Rome. He died at Abbeville, 1st May, 1708, aged 63. He wrote a simple and historical history of the Ceremonies of the Church, 4 vols. Svo. &c.

VERTOT D'AUBOEUF, René Aubert de, a native of Bennetot in Normandy. He entered among the Capuchins, but quitted the order in 1677, to be admitted among the regular canons of Premontré. In 1701 he abandoned the solitude of the monastery for an ecclesiastical life, and a residence in Paris, where he found great and powerful patrons. He became in 1715, historiographer to the order of Malta, and was selected for the office of sub-preceptor to Lewis XV. but the appointment never took place. The abbé suffered much from the infirmities of age, and died 15th June, 1735, aged 80. In his character he was an amiable man, and united the virtues of private life to great intelligence, deep penetration, and an elegant taste. He wrote the History of the Revolutions of Portugal, 12mo. —History of the Revolutions of Sweden, 2 vols. 12mo.—History of the Revolutions of Rome, 3 vols. 12mo. his chief work—History of Malta, 4 vols. 4to. and 7 in 12mo.—History of the settlement of the Britons in Gaul, 2 vols. 12mo.—Origin of the greatness of the Court of Rome, 12mo. Dissertations on the Memoirs of the Academy of Belles Lettres, &c.

VERTUE, George, a native of London, bound apprentice to an engraver of arms. He afterwards studied painting and engraving, and by degrees emerged into reputation and consequence by the patronage of sir Godfrey Kneller and lord Somers. He made a collection of materials for a history of painting and painters, which was bought of his widow and digested and published from his MSS. by Horace Walpole, in 4 vols. 4to. 1762, and afterwards republished 5 vols. Svo. 1782. He died 1757, aged 73.

VERUS, Lucius Ceionius Commodus, son of Ælius, distinguished himself against the barbarians in the East, and was adopted by Marcus Aurelius, and admitted to share the throne. He died of an apoplexy in his German expedition, aged 39.

VERWEY, John, a learned Dutchman, who presided with great reputation over the school of Goude, and afterwards that of the Hague, where he died about 1690. He is author of a Medulla Aristarchi Vossiani—and Nova Via docendi Græcæ, Svo. two grammars of singular merit and general utility.

VESALIUS, Andrew, a celebrated anatomist, born at Brussels of a family long distinguished for their knowledge of medicine. After studying at Louvain, where he displayed the strong bent of his genius by dissecting dogs, cats, moles, &c. he came to Paris and applied himself laboriously to anatomy, a science then in its infancy. He next visited Pisa, Bologna, and the other universities of Italy, and in 1537, was appointed anatomical professor at Padua. He next removed to Spain to be physician to Charles V. and there acquired the most extensive reputation by his skill and sagacity. From this high popularity, he, however, all at once formed the project of going to the Holy Land, and while some attribute it to the wish of flying from the jealousy and persecution of his enemies at court, or to the troublesome peevishness of his wife, others ascribe the cause to a more extraordinary circumstance. He obtained, it is said, permission to open the body of a young nobleman, whom during a severe illness he had attended, but dreadful to relate, he no sooner uncovered the heart of his patient, than he perceived it still palpitating with life. This circumstance so irritated the weeping family of the nobleman, that the unhappy physician was summoned before the inquisition, but Charles V. interfered and saved him from the most excruciating torments, on condition that he should undertake a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. On his return from Cyprus and Jerusalem, which was hastened by the invitations of the senate of Venice, who solicited him to fill the medical chair of Padua, vacant by the death of Fallopius, the wretched pilgrim was shipwrecked and thrown upon the barren shores of the island of Zante, where he soon after perished through famine and hardship, Oct. 1674, aged about 60. His body when found was buried in St. Mary's church in the island. The chief of his works is, de Humani Corporis Fabrica, Leyden, 2 vols. fol. 1722. Vesalius may be truly considered as the great restorer of anatomy in Europe, as before his time it was not only neglected, but the study of it was impeded by the gross superstition and the ignorant prejudices of the age.

VESPASIAN, Titus Flavius, an obscure native of Riti, who by his merits and virtues rose to consequence in the Roman armies, and headed the expedition against Jerusalem. On the death of Vitellius A. D. 69, he was proclaimed emperor by his soldiers, and the wisdom, moderation, and firmness of his reign showed the propriety of the choice. This truly virtuous monarch, the liberal patron of learning, and the friend of morality and order, died A. D. 79, aged 71.

VESPUTIUS AMERICUS, the discoverer of the new continent, was a native of Florence. Vid. AMERICUS.

VICARS, John, a native of London, educated at Christ's hospital and Queen's college, Oxford, after which he officiated as undermaster in Christ's hospital. He was author of God in the Mount, or England's Remembrancer, a poem, 4to.—Looking Glass for Malignants, and other pamphlets in favour of the Presbyterians against the royalists. He died 1652.

VICARY, Thomas, a native of London, sergeant surgeon to Henry VIII. and his three successors, and surgeon to St. Bartholomew's hospital, was the first anatomical writer in the English language. His book "a Treasure for Englishmen, or the Anatomy of a Man's Body," 12mo. 1577, and other medical and surgical tracts, are chiefly compiled from the works of Galen and of the Arabians.

VICENTE, Giles, a famous dramatic poet of Lisbon in the 16th century, whose works have served as models to the labours of Lope de Vega, and to Quevedo. He wrote with great facility, and his pieces were so popular among the Portuguese, that he was called the Plautus of Portugal. It is said, that Erasmus learned the Portuguese to be able to read his works, which were published by his children in five parts, 1562.

VICO, John Baptist, a native of Naples, who became professor of rhetoric in the university there. The best known of his works is Scienza Nuova. He died 1740, aged 70.

VICQ D'AZIR, Felix, a native of Valone, who like his father became eminent as a physician. He came to Paris in 1765, and acquired such celebrity that in 1775 he was sent by the minister Turgot to stop a contagious distemper which raged among the people of Languedoc, and in this he was happily successful. He was one of the founders of the society of medicine, and pronounced the eulogies of Haller, Linné, Pringle, and other illustrious men, and with such applause, that he was elected member of the academy of sciences in the room of Buffon. He died universally respected, 20th June, 1794, aged 46. Besides his eulogies he wrote memoirs—Anatomical Observations—Description of the Nerves, &c.

VICTOR I. pope after Eleutherus 193, suffered martyrdom under Severus 202. During his age there were violent disputes in the church about the time most proper for the celebration of Easter.

VICTOR II. Gebhard, elected pope after Leo IX. 1055, died two years after. He was an active pontiff, who devoted himself attentively to the reformation of his clergy.

VICTOR III. Didier, was elected pope 1086. He hurled a bill of excommunication against the anti-pope Guibert, and died soon after, 16th Sept. 1087. Some of his epistles, dialogues, &c. are extant. There was an anti-pope of that name after the death of Anicletus, 1138.

VICTOR, Amadeus, duke of Savoy, and first king of Sardinia, was born 14th May, 1666, and succeeded his father Charles Emanuel in 1675. By his marriage with the niece of Lewis XIV. he ensured the co-operation of France, but he was no sooner established in his power, than he declared against his new allies. He was consequently attacked and defeated by Catinat at Staffarde 1690, and lost all Savoy, but two years after he entered Dauphiné and seized upon Gap and Embrun. Another victory at Marseilles, obtained over him by Catinat, robbed him of all his newly acquired dominions, but though he was obliged to make peace in 1696, he took up arms again in 1701, encouraged by the promises of the emperor, who flattered his ambition by the hopes of possessing a large territory between the Po and Tanaro. His troops were now defeated by Vendome, and Turin his capital besieged by the duke de la Feuillade, but the timely succour of prince Eugene saved him from ruin, and restored him to his independence. Peace was restored in 1713, and Victor, acknowledged king of Sicily by the king of Spain, soon after resigned his title in favour of the emperor, who in return supported his assumption of the name of king of Sardinia. Tired with the intrigues and labours of greatness, Victor at last in 1730, after a reign of 55 years, abdicated the throne in favour of his son, but the next year, with the same capricious inconsistency, he reclaimed the regal honours. The son might have complied, but when he saw that the crown was claimed by the suggestions of an ambitious mistress, who tyrannized over the affections of his father, he wisely refused, and the fickle old man soon after died at Rivoli near Turin, 31st Oct. 1732.

VICTORIUS, or VETTORIN, Peter, a learned Florentine, appointed by Cosmo de Medicis, professor of eloquence in the college of his native town. He was universally respected for his learning and abilities, and served his country in some embassies. He died 1585, aged 87. He is to be regarded as one of the first restorers of learning in Italy, and he ably devoted his time in elucidating the classics, especially Cicero. His works are Critical Notes on Cicero, Cato, Varro, and Columella—Commentaries on Aristotle's Rhetoric, &c.—Collection of Latin Epistles and Harangues, &c.

VICTORIUS, Benedict, a native of Faenza, professor of medicine at Bologna. He wrote Empyrical Medicine, 8vo.—de Morbo Gallico, 8vo.—la Grande Pratique, 2 vols. fol. &c. and died about 1552, aged 72. His uncle Lionel was also professor of medicine at Bologna, where he died 1530. He wrote a Treatise on the Diseases of Children, 8vo.—Practice of Medicine, 4to. &c.

VIDA, Mark Jerome, a celebrated modern poet, born at Cremona 1470. After finishing his studies at Padua and Bologna, he entered into the order of the regular canons of St. Mark at Mantua, which he soon after exchanged for the order of St. John Lateran at Rome. His poetical fame reached the ears of Leo X., who rewarded him with his friendship and the priory of St. Sylvester at Tivoli. In this charming retreat he devoted himself to the composition of his Christias, and though his labours were interrupted by the death of his patron, he soon emerged from the dissatisfaction which the neglect shown to literary merit during the short reign of Adrian VI. had created, and under the next pope, Clement VII., he received the rewards due to his talents, and was made bishop of Alba, 1532. This truly benevolent prelate, and learned man, died 27th Sept. 1566, aged 96, and was buried in his own cathedral; and his countrymen of Cremona honoured his memory by the erection of a noble monument in their cathedral. The tributes of praise paid to the genius and merits of this great man, have been numerous, and among them, the words of Pope are particularly striking. Speaking of Leo's golden days, the poet thus celebrates his name :

*With sweeter notes each rising temple rang,
A Raphael painted, and a Vida sang.
Immortal Vida ! on whose honoured brow,
The poet's bays, the critic's ivy grow,
Cremona now shall ever boast thy name,
As next in place to Mantua, next in fame.*

The poetical works of Vida were collected by himself, 2 vols. 8vo. 1550. They consist of Ars Poetica, a valuable poem—de Bombyce Libri Duo, the most correct of his works—Scacchia Ludus—Hymni de Rebus Divinis—Christiados Libri Sex—Bucolica, Ecloga, et Carmina, &c.—Besides these he wrote, Dialogi de Republica Dignitate—Orationes Tres adversus Papienses, &c.—Constitutiones Synodales Albæ, &c. The best edition of his poems is that of Oxford, 1733, in 3 vols. 8vo.

VIETA, Francis, master of requests to queen Margaret, was born at Fontenay, in Poitou 1540, and acquired great celebrity as a mathematician. He was the first who used in algebra the letters of the alphabet to mark known quantities, as they could express every variety of number, and he also introduced some important improvements in that science, and in geometry. He made afterwards some alterations in the Gregorian calendar, and showed himself so exact and sagacious in deciphering the secrets of the Spanish government in their intercepted letters, that the divulging of the contents which were obscurely clothed in 500 different characters, was ascribed to magic. He died 1603. He published Apollonius of Perga, under the name of Apollonius Gallus, 4to. 1610, and his works were collected together in 1646, in 1 vol. folio, by F. Schooten.

VIUSSENS, Raymond de, a native of Rouergue, who became physician to the king of France, and distinguished himself by his publications on his profession, one of which, on Internal Diseases, in 4 vols. 4to. was published by his grandson 1774. He died at Montpellier, where he had retired for his health, 1715.

VIGAND, or WIGAND, John, a Lutheran divine, born at Mansfield. He was engaged in the publication of that important work, the Centuries of Magdeburg, printed at Basil, 13 vols. fol. 1562, and afterwards presided over the churches of Pomerania. He wrote several works in favour of the reformation, and died 21st Oct. 1587, aged 64.

VIGILIUS, an African bishop, about 484. He ably opposed the heretics of his age, in his sermons and in his writings, which have been published separately at Dijon, 4to. 1665.

VIGILIUS, a Roman, who was elevated to the papal throne by the intrigues of Theodora the wife of Justinian, to whom he promised, as the price of his elevation, that he would cancel all the decrees of the council of Constantinople, against the Eutychian bishops, whose cause she embraced. Though thus raised to the pontificate in 537, he afterwards ventured to oppose Theodora, and even excommunicated her, for which he was banished from Rome, but died soon after at Syracuse 555. Eighteen of his letters have been published at Paris, 8vo. 1642.

VIGNES, Peter des, a native of Capua, who rose from the obscurest situation to the dignity of chancellor of the German empire. After receiving his education at Bologna, by the charity of some benevolent persons, he rose to consequence, and became the favourite of the emperor Frederic. It is said that he attempted to poison his master, for which his eyes were put out, but others attributed this severe treatment to the malice and misrepresentation of his enemies. Disgusted with the confinement of a prison, and the tyrannical conduct of his sovereign, he dashed his head against the column to which his galling chains were fastened, and thus expired 1249. Des Vignes was very eminent in the knowledge of jurisprudence. Some of his works have been printed.

VIGNOLE, James Barozzio, an eminent architect, born at Vignole in the dutchy of Modena, 1507. He studied at Rome, and was afterwards employed in France by Francis I. in the construction of several splendid edifices, after which he returned to Italy to finish the magnificent palace of cardinal Farnese. He died at Rome, 7th July, 1573, aged 66. He wrote a treatise on the Five Orders of Architecture, in Italian, translated into French by Davilier, 3 vols. 4to. and another, sur la Perspective Pratique.

VIGNOLES, Stephen de, better known by the name of la Hire, was of an illustrious family, settled at Languedoc. He was one of the ablest generals in the service of Charles VII. and he obliged the duke of Bedford to raise the siege of Montargis, and assisted Joan of Arc in the relief of Orleans. After contributing by his valour to the restoration of Charles to his throne, he died at Montauban, 1447.

VIGNOLES, Alphonso de, a native of Aubais in Languedoc, who, as a Calvinist, left France on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and retired to Prussia. He was patronised by the king of Prussia, and made director of the royal academy of sciences at Berlin, where he died 24th July, 1744, aged 95. He wrote the Chronology of the Holy Scriptures, &c. 2 vols. 4to.—Epistola Chronologica—Conjectures on Virgil's fourth Eclogue, &c.

VILLALPANDUS, John Baptist, a Jesuit of Corduba, well skilled in the knowledge of the Holy Scriptures. He wrote Desultory Commentaries on Ezekiel, in 3 vols. 1596, in which he gives an interesting description of the Temple and the city of Jerusalem. He wrote besides, Explanatio Epistolarum S. Pauli, &c. and died 22d May, 1608.

VILLARET, Claude, a native of Paris, who first became known by his romance of la Belle Allemande. In consequence of some domestic distresses he quitted Paris, and to support himself began the life of an actor at Rouen, Compiègne, Liege, &c. but he afterwards abandoned a profession in which he had acquired some celebrity. He again settled at Paris, and obtained the place of first commissary of the chamber of accounts. On the death of Velly he was appointed his successor in the completion of a History of France, which he ably continued from the 8th volume, and the reign of Philip VI. to the 348th page of the 17th volume. He wrote besides, Considerations sur l'Art du Theatre, 8vo.—et l'Esprit de Voltaire. He died at Paris, March 1766, aged 61.

VILLARS, Andrew de Brancas de, a French general, who espoused the interests of the league against Henry IV. He was afterwards gained over by the interference of Sully, and when taken prisoner at the battle of Dourlens by the Spaniards, 24th July, 1595, he was basely murdered by the conquerors.

VILLARS, Louis Hector, marquis and duke of, peer of France, was born at Moulins in Bourbonnois, 1653. He embraced early the profession of arms, and distinguished himself on the Rhine, at the siege of Maestricht, at the battle of Senef, and on various occasions, and for his services was raised to the rank of marshal of France, 1690. At the peace of Ryswick, he went ambassador to Vienna, and when afterwards placed at the head of the French armies, he defeated the prince of Baden, and gained the battle of Hochstet; but after supporting the character of a brave and active general against the superior genius of Marlborough, he was at last routed and dangerously wounded at the battle of Malplaquet, 1709. He afterwards regained his reputation at Denay on the Scheldt, and by the fall of Douay, Quesnoy, and other places, and he assisted in the establishment of peace as plenipotentiary at Radstadt, 1714. After the death of Lewis XIV. he supported the administration of the duke of Orleans, and in 1733, when a new war broke out, he was sent to take the command of the French armies in Italy. He took Pisighitone, but soon after was taken ill, and died at Turin, 17th June, 1734, aged 82. His memoirs were published in Holland, 3 vols. 12mo.

VILLEFORE, Joseph Francis Bourgoin de, a native of Paris, who devoted himself laboriously to literary pursuits, and published various works on history, &c. He died 2d Sept. 1737, aged 85.

VILLENA, marquis of, a Spanish poet, allied to the royal house of Arragon. He preferred retirement and solitude to the intrigues of the court, and translated at the request of his relation John, king of Navarre, Virgil's Æneid into Spanish verse. His Gaya Sciencia, a system of poetry, rhetoric, and oratory, describing the ceremonies and public exhibitions of the Troubadours, is his most celebrated performance. He also translated Dante into prose, a work still esteemed by the Spaniards, and died of the gout, 1434.

VILLENEUVE, Gabrielle Susanne Barbot de, widow of John Baptist de Gaalon de V. lieutenant-colonel of French infantry is distinguished as an elegant and interesting novel-writer. Her romances are numerous, the best known of which are, la Jeune Americaine, 12mo.—le Phenix Conjugal—le Juge Prevenu—la Jardiniere de Vincennes, &c. She died 29th Dec. 1755.

VILLERS, Charles Francis Dominic de, a French writer, was born in 1764, at Belchen, in Lorraine. He became a lieutenant in the artillery at the age of eighteen, but in the revolution he joined the prince of Condé at Triers, in consequence of which, on the failure of the royal cause, he was obliged to seek an asylum in Germany. After many removals he settled at Lubec, where he wrote several works, particularly an "Essay on the Influence of the Reformation of Luther," which obtained the prize of the national institute. He next removed to a professorship of philosophy at Göttingen, but was deprived of it on the restoration of peace; though he obtained a pension from the Hanoverian government, and was made a knight of the polar star by that of Sweden. He died, Feb. 26, 1815. He was also the author of "a Letter to Fanny de Beauharnois;" in which he drew such an affecting picture of French enormity in Germany, as brought upon him the vengeance of Davoust. Besides this, he wrote "Rapport à l'Institut sur l'Etat actuel de la Littérature ancienne et de l'Histoire en Allemagne."—W. B.

VILLETTE, Charles, marquis de, a native of Paris, known as a writer. He married Voltaire's niece, and was one of the members of the convention. He died 10th July, 1793, and his remains were attended to the grave by a deputation of the French senators. His eloges of Charles V. Henry IV.—poetical pieces, &c. were collected together, 1784, 8vo.

VILLIERS, George, duke of Buckingham, was born of a respectable family at Brookesby, Leicestershire, 20th Aug. 1592, and after receiving an indifferent education, he travelled into France, where he acquired all the personal accomplishments of the gentleman and the courtier. He was introduced to the notice of James I. at the play represented for his entertainment by the students of Cambridge, and the monarch was so captivated with his handsome person and his fine clothes, that he soon succeeded to the honours of the discarded Somerset, and became cup-bearer to the king. By degrees honours were heaped upon him; he was knighted, and rapidly rose to the rank of a baron, an earl, a marquis, and a duke, and was made master of the horse, warden of the cinque ports, and obtained the disposal of all the offices of honour and emolument, in the church and state, in the three kingdoms. In 1620 he married the earl of Rutland's daughter, the richest heiress in the kingdom, and three years after he persuaded the prince of Wales to go to Spain, in disguise, to solicit the hand of the Infanta, his intended bride. On the death of James, Villiers retained all his influence with the new monarch, but while he was the favourite of the court, he was regarded with odium by the parliament and the people. His unpopularity was increased by rashly advising his master to dissolve the parliament and to raise supplies without the consent of the people. In the midst of these popular discontents a war broke out with France, and the duke took upon himself to carry hostilities into the enemy's country, but instead of landing on the continent, he made an imprudent attack on the isle of Rhé, in which he lost the flower of his army. This disaster was to be repaired by a more formidable armament, for the relief of Rochelle, which Richelieu was besieging with all the powers of the French monarchy, and the duke made the most extraordinary preparations for the expedition, but before he sailed he was stabbed at Portsmouth by Felton, a lieutenant of the army, who was dissatisfied with his conduct, and had vowed his death. This happened 23d Aug. 1628, in the 36th year of his age. In his disposition Buckingham was generous and humane, but in his attachments he was violent and headstrong. Immoderately ambitious, he viewed the cautious measures of the parliament with distrust and contempt, and to carry into effect his favourite measures, he hesitated not to sacrifice the interests of his master, and the happiness of the people. For the information which he possessed on public affairs, he was indebted to the partiality of the monarch, who, with ridiculous fondness for his person, resolved to make him a masterpiece, and to mould him, as it were, platonically to his own ideas.

VILLIERS, George, duke of Buckingham, son of the preceding, was born at Wallingford house, London, 30th Jan. 1627, the year before his father's murder. After being at Cambridge he went on his travels, and at his return he was presented to the king, who was at Oxford, and he entered at Christ church. On the fall of the royal power he went with prince Charles to Scotland, and shared afterwards his dangers at the battle of Worcester, but after accompanying him on the continent he returned to England, and retrieved his fortunes by marrying, in 1657, the daughter of lord Fairfax. Though thus connected with republicans, he did not lose the royal favour, but preserving his property, he at the restoration was possessed of an estate of 20,000*l.* a year, and added to his honours the place of master of horse to the king. The favours which he enjoyed at court were, however, soon forfeited, when he joined a conspiracy against the government, yet so forgiving was the king's temper, that he was restored, on his submission, to his honours, and to confidence. The flagitious attempt which he made with Blood on the duke of Ormond's life, did not again expose him, as he deserved, to the royal displeasure, but he was made chancellor of Cambridge, and employed as ambassador to Lewis XIV. He afterwards resigned the chancellorship, and capriciously favoured the cause of the nonconformists, and afterwards was sent to the Tower for contempt, by order of the house of lords. He died at Kirky Moorside, Yorkshire, 16th April, 1688, after a short illness of three days, of an ague, in consequence of sitting on the ground when fatigued with hunting. His remains were buried in Westminster abbey. Though a man of abilities, of great vivacity, and of quickness of parts, he did not possess a single virtue. His wit was malevolence, his generosity was profuseness, and so debauched was his character, that the whole business of his life seemed to be the gratification of the most sensual appetites. His character has been well delineated under the name of Zimri in Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel, but though a debauchee he has acquired celebrity as a poet and a man of letters. His poems, though few in number, are great in merit. Besides the Rehearsal, a comedy of singular merit, in which he ridicules the dramatic writers of his age, he wrote the Chances, altered from Fletcher—the Restoration—the Battle of Sedgemoor—the Militant Couple—an Essay on Reason and Religion—on Human Reason—Discourse on the Reasonableness of having a Religion and Worship of God, &c.

VILLOISON, John Baptist Gaspard d'Anse de, a learned critic, was born at Corbeille-sur-Seine in 1750. He studied under Capperonier, professor of Greek in the royal college; and in 1773 published the Greek Lexicon to Homer by Apollonius, from a manuscript in the library of St. Germain-des-Pres; for which he was admitted a member of the academy of inscriptions and belles lettres. His next publication was an edition of the pastoral of "Longus," with a commentary. In 1781 he went to Venice to search for Greek manuscripts in the library of St. Mark, where he found several unedited works, from which he made extracts, and published them in two quarto volumes, under the title of "Anecdota Græca." But his most important discovery was a copy of Homer of the tenth century, which he published in folio in 1788. From Venice, Villoison went to the court of Saxe-Weimar, at the invitation of the duke, and, while there, formed the collection of critical letters, which he printed at Zurich, under the title of "Epistolæ Vinarienses." He next published a translation of part of the Old Testament, made by a Jew in the ninth century. Soon after this, he travelled into Greece, and left numerous observations for a history of that country, and for a new edition of Montfaucon's "Palæographia Græca." In the French revolution he lost all his property; but was appointed professor of ancient and modern Greek, which office he had just entered upon when he died, April 26, 1805.—W. B.

VILLOTTE, James, a Jesuit of Bar-le-duc, who travelled into Armenia, and returned to Europe 1709. He died at St. Nicholas, near Nancy, 14th June, 1743, aged 87. He wrote an explanation of the Catholic Faith—Christian Armenia, &c.—Commentaries on the Gospels, 4to.—Armenian Dictionary, &c.

VINCENT, Thomas, author of God's Terrible Voice in the City, by Plague, and Fire, 8vo.—of an Explanation of the Catechism, and other religious tracts, was ejected for nonconformity from the living of St. Mary Magdalen, in Milk-street, and died at Hoxton, 1671. During the plague he continued in the city, and by his discourses from the pulpit greatly contributed to support the spirits, and relieve the terrors of the afflicted inhabitants.

VINCENT, Nathaniel, author of the Conversion of a Sinner, and the Day of Grace, 8vo.—sermons, and other religious books, was of Magdalen college, Oxford, and was ejected from the living of Langley Marsh, Bucks, for nonconformity. He adhered so strenuously to his dissenting principles that he was imprisoned for preaching in a conventicle at Southwark. He died 1697.

VINCENT, William, a learned divine, was born in London, Nov. 2, 1739. He received his education in Westminster school, from whence he was elected to Trinity college, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. In 1762 he was appointed usher of the school where he had been bred; and in 1771, second master. He was also made chaplain in ordinary to the king; and in 1778, being then doctor of divinity, he was presented to the vicarage of Longdon, in Worcestershire; which he resigned the same year, on being instituted to the rectory of Allhallows, Thames-street. In 1788 he became head master of Westminster school, which office he held till 1801, when he obtained a stall in the collegiate church of St. Peter. On the translation of bishop Horsley to St. Asaph, in 1803, he was made dean of Westminster, with which preferment he held the rectory of Islip, in Oxfordshire. He died, Dec. 21, 1815. His principal works are, 1. A Charity Sermon at St. Margaret's, Westminster, 1792. 2. "De Legionē Manlianā." 3. The Conjugation of the Greek Verb; and the Greek Verb analyzed. 4. A Commentary on Arian's Voyage of Nearchus, 4to. 6. The Periplus of the Erythæan Sea, 2 vols. 4to. The two last he afterwards printed together, with the title of "The Commerce and Navigation of the Ancients in the Indian Ocean," 2 vols. 4to. 7. A Defence of Public Education, 8vo. A volume of Sermons, with his life prefixed, was published after his death.—W. B.

VINCI, Leonard, a celebrated painter, descended of a noble family, and born in the castle of Vinci near Florence 1445. He studied under Verrochio, and soon became a most accomplished painter, well skilled in the knowledge of anatomy, of optics, of geometry, and of all the arts which could add correctness, grace, and delicacy to the efforts of a great genius. He was patronised by Lewis Sforza, duke of Milan, and not only introduced the simplicity and purity of the Greeks over the rude Gothic, but he contributed much to ornament the city, and as well acquainted with architecture and engineering, he supplied it with water by a new canal 200 miles in length. The wars of Milan, and the misfortunes and captivity of the duke influenced the destinies of the painter, and Leonard quitted a city which he had adorned with his paintings and the labours of his genius. He removed to Florence, where he found protection and friendship with the Medicis. From Florence he went to Rome, and soon after visited France by the liberal invitations of Francis I. The fatigues of the journey, however, were too much for his constitution, he languished for some months at Fontainebleau, and during one of the visits which he frequently received from Francis, he raised himself in his bed to show the gratitude of his heart, and at that moment being seized with a fainting fit, he expired in the arms of the monarch, who had eagerly stooped to support him. This was in 1520. The best of his pieces was our Saviour's last supper, painted in oil, on the wall of a church of Milan, long since defaced from moisture and the ravages of time, though a copy of it was taken by order of Francis I. which is preserved at St. Germain's. At Florence he was engaged with Michael Angelo in painting the council chamber of the city, but this union of talents produced unfortunately not only rivalry, but lasting jealousy. According to Rubens, his chief excellence was in giving every thing its proper character. His pieces are mostly preserved at Florence and in France. He wrote treatises on the Nature, Equilibrium, and Motion of Water; on Anatomy; on Perspective; on Light and Shadows; on Painting, &c.

VINER, sir Robert, a goldsmith and banker of London, who was much noticed by Charles II. to whom he lent large sums of money. When he was lord mayor of the city the monarch honoured him with his presence at dinner, and showed him many marks of kindness and favour.

VINES, Richard, an English divine, born at Blaston, Leicestershire. He was educated at Magdalen college, Cambridge, and afterwards became master of Hinckley school, and when in orders he obtained the living of Weddington, Warwickshire. The civil wars drove him from his parish to Coventry, but on the establishment of the presbyterian government in 1644, he was nominated one of the assembly of divines, and proved himself by his eloquence, an able champion of the republican cause. From London, where he obtained St. Clement Danes, and St. Lawrence, Jewry, he removed to Cambridge, where he was appointed master of Pembroke hall, which he resigned soon after, as he would not take the engagement. In the conferences which he had with the monarch as one of the deputies from the parliament, he conducted himself with becoming propriety and marked respect towards his unfortunate sovereign, and on the morning of his execution he offered him his spiritual consolation and assistance. He died 1653, and was buried in St. Lawrence, Jewry, where his monument perished in the great fire of London. Though a strong and violent Calvinist, he was a benevolent man, void of pride and flattery, and as a scholar distinguished for his perfect knowledge of Greek, and eminent as a philologist, invincible as a disputant, and as a preacher most persuasive. He often preached before the parliament, and of the sermons which he composed, 32 have been published.

VINNIUS, Arnold, professor of law at Leyden, was author of commentaries on the institutes of Justinian, 2 vols. 4to. and on the ancient lawyers, 8vo. and died at Leyden 1657, aged 69.

VIVOT, Marie Ann Henrietta Payan de l'Estang, a native of Dresden, distinguished for her learning, her wit, and the great versatility of her genius. She married d'Antremont at the age of 12, and was a widow at 16, and afterwards she took for her second husband de Bourdic of Nismes. Her mental accomplishments recommended her to the notice of the learned, she was honoured with a seat in the academy of Nismes, and read on her admission an elege on her favourite author Montaigne. Among her compositions are known an Ode to Silence; the Summer; Fauvette, a romance, la Floret de Brama, an opera: Epistle to Tremblaye, &c. This ingenious and excellent woman died of a fever in the summer of 1802, aged 56, at Bag-nols.

VIRGILIUS, Publius Maro, a celebrated Latin poet. He was born at Andes near Mantua, and died at Brundisium, B.C. 19, aged 51. He was happily patronised by Mæcenas and Augustus, and the independence which he enjoyed permitted him to devote the great powers of his genius to the composition of the sublimest efforts of the Italian muse. His 10 Eclogues, his four Georgics, and his Æneid in 12 books are well known, and will be read and admired so long as the labours of genius can command the applauses of mankind.

VIRGINIA, daughter of Virginius, was stabbed to the heart by her father, and thus saved from the violence which Appius the tyrannical decemvir meditated against her person, under the pretence that she was the slave of one of his freedmen. This created a revolution in the state and the abolition of the decemviral power, 449, B.C.

VISCONTI, Ennius Quirinus, an Italian antiquary, was born at Rome, in 1753. His father, John Baptist Visconti, was keeper of the Pontifical Museum; and under him the son imbibed a taste for antiquarian research, which was encouraged by several cardinals and princes. His greatest work is "A Description of the Museum Pio-Clementinum;" in which he has explained a vast number of obscure inscriptions, medals, and basso-relievos. When the French carried off the ancient monuments, and works of art, to Paris, M. Visconti was called thither, and appointed keeper of the museum. There also he published his "Iconographie Grecque et Romaine;" which, however, he did not live to complete. He died in 1818.—W.B.

VITELLIO or VITELLO, a native of Poland, author of a treatise on Optics, collected from the works of Euclid, Archimedes, and others, in the middle of the 13th century. His works were best edited in 1572.

VITELLIUS, Aulus, a Roman emperor. After sharing in the debaucheries of Tiberius, and administering to the vices of Caligula, Claudius, and Nero, he was proclaimed emperor in Germany by his troops, in opposition to Otho. Though defeated in three battles by his rival he prevailed on the fourth, but instead of reigning like a father, he disgraced himself by every species of licentiousness, and at last was assassinated, and Vespasian placed on the throne A.D. 69.

VITRINGA, Campegio, a native of Leeward in Friesland, who became professor at the university of Franeker, where he died of an apoplexy 3d March, 1722, aged 63. He was author of a Latin commentary on Isaiah, 2 vols. fol.—Apocalypseos Anachrisis, 4to.—Typus Theologiæ Practicæ, 8vo.—Synagoga Vetus, 4to.—Archisyngogus, 4to.—De decem Viris Otiosæ Synagoga, 4to.—Observationes Sacræ, 4to. His son of the same name died also at Franeker 1723, aged 31, professor of theology, and author of a valuable abridgment of Natural Theology, 4to. 1720.

VITRUVIUS, M. Pollio, a famous architect of Antiquity. He lived in the age of Julius Cæsar, and dedicated his valuable work on architecture, in 10 books, to Augustus Cæsar; but few particulars are known of his history. The best edition of this work is that of Amsterdam, 1649, in fol.

VIVALDI, Antonio, a famous Italian musician. His execution on the violin was particularly admired, and his symphonies, and four seasons, are still popular pieces. He died about 1743, at Venice.

VIVARES, Francis, an engraver of great eminence, born at St. John de Bruel, a village of Rouergue. He came to London in 1727 with the intention of following the business of his uncle, a master tailor, but his partiality to engraving prevailed, and by the instructions of Amiconi the Italian painter, he acquired an extensive reputation. His landscapes, and trees were particularly admired. He died 1780, aged 71. He was three times married, and by his first wife, had 16 children, and by the two last 15.

VIVENS, Francis de, a French physician, who died at Clairac 1780, aged 80. He was author of tracts on the Flight of Birds—on the Principles of Physics—new Theory of Motion, &c.

VIVES, John Lewis, a native of Valencia, in Spain, who taught belles lettres at Louvain, and came to England, where he taught Latin to Mary the daughter of Henry VIII. He was highly favoured by the monarch, but when he presumed to speak and to write against the divorce of Catharine of Arragon, he was arrested, and for six months sent to prison. When he recovered his liberty he returned to Spain, and died at Bruges 6th May, 1540, aged 48. He wrote Commentaries on Augustin's Civitas Dei—a treatise on the Corruption and Decline of Arts and Sciences—treatise on Religion—and other theological works.

VIVIANI, Vincent, a famous mathematician, born at Florence, 5th April, 1622. He was the pupil and the friend of Galileo, and acquired such reputation that he received a pension from Lewis XIV. and was appointed first mathematician to the grand duke of Tuscany. He died 22d September, 1703, member of several learned societies in Europe. He published Divination on Aristeas, a work of merit, fol.—de Maximis et Minimis Geometricæ Divinatio in Quintum Conicor. Apoll. Pergæi, &c. fol.—Enodatio Problematum Universis Geometris Propositorum, a Cl. Commieres, 4to.—a treatise on Proportions, 4to.

VIVIEN, Joseph, a painter, born at Lyons. He studied under le Brune, and was patronised by the electors of Cologne and Bavaria. His pieces are much admired for correctness of delineation, and a happy manner which gave to the features the very feelings of the soul. He died at Bonn in Germany, 1735, aged 78.

VLODOMIR, grand duke of Russia, embraced Christianity in 989, and enforced the observation of its mild tenets among his heathen subjects. His good intentions were powerfully seconded by his daughter-in-law, the daughter of Boleslaus duke of Poland, who brought in her retinue Reimbern, bishop of Colberg, an active and intelligent missionary. Vlodimir, by an old age of repentance, made amends for the cruelties and the debauchery of his former years, and after his death he was regarded by his subjects as an apostle and a saint, and his tomb at Kiow has long continued an object of veneration among the Russians. An order of merit was established by the second Catherine, which bears his name.

VOETIUS, Gisbert, a learned divine, born at Heusden, 3d March, 1589. He was appointed in 1634, professor of theology, and of oriental languages at Utrecht, where he continued an active instructor for 40 years, and died 1st November, 1677, aged 87. His accusation of Des Cartes, whom he charged with atheism, was believed by the magistrates of Utrecht, and the two Apologetical letters of the philosopher were condemned to ignominy. His followers were called Voetians. He published Exercitia et Bibliotheca Studiosi Theologi—Politica Ecclesiastica, 4 vols. 4to.—Diatriba de Cælo Beatorum, &c.—His son Paul was professor of law at Utrecht, and died 1667, aged 48. He wrote de Usu Juris Civilis et Canonici, &c.—de Jure Militari—Commentar. in Institutiones Imperiales, 2 vols. 4to.—de Mobilium et Immobili. Naturâ, 8vo.—John, the son of Paul, was professor of law at Leyden, and at Herborn, and died 1714, author of an excellent Commentary on the Pandects, 2 vols. folio, 1698–1704, &c.

VOGLERUS, Valentine Henry, a native of Helmstadt, who became professor of medicine, and died there, highly respected as a physician, 1677, aged 55. He wrote an Account of Writers, &c. improved by Meibomius—Institutionum Physiologicarum Liber, 4to.—Diæticorum Comment. Dissertationes, &c.

VOIGT, Godfrey, a learned Lutheran divine, who was born at Misnia, and died at Hanburgh, 1682. He wrote a treatise on the Altars of the Primitive Christians, 8vo. &c.

VOISENON, Charles Henry de Fusée de, a native of Voisenon, near Melun, who quitted the ecclesiastical profession for the pleasures of the world, and for the writing of dramatic pieces. He was author of various romances; fugitive pieces of poetry; several comedies; lyric poems; historical fragments, &c. written in an easy and pleasing style, and collected together in 5 vols. 8vo. 1782, by Madame de Turpin. He died 22d Nov. 1775, aged 67.

VOISIN, Joseph de, a native of Bourdeaux, who became counsellor in the parliament of his native town, and afterwards entered into orders. He wrote Theology of the Jews, in Latin, 4to.; a treatise on the Divine Law, 8vo.; and other treatises, and died 1635.

VOISIN, Daniel Francis, counsellor of the parliament of Paris, rose by his merits to the highest offices of the state, and in 1714 was made chancellor of France. His integrity and virtues were eminently displayed in a conference with Lewis XIV. The monarch, who had promised pardon to some worthless culprit, directed his chancellor to affix the seals to the pardon, and when the upright magistrate refused, he took the seals, and sealed the pardon himself. When Lewis desired his minister to take the seals back, he declined it, saying, "they are contaminated, I wish no longer to hold them." Astonished at his firmness, the king, with an exclamation of admiration, threw the pardon into the fire; "now," rejoined the chancellor, "I can properly resume the seals, as fire purifies every thing." This excellent character died suddenly, 1st Feb. 1718, aged 62.

VOITURE, Vincent, an eminent French writer, son of a wine-merchant, born at Amiens, 1598. His wit and literary reputation soon recommended him to the notice of the court, where he was liberally patronised and pensioned. He was sent to Spain on political affairs, and during his stay at Madrid, he wrote verses in Spanish with such elegance that they were ascribed to the muse of Lopez de Vega. He afterwards visited Rome, where he was courteously treated, and he was the bearer of the information of the birth of Lewis XIV. to the court of Florence. Though loaded with pensions, he was, in consequence of his fondness for gaming, always poor. He died 27th May, 1648. Though he wrote verses with elegance in French, Spanish, and Italian, yet few of his poetical pieces are preserved. His letters form nearly the whole of his works, and they have often been printed in 2 vols. 12mo. They are elegant, polite, and easy, and have deserved the highest commendations of Boileau, who regards him not only as a polisher and refiner of the French language in a barbarous age, but as a sensible and graceful writer. Voltaire, however, speaks differently of his merits, and describes his letters as the mere pastime of a wanton imagination, with nothing instructive, nothing flowing from the heart, but rather an abuse than an exercise of wit.

VOLDER, Burchel de, a native of Amsterdam, professor of philosophy and mathematics at Leyden, where he died, 1709, aged 66. He wrote Harangues and Dissertations on Philosophical Subjects.

VOLKOF, Feodor, the Garrick of Russia, was the son of a tradesman at Yaroslaf, and was born 1729. He was educated at Moscow, but instead of devoting himself to the business of a manufacturer of salt-petre and sulphur in the house of his mother's second husband, he took pleasure in frequenting the German theatre at Petersburg, and on his return to Yaroslaf, he erected a stage in his father's house, and provided himself with all the apparatus necessary for dramatic representation. His four brothers shared his theatrical labours, and by degrees acquired such reputation, that a regular theatre was built for the reception of crowded audiences. The fame of the young performer was no sooner reported at Petersburg, than the empress, in 1752, sent for him to the capital, and nobly allowed him a handsome pension, and enabled him to represent with effect and magnificence the finest productions of Sumorokof and of Moliere. Under the patronage of the court, not less than 2200*l.* were annually granted for the salaries of the actors, and Volkof and his brother were ennobled, and presented with extensive estates. The last character which this eminent actor performed was in the tragedy of Zemira, at Moscow, and he died soon after, 1763, aged 35.

VOLMAR, Isaac, a German statesman, who assisted as ambassador from the emperor at the conferences before the peace of Westphalia. He wrote in Latin, Memoirs of the Transactions which happened at Munster and Osnaburgh between the Catholics and Protestants from 1643 to 1648. He died 1662.

VOLNEY, Constantine Francis Chassebeuf de, a French writer, was born at Craon in 1757. After finishing his education he went to Egypt and Syria, of which countries he published a description in 2 vols. 8vo. 1787. At the beginning of the revolution he became a member of the States-general; but afterwards he purchased an estate in Corsica, where he gave such offence by his opinions that he was obliged to leave the island. In the reign of terror, he suffered imprisonment; but in 1794, he was appointed one of the professors in the new school of education. On the failure of this project Volney went to America, where he had a controversy with Priestley on the origin of Christianity. At the peace he returned to Europe, and died at Paris, April 20, 1802. His other works are,—1. On the Simplification of the Oriental Languages. 2. Chronology of the Twelve Centuries preceding the entrance of Xerxes into Greece. 3. The Ruins, or Meditations on the Revolutions of Empires. 4. The Law of Nature, or Physical Principles of Morality. 5. Account of Corsica. 6. Lectures on History. 7. On the Climate and Soil of the United States of America. 8. The Chronology of Herodotus. 9. New Researches on Ancient History, 3 vols. &c.—W. B.

VOLTAIRE, Marie Francis Arouet de, a French writer of great celebrity, born at Paris, 20th Feb. 1694. He was so feeble at his birth, that it was long doubtful whether he could be reared by the kindest attention of his parents. From his earliest years he evinced superior powers of mind, and a sprightly imagination, so that he said he wrote verses before he left his cradle. He was educated in the college of

Lewis the Great, where he made so astonishing a progress, that Ninon de l'Enclos left him 2000 livres to buy him a library. He was intended for the law; but the muses had greater charms for him, and in the society of the courtiers of Lewis XIV. he acquired those graces of delicate humour and easy expression by which he was so much distinguished. His fondness for satire directed against the government, procured his imprisonment in the Bastille for one year, from which he was liberated by the interference of the duke of Orleans, who was pleased with the representation of Œdipus, the first tragedy which he wrote, 1718. Some of his plays were afterwards unsuccessful on the stage, and the poet, indignant at the severe censures of his countrymen, left Paris, and came to England, where he was much noticed by George I. and queen Caroline, under whose patronage he published his Henriade. Flattered with his reception from the English, and with the handsome property which he had realized by the liberality of his subscribers, he in 1728 returned to Paris, and while with avaricious eagerness he laboured by commerce, and by adventurous undertakings to improve his income, he devoted the best part of his time to literary pursuits. His Brutus, the most nervous of his tragedies, appeared in 1730, and was soon succeeded by Zara, the most pathetic of his dramatic pieces. His Lettres Philosophiques at this time gave such offence for their profane and indecent witticisms, that they were burnt by a decree of the parliament, and the author for a while withdrew from the public indignation to the seat of Madame de Chatelet on the borders of Lorraine. His Alzire, Mahomet, and Merope, produced soon after, placed him at the head of the dramatic poets of France, and introduced him to the court as the favourite of Madame Pompadour. He was appointed gentleman of the bed-chamber to the king, and historiographer of France, and in 1746 was gratified in the long coveted honour of a seat in the academy of sciences. Though thus in the possession of popularity, and universally admired for the bold effusions of his muse, he yet found a host of rivals and detractors, and to fly from their persecution, he retired to the court of Berlin. The confidence and familiarity of the Prussian monarch, and a liberal pension of 22,000 livres, for a while commanded his attachment and partiality; but a quarrel with Maupertuis, who was at the head of the Berlin academy, and that spirit of independence and inconstancy which always marked his conduct, soon after brought on his disgrace, and after being dispossessed of a volume of royal verses, which he wished to carry away, he was permitted to leave the kingdom. The publication of an obscene and impious poem at that time rendered his return to Paris dangerous, and, therefore, after staying one year at Colwar, he purchased an estate near Geneva, where he fixed his residence. This place he soon abandoned for Ferney, on the borders of France, where he established a little colony of industrious artisans, and received, in progress of time, the homage and the respect of the learned of Europe. In this peaceful retreat, where he received the adulation of the great, and the liberal presents of crowned heads, especially of his ancient friend the king of Prussia, and of the empress Catharine, he continued long to direct the taste and the literature of the world. At last, in 1778, he ventured to exchange the tranquillity of Ferney for the incense of the capital, and, surrounded with glory and with wealth, he appeared at Paris, where he was received with unusual honours by all the learned bodies, and crowned with the poetic wreath, in the full theatre, amidst applauding thousands. These honours, and the complimentary visits of ceremony which they produced were, however, too burdensome for the great age of the poet, and change of regimen, and continued fatigue, inflamed his blood, and brought on a hæmorrhage. As if foreboding his approaching end, he declared, when he reached Paris, that he came to seek glory and death; and when presented by an artist with a picture of his triumph, he observed, "a tomb would be fitter for me than a triumph." When unable to enjoy his usual rest he took a large dose of opium, which deprived him of his senses, and he died soon after, 30th May, 1778. He was buried at Selieres, between Nogent and Troyes, and his remains were, during the fervour of the revolution, removed to the church of St. Genevieve, at Paris, by a decree of the convention. Voltaire was an extraordinary character; as the leader of a new sect he has caused a revolution in wit and morals, and whilst he has often exerted his powerful talents to promote the cause of reason and of humanity, to inspire princes with toleration, and with a horror for war, he has too often, and too successfully, exerted himself in extending principles of irreligion, anarchy, and libertinism. Ever inconstant and wavering, he was the free-thinker at London, the Cartesian at Versailles, the Christian at Nancy, and the infidel at Berlin. From the high character of the moralist, he frequently descended into the buffoon; from the philosopher he became an enthusiast; from mildness he passed to passion; from flattery to satire, from the love of money to the love of luxury; from the modesty of a wise man to the vanity of an impious wit; and from the faith of the humble Christian to the foul language and effrontery of the blasphemous atheist. It has been said, that his physiognomy partook of that of the eagle and of the ape, and his character exhibited him occasionally with sensibility, but void of affection, voluptuous, but without passions, open without sincerity, and liberal without generosity. As a man of letters, he must stand on very high ground in the eye of posterity, for versatility of talents, for brilliancy of imagination, for astonishing ease, for exquisite taste, and for vast extent of knowledge. Besides the pieces already mentioned, he wrote several tragedies, the last of which was Irene—several comedies, the best of which are, l'Indiscret, l'Enfant Prodigue, and Nanine—operas—fugitive pieces—Essai sur l'Histoire Generale—Les Siecles de Louis XIV. et Louis XV.—History of Charles XII.—of the Czar Peter—Melanges de Literature—Dictionnaire Philosophique—Philosophie de l'Histoire, and other works of impious tendency—Theatre of Peter and Th. Corneille, &c. These very voluminous works have appeared in various forms, and by several editors. The most correct edition is that of Geneva, in 30 vols. 4to. and the most copious that of Basil, in 71 vols. 8vo.

VONDEL, Justus, or Josse du, a Dutch poet, born 17th Nov. 1587. His parents were anabaptists, but he quitted their sect for the Roman catholic tenets. With strong natural powers, he for a while disregarded the rules of art, and at the age of 30, began to learn Latin, to enjoy in their original the beauties of the ancient muse. He wrote various poems, collected together in 9 vols. 4to. The best known of these are, the Taking of Amsterdam by Florent V. count of Holland, a work of merit, though wild and irregular—the Destruction of Jerusalem, a tragedy—Palamedes, or Innocence Oppressed, a work which described the fate of Barneveldt, and for which the author was fined 300 livres by the influence of the offended Maurice—Satires, bitterly severe against the ministers of the reformed religion, &c. He lived regardless of worldly affairs, and consequently, died poor, 5th Feb. 1679, aged 91.

VOPISCUS, Flavius, a Syracusan in the reign of Dioclesian, author of the Lives of Aurelian, Tacitus, Florianus, &c. printed with the Historia Augustæ Scriptores.

VORSTIUS, Conrad, a native of Cologne, who studied at Heidelberg, where he took his doctor's degree. He succeeded Arminius in the divinity chair at Leyden, 1611, an appointment which so displeased the Calvinists, that James I. not only caused his book De Deo to be burnt publicly in London, but prevailed upon the states of Holland, by entreaties and by threats, to banish the offending divine. This persecuted man at last found protection in Holstein, and died at Tonningen, 1622. His remains were conveyed to Frederickstadt, the newly built city of the Arminians, and buried with great pomp. His works are chiefly on controversial and theological subjects. His son William Henry was minister of the Arminians at Warmond, in Holland, and wrote several tracts, &c.

VORSTIUS, Ælius Everard, a native of Ruremonde, professor of medicine at Leyden, where he died 1624, aged 59. He wrote De Annulorum Origine—the Fishes of Holland—an Historical Voyage, &c. in Magna Græcia, &c. His son Adolphus was also professor of medicine at Leyden, and died 1663, aged 66. He published a Catalogue of the Plants in the Botanical Garden of Leyden.

VORTIGERN, a British chief, elected king after the departure of the Romans from the island, 445. To repel the invasion of the Picts and Scots, he called to his assistance the Saxons, and when these warlike tribes landed under the command of Hengist and Horsa, Vortigern granted them large domains. He afterwards married Rowena, Hengist's daughter, and granted him the kingdom of Kent, after which he retired to Wales, and was it is said burned in his castle about 484.

Vos, Martin de, a painter of Antwerp. He studied in Italy, and was intimate with Tintoret. His landscapes, historical pieces, &c. possessed singular merit. He died in his native town, 1604, aged 70.

Vossius, Gerard John, a learned writer, born near Heidelberg, 1577. He studied at Dort, and in 1595, removed to Leyden, and he acquired such reputation for learning and for merit, that though young, he was, 1599, elected to the office of director of the college of Dort. He was in 1614 appointed director of the theological college of Leyden, and four years after was placed in the chair of eloquence and chronology. Though he endeavoured to avoid all controversy, he incurred the displeasure of the Gomarists in his history of Pelagianism, and was expelled from the communion of the Antiremonstrants. Thus persecuted in Holland, he found friends and protection in England, and by the influence of Laud he obtained a prebend in Canterbury cathedral, and was honoured with the degree of doctor of laws at Oxford 1629. On the erection of the university of Amsterdam in 1630, Vossius was regarded as a most proper person to support by his learning and abilities the new establishment, and notwithstanding the clamours of his enemies and the opposition of Leyden against the institution, he was called to fill the chair of history. He died there 1649, aged 72. His works were published in 6 vols. fol. 1695. The best known of these are, Etymologicon Linguae Latinae—de Origine et Progressu Idolatriæ—de Historicis Græcis—de Hist. Latinis—

Arte Grammatica, &c. By his first wife, whom he married at Dort 1602, and who died 1607, he had three children, and by the second he had five sons and two daughters, of whom only one son survived him.

VOSSIUS, Francis, brother of the preceding, was author of a poem on a naval triumph obtained by Von Tromp, and died 1645.

VOSSIUS, Dionysius, son of Gerard John V. was celebrated for his learning, which it is said, in consequence of his intense application, hastened his death. He wrote valuable notes on the work of Moses Maimonides, with a Latin translation, and died 1633, at Amsterdam, aged 22.

VOSSIUS, Gerard, third son of Gerard John V. was an able critic, who edited, with valuable notes, Velleius Paterculus, 1639, in 16mo. and died 1640. His brother Matthew, wrote a valuable chronicle of Holland and Zealand in Latin, 4to. and died 1646.

VOSSIUS, Isaac, youngest of the children of Gerard John V. was born at Leyden 1618. He was educated under the care of his father, and acquired such celebrity that he was invited to Sweden to teach queen Christina the Greek language. He received in 1663, a handsome present from Lewis XIV. with a flattering letter from Colbert, and on his visit to England in 1670, he was courteously received by Charles II. made doctor of laws at Oxford, and appointed canon of Windsor, with apartments in the castle, where he died 10th Feb. 1688. The valuable library which he left was regarded as the best in the world, and it was purchased by the university of Leyden. Though learned and well informed, Vossius was weak and credulous, and though he wrote a book to prove the Septuagint to be the work of inspired writers, he ventured in private conversation to dispute the truths and reality of a revelation, in consequence of which Charles, well acquainted with his belief in fabulous stories, exclaimed, "there is nothing which Vossius refuses to believe, except the Bible." His works are very numerous, but may perhaps be regarded as less valuable than those of his father. The character of these two illustrious men has been drawn by the journalists of Trevoux, with great accuracy. Nothing, say they, is more different than the make of their understandings. In the father judgment prevails, imagination in the son; the father labours slowly, the son goes on with ease; the father distrusts the best founded conjectures, the son loves nothing but conjectures; bold and daring, the father's aim was to instruct, the son's to parade and make a noise; truth was the father's object, and novelty the son's. In the father we admire vast erudition orderly arranged, and clearly expressed, in the son a dazzling turn of style, singular thoughts, and a vivacity which pleases even in a bad cause. The father was a man of probity and religion, and regular in his manners, the son was a libertine in principle and practice, he made religion the object of his insults, and only studied to find the weak sides of it, and as to his morality his obscene notes on Catullus will too fully prove the licentiousness of his heart.

Vossius, Gerard, a Roman catholic ecclesiastic, distantly related to the preceding. He died at Liege, where he was born 1609. He edited and enriched with Latin versions and with notes, the works of Gregory Thaumaturgus, Ephrem Syrus, and some of the pieces of J. Chrysostom and Theodoret, besides a commentary of Cicero's Somnium Scipionis.

VOUET, Simon, a celebrated painter, born at Paris 1582. After studying under his father, who was a painter, he visited Constantinople, Venice, and Italy, and settling at Rome he was patronised by pope Urban VIII. and made prince of the Roman academy of St. Luke. He was recalled in 1627, after a residence of 14 years at Rome, by Lewis XIII. and he was employed in adorning the palaces of the Louvre, Luxemburg, St. Germain's, and other places. Though he had no genius for grand compositions, and was unacquainted with the rules of perspective, he was a great master in colouring, and to him France is indebted for banishing the insipid and barbarous manner which then prevailed. As the founder of the French school, he had numerous and respectable pupils, le Brun, Perrier, Mignard, le Sueur, Dorigny, and others, who in acquiring celebrity to themselves, reflected high honour on their instructor. He died, worn more with labour than with years, 1641, aged 59. The best part of his work was engraved by his son-in-law Dorigny.

VROON, Henry Cornelius, a native of Haerlem, who in a voyage to Spain was shipwrecked on the coast of Portugal. As he was well skilled in painting he drew a representation of the storm which had nearly proved fatal to him, and with such success that he met with general approbation. When the earl of Nottingham wished to have the defeat of the armada transmitted to posterity on a suit of tapestry, Vroon was selected for the work, and his execution was equal to the celebrity of the subject. It remains still in the house of lords a monument of his genius, and of the glorious victory of Elizabeth's navy. The time of his death is unknown.

WAD

WACE, Robert, a native of Jersey, clerk of the chapel to Henry II. of England, and canon of Bayeux, flourished in the middle of the 12th century, and wrote, Rhon, or the Dukes of Normandy, in French verse.

WADING, Peter, a native of Waterford, in Ireland, who entered among the Jesuits, and was professor of theology at Prague, and afterwards at Louvain for 16 years. He was also chancellor of the universities of Prague and Gratz, in Stiria, and was highly esteemed for his virtues and learning. He wrote poems, and various other works in Latin, and died at Gratz, 1644, aged 58.

WADING, Luke de, an Irish cordelier, who settled at Rome, where he died 1655, author of Annals of his Order, 4 vols.—Bibliothèque des Ecrivains Cordeliers, &c.

WADSWORTH, Thomas, a native of St. Saviour's, Southwark, educated at Christ's college, Cambridge. He obtained Newington Butts, and was remarkable for his charity, but at the restoration he was ejected from the living of St. Laurence Pulteney. He afterwards preached at Newington Theatral's, &c. and died of the stone, 29th Oct. 1676, aged 46, much respected for his piety and learning. His works are the Immortality of the Soul, and on theological subjects.

WADSWORTH, Benjamin, president of Harvard college, Massachusetts, was born at Milton in 1669, and graduated in 1690 at Harvard. He was ordained pastor of the first church in Boston in 1696, and preached there till his election to the presidency in 1725. His mind was marked by strength more than brilliancy, and his style of preaching more by gravity than animation. He possessed a most tenacious memory. His learning was considerable, and his piety exemplary. He died in 1737.  L.

WAFFER, Lionel, a surgeon of London, who made several voyages to the South Seas, of which he published an account 1699, translated into French by Montirat, 1706, 12mo.

WAGENSEIL, John Christopher, a learned German, born at Nuremberg, 26th Nov. 1633. He studied at Stockholm and Altorf, and afterwards travelled as tutor to some persons of distinction, with whom he visited Holland, France, Spain, England, and Italy, and received every where those marks of respect and attention which his reputation and learning deserved. Louis

XIV. treated him with great liberality, and the university of Orleans honoured him with the title of doctor of laws, but though solicited to settle abroad, he preferred literary distinction at home, and after an absence of six years he was placed in the chair of law and history at Altorf. He afterwards exchanged the professorship of history for that of oriental languages, and after being honoured with the confidence of the count Palatine of the Rhine, and the notice of the emperor, he died 9th Oct. 1705, aged 72. He wrote a treatise de Urbe Noribergæ, 4to.—Pera Librorum Juveniliū, 12mo.—Tela Ignea Satanae, 2 vols. 4to. &c.

WAGNER, John James, a Swiss physician, librarian to the town of Zurich, and member of the academy of the curious in nature. He published Historia Naturalis Helvetiæ Curiosa, 12mo. and died 1695, aged 54.

WAGSTAFFE, Thomas, a native of Warwickshire, educated at the Charter-house, and New Inn hall, Oxford, where he took his degrees in art. He obtained Martins-thorp rectory in Rutlandshire, and in 1684, was made chancellor of Litchfield, and rector of St. Margaret Pattens, London. At the revolution he refused to take the oaths, and was deprived of his ecclesiastical preferments, and then practised physic for some years with success. He was in 1693, consecrated suffragan bishop of Thetford, and died Oct. 17th, 1712, aged 67. He wrote several tracts in defence of the constitution, according to the tenets of the non-jurors, and he ably supported the title of Charles I. to be author of the Eikon Basilike.

WAILLY, Noel Francis de, a native of Amiens, distinguished as a philologist. He wrote a French Grammar of great merit, often republished—Principles of the Latin tongue—on Orthography—translations of Cæsar's Commentaries, and Cicero's Orations, 4 vols. 12mo. &c. He died at Paris, 1801.

WAKE, William, an eminent prelate born at Blandford, Dorsetshire, 1657. He was in 1672 admitted at Christ church, and when in orders he became preacher to the Grays-inn society. In 1689 he took his degree of D.D. and was appointed deputy clerk to the closet, and chaplain to William and Mary, and soon after canon of Christchurch, in 1694 rector of St. James's, Westminster, dean of Exeter 1701, bishop of Lincoln 1705, and translated to Canterbury, Jan. 1715-16. He was engaged, 1697, in a severe controversy with Atterbury with respect to the rights of convocation, but though several of the clergy entered the lists on both sides, the State of the Church and Clergy of England, &c. fol. by Dr. Wake, was the most masterly, luminous and satisfactory performance, published on the subject. In other writings he also ably vindicated the church against the papists, and while he earnestly wished in his discourses, and in his correspondence, to form a union between the churches of England and France, he was indefatigable in supporting the rights and tenets of the protestants. This truly learned and virtuous man died at Lambeth, 24th Jan. 1736-7, leaving several daughters. Besides his controversial works he published a translation of the epistles of the Apostolical Fathers, 8vo.—Exposition of the church Catechism, often edited—Tracts against Popery—sermons and charges.

WAKE, Isaac, a native of Northamptonshire, educated at Merton college, Oxford, of which he became fellow 1598. He was public orator to the university, and afterwards went as ambassador from England to Venice, Savoy, and France. He was knighted, and died abroad 1632. He was author of Rex Platonicus—Discourse on the 13 Helvetic Cantons—on the State of Italy—on the Proceedings of the king of Sweden, &c.

WAKEFIELD, Robert, an eminent divine, born in the north of England, and educated at Oxford. He afterwards travelled abroad, and acquired such reputation that the emperor appointed him, 1519, professor of Hebrew at Louvain. He, however, soon left the continent for the patronage of Henry VIII. and he became Hebrew professor at Oxford, 1530, and canon of Christ church. He was author of several Latin pamphlets on the abuses of the papal power—on the Celibacy of the Clergy—Syntagma Hebraorum—a paraphrase of Ecclesiastes, &c. and died in London 1537.

WAKEFIELD, Gilbert, a native of Nottingham, educated under Mr. Woodeson, at Kingston on Thames, where his father was minister, and at Jesus college, Cambridge, where he took his first and only degree 1776. When in deacon's orders he obtained Stockport curacy, Cheshire, and soon after removed to Liverpool and married. He quitted the church in 1779 for the situation of tutor in the dissenting academy at Warrington, and on its dissolution he removed to Hackney college where he continued about one year. The French revolution at this time gave rise to several political publications, and among others Mr. Wakefield excited the public attention by the violence of his attacks, and the animosity of his observations on the conduct of government. These publications were disregarded by the ministry, as the efforts of virulent licentiousness or disappointed ambition, but his letter to the bishop of Landaff appeared so hostile to the interests of the state, and to the safety of the establishment, that he was prosecuted by the attorney-general. and immured for two years in Dorchester jail. His imprisonment expired May, 1801, but a fever carried him to his grave the following September, in his 45th year. As a scholar he is entitled to high and unreserved praise, and had his talents been always directed in the paths of classical literature, he might have acquired greater fame, and added much to his domestic happiness from the respect and good opinion of men of all parties, and of every denomination. Unfortunately, however, attached to Socinian and levelling principles, he was restless and dissatisfied under a government which afforded him protection and safety; and while he wished to prostrate in the dust the noblest monuments of human wisdom in legislation and in government, he boldly claimed the exercise of an unlimited sway over the opinions, the prejudices, and the attachments of his fellow-subjects. The best known of his publications are a collection of Latin poems, with notes on Homer, 1776—Inquiry into the Opinions of the Christian Writers of the three first Centuries concerning the Person of J. C. 4 vols. 8vo.—Sylva Critica—a pamphlet against Public Worship, which gave general offence, and was answered chiefly by dissenters—translation of the New Testament, 2 vols. 8vo.—Tragediarum Græcarum Delectus, 2 vols. 12mo.—Lucretius edited, 3 vols. 4to.—Horace edited, &c. He also published Memoirs of himself, 8vo. little interesting.

WALDECK, Christian Augustus, prince of, an Austrian general, employed in 1759 against the Turks, and in 1792 against the French. He lost an arm at the siege of Thionville, and afterwards distinguished himself with Wurmser in carrying the lines of Weissemburg. He continued to serve his country with high distinction, and in 1798 passed into Portugal, where he was named commander-in-chief. He died 1798, aged 54, highly respected as a general, and as a warrior.

WALDO, Peter, a merchant of Lyons, who, in the 12th century, became the founder of the new sect of the Waldenses. The sudden death of a friend by his side, had such an effect upon him that he made a vow of consecrating himself more immediately to the service of God. He distributed his goods to the poor, and as preacher of the gospel, collected around him thousands of followers in Dauphiné, Provence, and other provinces of France, but notwithstanding the correct conduct and inoffensive morals of his sect, as he entertained opinions contrary to the interests of Rome, he was declared an enemy to the church, and persecution and war were raised against him. Though thousands fell in this bloody and unequal contest, the sect spread from France to Piedmont, and long maintained itself against all opposition.

WALEs, William, an English mathematician who accompanied captain Cook in his first voyage round the world, as astronomer, and was recommended on his return, to the place of mathematical master at Christ's hospital. He was author of Account of Astronomical Observations in the Southern Hemisphere, 4to.—remarks on Foster's account of Cook's voyage—inquiry into the Population of England and Wales—Robertson's Elements of Navigation improved—a Dissertation on the Achronical Rising of the Pleiades, inserted in Dr. Vincent's Periplus. He died 1799.

WALEs, Samuel, D.D. professor of divinity in Yale College, was graduated at that institution in 1767, and was not long after settled in the ministry at Milford, Connecticut. He was appointed to the professorship in 1782, and continued in the office till his death, February 15th, 1794. He was distinguished for talents, learning, and piety. L.

WALKER, Clement, a native of Cliffe, Dorsetshire, educated at Christ church, Oxford. He was usher to the exchequer, and member for Wells, and ably supported the royal cause, during the civil wars. His opposition to the republican government, was so determined that Cromwell sent him to the Tower, where he died, 1651. He was author of the History of Independency, 4to. a curious work—the High Court of Justice, or Cromwell's Slaughter-house, 4to. &c.

WALKER, Edward, a native of Somersetshire, who was made secretary at war 1639, and assisted the king at the battle of Edgehill. He was also garter-king at arms, and received from Charles I. the honour of knighthood, and at the restoration was made one of the clerks of the privy-council. He was author of Historical Discourses, fol.—Order of the Ceremonies observed at the celebration of St. George's feast at the Windsor 1674—Acts of the knights of the Garter in the Civil Wars, &c. and died 1676.

WALKER, Robert, chief painter to Cromwell, died some time before the restoration in an apartment in Arundel-house. One of his pictures of the Protector, was sold to the grand duke of Tuscany for 500*l.* according to the anecdote mentioned by Horace Walpole.

WALKER, John, a native of Devonshire, educated at Exeter college, and made rector of St. Mary's, Exeter, where he died 1725. His attempt towards recovering an account of the sufferings of the clergy, in the great rebellion, fol. 1714, was so honourably received by the public, that the university of Oxford complimented him with the degree of D.D.

WALKER, William, the master of Sir Isaac Newton, was successively appointed to the grammar-schools of Lowth, and of Grantham, and was rector of Colsterworth, Lincolnshire, where he died 1684, aged 61. He was author of a valuable treatise on English Particles, 8vo.—and other useful works in grammar, rhetoric, and logic.

WALKER, Samuel, an English divine, descended from bishop Hall, and born at Exeter, 16th Dec. 1714. He studied at Exeter college, Oxford, and travelled with the son of lord Rolle, and became in 1740, minister of Lanlivery, and in 1746, obtained the living of Truro in Cornwall, where he died 19th July, 1761. He was author of two vols. of Sermons, 8vo.—and discourses on the Catechism, 2 vols. 8vo.

WALKER, George, an Irish clergyman, born of English parents in the county of Tyrone, celebrated as the governor of Londonderry, which he gallantly defended against the attacks of James II. till relieved by the English. His valour was handsomely rewarded by king William, whom he accompanied in his Irish campaigns. He was slain at the battle of the Boyne, as he crossed the water.

WALKER, Obadiah, a native of Yorkshire, educated at University college, where he became fellow. Though deprived of his fellowship by the parliament in 1648, he was made master of the college at the restoration, and turned papist to keep his place under James II. He was dismissed from the headship at the revolution, and returned to the house of his pupil Dr. Radcliffe, where he was honourably maintained till his death 1698. He was buried in St. Pancras's churchyard. He wrote among other things a violent pamphlet against Luther and his opinions—Life of Christ, &c.

WALKER, John, an ingenious writer, author of "the pronouncing Dictionary of the English language," and several other works of excellence, on grammar, and elocution. He was for nearly 40 years teacher of elocution, and with such reputation and success, that he acquired a very comfortable competence. His literary as well as his many virtues recommended him to the notice of the learned, and he had among his particular friends and patrons, Dr. Johnson, Edmund Burke, and other eminent characters. He died 1st Aug. 1807, in his 76th year, at his apartments, Tottenham-court road.

WALKER, Adam, a philosophical lecturer, was born in Westmoreland, and brought up to the weaving business. While thus employed, he amused himself in constructing the models of mills, and devoted so much time to study, that, at the age of fifteen, he was qualified to be an usher in a school. He next became writing-master and accountant to the free-school at Macclesfield; after which he travelled as a lecturer, and in 1778 settled in London, where he met with great encouragement. He invented the Eidouranion, or transparent orrery; the rotatory lights in the islands of Scilly; and various useful engines. His literary works are—1. Lectures on Experimental Philosophy. 2. Ideas suggested in an Excursion through Flanders, Germany, Italy, and France. 3. Remarks in a Tour to the Lakes of Westmoreland and Cumberland, &c. 4. A System of Familiar Philosophy. 5. A Treatise on Geography and the Use of the Globes, &c. He died at Richmond, aged 90, Feb. 11th, 1821.—W. B.

WALKER, George, a mathematician, was born about 1735 at Newcastle-upon-Tyne. He studied at Glasgow; and in 1757 was ordained pastor of a congregation of dissenters at Durham; from whence, in 1761, he removed to Great Yarmouth, where he remained till 1771, when he accepted the office of mathematical tutor at Warrington. In 1774 he went to Nottingham, and in 1798 to Manchester. He died in London in 1807. As a mathematician he is known by a "Treatise on the Doctrines of the Sphere;" and papers in the transactions of the Royal Society, of which he was a member. He was also president of the Literary and Philosophical Society of Manchester, in whose memoirs are some of his essays. His sermons and political tracts were published after his death, in 2 vols. 8vo.—W. B.

WALL, Martin, M.D. a native of Powick, Worcestershire, educated at Worcester school, and Worcester college, Oxford. He was in 1735 elected fellow of Merton, and afterwards settled at Worcester, where he practised with great reputation. He died at Bath 27th June, 1776, aged 68, and was buried in the Abbey church. He had a strong genius for painting, and would have excelled in the art if he had practised it. Two of the frontispieces to Harvey's Meditations were by his pencil. He wrote a treatise on the Malvern waters—some medical tracts, &c. edited by his son at Oxford in 8vo. 1780.

WALLACE, sir William, a celebrated Scotchman, descended from a poor but ancient family. Feeling for the miseries of his country, he determined to free it from English slavery, and collecting a small but resolute band, fell unexpectedly upon the enemy's troops amounting to 40,000 men, and slew their leader lord Warren. Thus deservedly regarded as the saviour of his country, he was appointed regent of the kingdom during the captivity of John Baliol, and penetrating into England, laid waste the county of Durham with fire and sword. These victories recalled Edward I. from Flanders, he hastened to meet the Scotch, and totally routed their forces, but though defeated, Wallace retired in security to the impregnable fastnesses of the mountains, and defied the power of the English. Disgusted with the jealousy of the nobles, Wallace abdicated his important offices, and lived in privacy, but his valour was so formidable to the English monarch, that he was meanly betrayed into his hands, and treated as a traitor, and after being executed in 1303, his four quarters were hung in derision in the four principal towns of England.

WALLER, Edmund, an English poet, born 3d March, 1625, at Coleshill in Herts, near Amersham. He was educated at Eton, and King's college, Cambridge, and was chosen, when scarce seventeen, member for Amersham, in the last parliament of James I. He became early known to the public, by carrying off a rich heiress against a rival whose pretensions were espoused by the court, but his matrimonial happiness was of short duration, as he was a widower at the age of 25. Though noticed by the court, and flattered by the nobility on account of his wit and vivacity, he did not neglect the muses, but imbibed a deep taste for the beauties of ancient writers, by his acquaintance with Morley, afterwards bishop of Winchester, who for several years enjoyed the comforts of hospitality and friendship under his roof. In his parliamentary conduct he warmly opposed the measures of the court, and in the impeachment of judge Crawley, he spoke with such eloquence and animation, that 20,000 copies of his speech were sold in one day. He was in 1642 one of the commissioners who proposed conditions of peace from the parliament to the king at Oxford, but the following year his popularity vanished on an accusation of a conspiracy to reduce the city of London, and the Tower, to the service of the monarch. In this design he was assisted by some members of parliament, and other inferior persons, but though they were all condemned to death, only two were hanged, and Waller purchased his life and liberty after one year's imprisonment, by a heavy fine of 10,000*l.* After this disgrace he retired to France, and lived chiefly at Rouen, and on his return to England, after some time he paid his court to the men in power, and became a great favourite with Cromwell, whose death he embalmed in the most fulsome language of panegyric. So great was the versatility of his talents, and of his disposition, that after being in confidence with the usurper, he became the favourite of the second Charles, and celebrated the restoration as the happiest of events. He continued also in the good graces of James II., and died of a dropsy at Beaconsfield 1st. Oct. 1687, and was buried in the churchyard there, where a monument is erected over his remains. In his character Waller was agreeable and insinuating, his discourse was admired for its keenness, and vivacity, and in the house of commons his speeches were heard with unusual attention, not only from the elegance of his delivery, but the force of his wit, and the quickness of his remarks. Though courted however as a man of the world, he was in other respects, says Clarendon, of an abject temper, without courage to support him in any virtuous undertaking, and of the most insinuating and servile flattery. The virulence which he showed in joining the persecution of Clarendon is not free from censure, and though he was refused, by his means, the office of provost of Eton, he ought to have shrunk from the appearance of an accuser against the virtuous chancellor. As a poet Waller is entitled to the highest praise. He may be called, as has been observed, the parent of English verse, and the first who showed us that our language had beauty and numbers. The English tongue came into his hands like a rough diamond, he polished it first, and to that degree, that all succeeding artists have admired the workmanship, without pretending to mend it. Waller was twice married, and left several sons and daughters. The best edition of his works is that of 1730 in 4*to.* containing his poems, speeches, and letters, with valuable notes by Fenton.

WALLEY, John, judge of the superior court of Massachusetts, in 1690 commanded the land forces in the expedition of sir William Phips against Canada. He was a principal founder of the town of Bristol, Rhode Island. He was for some time a member of the council of Massachusetts, and a judge of the superior court, and discharged the duties of those stations with ability, and was highly respected for talents, integrity, and amiableness. L.

WALLIS, John, an able mathematician, son of a clergyman, born at Ashford, in Kent, 23d Nov. 1616. From Felsted school, he removed in 1632, to Emanuel college, Cambridge, and soon after taking his degree he was elected fellow of Queen's. After living for some time as chaplain in the family of sir Richard Darley, and of lady Vere, he became in 1644 secretary to the Westminster assembly of divines, and married. In 1649 he was appointed Savilian professor of geometry at Oxford, and he removed thither from London, where he had long resided, and by his efforts laboriously assisted in laying the foundation of the learned body, afterwards denominated Royal Society. He entered at Exeter college, and in 1654, was admitted to the degree of D. D. and four years after he was appointed, after some opposition, keeper of the university archives. At the restoration he was received with kindness by Charles II. made his chaplain, and not only confirmed in his academical offices, but selected as one of the divines to review the liturgy. He died at Oxford, 28th Oct. 1703, aged 88, and was buried in St. Mary's church at Oxford, where a monument has been erected to his memory. He left one son and two daughters. Respected as a man of learning, Dr. Wallis was, during the turbulent times in which he lived, universally esteemed for the moderation of his principles, and the mild demeanour which marked his compliance with the various powers in being. Whilst he regarded only the advancement and the interests of religion, of virtue, and of the public good, he lamented the miseries which afflicted his country, and endeavoured, in the enjoyment of privacy and learned ease, to live useful and not great. His works are very numerous; but though what he wrote on divinity is most respectable, yet it is from his mathematical labours that he has real claims to lasting celebrity. The best known of his works are, Animadversions on lord Brooke's Nature of Truth, &c.—Animadversions on Baxter's Aphorisms, &c.—Grammatica Linguae Anglicanae, &c.—Elenchus Geometriæ Hobbianaë, with other pamphlets, against Hobbes—Mathesis Universalis, 4to.—Commercium Epistolicum de Quæstionibus Mathem. 4to.—de Cycloide, &c.—de Æstu Maris Hypothesis, &c.—the works of Archimedes edited, and also Ptolemy's Opus Harmonicæ—Appendix de Veterum Harmonicâ, &c. His theological works appeared in 1699, 3 vols. folio, dedicated to king William.

WALLIUS, James, a native of Courtrai, distinguished among the Jesuits for his learning and his talents as a Latin poet. He died 1680, aged 81. He wrote elegies—odes—heroic pieces—paraphrases, &c.

WALPOLE, sir Robert, earl of Oxford, an illustrious minister, born at Houghton in Norfolk, 6th Sept. 1674. He was educated at Eton, and elected to a fellowship at King's college, Cambridge; but he resigned it on the death of his elder brother, to whose estates he succeeded. He was elected into parliament in 1700, for King's Lynn, and gradually rose to consequence in the nation. In 1705 he became one of the counsellors of George, prince of Denmark, and secretary at war, and in 1709 treasurer of the navy, but lost all his places the next year on the change of the ministry. In 1711 he was voted by the house guilty of misdemeanors, and of corruption in his office of secretary at war; but though he was expelled from the house, and confined in the Tower, it is fully evident that he owed this disgraceful sentence, not to his own misconduct, but to the violence of his political opponents, who resented his firm attachment to the Marlborough family, and were jealous of the powerful influence of his oratorical powers in the house. His ignominy was regarded as the cause of the Whigs, he was returned for King's Lynn, and though the election was declared void, his constituents nobly persisted in their choice. His attachment to the Hanoverian interest was rewarded on the accession of George I. he was made paymaster-general of the forces, and a privy counsellor, and soon raised to the arduous office of chancellor of the exchequer, and first lord of the treasury. His zeal in the impeachment of Oxford, Bolingbroke, Ormond, and Strafford, had rendered him popular in the nation, and a favourite of the court; but after two years the ministry was divided, and sir Robert gave way to the more powerful influence of Stanhope. Now engaged in the ranks of opposition, he directed the shafts of his nervous eloquence against all the measures of the court, and even shared the honours and the popularity of patriotism with Wyndham and Shippen; but by degrees his acrimony softened, and the zealous and watchful defender of public rights became again the fawning courtier, and was restored soon after to the high and responsible situation of premier. Thus the favourite minister of the king, he continued at the head of affairs during the reigns of the first and of the second George, till at last in 1742, the clamour of opposition prevailed, and sir Robert, unable to carry a majority in the House of Commons, retired from his dangerous eminence, and took shelter behind the throne. He was created earl of Orford, and as the reward of his long-tried services, the king granted him a pension of 4000*l.* This extraordinary character, who so long guided the destinies of England by the powers of eloquence as well as by intrigue and by corruption, and who, in the possession of ministerial influence, boasted that he knew the price of every man, was, in private life amiable, kind, and benevolent, and fully deserved the unsolicited, and therefore impartial praises of Pope's elegant muse. The last years of his life were spent in retirement and tranquillity on his estate in Norfolk, where he died 18th March, 1745-6, aged 71. Lord Orford was author of various pamphlets on political subjects, which have passed into gradual oblivion, with the subjects in which they originated. An interesting and well-written account of the administration of lord Orford, has appeared from the elegant pen of Mr. Coxe.

WALPOLE, Horace, youngest son of the preceding, was born 1717, and educated at Eton, where his acquaintance with Gray commenced. In 1734 he went to King's college, Cambridge, and there distinguished himself by his elegant verses in honour of Henry VI. the founder of Eton school. Under the patronage of his father, he obtained, in 1738, the office of inspector of exports and imports, which he afterwards exchanged for that of usher to the exchequer, with which he held the place of comptroller of the pipe, and of clerk of the escheats in the exchequer for life, appointments of the annual value of nearly 5000*l.* In 1739 he was permitted by his father to travel on the continent, and accompanied by Gray he made the tour of France and Italy; but a dispute at Reggio unfortunately separated the two friends, whose intimacy was again renewed in 1744, to the honour of both. On his return to England in 1741, he was elected into parliament; but though he sat in the house for above 25 years, he never distinguished himself as a speaker, except on one occasion, in defence of his father in 1742. On giving up his seat in parliament, he retired to his favourite house at Strawberry-hill, near Twickenham, which he had purchased in 1747, and tastefully adorned with all the striking features of Gothic times. In this charming spot the literary hermit opened in 1757 a printing press, where he published first the two sublime odes of his friend Gray, and afterwards edited other works in an elegant and highly finished style. On the death of his nephew in 1791, he succeeded to the title of earl of Orford, but elevation of rank had no charms for him. He never took his seat in the House of Lords, and with reluctance submitted to the respect or adulation of his friends in assuming an empty title, which he contemptuously called a new name for a superannuated old man of 74. Respectable as a man of letters, lord Orford was distinguished for his extensive information; he was polite in his manners, facetious in his conversation, and in his sentiments, lively, intelligent, and acute. If avarice and vanity were, according to one of his biographers, his leading foibles, affability, and a companionable temper were his most distinguishing virtues. He was of a benignant and charitable disposition; but it must be confessed, that no man ever existed, who had less the character of a liberal patron. He died at his house in Berkeley square, 2d March, 1797, aged 80. The best known of his works are, a Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors, re-published with great additions by Th. Park, in 5 vols. Svo. 1806—Historic Doubts concerning Richard III.—Anecdotes of Painting enlarged from Vertue—the Castle of Otranto, an interesting romance in the marvellous style, written in eight days—Essay on Modern Gardening—the Mysterious Mother, a tragedy, &c. His works have been collected together in a splendid edition, 5 vols. 4to. Anecdotes concerning him, his family, &c. have appeared in 2 vols. 12mo. called Walpoliana, in 1800.

WALSH, William, an English poet, born at Abberley, in Worcestershire, about 1663. He entered as gentleman commoner at Wadham college, Oxford; but though he left the university without a degree, he applied himself with such assiduity to literature, at home, and in London, that he became, in Dryden's opinion, the best critic of the nation. He was for several years member of parliament, and gentleman of the horse to queen Anne; but he derives greater celebrity from the acquaintance with Dryden and of Pope, than from his intimacy with the great and the powerful. He has been praised by Pope in his Essay on Criticism, and though he possesses not the fame of a great poet, he is to be admired for the correctness of his language, and the sportive graces of his muse. The time of his death is not certain, though it is generally supposed to have happened about 1709. His works are, a Dialogue concerning Women, being a Defence of the Sex, 8vo.—letters and poems, amorous and gallant, 8vo.—Essay on Pastoral Poetry—Defence of Virgil—elegies, epitaphs, odes, and songs.

WALSINGHAM, Thomas, a Benedictine monk of St. Albans, historiographer to the king in the 15th century. His works are, Historia Brevis from the conclusion of the third Henry's reign, where Matthew Paris ends,—and Hypodigma Neustriæ, both published by archbishop Parker, 1574.

WALSTEIN, Albert, duke of Friedland, distinguished himself in the service of the emperor, and was rewarded with part of the lands of the revolted duke of Mecklenburg. When Germany was invaded by Gustavus Adolphus, he was placed at the head of the imperial armies, and defeated the enemy, though he was afterwards beaten at the battle of Lutzen, 1632. His popularity was such among his soldiers, that the emperor, afraid of his influence, appointed him a successor; but Walstein, unwilling to yield his power, demanded and received the sworn allegiance of his army, and declared himself independent, 1634. He was murdered a month after, by the cruel and cowardly suggestion of the emperor, who thus cut off an enemy whom he despaired of destroying in the field of battle.

WALSINGHAM, Sir Francis, an illustrious statesman, under Elizabeth, born at Chislehurst, Kent, of an ancient family. He was educated at King's college, Cambridge, and improved his knowledge by travelling. He was twice ambassador from England to France, and was, with difficulty, saved from the horrible massacre of St. Bartholomew. His services abroad were rewarded at home, with the office of secretary of state, and his vigilance and abilities were directed in establishing the protestant religion, and in strengthening the throne of his sovereign.

He possessed such deep penetration, and such address, that he discovered the political intrigues of foreign courts, and by means of the 53 agents, and 15 spies which he entertained abroad, procured the earliest intelligence of the designs of the enemies of his country, and often removed the scruples of his coadjutors, by producing copies of the most secret articles of diplomatic confidence. He was, in 1578, sent as ambassador to the Netherlands, and he afterwards visited France and Scotland in the same capacity. This celebrated statesman, whose labours were indefatigable, dedicated to advance the commerce, and the arts of his country, and to patronise literature, died so poor, in 1589, that, on account of his debts, his remains were privately buried by night in St. Paul's church, without any funeral ceremony. He was in his 90th year. He left one daughter, who had three husbands of high distinction; Sir Philip Sidney, Devereux, earl of Essex, and Bourke, earl of Clanricard. An account of his negotiations and despatches have appeared by the title of the Complete Ambassador, in fol. published by Sir D. Digges, 1655.

WALTER, Thomas, a minister of Roxbury, Massachusetts, was graduated at Harvard college in 1713, and in 1718, settled colleague with his father, and was one of the most distinguished ministers of that time. His mind was of a very superior order, uncommonly energetic, almost intuitive in its perceptions, and rich and glowing in its views. He acquired learning almost without effort, and communicated it without toil. He was a profound scholar, a keen disputant, and a popular preacher. He excelled in the knowledge of music, and published an elementary work on the subject of vocal music, which was long used in New-England. He died in 1725. ¶ L.

WALTER, Thomas, an eminent botanist, was a native of England; a man of liberal education, and much devoted to the study of natural history, and especially of botany. He migrated to America, and settled in South Carolina, a few miles from the city of Charleston, where he resided a number of years as a planter, and where he died toward the close of the eighteenth century. In 1788, he published his "Flora Caroliniana," which is much esteemed. ¶ L.

WALTERS, John, M.A. a Welsh divine, educated at Oxford, and made rector of Llandocan, Glamorganshire, where he died 1797. He published an English Welsh Dictionary, 4to. 1794—a Dissertation on the Welsh Language—sermons, &c.

WALTHER, N. a native of Nuremberg, in the beginning of the 16th century, known as the first who discovered the astronomical refraction of light. He was the friend and the associate of Regiomontanus, whose writings and astronomical instruments he purchased.

WALTHER, Michael, a native of Nuremberg, professor of divinity at Helmstadt. He published, Harmonia Biblica, 4to.—Officina Biblica, 4to.—Mosaica Pastilla, &c. and died 1662, aged 66. His son, of the same name, was divinity professor at Wittenberg, and published some valuable treatises.

WALTHER, Christopher Theodosius, a German missionary to Tranquebar, author of Doctrina Temporum Indica, &c. He died after his return, at Dresden, 1741, aged 42.

WALTHER, Augustin Frederic, professor of anatomy at Leipsic, was author of treatises, De Linguâ Humanâ, 4to.—De Articulis, Ligamentis, et Musculis, 4to.—Academical Dissertations, &c. He died about 1735.

WALTON, Brian, the learned editor of the Polyglott Bible, was born at Cleveland, Yorkshire, 1600. He studied at Magdalen college, and afterwards at Peterhouse, Cambridge, and then officiated as curate in Suffolk and in London. His learning recommended him to the notice of the great; he became rector of St. Martin's Orgar, London, and of Sandon, Essex, and in 1639, took his degree of D.D., and soon after was appointed chaplain to the king, and prebendary of St. Paul's. His activity in defending the rights of the church, rendered him very obnoxious to the presbyterians, so that, on the breaking out of the civil wars, he was accused before parliament as a great delinquent, and stripped of his benefices. He escaped with difficulty to Oxford, where he was incorporated in 1645, and where he formed the noble scheme for his Polyglott Bible. This most valuable and laborious publication was happily completed in the midst of persecution and of civil war, and made its appearance in 1657, in 6 vols. folio, exhibiting the text in the Hebrew, Syriac, Chaldee, Samaritan, Arabic, Æthiopic, Persic, Greek, and Latin languages. His coadjutors in the collating of various copies, were Edmund Castell, Samuel Clarke, Thomas Hyde, Edward Pococke, Whelock, Thorndike, and other learned men. For his services to sacred literature, and his attachment to the royal cause, Walton was, on the restoration, made chaplain to the king, and a little after created bishop of Chester. His reception in his diocese, in the midst of the acclamations of thousands of people, was most flattering to his virtues and popularity, which unhappily was to be short-lived, as he died on his return to London, at his house, Aldersgate-street, 29th November, 1661. He was buried in St. Paul's cathedral. He published besides, Introductio ad Lectionem Linguarum Oriental. Svo.—an able Defence of his Bible—and a pamphlet on the Right of the London Clergy to Tithes.

WALTON, Izaak, an English writer, born at Stafford, Aug. 1593. He for some time kept a shop in the royal exchange, and in Fleet-street, and retired from business with a comfortable competency. He was particularly attached to angling, and he published a most curious and valuable treatise on his favourite amusement, called the Complete Angler, or the Contemplative Man's Recreation, 1653, in 12mo. with cuts, of which a fifth edition appeared in 1676. His time was afterwards usefully employed in compiling accounts of the lives of several of his learned friends, and those which appeared separately have been published together, and exhibit a most pleasing picture of the abilities of the indefatigable author, and abound with interesting and curious anecdotes of men eminent in rank, in talents, and in learning. The characters mentioned are Dr. John Donne, Sir Henry Watton, Hooker, author of Ecclesiastical Polity, George Herbert, and bishop Sanderson. Walton lived to a good old age, respected and beloved by his friends, in the number of whom were archbishops Usher and Sheldon, bishops Morton, Morley, King, Barlow, Drs. Fuller, Price, Holdsworth, &c. He died at the house of Dr. Hawkins, at Winchester, 15th Dec. 1683, aged above 90, and was buried in Winchester cathedral, where an ill-written epitaph marks his remains. The best edition of his Angler is by Sir John Hawkins, and that of his Lives is that by Zouch, in 4to. Another edition has also appeared at Oxford, in 2 vols. 8vo.

WALTON, George, one of the signers of the declaration of American Independence, was one of the four individuals who assumed the responsibility of calling a public meeting of the citizens of Savannah, for the purpose of concerting measures for the defence of the country, in 1774; and was one of the committee which drew up the patriotic resolutions adopted on that occasion. He was active in promoting the revolution at home, and in 1776, was one of the delegates of Georgia in congress. When the enemy attacked Savannah, he was dangerously wounded and taken prisoner. He was released in 1779, and the same year was chosen governor of the state. In 1780 he was again a delegate to congress, and in 1783 was appointed chief justice of the state. In 1787 he was appointed a delegate to the convention which framed the constitution of the United States, but declined taking his seat. In 1793 he was again appointed a judge of the supreme court, in the place of Mr. Houston, and in 1795 was appointed to succeed general Jackson as a senator in congress. He died February 2d, 1804.

WANLEY, Nathaniel, vicar of Trinity church in Coventry, was educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, and died about 1690. He is author of a curious book, called the Wonders of the Little World, or the History of Man, folio.

WANLEY, Humphrey, son of the preceding, was born 21st March, 1671-2, at Coventry. He preferred literature to the drudgeries of trade in which his father had engaged him, and by the friendship of Lloyd, his diocesan, he went to Edmund hall, Oxford, and afterwards removed to University college. By the kindness of Mr. Nelson, he obtained the office of secretary to the society for propagating Christian knowledge, and he afterwards became librarian to lord Oxford, with a liberal pension. In this occupation he arranged with judicious care the Harleian collection, and kept a curious diary of every occurrence in which he was personally concerned. He made some extracts from the MSS. of the Bodleian, and promised a supplement to Hyde's catalogue of the printed books, and intended a treatise on the various characters of MSS. &c. He travelled through England in search of Anglo-Saxon MSS. for Dr. Hickee, and died universally respected, 6th July, 1726.

WANLEB, John Michael, a native of Erfurt in Thuringia, who, after studying at Konigsberg, was employed by the learned Ludolf to come to England, to print his Æthiopic dictionary. The work appeared in London, 1661, and the author charged Wanleb with inserting several ridiculous and improper things without his permission. Wanleb afterwards assisted Dr. Castell in the completion of his Lexicon Heptaglotton, and then was employed by Ernest, duke of Saxe Gotha, to travel into Æthiopia to propagate the Christian religion. He was dissuaded from penetrating to Æthiopia by the patriarch of Alexandria, and therefore, after visiting Egypt, he returned to Europe. Afraid, however, of appearing before the duke, he repaired to Rome and Paris, and was engaged by Colbert to go into the East in search of literary curiosities, and he enriched the French king's library by the purchase of 334 MSS. His conduct, however, displeased Colbert, as it had displeased the duke of Saxe Gotha, and he was recalled to Paris as he was preparing to go to Æthiopia, and he died a few years after, neglected by the government, which had before liberally promised him protection, June, 1679, aged 44. He published some Account of Egypt, and also of the Church of Alexandria.

WANTON, William, governor of Rhode Island, was elected in 1732, and continued in office two years. He had previously been one of the assistants of the colony, and died at Newport, May 9th, 1737, aged 57.

WANTON, John, governor of Rhode Island, was several years an assistant and lieutenant-governor previous to 1734, when he succeeded William Wanton as governor. He continued in office until 1741.

WANTON, Gideon, governor of Rhode Island, was elected in 1745, and again in 1747. He had previously been treasurer of the colony, and died at Newport, September 12th, 1767, aged 74.

WANTON, Joseph, governor of Rhode Island, was elected in 1769, and continued in office until 1775, when he was succeeded by Mr. Cooke. He died at Newport, July 19th, 1780, aged 75.

WARBURTON, William, an illustrious prelate, born at Newark, in Nottinghamshire, 24th Dec. 1698. He was educated at Okeham school, under the care of Mr. Weston, and was brought up to the business of his father, who was an attorney and town-clerk of the town of Newark. Though he practised for some years as an attorney in his native town, it is believed that he had little business, and consequently he applied those high endowments of classical knowledge which he had industriously acquired at school, to pursuits more congenial to his taste and inclination. In 1724 he published miscellaneous translations in prose and verse from Roman historians, &c. and three years after his Critical and Philosophical Inquiry into the Causes of Prodiges and Miracles as related by historians appeared. His learning and abilities in the mean time recommended him to the notice of Theobald, Concanen, and other wits, and by the friendship of Sir Robert Sutton, to whom he had dedicated his two works, he was presented to the living of Burnt Broughton, worth 200*l.* a year. In 1728 he was among those created masters of arts in consequence of the king's visit to Cambridge, and he deserved the honour by his merit and his learning. In 1736, he published the Alliance between Church and State, or the Necessity and Equity of an established Religion and a Test Law, &c. and in 1738, appeared his Divine Legation of Moses, demonstrated on the principles of a religious deist, from the omissions of the doctrines of a future state of rewards and punishments in the Jewish dispensation, in six books. This work drew upon him a host of literary enemies, and he was obliged to vindicate himself against their objections and cavils. In 1739 he defended Pope's Essay on Man, and this ensured him the friendship and attention of this celebrated poet, and a warm recommendation to the learned and the great, and among these to Mr. Ralph Allen, of Prior park. At his death in 1744, Pope left the publication of his works to the judgment of his friend, a bequest worth about 4000*l.* At that time Warburton published an answer to the objections raised against his Divine Legation, and severely directed his censures against Drs. Middleton, Poccocke, Richard Grey, and others. On the following year he cemented his intimacy with Mr. Allen, by marrying his niece, Miss Tucker, an event which procured to him the opulent inheritance of that gentleman's property, and paved the way to preferment and dignity. Though his abilities were now universally acknowledged as an able divine, and a zealous advocate in favour of the church establishment, he yet received no reward from the gratitude of government. In 1746, however, he was unanimously called by the society of Lincoln's inn to be their preacher; in 1754 he was made king's chaplain, and prebendary of Durham, and also honoured with the degree of D.D. by Herring the primate. In 1757 he was advanced to the deanery of Bristol, and two years after his services to religion and literature were rewarded by his nomination to the vacant see of Gloucester. In the last years of his life this learned prelate sunk into deep melancholy, which was aggravated by the loss of his only son, a promising youth, who fell a victim to a consumptive disease. He died in his palace at Gloucester, 7th June, 1779, aged 81, and was buried in his cathedral, where a neat monument records his virtues. His wife survived him. His works are very numerous and highly respectable. Besides the Divine Legation, which he corrected and improved, a work often reprinted, in 3 vols. 8vo. and 2 vols. 4to. and the works already mentioned, he published Julian, or a Discourse on the Earthquake and Fiery Eruptions which defeated that Emperor's Attempt to rebuild the Temple of Jerusalem—sermons, 2 vols. 8vo.—a View of lord Bolingbroke's Philosophy—a tract on the Lord's Supper—a treatise against the Methodists on the Doctrine of Grace—an edition of Shakspeare, severely criticised in the Canons of Criticism by Edwards—Pope's works, 9 vols. 8vo. &c. His works have appeared together in 6 vols. 4to. edited by his friend and zealous advocate bishop Hurd, with an account of his life. Warburton was founder in 1768 of a lecture at Lincoln's inn, to prove the truth of revealed religion from the completion of the Scripture prophecies. The character of Warburton is summed up with great discrimination by Dr. Johnson. He was, as he observes, a man of vigorous faculties, a mind fervid and vehement, supplied by incessant and unlimited inquiry, with wonderful extent and variety of knowledge. To every work he brought a memory full iraught, together with a fancy fertile of original combinations, and at once exerted the powers of the scholar, the reasoner, and the wit. His abilities gave him a haughty consequence, which he disdained to conceal or mollify; and his impatience of opposition disposed him to treat his adversaries with such contemptuous superiority, as made his readers commonly his enemies, and excited against the advocate the wishes of some who favoured the cause. He seemed to have adopted the Roman emperor's maxim, "oderint dum metuant;" he used no allurements of gentle language, but wished to compel rather than to persuade. His style is copious without selection, and forcible without neatness; he took the words that presented themselves; his diction is coarse and impure, and his sentences are unmeasured.

WARD, Samuel, D.D. scholar of Christ college, fellow of Emanuel, and in 1609 master of Sidney, Cambridge, was an able disputant. He was also archdeacon of Taunton, and Margaret professor of divinity, and so well known as a divine, that he was sent to the synod of Dordt, where he relaxed from his rigorous attachment to the doctrines of Calvin. He suffered great persecution during the civil war, and was not only expelled from his offices in the university, but treated with such harshness and severity, that he died in consequence, 1643. He was author of some theological tracts, and many of his letters appear in Usher's collection, folio.

WARD, Edward, a man of low extraction in the 17th century, known as the uncouth imitator of Butler's Hudibrastic rhymes. He wrote the Reformation, a burlesque poem—the London Spy—and Don Quixote in Hudibrastic verse. He was in his principles a great Tory, and the public-house which he kept was frequented by persons of his political opinions.

WARD, Seth, an English prelate, well known as a mathematician and astronomer. He was born at Buntingford, Hertfordshire, 1617, and after studying in the school of his native town, he removed in 1632 to Sydney college, Cambridge. By application and good conduct, he recommended himself to the notice of the master of the college, who though not a relative, was of his own name, and he was elected fellow of the society, but was ejected for refusing to take the covenant. After leaving Cambridge, he was employed as tutor in various respectable families, and on the expulsion of Greaves from the Savilian professorship of astronomy at Oxford, he was appointed to succeed him, and entering at Wadham college, he took the requisite oaths in 1649. In 1654 he had a dispute with Dr. Wallis about precedency in taking their degrees of D.D. and three years after he was chosen principal of Jesus college, but was disappointed by the nomination of Howell to that office by Cromwell. In 1659 he was elected president of Trinity college; but at the restoration he resigned it, and obtained the rectory of St. Lawrence, Jewry, and was installed into the precentorship of Exeter church, which a few years before had been presented to him by the expelled bishop. In 1661 he was made fellow of the Royal Society, and dean of Exeter, and the next year bishop of that see. In 1667 he was translated to Salisbury, and 1671, obtained the chancellorship of the garter, an honour which he had the interest to annex to his successors in the see of Sarum. He unfortunately, in the last years of his life, was deprived of the use of his faculties, and died 1689, a melancholy instance of weak mortality. In his character he was a prudent, pious, and ingenious man, admirably skilled not only in mathematics, but also in all kinds of polite literature, and he was, as bishop Burnet has observed, one of the greatest men of his age. He was author of a Philosophical Essay on the Being and Attributes of a God, &c.; Exercitatio Epistolica in Hobbii Philosophiam, 8vo.; Sermons; a Lecture on Comets; an Idea of Trigonometry; Geometrical Astronomy, &c.

WARD, John, LL.D. a native of London, educated at Utrecht, where he took his law degrees. He was brought up for the ministry among the dissenters, but obtained the place of clerk in the navy office, which he afterwards resigned, and kept an academy in Moorfields. He was in 1720 elected professor of rhetoric at Gresham college, and three years after fellow of the Royal Society, and in 1751 created doctor of laws at Edinburgh, and in 1753 elected a trustee of the British museum, and he died at Gresham college, 17th Oct. 1758, aged 80. He was author of the Lives of the Gresham Professors, 2 vols. folio—Dissertations on Difficult Passages of Scripture, 8vo. besides editions of Lily's Grammar, and of the Westminster Greek Grammar, and he assisted Horsley in his Britannia Romana, and Ainsworth in his Dictionary, &c.

WARD, Richard, two years governor of Rhode Island, succeeded Mr. Wanton in 1740. He had previously been secretary of the colony from 1714 to 1733, and deputy governor. His ancestors, one of whom was an officer in Cromwell's army, were among the first and most respectable settlers of Rhode Island.

WARD, Thomas, son of the preceding, a distinguished scholar. Some few of his manuscripts are still preserved among the members of his family, and many of his classical books, full of valuable notes in his own handwriting were presented by him to the Redwood library, where part of them still remain. He was secretary of Rhode Island, from 1746 till his death, in Dec. 1760.

WARD, Samuel, brother of the preceding, governor of Rhode Island, and a distinguished patriot, held the office of chief justice of the supreme court of that state, for some time. He was chosen governor in 1762, 1765, and 1766. At the commencement of the revolution, he exerted himself vigorously in the cause of liberty; and was elected a member of congress in 1774, and held a seat in that august body till his death by the smallpox in March, 1776. ☞ L.

WARD, Henry, brother of the preceding, was a member of the congress which met at New-York in 1765. He succeeded his brother Thomas as secretary of Rhode Island. In 1775 governor Wanton, being a tory, and having refused to sign the commissions for the officers of the Rhode Island brigade destined for the siege of Boston, Mr. Ward assumed that responsibility as secretary. He, with his brother Samuel, were the principal advocates and supporters of the revolution in that state. He held the office of secretary till his death in December, 1797. It may be worthy of remark, that this same office was held by the father and two of his sons for 70 years of the last century. ☞ L.

WARD, Artemas, the first major-general in the army of the American revolution, was graduated at Harvard college in 1748. He served in the army during the French war, and held a seat for a number of years in the house of representatives and council of Massachusetts, and on the bench of the court of common pleas for Worcester county. He was chosen a member of congress in 1774, and in 1775 appointed the first major-general. He commanded the right wing of the army at Roxbury for some time. He resigned his commission in 1776, and was elected to a seat in congress both before and after the adoption of the present constitution. He was greatly esteemed for his integrity, independence, and fidelity. He died at Shrewsbury, in 1800. ☞ L.

WARD, William, English missionary at Serampore, was born at Derby, October 20th, 1769, and was bred a printer. He was for some time at the head of a printing establishment in Hull, but in May, 1799, embarked with several others for India, and established a press at Serampore, for the purpose of printing the Scriptures, where with the exception of a visit to England and America, for the purpose of collecting funds for the missionary college at Serampore, he continued to labour with great zeal and success, both in his department in the printing establishment, and in his pastoral office until his death, March 7th, 1823, in his fifty-fourth year. ☞ L.

son of the secretary of the lord deputies of Ireland. He was educated at Trinity college, Dublin, and in 1629 he was knighted, and three years after he was, on the death of his father, appointed his successor as auditor-general of the kingdom. In 1639 he was made a privy counsellor; but during the rebellion he was a great sufferer from the violence of the republicans. He came in 1644 as deputy from lord Ormond to Charles I. at Oxford, but was taken at sea on his return, and sent to the Tower. When liberated, he returned to Dublin, and after the surrender of that city, on which occasion he was delivered as an hostage, he was permitted to go to France, and continued at Caen and Paris. On the restoration he recovered his places of auditor-general and of privy counsellor, and died at Dublin, 1st Dec. 1666, aged 62. His works are chiefly on the history and antiquities of Ireland, the best known of which are, de Præsulibus Hiberniæ, folio—the Antiquities of Ireland, folio, &c. His valuable collection of MSS. passed into the hands of lord Clarendon, and afterwards came into the possession of the primate Tenison.

WARGENTIN, Peter, a learned Swede, born 22d Sept. 1717. He became knight of the order of the Polar-star, member of the various learned societies of Europe, and secretary to the academy at Stockholm, where he died at the observatory, 13th Dec. 1783. He published tables for computing the eclipses of Jupiter's Satellites, a valuable work, and contributed 52 memoirs to the transactions of the Stockholm academy.

WARHAM, William, a native of Okeley in Hampshire. He was educated at Winchester school and New college, Oxford, of which he became fellow, 1475. In 1488 he practised as an advocate in the court of Arches, and five years after was sent as ambassador to the court of Burgundy, to solicit the duke not to support the imposture of Warbeck, and he conducted himself so much to the king's satisfaction, that he was appointed chancellor of Wells, and master of the rolls. He was afterwards raised to the dignity of lord chancellor and made bishop of London, and in 1504 translated to Canterbury. The death of Henry VII. greatly altered his situation in the kingdom, and Wolsey the favourite of the new king was raised in his room to the office of chancellor, and soon after acquired the superiority in ecclesiastical affairs, by being nominated legate a latere from the pope. Warham remonstrated in vain against the pride and encroachments of his rival, and died at St. Stephen's, near Canterbury, after filling the see 28 years, and was buried in his cathedral without funeral pomp. His memory is entitled to respect, not only from his munificence.

piety, and moderation, but his liberal patronage of Erasmus and other learned men.

WARIN, John, a native of Liege, famous as an engraver and sculptor. His abilities recommended him to the patronage of Lewis XIII. who appointed him inspector of the royal mint, and engraver general. He engraved the seal of the French academy representing Richelieu, which is regarded as his most perfect piece. His two busts of Lewis XIV. in bronze, and of cardinal Richelieu in gold, are also deservedly admired. He was so avaricious in his character, that he compelled his daughter to marry a man greatly deformed but very rich, and this had such an effect upon the feelings of the unfortunate bride that she poisoned herself ten days after her nuptials, by swallowing sublimate in an egg. He was poisoned himself at Paris by some rival artist, 1672.

WARING, Edward, a native of Shropshire, educated at Magdalen college, Cambridge. He was appointed Lucasian professor of mathematics in 1760, and two years after published his valuable book, Miscellanea Analytica, 4to. He was admitted to the degree of doctor of medicine 1767, and died 1798. He was author besides of Meditationes Analyticae; Proprietates Algebraicarum Curvarum, besides communications to the philosophical transactions, &c.

WARNER, Ferdinando, LL.D. vicar of Roude, Wilts, rector of St. Michael's, Queenhithe, London, and of Barnes, Surrey, was author of a system of divinity and morality, on the most important points of natural and revealed religion, &c. 5 vols. 12mo. reprinted in 4 vols. 8vo. 1756. He published besides some single sermons; Life of sir Thomas More; the History of Ireland, 1 vol. 4to.; History of the Rebellion and Civil War in Ireland, 4to.; Bolingbroke, or a Dialogue on the Origin and Authority of Revelation; an Account of the Gout, &c. This laborious author died of the gout, Oct. 3d 1768, aged 68. His son John was educated at Cambridge, where he took his degree of D.D. 1773. He obtained Hockliffe and Chalton livings in Bedfordshire in 1771, and afterwards Stourton, Wilts. He was author of a learned treatise on the pronunciation of Greek, called Metron Ariston, and he also translated from the Spanish the life of Friar Gerund, in 2 vols. 8vo. He was for some time chaplain to the English embassy at Paris, and died 1800.

WARNER, Richard, a learned botanist, educated at Wadham college, Oxford. Though called to the bar he never followed the profession, but chiefly passed his time at his seat at Woodford Green, Essex, employed in those botanical pursuits which he loved. He wrote Plantæ Wood- fordienses, or a catalogue of the plants in his neighbourhood, 8vo.; Letter to Garrick on a Glossary to Shakspeare, 8vo.; Translations of some of Plautus's Comedies, &c. He left his valuable library to Wadham college, and died 1775.

WARREN, James, who acted a conspicuous part in many of the civil transactions during the contests of the American colonies with Great Britain, was born at Plymouth in 1726, and graduated at Harvard college in 1745. He employed himself a number of years in merchandise. In 1757 he was appointed high sheriff, and held the office till the opening of the war of the revolution. He took a decided and bold part in opposing the aggressions of the British government. In 1766 he was elected a member of the general court, and distinguished himself in maintaining the rights of the colony. In 1773 he proposed the establishment of committees of correspondence, which were instituted and became highly useful. After the death of general Warren he was appointed president of the provincial congress, and in 1775, while the army was at Cambridge, was made paymaster general, but he resigned the office on its removal to New-York. He was afterwards appointed a major general of the militia. After the adoption of the constitution of Massachusetts, he was for many years speaker of the house of representatives; and held a seat at the navy board. He was solicited to accept of more important offices, but preferred retirement. In 1804 he was chosen elector of president. He died at Plymouth in 1808.

WARREN, Joseph, major general in the army of the American revolution, was born in Roxbury, Massachusetts, in 1740, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1759. He studied medicine, and settling in Boston, rose to eminence in the profession. He distinguished himself at an early period by a zealous opposition to the unjust measures of the British government toward the colonies. He was bold, ardent, decisive, circumspect, eloquent, elegant in his manners, and accomplished in literature, and soon rose to the first place in the esteem and confidence of his fellow-citizens. He was a principal member of a secret association formed in Boston in 1768, which exerted a very important influence, by originating plans for resisting the designs of the British ministry, designating individuals for office, and instituting means to excite the people to the defence of their rights. He delivered two of the Boston 5th of March orations, so called, the last under extraordinary circumstances in 1775. Boston was then filled with British troops; the office of giving the public oration was considered danger-

608. He presented himself for the purpose, and his offer was accepted. On the appointed day the church designated was crowded with citizens, but the British officers took possession of the aisles and stairs leading to the pulpit. He succeeded in entering by a window; and in the presence of this mixed audience, where every man's heart was on fire, and every hand ready to be lifted; with absolute self-command, not intimidated by the menacing looks and gestures of the officers surrounding him, he pronounced a most animated and touching declamation on the injuries done the country by the British government, and the necessity of resisting them by force of arms. It was he, who, on the evening before the battle of Lexington, obtained intelligence of the intended expedition of the British to Concord, and apprised Hancock and Adams of it, and he was one of the most active in the battle of the next day. He exerted a high influence in preserving order among the troops which soon after assembled at Cambridge. On the departure of Hancock to the congress at Philadelphia, he was chosen president of the provincial congress. Four days before the battle of Bunker's hill, he was appointed major general, and on the day of that battle, to encourage the soldiers within the lines, joined them as a volunteer, and just as the retreat commenced, was struck by a ball, and died in the trenches, aged 35. He was the first person of rank who fell in the war, and was deeply lamented. In 1776 his remains were removed from the battle ground and interred in Boston.  L.

WARREN, Mercy, was the wife of general James Warren of Plymouth, and a daughter of the honourable James Otis of Barnstable, Massachusetts. Her connexion with these distinguished individuals was the means of introducing her to extensive literary acquaintance, and led to a correspondence between her and several of the leading revolutionary characters. The advantages she thus enjoyed led her to write a "History of the American Revolution," which was published in 3 volumes, 8vo. Boston, 1805. She also published "The Adulator," and "The Group," two political pieces, before the revolution, and a volume of poems, containing tragedies, and miscellanies. She died at Plymouth, October, 1814.  L.

WARREN, John, M.D. professor of anatomy and surgery in Harvard university, was born at Roxbury, Massachusetts, July 27th, 1753. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1771; and prepared himself for his profession under the direction of his brother, general Joseph Warren, then a physician of Boston. He first settled at Salem, and when the revolutionary army was organized, had an appointment as hospital surgeon. Two years after, he was appointed to superintend the hospital at Boston, which was from that time the place of his abode. In 1780 he commenced the first course of lectures on anatomy, which were given in New-England, and in 1783 was appointed professor on the foundation of doctor Hersey. He was among the original members of the medical society of the state, and several years its president. He was also president of the humane society, and a counsellor of the American academy. His life was a scene of great industry and professional usefulness. He early attained, and through life enjoyed as a physician, and still more as an anatomist, a very high reputation. He died April 4th, 1815. His chief publications were a dissertation on the use of mercury in febrile complaints, and occasional essays in the periodical journals.  L.

WARREN, sir John Borlase, baronet, admiral in the British navy, was educated at Cambridge, and became a lieutenant in the navy as early as the American war. He was promoted to the rank of captain in 1781, vice admiral in 1805, full admiral in 1810, and was commander-in-chief of the fleet on the coast of North America, during the last war with the United States. He was some time in early life a member of parliament, and ambassador to Russia after the truce of Amiens. His principal naval battles were in April, 1794, in October, 1798, and in March, 1806, in all of which he defeated the French fleets opposed to him, and captured several of their vessels. He died February 27th, 1822.  L.

WARTON, Thomas, a native of Godalmin, Surrey, educated at Magdalen college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He was professor of poetry at Oxford from 1718 to 1728, and obtained the living of Basingstoke, Hants, and Cobham, Surrey. He died 1745, and two years after appeared a volume of his poems, 8vo. He is particularly known by his ingenious epigram on the occasion of George the second sending a troop of horse to Oxford, and a collection of books to Cambridge.

WARTON, Joseph, son of the preceding, was born 1722, at Dunsfold, Surrey, where his mother's father, the Rev. Joseph Richardson, was rector. He received his education at Winchester school, but as he was superannuated and thus disabled from admittance on the New college foundation, he entered at Oriel college, Oxford. In the university he distinguished himself by his application and regularity, and published there his Enthusiast, his Dying Indian, and a satire on Ranelagh house. He left Oxford after taking his first degree, and was created M.A. in 1757 by diploma, and in 1768 he was admitted to the degree of D.D. In 1751 he went to France as the companion of the duke of Bolton, to whom he was chaplain, with the intention, it is said, of marrying him at Paris on the expected death of his dutchess, to Polly Peachum of licentious memory, but he returned to England soon after, and thus was prevented from solemnizing the nuptials of his amorous patron. He obtained from the duke Wynslade rectory in Hampshire, to which was added in 1755 Tunworth living. In 1755 he was elected to the second mastership of Winchester school, and in 1766 he was placed at the head of this celebrated foundation, which after an honourable and laborious service he resigned in 1793. In 1782 he was presented to a prebend of St. Paul's by Lowth, and to the living of Chorley, Hertfordshire, and in 1788 he obtained a stall in Winchester cathedral and Easton rectory, which he afterwards exchanged for Upham. This amiable and deservedly respected character died at his living of Wickham, in Hampshire, 23d Feb. 1800, and his remains were deposited in Winchester cathedral, where the gratitude of his pupils has erected a monument, and paid a due and becoming tribute of reverence to the abilities, the genius, and the virtues of their beloved instructor. Dr. Warton married in 1748 Miss Daman, who died 1772, and the year after he took for his second wife Miss Nicholas. His elegant and interesting essay on the genius and writings of Pope appeared in 1756, and to it he added a second volume in 1782. He projected the history of the revival of literature, but little progress was made in the work. In 1797 he published his edition of Pope's works, and soon after began an edition of Dryden's works which he never completed, though the first 2 vols. were published with notes. As a poet his character is very respectable, but his merits are still greater as a critic and commentator, and the services which he has rendered to the public as an active, vigilant, and enlightened preceptor, have deservedly endeared him in the esteem and the affection of numerous pupils, on whose minds his superior abilities, and his sound judgment, deeply imprinted a lasting taste for elegant literature, and for all the beauties of poetical composition. Memoirs of his life and writings have been published in 2 vols. 4to. by his respectable pupil Dr. Wooll.

WARTON, Thomas, D.D. brother of the preceding, was born in 1728, and educated at Winchester school and Trinity college, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship in 1751. He had already distinguished himself by the publication of five pastoral eclogues, when on the appearance of Isis, a poem by Mason, he was encouraged by

Dr. Huddersford, the head of his college, to stand forth the champion of the university, and he soon after produced the Triumph of Isis, a poem of great merit, which rivalled the elegance and the popularity of the Cantabrigian bard. In 1753 he published his Observations on Spenser's Fairy Queen, and the following year he was particularly honoured with the notice of Dr. Johnson in his visit to the university. In 1756 he was elected professor of poetry for ten years, and in his lectures he evinced his abilities as a polished scholar, and an acute critic. The Anthologia Græca by Cephalæ, was edited by him in 1766, and four years after his Theocritus issued from the press in 2 vols. 4to. with valuable notes. He was admitted into the antiquarian society in 1771, and in that year obtained from lord Lichfield the small living of Kiddington, Oxfordshire. The life of sir Thomas Pope, the founder of his college appeared in 1771, and in 1774 his first volume of the history of English Poetry, and the second, which brings the account down to the accession of Elizabeth, four years after. Though in some respects a tedious performance from the long quotations of obsolete passages, the whole is a valuable acquisition to British literature, and the records of our more ancient poets are presented to view in a pleasing and interesting form, whilst the genius of the author enriches and diversifies the dry narrative with acute remarks, judicious explanations, and appropriate anecdotes. The death of Whitehead in 1785, made room for his appointment to the laureateship, and at the same time he was chosen Camden professor of history. His last publication was Milton's smaller poems, elucidated with curious notes, illustrative of the allusions and beauties of the great poet. Blessed with an uninterrupted flow of health, and in the possession of comfort and independence in the midst of the enlightened society of his college, Warton knew little of the concerns or calamities of life, till in his 62d year he felt a serious attack of the gout. A journey to Bath removed the troublesome complaint, and he promised himself more years of health and of intellectual enjoyments, when after spending a cheerful day in the common-room of his college, he was seized with a paralytic stroke, 20th May, 1790, which terminated his existence on the following day. He was buried with academical honours in the college chapel, and a short inscription on the pavement marks the spot where his remains were deposited. In his character, Warton was affable and easy, his conversation was full of anecdotes, and he aspired to the name of a ready and frequent punster. As a critic he displayed great judgment, elegant taste, and strong discriminating powers, and as a poet he is entitled to no mean praise. In his imagery he is bold, clear, and lively, he paints with correctness, and in his descriptions of rural scenes he is singularly happy, rich, and interesting. The best of his poems are, the Progress of Discontent—the Suicide—and the ode on the king going to Cheltenham; and among the various subjects which he has attempted it is remarkable that he never sung of love. He has, as one of his biographers observes, visited many a Grecian isle, but he never touched at Paphos. His Mons Catharinæ is also an elegant Latin poem; but the chief work on which his fame is built, is his History of Poetry, of which a third volume, collected from his papers, has appeared.

WARWICK, sir Philip, an eminent writer, born in St. Margaret's parish, Westminster, 1608. He was educated at Eton, and after travelling over France, and visiting Geneva he returned to England, and became secretary to Juxon, the treasurer and clerk to the signet. He was also in parliament, and opposed the impeachment of Strafford, but on the breaking out of the civil war he retired to Oxford with the king, whose confidence he much enjoyed. He was in 1646 one of the royal commissioners empowered to treat with the parliament, and the next year he attended his master in the isle of Wight as his secretary. At the restoration he was returned member for Westminster, and was knighted and replaced in his situation of clerk to the signet. He died 15th Jan. 1682, and was buried in Chiselhurst in Kent, where he had purchased an estate. His chief work is, Memoirs of the reign of Charles I. continued to the restoration, 8vo. 1701, a work of great merit, candour, and integrity. He wrote besides discourses on government, &c.

WASER, I. H. an ecclesiastic of Zurich, known for his writings, and chiefly for his sufferings. He inserted in a German journal, some severe animadversions on the administration of public affairs in Zurich, for which he was arrested by the magistrates, and condemned to death. He was beheaded 27th June, 1780.

WASER, Anna, daughter of a senator at Zurich, excelled as a painter in oil, and particularly in miniatures. She died 1713, aged 34.

WASHINGTON, George, the illustrious founder of American independence, was born 1732, in the county of Fairfax in Virginia, where his father, Augustus Washington, was possessed of great landed property. He was descended from an English family, which emigrated from Cheshire, about the year 1630 for a settlement in Virginia. He was educated under the care of a private tutor, and after making rapid progress in mathematics and engineering, he embraced the military profession. His abilities were first employed by general Dinwiddie in 1753, in making remonstrances to the French commander on the Ohio, for the infraction of the treaty between the two nations, and he afterwards negotiated a treaty of amity with the Indians on the back settlements, and for his honourable services received the thanks of the British government. In the unfortunate expedition of general Braddock he served as his aid-de-camp, and when that brave but rash commander fell in an ambush, he displayed great military talents in conducting the retreat to the corps under colonel Dunbar, and in the saving the remains of the army, from a dangerous and untenable position. He retired from the service with the rank of colonel, but while engaged in the peaceful employments of an agriculturist at his favourite seat of Mount Vernon, he did not refuse the civil offices of his country, and appeared as a senator in the national council for Frederic county, and afterwards for Fairfax. In the unhappy quarrel which separated the American colonies from the mother country, he was early selected by the leaders of the insurrection, as a proper person to command the provincial troops, to inspire them with confidence, and to unite under his standard their wavering and undisciplined ranks. From the moment when he took upon himself the important office of commander-in-chief, at Cambridge, June 1775, he employed the great powers of his mind to his favourite object, and by his prudence, his valour, and his presence of mind he deserved and obtained the confidence and the gratitude of his country, and finally triumphed over all opposition. Distinguished by the name of the American Fabius, he showed himself master of the knowledge of military stratagems, and while some presumed to blame his precautions as cowardice, he proved that he could fight, whenever he calculated upon the prospect of decisive advantages, or certain victory. A more rash general might have endangered the safety of his country, by venturing to face openly the disciplined troops of England in the field, but the sagacious general knew that cautious operations, and vigilant delay would prove, without loss to himself, more decisive than the most brilliant victory over an enemy, whose resources were supplied with difficulty from the distant shores of Europe. After seeing the independence of his country established in the treaty of peace of 1783, the heroic chief resigned his high office of commander to the congress, and in the midst of the applauses, the admiration, and the tears of his fellow-citizens, he retired to the obscurity of a private station. With becoming firmness he declined the honours offered to his active administration, by the gratitude of America, he defrayed all his military expenses, during the long period of the eight years of the war, and modestly declared himself satisfied with the recollection of the services which he had performed, and with the good opinion of his fellow-citizens. Such patriotism naturally pointed him out for the highest offices of the state, and in 1789 he was called to fill the dignity of president, for which his wisdom and moderation so fully qualified him. It was a period of great difficulty, the unsubdued spirit of liberty in America was again kindled into a flame by the revolutionary events of France, and not a few of the Americans sighed at home for that freedom and equality, which seemed to promise more extensive happiness, and more lasting blessings to the renovated subjects of Lewis XVI. Washington foresaw and anticipated the plans of the factious, the prudence and firm moderation of his administration checked insurrection, discontent was silenced, and the people of the Alleghany and Washington counties, which the intrigues of Genet the French envoy had roused to rebellion, were convinced of the wildness of their measures, and of the wisdom of their governor. The virtuous president completed in 1796 the business of his temporary office by signing a commercial treaty with Great Britain, and then resigned his power, at a moment when all hearts and all hands were united again to confer upon him, agreeable to the general wish, the sovereignty of the country. Restored to the peaceful retirement of Mount Vernon he devoted himself to the cultivation of his lands, and though he accepted the command of the army in 1798, it was more to unite together the affections of his fellow-citizens, to one general point, the good of the country, than to gratify any desires of ambition or of pride. This great man expired at his seat, rather unexpectedly, after a few days' illness, 14th Dec. 1799. He was buried with due national honours, America, in a public mourning, deplored in him the loss of her father and of her friend, and a new city was erected on the borders of the Potomack, which, in becoming the capital of the United States, records to distant times, in bearing his name, the services, the patriotism, and the glories of her great and illustrious founder. Wisdom, says a contemporary writer, was the predominant feature in the character of Washington, in his military and political career. His patience, his forbearance, his firmness, in adverse as well as in prosperous events proved of more solid advantage to his country than his bravery and his talents. Though perhaps inferior to other great characters in the extent of his ideas, and the boldness of his plans, he surpassed them far in wisdom, in moderation, in integrity. The history of his life, is the history of American independence, and though there may be in America men who decry his services, while they forget his noble disinterested resignation of sovereign authority, it is much to be feared that many generations shall not elapse, before some equally fortunate, but more ambitious chief, may boldly seize the reigns of absolute dominion, and establish a usurped power, over the rights, the fortunes, and the liberties of his bleeding, but enslaved country. A copious account of his life has lately been published by judge Marshall, in five large vols. 8vo. collected from the private papers of his family, and from the public records of the state.—

General Washington joined the army at Cambridge, July 2d, 1775. The British having evacuated Boston on the 17th of March, 1776, he proceeded to New-York in April. The battle of Long Island was fought on the 27th of August, he evacuated New-York on the 15th of September, and fought the battle of White-plains on the 28th of October. He passed into New-Jersey in November, and into Pennsylvania in December. He recrossed the Delaware the 25th of December, and on the 26th captured a body of Hessians at Trenton, and soon gained a victory over another British detachment at Princeton. He fought the Battle of Brandywine September 11th, 1777, that of Germantown on the 4th of October following, and that of Monmouth February 28th, 1778. He continued during the years 1779 and 1780, in the vicinity of New-York, and closed the important military operations of the war by the capture of Cornwallis, at Yorktown, October 19th, 1781. The cessation of hostilities was proclaimed in the American camp on the 19th of April, 1783, and the British evacuated New-York on the 25th of the following November, when he entered the city, and bidding farewell to the army, proceeded to Annapolis, and resigned his commission on the 3d of December.  L.

WASHINGTON, William, colonel in the army of the American revolution, was a native of Stafford county, Virginia, and descended from the same ancestors as general Washington. He entered the army as a captain under general Mercer, and was at the battle on Long Island, and at Trenton, in the latter of which he particularly distinguished himself. He was soon after appointed major, and served in the northern and middle states until 1780, when he was advanced to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and joined the army under general Lincoln. In the battle at the Cowpens he had command of the cavalry, and contributed greatly to the victory. His intrepidity of that occasion was rewarded by the gift of a sword by congress. In the battle of Eutaw Springs, he was wounded and taken prisoner. After the war terminated, he settled at Sandy Hill, South Carolina. In 1798 General Washington selected him as one of his staff, with the rank of brigadier-general. He died March 6th, 1810. He was dignified in person, eminently enterprising and intrepid as a soldier, and in private life amiable and unassuming.

WASSE, Christopher, author of a translation of Grotius's catechism into Greek verse, and of Gratius's Cynegeticon into English, was for some time fellow of King's college, Cambridge, and afterwards superior beadle in law at Oxford. He died 1690.

WATELET, Claude Henry, receiver general of finance, member of the French academy, and of several foreign learned societies, paid much attention to literature, and travelled to Italy, and the low countries, to improve himself. He died poor 13th Jan. 1786, aged 68. He is author of a poem on the art of painting, in 4to. and 8vo.—and of some comedies—operas—and a prose poem from the Aminta of Tasso—a Dictionary of Painting, Sculpture, and Engraving. His Opuscula were published together 1788.

WATERLAND, Daniel, an English divine, born 1683 at Wasely, Lincolnshire, where his father was rector, and educated at Lincoln school, and Magdalen college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, and in 1713 master. He became successively rector of Ellingham, Norfolk, chaplain to the king, rector of St. Austin, and of St. Faith, London, chancellor of York, archdeacon of Middlesex, canon of Windsor, and vicar of Twickenham. He died 1740, and was buried at Windsor. He was author of sermons preached at lady Moyer's lecture, of which he was the first preacher—treatise on the Eucharist—history of the Athanasian creed—a vindication of the Trinity against Dr. Samuel Clarke, with whom he was engaged in a long and acrimonious controversy—and other theological works.

WATERLOO, Anthony, a native of Utrecht, distinguished as a painter in the 16th century—His pictures are scarce, but bear a very great price.

WATRIN, Henriette, Helen, and Agatha, three sisters at Verdun, who were accused of having strewed flowers in the way of the king of Prussia, when he entered their town. Tinville, the public accuser of the revolutionary tribunal, recommended to them to deny the charge, but they refused to purchase their liberty by a falsehood, and perished on the scaffold in 1793, pitied by thousands.

WATS, Gilbert, D.D. a native of Yorkshire, educated at Lincoln college, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. He translated into English, Davila's History of the Civil wars, and lord Bacon's treatise de Argumentis Scientiarum, fol. and died 1657.

WATSON, John, a native of Rengworth, Worcestershire, educated at All Souls college, Oxford. He studied medicine, but under Elizabeth he took orders, and rose in 1572 to the deanery, and eight years after to the bishopric of Winchester. He wrote among other things a Latin tragedy called Abalom, and died 1589.

WATSON, Thomas, M.A. minister of St. Stephen, Wallbrook, was educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, and lost his preferment, for nonconformity, at the restoration. He wrote the body of Divinity, a course of sermons on the assembly's catechism, fol. and some other theological works, and died 1673.

WATSON, James, a native of Aberdeen, brought up to the printing business under his father. In 1711 he obtained a patent from queen Anne, with Mr. Freebairn, and then published several valuable works. He printed in an elegant manner a Bible in 8vo. 1722, and in 4to. 1726, and another in very small size, and of great beauty. He died at Edinburgh, 1728.

WATSON, David, M.A. a native of Brechin, in Scotland, educated at St. Leonard's and St. Andrew's, where he became professor of philosophy. On the union of his college with St. Salvador's in 1747, he retired to London, where he published his prose translation of Horace, 2 vols. with notes, a popular work. His manner of life was very irregular, and brought him into many difficulties, and he at last sunk a victim to his licentious pursuits, and was buried at the expense of the parish 1756. He published also the history of the heathen Gods and Goddesses.

WATSON, Robert, a native of St. Andrew's, educated in his native town, from which he passed to Glasgow, and to Edinburgh. He took his degree of doctor of laws, and became professor of logic, rhetoric, and belles lettres at St. Andrews, and afterwards principal of the college. He died 1780, and three years after his death, appeared his History of the Reign of Philip III. of Spain, in 1 vol. 4to. and in 2 vols. 8vo.

WATSON, John, a divine born 26th March, 1724, at Lyme-cum-Hanley, in Prestbury parish, Cheshire. From Manchester school he came to Brazen-nose college, Oxford, of which he became fellow, and afterwards he obtained the living of Meningsby, Licolnshire, which he resigned, in 1769, for the valuable rectory of Stockport, Cheshire. He devoted himself to the compilation of the History of Halifax, which appeared in 1775, and died March 14th, 1783. He wrote besides a History of the ancient earls of Warren, and Surrey, to prove the claim of his patron, sir George Warren, to these ancient titles.

WATSON, Henry, a native of London, eminent as a lecturer in anatomy, and as the author of an Account of the Absorbents of the Urinary Bladder, was elected, in 1761, surgeon of Westminster hospital, and died 1793, aged 91. He contributed besides some papers to the Philosophical Transactions.

WATSON, sir William, a native of London, educated at Merchant Tailors'. He applied himself to the medical profession, and in 1741 was made member of the Royal Society. He was complimented in 1757 with the degree of M. D. by the universities of Hasle, and Wittemberg, and in 1762 he became physician to the Foundling hospital. He was made member of the college of physicians in 1784, and two years after knighted by the king. He wrote various tracts on electricity, collected into one vol. Svo. and as he had paid particular attention to that branch of philosophy, and contributed some curious experiments to the Royal Society, in 1744 he was honoured with the Copley medal from that learned body. He died universally respected, 1787.

WATSON, Richard, a celebrated prelate, was born in 1737, at Heversham, in Westmoreland, where he was educated under his father, who was master of the grammar-school at that place. In 1754, he became a sizar in Trinity college, Cambridge, where, in 1760, he was elected fellow. In 1764 he was chosen to the chymical professorship, and in 1771 he succeeded to that of divinity. In 1776 he printed "An Apology for Christianity," addressed to Gibbon, with whom he held a friendly correspondence. In 1782 he was advanced to the bishopric of Llandaff, with permission to hold the archdeaconry of Ely, his professorship, and other ecclesiastical preferments. On this promotion, he published a letter to the archbishop of Canterbury, containing a plan for equalizing church revenues. In 1785 he printed six volumes of "Theological Tracts," selected from various authors, for the use of students. The year following, Mr. Luther, of Ongar, in Essex, though noway related to the bishop, left him an estate worth twenty-four thousand pounds, which he sold to lord Egremont. During the king's illness, in 1788, Dr. Shipley, of St. Asaph, died, on which bishop Watson made a speech in the house of lords, advocating the right of the prince of Wales to the regency; and it was expected that his lordship's translation to the vacant see would have followed; but the king recovered, and the bishop was disappointed. In 1796 he published an Answer to Paine's Age of Reason, in a volume called "An Apology for the Bible," which passed through many editions. In 1798 he printed "an Address to the People of Great Britain," recommending large sacrifices to repel the French, for which he was attacked by Gilbert Wakefield. The bishop died at Calgarth-park, in Westmoreland, July 4, 1816. Besides the works already mentioned, he published five volumes of Chymical Essays, several sermons, charges, and tracts. After his death appeared the Memoirs of his Life, written by himself.—W. B.

WATT, James, an engineer, was the son of a tradesman at Greenock, and born there, in 1736. He became a mathematical instrument maker, and in 1757 was appointed in that capacity to the university of Glasgow, with apartments in the college, where he resided till 1763, when he married and established himself in that city. About a year after this, he made his famous improvement of the steam-engine, and from this time entered almost wholly upon the business of civil engineer, particularly in planning and surveying canals, to aid him in which he invented a new micrometer and machine for drawing in perspective. In 1774 he removed from Glasgow to Soho, near Birmingham, where he entered into partnership with Mr. Boulton in the business of constructing steam engines, which they carried to the height of perfection. Mr. Watt also invented a method of copying writings by a simple machine. He was a member of the royal societies of London and Edinburgh; and in 1806 the degree of doctor of laws was conferred on him by the university of Glasgow. He died Aug. 25, 1819.—W. B.

WATTEAU, Anthony, a native of Valenciennes, of obscure origin. Self-instructed, he gradually rose to eminence, and after visiting Italy, and studying the beauties of Rubens, and other illustrious artists, he was admitted member of the French academy of painting, and obtained a pension from the king. He afterwards visited England, which he was obliged to quit on account of the ill state of his health. He died soon after at Nogent near Paris, 1721, aged 37. His pieces are particularly striking for their originality, the grace of his attitudes, the lightness of his figures, and the delicacy of the whole. His conversation pieces are his best performances, and in these the airs of the heads deserve particular admiration.

WATTS, Isaac, a respectable divine among the dissenters. He was born at Southampton, 17th July, 1674. His great abilities early displayed themselves, and he was, in 1690, placed under the care of Mr. Thomas Rowe, in London, where he completed his studies, and where he had among his fellow-students Horte, afterwards archbishop of Tuam. In 1696 he went into the family of sir John Hartop, Stoke Newington, as tutor to his son, and in 1702 he was appointed successor to Dr. Chauncey in the pastoral office. Though his constitution was weak, and his health disordered by frequent illness, he not only paid particular attention to the duties of his office, but wrote some valuable works on subjects of divinity. In the latter part of life he became acquainted with sir Thomas Abney, in whose family he found an asylum of friendship and hospitality, and where he died 25th November, 1748, aged 75. He had been, in 1728, honoured in a very flattering manner, and unsolicited, by the universities of Edinburgh and Aberdeen, with the degree of D D. and the useful publications which he sent to the press deserved the high distinction. In his character he was an amiable man, mild, generous, and charitable, and it may be said of him, that few have left behind such purity of conduct, or such monuments of laborious piety. His works are very numerous and respectable, the best known of which are, a Treatise on Logic—an Essay on the Improvement of the Mind—Introduction to Astronomy and Geography—Hymns—and a poetical version of the Psalms sung in dissenting congregations—Horæ Lyricæ, chiefly on religious subjects—Scripture History in Question and Answer—Miscellaneous Thoughts, 12mo.—two volumes of sermons—Philosophical Essays, &c. The whole have been collected into six vols. 4to.

WAYNE, Anthony, major general in the army of the United States, was born in Chester county, Pennsylvania, in 1745. He was chosen to a seat in the legislature of that state in 1773, and took a vigorous part in opposing the injustice of Great Britain. In 1775 he entered the army as a colonel, and accompanied general Thompson to Canada. He afterwards served under general Gates at Ticonderoga, and was highly esteemed as an engineer, as well as a brave and skilful officer. At the close of that campaign he was advanced to the rank of brigadier general. In the campaign of 1777, in the middle states, he acted an important part. At the battle of Brandywine, being stationed at the ford, he made a brave defence against the attack of the British under general Kniphausen, but in a few days after, being detached with 1500 men to hang on the British rear, he was surprised and defeated. He fought also in the battles at Germantown and Monmouth. In 1779, being detached for that purpose, he stormed the fortress at Stony Point, and succeeded in capturing it. In 1781 he was ordered to join the southern army under La Fayette; and while on his march, falling in with the army of Cornwallis, amounting to 4000, supposed it to be only a rear guard till he had approached too near to allow an unmolested retreat. He extricated himself by intimidating the enemy. Advancing at the head of his troops, amounting only to 800, he made an attack on the British for a few minutes so furious, that it inspired them with the belief that other troops must be in the vicinity to sustain him, and deterred them from pursuing him on his retiring. After the capture of Cornwallis he was detached to Georgia, and was victorious in several battles with the British and Indians, and received from that state the gift of a plantation as a reward for his services. In 1787 he was a member of the convention of Pennsylvania which ratified the constitution of the United States. In 1792 he was appointed to the command of the western army, as successor of St. Clair, and at the battle of the Miamis, in 1794, gained a complete victory: the next year he concluded a peace. He remained in that region till the 15th of December 1796, when he died at Presque Isle in his fifty-second year.

WEARE, Mesheck, president of New-Hampshire, was a native of that state, and graduated at Harvard college in 1735. He was early elected to a seat in the house of representatives, and was its speaker for several years. In 1754 he was sent a commissioner to the congress which met at Albany. He was afterwards appointed judge of the superior court, and in 1777, chief justice. On the establishment of a new form of government, in 1776, he was elected president, and held the office of chief magistrate and chief justice during the whole war. On the formation of a new constitution, in 1784, he was again chosen president, but soon resigned the office on account of his age. He died in 1786, aged 72. His talents, though not splendid, were highly respectable. His understanding was vigorous and clear, his judgment accurate, and his knowledge extensive; and he was distinguished for uprightness, fidelity, and amiableness.

WEAVER, John, author of the Loves of Mars and Venus—of Orpheus and Eurydice—of Perseus and Andromeda, pantomimic dramas—of a History of the Mimes and Pantomimes of the Ancients—of the Art of Dancing—with a Treatise on Action and Gesture, &c. was a dancing master, and died in London about 1730.

WEBB, Philip Carteret, an able antiquarian, born 1700. He was bred up to the law, and acquired great eminence as a parliamentary and constitutional lawyer. He published in 1747, Observations on the Course of Proceedings in the Admiralty, and in 1751 he was employed in obtaining the charter of incorporation for the Antiquarian Society, to whose labours he sent some valuable communications. He was returned member for Haslemere in 1754 and 61, and became one of the joint solicitors to the treasury; but during the question about general warrants, and in the prosecution of Wilkes, he expressed his disapprobation of the measures of the government, and published some pamphlets on the occasion. He died at his house at Busbridge, near Haslemere, 22d June, 1770, aged 70. His valuable library and MSS. were sold by public auction for 17 days, and his other curiosities also passed into the hands of different collectors. He wrote several pamphlets of considerable merit, and chiefly on temporary subjects in law, antiquities, &c.

WEBB, Benjamin, son of a shoemaker at Redcross, became known as the master of Bunhill-row school, where he died 1774, aged 49. He was very ingenious in his calculations, &c. and he was employed in writing copies of honorary freedoms bestowed by the city of London on eminent persons, and that which he prepared for the king of Denmark in 1768 was particularly admired.

WEBBER, Samuel, D. D. president of Harvard University, was a native of Byfield, Massachusetts. His father removed when he was two years old to Hopkinton, New-Hampshire. He early discovered an attachment to study, and at the age of twenty entered Harvard university. While there he exhibited a strong predilection for mathematics, and attained to uncommon eminence in them. When he had concluded his college life, in 1784, he devoted himself to the study of theology, but in 1787 was appointed a tutor in the university, in 1789 succeeded Doctor Williams as professor of mathematics and natural philosophy, and continued in that office until the death of president Willard, when he was elected his successor. His inauguration took place May 6, 1806, and he devoted himself with great assiduity to the duties of the station. He died suddenly, at Cambridge, July 17th, 1810, aged 51. Dr. Webber was a fellow of the American academy, and philosophical society. In 1796 he was employed by the government to ascertain the boundary between the British provinces and the United States. He published a system of mathematics, intended to be a text book in the university, in 2 vols. 8vo. 1801, a judicious work, which has been adopted in other seminaries. [F L.

WEBSTER, William, an able writing master, author of a Compendious Course of Mathematics, 3 vols. 8vo. translated from the French of la Hoste—Book-keeping—and a Treatise on Arithmetic, often edited. He kept a school in Castle-street, near Leicester-square, where he died 1744, aged 60.

WEBSTER, John, governor of Connecticut, one of the principal settlers of Hartford, was elected a magistrate of the colony in 1639, and governor in 1656. About four years after, he, with three others of the name, the reverend Mr. Russel, of Wethersfield, and a number of associates, purchased the territory now included in the towns of Hadley, Hatfield, Granby, and Amherst, Massachusetts, and removed thither. He died in Hadley in 1665. [F L.

WECHEL, Christopher, an eminent printer, at Paris. He began to print Greek books in 1530, and with such correctness that scarce an error could be discovered in a folio volume. This accuracy is attributed to his able corrector, the learned Sylburgius. He exposed himself to the persecution of the church for printing some offensive and controversial books, and died soon after, 1552. His son Andrew retired from Paris, because he was a protestant, and settled at Frankfort, where he carried on with great success the printing business. A catalogue of the books which he and his father printed, was published in 8vo. He died 1581.

WEEVER, John, a native of Lancaster, educated at Cambridge. He is author of Funeral Monuments, lastly edited in 4to. 1767, a work of singular service to antiquarians and historians, though greatly deficient in point of accuracy. He died about 1632, and was buried in St. James's church, Clerkenwell.

WEIMAR, Bernard, duke of Saxe, early distinguished himself in arms against the house of Austria, whose severities to his family he strongly resented by espousing the cause of Gustavus Adolphus. Though defeated at Nordlingen, he repaired his losses, and at the head of a large army, intrusted to his command by Lewis XIII. he quickly overran Franche Comté, Burgundy, and Alsace, and would have obtained more important advantages had not death stopped his career. He died 18th July, 1639.

WELBY, Henry, a native of Lincolnshire, of a very eccentric character. In consequence of an attempt on his life by his brother, he quitted his native county, where he had extensive estates, and retired to the privacy of an obscure house in Grub-street, London, where for 44 years, either through superstition or melancholy, he suffered himself to be seen by no one till his death in 1636.

WELLENS, James Thomas Joseph, bishop of Antwerp, is distinguished for his learning, and his private and public virtues. He published Exhortationes Familiares de Vocazione Ministrorum, &c. 8vo. and died at Antwerp, 1784, aged 58.

WELLER, Jerome, a native of Freyberg, in Misnia, known as the friend and favourite of Luther. He wrote Commentaria in Libros Samuel et Regum—Consilium de Studio Theolog. &c.—Commentaria in Epistol. ad Ephesios, &c. all collected into 2 vols. fol. and he died at Freyberg, 1572, aged 73.

WELLER, James, a native of Newkirk, in Voigtland, professor of theology, &c. at Wittenberg, where he died 1664, aged 62. He wrote Specilegium Quæstion. Hebræo-Syriacæ—and a Greek Grammar.

WELLES, Samuel, M. A. an English divine, born at Oxford, 18th Aug. 1614, and educated at Magdalen college there. He proved an active minister during the civil wars, though he retired from persecution, and settled at Remenham, Berks, from which he afterwards removed to Banbury, Oxfordshire. He was much beloved by his parishioners for his eloquence as a preacher, and his charitable and benevolent deportment as a man. He wrote a Spiritual Remembrancer, and died after the restoration.

WELLES, Thomas, governor of Connecticut, was one of the earliest settlers of Hartford, and was elected a magistrate and treasurer of the colony in 1639. He was deputy governor in 1656, governor in 1657 and 1658, and died in 1660.  L.

WELLS, William Charles, a physician, was born, of Scotch parents, at Charleston, in South Carolina, in 1753. He was educated at Dumfries, and next at Edinburgh, from whence he returned to his native place, and was put apprentice to a medical practitioner. On the breaking out of the war, he quitted America, and in 1779 was appointed surgeon of a regiment in Holland. The year following he graduated, and went back to Carolina, where he distinguished himself by his loyalty. In 1784 he visited London, and in 1788 was admitted a licentiate of the Royal College. He afterwards became a zealous manager of the dispute with the same learned body, on the claims of the licentiates to the right of being admitted fellows. In 1793 he was chosen a member of the Royal Society, to whose Philosophical Transactions he communicated several valuable papers, for some of which, containing Experiments on Dew, he received the gold and silver medals. He died Sept. 13, 1817. Dr. Wells was also the author of an "Essay upon Single Vision with Two Eyes;" and a defence of it in answer to Dr. Darwin; also several memoirs and medical papers in different journals.—W. B.

WELLS, Edmund, a native of Corsham, Wilts, educated at Westminster school, and Christ-church, Oxford, where he took his degree of D. D. He became professor of Greek in the university, and obtained the living of Cotesbach, Leicestershire, where he died, 1730, aged 65. He wrote, besides pamphlets against the dissenters, and an Answer to Dr. Clarke on the Trinity—a Course of Mathematics for Young Gentlemen, 3 vols.—a work of merit on the Geography of the Old and New Testaments, 2 vols. 8vo. &c.

WELLS, John, eminent as a lawyer, was born at Cherry-Valley, New-York, in 1769, or 1770. While on a visit at Schenectady, in 1778, the celebrated colonel Brandt attacked the settlement of Cherry-Valley, and, murdering its inhabitants, left him the only survivor of his father's family. He was not long after placed in a grammar-school, at Newark, New-Jersey, and at length entered Princeton college, where he was graduated in 1788. He was admitted an attorney of the supreme court in 1792, and to the degree of counsellor in 1795. He established himself in the city of New-York, and devoting himself assiduously to his professional studies, at length rose by the superiority of his talents and knowledge, to the first eminence at the bar. He possessed a mind of great strength and penetration, an enlightened judgment, and a classical taste: was an accomplished and eloquent speaker, and eminently distinguished in his professional and private life by urbanity, uprightness, and the social virtues. His death took place September 7th, 1823.  L.

WELLWOOD, James, M. A. a native of Perth, educated at St. Andrews. The troubles of the times prevented him from entering into the ministry, and after concealing himself from the persecution of his political enemies, he was attacked by a fever, and died at Perth, 1680, aged 32. He was author of Immanuel's Land, and other tracts.

WELLWOOD, Thomas, M. D. a native of Edinburgh, educated at Glasgow. He fled to Holland with his father, who had been suspected of being concerned in the murder of archbishop Sharpe, in 1679, and after studying medicine at Leyden, and taking his degrees, he returned with William at the revolution, and was nominated one of the royal physicians for Scotland. He acquired a respectable fortune by his extensive practice, and died at Edinburgh, 1716, aged 64. In his principles he strongly favoured the republican government, and published Memoirs of England from 1588 to 1688, well written, though with the spirit of party.

WELSTED, Leonard, a native of Abington, Northamptonshire, educated at Westminster school. He obtained a place in the ordnance office by the friendship of lord Clare, but in the midst of his occupations he devoted much of his time to the muses. He wrote epistles, odes, &c.—a translation of Longinus on the Sublime, from Boileau's version—the Genius, or the duke of Marlborough's Apoplexy—an Epistle on the duke's Death—the Triumvirate, &c. which was considered as an attack on Pope, and consequently procured the author an honourable place in the Dunciad. He wrote besides, the Dissembled Wanton, a comedy, 1726, and other things, which were much applauded in his day, and which appeared, collected into one vol. Svo. 1787, with a Vindication of his Character by a relation. His little poem called the Apple-Pie, written at Westminster school, was for a long time attributed to Dr. King, and printed among his poems. Welsted was much noticed by the great and the learned, and his poetical talents were respectable, and displayed genius, and though he did not perhaps rise to the sublimer flights of the muse, his compositions were entitled to praise. He was twice married, but left no children. He died at the house which he held from his official situation in the Tower, 1747, aged 58.

WENCESLAUS, son of Charles IV. emperor of Germany, succeeded his father in 1378, at the age of 15. Though he promised the highest virtues for the ornament and the glory of the throne, he became debauched, capricious, and tyrannical, and at last he was deposed, in 1400, by the electors of the empire. He died king of Bohemia, 1419, aged 58. In his character he united all the extravagance of Antony, the infamous cowardice of Heliogabalus, and the bloody passions of Tiberius. Though twice married, he left no issue.

WENTWORTH, Thomas, earl of Strafford, was born in London, 1594. After finishing his education at Cambridge, he travelled abroad, and succeeding to a family estate of 6000*l.* per annum, in Yorkshire, he was elected into parliament, and became a leading member of the house. His eloquence in opposition to the measures of the court was so powerful, that he was named sheriff of Yorkshire, that he might not be elected into parliament; after, however, maintaining such determined opposition to the king, he was gained over by the ministry, and the grant of a peerage, and the office of president of the council in the northern counties, rendered him a loyal subject. This dereliction of principle highly offended his old political friends, and Pym, to whom he wished to justify his conduct, told him, "though you have left us, I will not leave you while your head is on your shoulders." In 1631 he was sent as deputy to Ireland, and in his government he was a most zealous and active representative. He redeemed the encumbrances of the royal revenue; he improved the yearly income 40,000*l.* a year, and prevailed upon the clergy of Ireland to conform to the doctrines and the discipline of the English church. Notwithstanding these important services, he was arbitrary in his conduct, and his severity towards lord Mountmorris, whom, in the course of two hours, he caused to be condemned to death, because he had spoken disrespectfully of him, reflects eternal disgrace on his memory. The king rewarded the faithful administration of his viceroy with every mark of favour and honourable distinction, but while he was secure of the royal confidence, he lost the good opinion of the nation. Pym, too true to his promise, inveighed against him in parliament, and at last accused him before the house of lords, as the cause of all the acts of tyranny that prevailed, and as the greatest enemy to the liberties of his country. His impeachment, drawn up in 28 articles, engaged the attention of the nation for 18 days, but when his noble and energetic defence seemed to influence the decision of the lords, the commons, with persecuting virulence, passed a bill against him, attainting him of high treason. The king used all his influence to save this faithful minister, but his compassion was answered by the cries of the factious, who insulted him with the exclamations of justice! justice! and even threatened his person if he refused to sacrifice him to the popular indignation. Charles was relieved from his deep distress; and when the earl, with ill-requited generosity, entreated him, by letter, not to hazard his safety, nor the peace of the kingdom, for his sake, but to assent to the sacrifice of his life, which might become a means of reconciliation between the injured sovereign and his rebellious subjects, the monarch, after two days and two nights of dreadful perplexity, signed, with the greatest reluctance, the fatal instrument which conducted his friend to the scaffold. He suffered with great resignation, on Tower-hill, 12th May, 1641. At the restoration his attainder was reversed, as dishonourable to the nation. His letters have appeared, in 2 vols. fol. 1739, by Dr. Knowles.

WENTWORTH, Benning, governor of New-Hampshire, was a native of that state, and graduated at Harvard college in 1715. He resided at Portsmouth, and employed himself in merchandize. After having held a seat both in the house of representatives and in the council, he was, in 1741, when that colony obtained a distinct government, appointed its governor, and held the office nearly twenty years. He was superseded in 1767, and died in 1770, in his seventy-fifth year. He was passionate and resentful, addicted somewhat to favouritism, and partial towards the Episcopalians, yet his administration was on the whole useful. Bennington, in Vermont, obtained its name from him. He gave a lot of 500 acres to Dartmouth college, on which the college buildings were erected.

WERMULLER, John Rodolph, a historical and landscape painter of Zurich. He was unfortunately drowned in crossing a river near Zurich, 1668, aged 27.

WERENFELS, John James, a divine of Basil, author of sermons in German, of homilies in Latin, &c. He died 1655. His son Peter became professor of theology at Basil, and died there, 23d May, 1703, aged 76. He was author of some learned dissertations, sermons, &c.

WERENFELS, Samuel, son of Peter, was born at Basil, where he filled some professorial chairs with great celebrity. He travelled into Holland, Germany, and France, and was the correspondent of the learned of Europe. He died at Basil, universally respected for his learning and for his many virtues, 1st June, 1740, aged 83. His works, which are chiefly on subjects of theology, philosophy, and philology, have appeared in 2 vols. 4to. The best known of his works is de Logomachiis Eruditiorum.

WERFF, Adrian Vander, a painter of Rotterdam. His portraits and historical pieces were finished with correct taste and judgment, and procured him the patronage of the great and the powerful. His pieces are preserved in the Dusseldorf gallery. The best are his 15 pieces on the mysteries of the Christian religion. He died in his native town, 1727, aged 68. His brother Peter was his pupil, and became eminent also in historical pieces. He was a hypochondriac in the latter part of his life, and died 1718, aged 53.

WERNER, Abraham Gottlieb, a mineralogist, was born at Wehraw, in Upper Lusatia, in 1750. At the age of twenty-four he published a valuable treatise "on the external Characteristics of Fossils;" which procured him the professorship of mineralogy at Frieberg, where his lectures were attended by students from various parts of Europe. He was also keeper of the cabinet of natural history, and held a situation in the council of Mines. He was employed in very extensive works and mineralogical surveys, and his system is now almost universally adopted. Werner died at Dresden in 1817.—W. B.

WESENEEC, Matthew, a native of Antwerp, professor of law at Jena, and at Wittenberg, where he died, 1586, aged 55. He wrote Observations on the Pandects, 4to. and fol. and other works on jurisprudence.

WESLEY, Samuel, a native of Winterborne Whitechurch, Dorsetshire, where his father was vicar. He was educated at Dorchester school, and then entered as servitor at Exeter college, Oxford, 1694. By means of the duke of Buckingham he obtained the living of South Ormesby, Lincolnshire, and afterwards Epworth, in the same county, where he died, 25th April, 1735. The best known of his publications are the Life of Christ, a heroic poem, folio—the History of the Old and New Testament, attempted in verse, &c. 3 vols. 12mo.—Maggots, or Poems, &c.—Elegies on queen Mary, and on Tillotson—a letter concerning the Education of the Dissenters, &c.—treatise on the Sacrament—Dissertations on Job, &c. He has been ridiculed by Garth for the inelegance of his poetry, but though indifferent as a poet, he was very respectable as a man. He left a large family, four of whom are not unknown in the history of English literature. The eldest of these, Samuel, was educated at Westminster, and elected to Christ church, Oxford. He was afterwards usher of Westminster school for near 20 years, and then obtained Blundel's school, at Tiverton. He was presented to no ecclesiastical benefice, and died at Tiverton, 6th Nov. 1739, aged 49, and was buried in the churchyard there. He is author of the Battle of the Sexes—the Prisons Opened, two poems of merit, and the Parish Priest—a eulogy on his Wife's Father, &c. His poems appeared in 1736, 4to. and in 1743, 12mo. He is said to have presented to the Spalding Society an amulet that had touched the heads of the three kings of Cologne.

WESLEY, John, the great founder of Methodism, son of Samuel, was born at Epworth, Lincolnshire, 1703. In 1714 he was placed at the Charter house, and two years after he was elected to Christ church, Oxford, and in 1725 was ordained deacon by bishop Potter, and the next year became fellow and tutor of Lincoln college. He early expressed himself against the damnable clauses of the Athanasian creed, and was one of that small society at Oxford which was formed on principles of greater austerity and devotion than prevailed in the university, and which consequently received the appellation of Methodists. In 1735 he embarked at Gravesend for America, at the request of the trustees of the new colony of Georgia, who were anxious for the conversion and spiritual instruction of the natives and settlers, and in this new theatre he, accompanied by his brother Charles, displayed his strong powers of eloquence and persuasion in the cause of methodism. Here, though much engaged in spiritual affairs, Wesley gave way to the emotions of love, but Miss Causton, the object of his passion, growing impatient at his delay, gave her hand to a more favoured suitor, and the modern saint, who compared the disappointment to the plucking out of his right eye, carried his pique and resentment so far as to repel the virtuous bride from the altar at the administration of the sacrament. This gross attack upon the character of a woman whom he wished to have taken for a wife, was resented by the lady, who published to the world some transactions not very honourable to the sanctity of the preacher, in consequence of which he hurried away from the public odium of America. In 1738 he landed at Deal, and began his career of proselytism. Believing himself to be set at liberty from the bonds of sin by divine illumination, he soon saw himself followed by a crowd of admiring converts, and zealously delivered his doctrines in his conventicle, which was first established in Fetter-lane. His discourses were heard with enthusiastic admiration, and superstitious deference, the number of the faithful were rapidly increased, and the pious founder of the sect, by the solemn imposition of hands, sent forth his apostles to propagate the faith. In 1751 he married Mrs. Vizelle, a widow lady of independent fortune, but whatever might have been the motives to this union, it proved unfortunate, and showed that, however calculated he might be for the head of a sect, he was very unwilling to spare attention to the comforts or happiness of his bride, who fled in disgust from his home. The great increase of his followers, no doubt, flattered the pride of the saint, and to that he devoted the whole of his active life, in the midst of dangers, of troubles, and of corporeal fatigues. Impressed with the idea that his great success was the immediate influence of heaven, his adherents easily believed that he was inspired, and that methodism was the work of God. But while he affected humility in his intercourse with the multitude, with all the strong powers which constitute the leader, with coolness, perseverance, and popular eloquence, he kept in his own hands the supreme authority over his sect, and the whole spiritual machine was moved according to his direction, so that in the most distant corners of the empire, his censures had as much the weight of law and correction upon his delegates as if he had himself personally pronounced the sentence of reproof or dismissal. This extraordinary character, who for more than half a century exercised the most absolute authority, and with undiminished effect, over his followers, died on the 2d March, 1791, in his 88th year, and the 65th of his ministry. Though the sermons which he published are superior to those of his fraternity, they must be considered as loose and desultory, conveying little to the mind, but, by familiar allusions or vulgar imagery, commanding the attention of the ignorant multitude. It has been doubted whether he was in his spiritual career hypocritical, or sincere, and actuated more by interested pride, than unspotted piety and unfeigned love; but though he was ambitious of power, greedy of pre-eminence, and impatient of contradiction, it is plain that he was influenced by motives of benevolence, and that his zeal in the cause of methodism was directed, whether by proper or improper means, to promote the future happiness of man. He published various tracts, and controversial pamphlets, against the Calvinists and Moravians. An interesting account of the Rise and Progress of Methodism, has been published by Mr. Nightingale, and the Life of Wesley has appeared from the pen of John Whitehead, one of his followers, in 2 vols. 8vo.—

The insinuations often made, that Wesley was hypocritical, and actuated supremely by ambition, are unjust. The plan on which he organized his societies did, indeed, throw the management of them entirely into his hands, and at length elevated him to an extraordinary degree of power, which he retained till his death; but the acquisition of that influence was an adventitious consequence, not the supreme object of his exertions. No man ever gave more decisive evidence that he truly held the views which he avowed and defended, and that he regarded himself as promoting the salvation of men by the peculiar measures he pursued. He was ardent in his feelings, strong in his prejudices, confident and hasty in his opinions, and forward to make them known, and vindicate them, on all occasions. His life was a scene of almost unparalleled labour, and was marked by great frugality, temperance, self-denial, and ardour of devotion. He is supposed, in the course of his itinerancy, to have travelled near 300,000 miles, and to have preached more than 40,000 sermons.  L.

WESLEY, Charles, younger brother of the preceding, was born at Epworth, and from the care of his father, passed to Westminster school, of which he became captain. He was elected, in 1726, to Christ church, Oxford, and after taking his degrees, embraced, with warmth, the religious tenets of his brother John, whom he accompanied in his mission to Georgia. After various adventures in his intercourse with the Indians, he returned, in 1736, to England, and became a zealous and active preacher to the people of his own persuasion. As he was well skilled in Scripture divinity, and of a warm, lively character, his discourses were much admired among the Methodists. Though occasionally resident in London, he was chiefly employed as an itinerant preacher among his adherents. He died 1788, aged 79. He was respectable as a poet, and his religious pieces are also numerous. His two sons, Charles and Samuel, have been celebrated as very great proficient in music.

WESSELUS, John, a native of Groningen, who studied at Zwol and Cologne, and afterwards at Paris. Sixtus IV. who was well acquainted with his learning, and with his abilities, was no sooner raised to the papal chair, than he sent for him to Rome, and offered him whatever he wished. The modest Wesselus requested the gift of a Hebrew and Greek Bible in the Vatican. Why do not you ask for a bishopric, inquired the astonished pontiff, because, answered the disinterested ecclesiastic, I do not want one. He soon after returned to his country, where he died 4th Oct. 1489, aged 70. He was, in his opinions, occasionally unfriendly to the tenets of the Romish church, and many have regarded him as the forerunner of Luther. He wrote various things, some of which appeared at Leipsic 1522, and Groningen 1614, in 4to. under the title of Farrago Rerum Theologicarum.

WEST, Gilbert, a learned writer, educated at Eton and Christ church, Oxford, for the church. He, however, entered into the army, and afterwards held some civil offices, and was appointed clerk extraordinary to the privy-council in 1729. He married some time after, and settled at Wickham, Kent, where he devoted himself to literary and religious pursuits, and where his retirement was frequently visited by Lyttleton and Pitt, who, weary with faction and political debates, courted his society, and the tranquillity of his abode. Though thus noticed by the great, it was not till 1751 that he could obtain an increase to his narrow fortune by the appointment of a clerkship to the privy council, to which was afterwards added the place of treasurer to Chelsea hospital, by the kindness of Mr. Pitt. These honours, however, came too late; the loss of his only son, in 1755, embittered the short remainder of life, and on the 26th of March, 1756, a stroke of the palsy hurried him to his grave at the age of 50. He was a man of polished manners and great erudition, and so respectable, that, it is said, the care of the young prince's education was offered to him, which he declined, because he considered his mode of superintendence not sufficiently extensive. His works are Observations on the Resurrection, 1747, a work which obtained for him, from the university of Oxford, the honourable degree of LL.D.—Pindar's odes translated into English, a valuable, elegant, and spirited composition.

WEST, James, M.A. of Alscot, Warwickshire, was educated at Baliol college, Oxford, and in 1741, was elected into parliament for St. Alban's. He was soon after made one of the joint secretaries to the treasury, which he resigned in 1762, and three years after he obtained, by the favour of the duke of Newcastle, a pension of 2000*l.* a year. He was member of the antiquarian society, and for some time president of the Royal Society. He died 2d July, 1772. His valuable MSS. were purchased by lord Shelburne, and his printed books were sold by auction in 24 days, his prints and drawings in 13, his coins and medals in seven, his plate curiosities in seven, and his pictures, drawings, &c. in four.

WEST, Richard, of the Temple, was made king's counsel in 1717, and in 1725, raised to the dignity of lord chancellor of Ireland. He married a daughter of bishop Burnet, and died 1726. He was author of a Discourse on Treasons and Bills of Attainder—treatise on the Manner of creating Peers, &c.

WEST, Thomas, the ingenious author of the history of Furness abbey, and of a guide to the lakes, was for some years professor of natural philosophy in the universities on the continent. He spent much time in describing the beauties of the lakes, &c. and in visiting those spots which are so remarkable for sublimity and extent of view. He chiefly lived in the latter part of life at Ulveston, and died there much respected, 10th July, 1779, aged 63.

WEST, John, succeeded Sir John Harvey as governor of Virginia, when the latter was displaced by the council in 1635. Harvey was restored to his office the following year, and succeeded by Sir William Berkeley in 1639. Colonel West was afterwards a member of the council.  L.

WEST, Joseph, was a short time governor of South Carolina in 1671, was again appointed in 1674, and a third time in 1684. He was succeeded by Sir Richard Kirtle in 1685. The brief accounts we have of his administration represent it as having been conducted with prudence and moderation.  L.

WEST, Francis, brother of lord Delawar, arrived at Plymouth in 1623, with a commission to be admiral of New-England. He was authorized to restrain vessels from fishing or trading on the coast without a license from the New-England council, but meeting with difficulty in executing that part of his commission, he sailed for Virginia. He was a member of the council for that colony under the old charter, and was reappointed in 1624. When governor Yearly died, in 1626, the administration devolved on him. He was succeeded by John Pott, in 1628. During this period, the colony received large accessions of emigrants from Europe.  L.

WEST, Samuel, D.D. minister of New-Bedford, Massachusetts, was born at Yarmouth, March 4th, 1730. He employed himself in husbandry till twenty years of age, when the superior talents he discovered induced a number of gentlemen to furnish him with the means of education, and he was graduated at Harvard in 1754. He settled at New-Bedford about ten years after, and continued there till disqualified by age for the labours of the ministry. He was one of the most conspicuous men of his day. He possessed a mind of great originality, and extraordinary strength and activity. His investigations in theology were profound and extensive, his reasoning shrewd and demonstrative, and his memory tenacious and prompt to furnish at every call whatever had come within his knowledge. He was not, however, popular as a preacher from an ill-modulated voice, and singularly uncouth manner. About the year 1775 he engaged zealously in the political struggle against British despotism, and rendered considerable service to the country by his sermons, and by deciphering the letter of Dr. Church, designed to convey intelligence to the British. He was a member of the convention which formed the constitution of Massachusetts, and of that also which adopted the constitution of the United States. During the last years of his life he suffered an almost total loss of his mental powers. He died September 24th, 1807, in his seventy-eighth year. He made himself conspicuous by some metaphysical writings in opposition to the opinions of president Edwards, published in 1793, and 1795, which were answered by Dr. Edwards.

✠ L.

WEST, Benjamin, LL.D. professor of mathematics and natural philosophy, in Brown University, Rhode-Island, was born at Rehoboth, Massachusetts, in March, 1730. He early displayed an extraordinary genius for the exact sciences, and without the aid of a public education, and amid the hinderances of other occupations, made himself acquainted with mathematics and natural philosophy, to such an extent, that he was, in 1786, appointed professor of those branches in the college at Providence, in which town he had before spent several years in instruction. He not long after received the same appointment from Columbia college, but declined it. He entered on his office at Providence in 1783, and retained it till 1799. He died August 26th, 1813, aged 83. His talents were of a superior order, and had he been able to devote himself to their cultivation, would have given him a distinguished rank among mathematicians.

✠ L.

WEST, Benjamin, a distinguished lawyer of New Hampshire, was born April 8th, 1746. He was a brother of Samuel West, D.D. and was educated at Harvard college, where he was graduated in 1768. He studied law and established himself in practice at Charlestown, New-Hampshire, and soon rose to eminence in the profession. His superior talents and great excellence of character, caused him to be elected by his fellow-citizens to several important civil employments. The chief of which were a seat in Congress; in the convention which formed the Constitution of the United States; and the State Convention which ratified it: but his dislike to public life led him to decline them all. After a long life marked by uncommon amiableness, modesty, uprightness, and piety, which endeared him to all who knew him, he died, July 27th, 1817.

WEST, Benjamin, a celebrated painter, was born in Chester county, in the state of Pennsylvania, in 1738. His parents were Quakers, but indulged him in his propensity to the fine arts, and even the society, at a general meeting, allowed him to practise portrait painting as a profession. After exercising his pencil in different parts of America, he went to Italy in 1760, and from thence came to England in 1763. Here he was persuaded to settle, and soon met with encouragement to confirm him in that resolution. One of his earliest friends was Dr. Drummond, archbishop of York, who introduced him to the late king, and he enjoyed the patronage of that excellent monarch above forty years. On the death of Sir Joshua Reynolds in 1791, Mr. West was elected president of the royal academy, which chair he enjoyed, with the exception of a short interval, till his death, March 10, 1820. He was interred in St. Paul's cathedral.—W. B.

WEST, Elizabeth, a native of Edinburgh, who became known for her eccentricities and mystical opinions. She wrote an account of her life, and died at Saline, 1735, aged 63.

WESTFIELD, Thomas, a native of Ely, educated at Jesus college, Cambridge. He obtained the livings of Mary-le-Bow, and St. Bartholomew's, London, and was made archbishop of St. Alban's and soon after raised to the see of Bristol by the king, who thus rewarded his soundness of judgment, his learning, and his unblamable conversation. Though at first respected and beloved in his diocese, he was exposed to the ridicule and persecution of the republicans, and at last ejected from his see. He died 25th June, 1644. His sermons were published after his death in 2 vols. He was so eloquent and so pathetic a preacher, that he was called the weeping prophet.

WESTON, Richard, a native of Leicester, who though occupied in the business of a thread hosier, paid particular attention to horticulture, and contributed some valuable and curious observations to the Gentleman's Magazine on the subject. He also published various useful tracts on his favourite pursuit, and died at Leicester 19th Nov. 1806, aged 74.

WETSTEIN, John Rodolphus, a learned native of Basil, who succeeded his father as professor of Greek and of theology. He published among other valuable works, Dialogue of Origen against the Marcionites—Exhortation to Martyrdom, &c. and died in his native town 1711, aged 64. His brother John Henry, was well skilled in the learned languages. He settled in Holland, and acquired great celebrity as a printer, and died 1726, aged 77. He was respected by the great and the learned, and the prefaces which he prefixed to the works which he edited, proved that he was a man of abilities and of deep erudition.

WETSTEIN, John James, of the same family as the preceding, was born at Basil. He travelled over Switzerland, France, England, and Germany, to examine the various MSS. of the Greek Testament, and on his return home he published his Prolegomena 1730. The work was no sooner read than it created him a multitude of enemies, who accused him before the council of Basil as a Socinian, in consequence of which he was stripped of his ecclesiastical honours, and obliged to fly from his country. He was received with distinction at Amsterdam, and placed in the professorial chair of Le Clerc, in philosophy, an appointment which he held with great reputation, till his death 24th March, 1754, in his 61st year. His edition of the New Testament with the various readings, and with critical remarks, was published in 1751-2, in 2 vols. fol. He published with that work two epistles of Clemens Romanus in Syriac, with a Latin version, of which he ably defended the authenticity. In reward for these useful labours he was honourably elected member of the royal societies of London and Berlin.

WHALLEY, Peter, a native of Northamptonshire, educated at Merchant Tailors' and at St. John's college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He was chosen in 1763 master of the grammar-school of Christ's hospital, which he resigned in 1776, and was soon after placed at the head of St. Olave school in Southwark. He obtained some preferment in the church, St. Sepulchre's vicarage, Northampton, and afterwards St. Margaret Pattens, and Horley, Sussex. He died 1791. He wrote an Inquiry into the Learning of Shakspeare, 8vo.—Vindication of the Authenticity and Evidences of the Gospels, 8vo.—Ben Jonson's Works with notes, 7 vols. 8vo.—Verses prefixed to Hervey's Meditations—sermons, &c. and he was for some years engaged in making collections for a history of Northamptonshire, which was never completed.

WHARTON, George, a native of Westmoreland, whose property was ruined in the civil wars, in consequence of his strong attachment to the royal cause. During the usurpation he maintained himself by writing almanacs, tracts on astronomy, chronological works, &c. His sufferings were rewarded at the restoration, he was made a baronet, and appointed treasurer of the ordnance. He died about 1681.

WHARTON, Anne, daughter of sir Henry

Lee, of Ditchley, Oxfordshire, inherited conjointly with her sister lady Abingdon, her father's estates. She became the wife of Thomas, marquis of Wharton, and distinguished herself by her learning and poetical works. Several of her poems have appeared in Dodsley's and Nicholas's collections. She died about 1685.

WHARTON, Henry, a learned divine, born 9th Nov. 1664, at Worstead in Norfolk, where his father was vicar. He was educated under the eye of his father, and afterwards entered at Caius college, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in art. His abilities recommended him to the notice of Dr. Cave, and of Sancroft, archbishop of Canterbury, to whom he was appointed chaplain, and from whom he received the vicarage of Minster, and the rectory of Chartham in Kent. His application to literary pursuits was so great that his health at last sunk under it, and he died at Canterbury, 5th March, 1695, aged 31, universally lamented. His publications were numerous and valuable, the best known of which are, a treatise on the Celibacy of the Clergy against the Church of Rome—Defence of Pluralities, 8vo.—Specimens of Errors in Burnet's History of the Reformation—Historia de Episcopis et Decanis Assavensibus, 8vo.—Anglia Sacra, sive Collectio Historiarum de Episcopis, &c. 2 vols. fol.—History of Laud's Troubles, and Trials—sermons, 8vo. &c.

WHARTON, Philip, duke of, an English nobleman, remarkable for his great eccentricities, born 1699. His early marriage with a woman of inferior rank, though of amiable and virtuous character, proved the beginning of his misfortunes, and flying from those domestic comforts which were within his reach, he plunged into all the follies, the crimes, and the extravagance of a licentious age. In his travels on the continent he paid his court at Avignon to the chevalier de St. George, and was complimented with the title of duke of Northumberland. His partiality for the fortunes of the exiled Stuarts was, however, forgotten; on his return home, he became the zealous supporter of the ministry, and for his eloquent services in parliament he was raised from the dignity of marquis to that of duke. Unsteady in his politics he soon changed sides, and distinguished himself not only as the bold defender of the bishop of Rochester, but as the publisher twice a week of a violent periodical paper called the True Briton. His extravagances had now so injured his property, that his creditors obtained possession of his income under a decree of chancery, and therefore to avoid that disgrace of sinking from a high station into contempt and poverty, he retired to the continent, and at the court of Spain openly espoused the cause of the pretender. After filling Madrid and Rome with his intrigues, and deceiving by the levity of his conduct both the Spanish court and the chevalier of St. George, he formed the plan of revisiting his country, though he heard that an indictment for high treason was issued against him. He proceeded as far as Rouen, but new difficulties arose, and his want of money obliged him again to return to Spain, and he died soon after at Terragone, where he had gone for the benefit of the waters, May 1731. His remains were interred with little ceremony by the charity of the Bernardine monks, of a neighbouring convent. On the death of his wife in 1726, he married another, who, though the daughter of an Irish colonel, was one of the maids of honour to the queen of Spain.

WHATELEY, William, a native of Lancashire, educated at Magdalen college, Cambridge. He obtained a living in Cheshire, and died 1613. He was an able advocate in favour of the protestant religion against the Roman catholics, and he wrote, among other things, an Exposition of the Ten Commandments, &c.

WHEARE, Degory, a native of Jacobstov in Cornwall, educated at Broadgate hall, Oxford. He became fellow of Exeter college, and afterwards travelled on the continent. He was patronised by lord Chandos, and was appointed by Camden the first professor in the lecture which he had founded, and he obtained also the mastership of Gloucester hall, which he held till his death in 1647, in his 74th year. He was author of a Dissertation de Ratione et Methodo legendi Historias, 8vo. a useful work, translated into English by Edmund Bohun—Parentatio Historica, &c.—Epistolarum Eucharist. Fasciculus, &c.

WHEATLEY, Charles, a native of London, educated at St. John's college, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. He afterwards became lecturer of St. Mildred in the Poultry, and vicar of Brent and Ferneaux Pelham, Hertfordshire, where he died 1742, aged 56. He wrote a Rational Illustration of the Book of Common Prayer, fol. republished in 8vo.—Historical Vindication of the 85th Canon, &c.—Answer to Hoadly on the Sacrament—Private Devotions at the Sacrament—Sermons at lady Moyle's Lectures, 8vo.—Miscellaneous Sermons published after his death, 3 vols. 8vo.

WHEATLEY, Phillis, a poetess, was a native of Africa, and brought to America in 1761 in her childhood. She acquired a knowledge of the English language, and also learnt something of the Latin. While a slave in the family of Mr. John Wheatley, Boston, she wrote a volume of poems, indicating a very superior genius. She died in 1784, aged 31.

WHEELER, George, a native of Charing,

Kent, was born at Breda, where his parents lived in exile during the civil wars. He entered at Lincoln college, Oxford, but before he took his degrees he began to travel, in company with Dr. James Spon of Lyons, and visited Venice, Constantinople, Asia Minor, the various countries of Greece, Zante, &c. The observations of these two learned travellers were ingenious, and as they minutely compared the relations of Pausanias, with the existing state of the country, they were enabled to trace with accuracy every striking feature of difference and of improvement. On his return to England Wheeler presented to the university of Oxford several valuable antiquities, and was in consequence complimented with the degree of M. A. Though a knight he took orders and obtained the living of Basingstoke, and besides the valuable rectory of Houghton le Spring, Durham, and a prebend in Durham cathedral. In his private character he was an amiable and devout man. He was created D.D. by diploma 1702, and died Feb. 18, 1724, aged 74. Besides his journey into Greece, in 6 vols. fol. 1682, he published an account of the churches and places of assembly of the primitive Christians, 8vo. 1689—and the Protestant Monastery, or Christian Economics, 12mo.

WHEELOCK, Eleazer, D.D. first president of Dartmouth college, New-Hampshire, was born about the year 1710, and graduated at Yale college in 1733. He studied theology, and was greatly distinguished for zeal and piety, and success in the ministry. He settled at Lebanon, Connecticut, and there instituted a school for the instruction of Indian youth for missionaries in 1754, in which he was aided by benefactions from many in the colonies, and at length by contributions in England and Scotland. In 1762 he had more than twenty Indian youth under his care. In 1770, at the invitation of New-Hampshire, he removed to Hanover in that state, and there opened a college, of which he was appointed president, and which was called Dartmouth, in honour of the earl of that name, who was at the head of the board of trustees, to whose direction the money collected in Great Britain for the Indian school was intrusted. He continued in his benevolent labours there till his death in 1779, in his sixty-ninth year.

WHEELOCK, John, LL.D. president of Dartmouth college, New-Hampshire, was the second son of the former president, and born at Lebanon, Connecticut, in 1754. Removing with his father to Hanover, he was educated there, and graduated with the first class in 1771. The next year he was appointed a tutor in the college. When the revolution came on he was chosen a delegate to the New-Hampshire convention, and in 1777 entered the army, receiving first a major's commission from the state of New-York, and afterwards that of lieutenant colonel in the continental service. In the summer of 1778, he conducted a hazardous expedition into the Indian country, and in a manner highly creditable to himself. His military reputation was increased by subsequent events, until by request of general Gates he entered his family, and continued in that station until he left the service. The charter of Dartmouth college having conferred on the president the right of nominating his successor, he selected his son, who assumed the office on the death of his father in 1779. In 1782 he visited Europe for the purpose of obtaining contributions to the institution. He returned in 1784, and for the space of thirty-six years continued at its head, labouring assiduously and successfully to promote its usefulness. In addition to the duties of president, he discharged those of professor of civil and ecclesiastical history. Toward the close of his life a disaffection to him arose which led to his removal by the legislature in 1815, but a subsequent legislature and the public at large vindicated him, and he was restored to the office in February 1817. He died on the 4th of April in that year. He possessed fine talents, and extensive learning, and excelled as a speaker. He was amiable, an exemplary Christian, and distinguished for his charities.  L.

WHELPLEY, Rev. Philip Melancthon, was born in Stockbridge, Massachusetts, Dec. 22, 1792. Conspicuous for early exhibitions of talent, he entered the Christian ministry soon after he reached the age of twenty-one. In a few months he was called to the pastoral care of the first presbyterian church in the city of New-York, and was ordained April 25, 1815; from which charge he was removed by death, after nearly ten years devotion to its interests. Besides some anonymous pieces in the Christian Spectator, a periodical work published in New-Haven, Connecticut, he published several sermons in his lifetime; among which, one commemorative of the landing of the pilgrims upon this continent, delivered before the New-England Society in the city of New-York, in 1822, and one delivered before the United Foreign Missionary Society in 1823, are distinguished for their genuine eloquence, and are models of their kind. A volume of miscellaneous sermons from his pen is about to perpetuate his memory. He died July 17, 1824.  L.

WHINCOR, Benjamin, an English divine, born 1609 at Stoke in Shropshire. He was educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts, and obtained a fellowship. He afterwards obtained the living of Northcumbury, Somers-setshire, from which he was withdrawn by the parliamentary visiters to become provost of King's college, in the room of Dr. Collins who was ejected. At the restoration he was removed from the headship of the college, and then settled in London, where he became minister of St. Anne's, Blackfriars, and afterwards of St. Lawrence, Jewry. On a visit to Cambridge he caught a violent cold, and died soon after, May 1683, at the house of his friend Dr. Cudworth, master of Christ college, and he was buried in his church of St. Lawrence, Jewry, where his funeral sermon was preached by Dr. Tillotson. His sermons were published after his death, the first volume by Shaftesbury, the author of the Characteristics, three more by Dr. Jeffrey of Norwich, and another volume by Dr. Samuel Clarke, 1707.

WHIPPLE, William, one of the signers of the declaration of American independence, was a delegate from New-Hampshire. In 1777 he was appointed a brigadier general of the troops of that state. He was afterwards a member of the executive council, and from 1783 until his death a judge of the supreme court. He died at Portsmouth November 28th, 1785.  L.

WHISTON, William, a learned English divine, born 9th Dec. 1667, at Norton near Twyrosse, Leicestershire, where his father was rector. He received his education under his father, and afterwards was two years at Tamworth school, and then entered at Clare-hall, Cambridge. In 1693 he became fellow of his college, and soon after tutor, but the labours of this important office were too great for his delicate constitution, and he resigned his numerous pupils to become chaplain to bishop Moore. His New Theory of the Earth appeared in 1696, and excited general admiration, though its principles were opposed by Dr. Keill. In 1698 he was presented by his patron the bishop to the living of Lowestoft in Suffolk, where he devoted himself assiduously to his parochial duties, till he was invited in 1700 to Cambridge, to become deputy to sir Isaac Newton, whom he soon after succeeded in the Lucasian professorship of mathematics. About this time his attachment to the principles of the church of England began to waver, he pretended to discover that the two first centuries of the church were truly Eusebian and Arian, and that afterwards doctrines less congenial to the genuine spirit of Christianity had been adopted. These opinions, which were heard with astonishment by his friends, engaged much of the public attention, but he disregarded the opposition and censures of his former associates, and wrote several works in support of his sentiments, and in vindication of his conduct. This drew upon him the severe displeasure of the university.

and in 1710 he was deprived of his professorship, and banished from the precincts of Cambridge. Regardless of the disgrace, he retired to London, where he maintained himself by giving lectures on philosophy, astronomy, and divinity, and by writing on his favourite topic of primitive Christianity. The scanty pittance which he thus derived was scarcely sufficient to supply him with the necessaries of life, yet he was cheerful and serene, and in the midst of his distresses, he often found the hand of those who revered him for his learning, his integrity, and piety, extended to relieve his wants. Though he had regularly frequented the church of England, he at last forsook it in 1747, when the officiating clergyman read, in allusion to him as he supposed, the Athanasian creed, and he then repaired to the Baptist meeting, till, as he observed, he had an opportunity of setting up a more primitive congregation himself. He died after a week's illness, 22d Aug. 1752, aged 84, and was buried near his wife, by whom he had several children, and who had died 18 months before him, at Lyndon, in Rutlandshire. He was, as bishop Hare observes, a fair unblemished character, who all his life had cultivated piety, virtue, and good learning. Constant himself in the private and public duties of religion, he promoted virtue in others, and such learning as he thought would conduce most to the honour of God by manifesting the greatness and wisdom of his works. By his useful works of philosophy and mathematics, he endeavoured to display the glory of the great Creator, and to his study of nature he early joined the study of the Scriptures. The best known of his works are, besides his Theory,—Astronomical Lectures, 8vo.—translation of Josephus, with eight valuable dissertations, 4 vols. 8vo.—Astronomical Principles of Religion—History of the Old and New Testament, 6 vols. 8vo.—Vindication of the Testimony of Phlegon—Memoirs of his own Life, 2 vols. 8vo. and several theological pieces in defence or support of his favourite doctrines.

WHITAKER, William, D.D. a native of Holme, Lancashire, educated at Trinity college, Cambridge. He became regius professor in the university, and master of St. John's college, where he died 1595, aged 47. Though he wrote some tracts against popery, and in favour of the church of England, he is supposed to have inclined to the puritans. Bishop Hall said of him, "never a man saw him without reverence, or heard him without wonder."

WHITAKER, John, a learned divine, was born at Manchester in 1735. He was educated at the free-school of his native town, and next at Corpus Christi college, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship, and took his degree of bachelor in divinity. In 1771 he acquired celebrity by his "History of Manchester," which was followed by the "Genuine History of the Britons asserted," in answer to Macpherson. At this time he was morning preacher at Berkeley chapel, and lived on terms of intimacy with Gibbon, who submitted to his correction the manuscript of the first volume of his history, except the offensive chapter on Christianity. In 1778 Mr. Whitaker was presented to the college living of Ruan Lanyhorne in Cornwall, where he died Oct. 30, 1808. His other works are—1. Sermons on Death, Judgment, Heaven, and Hell, 8vo. 2. A Vindication of Mary, queen of Scots, 3 vols. 8vo. 3. The Course of Hannibal over the Alps, 2 vols. 8vo. 4. Criticisms on Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, 8vo. These were originally printed in the English Review. 5. The Origin of Arianism disclosed, 8vo. 6. The origin of Government, 8vo. 7. The ancient Cathedral of Cornwall, 2 vols. 4to. 8. The Life of St. Neot. He also wrote some poetical pieces.—W. B.

WHITAKER, Edward W. an ingenious divine, was the son of serjeant Whitaker. He studied at Christ Church, Oxford, and on entering into orders became curate of St. John's, Clerkenwell, but afterwards obtained the livings of St. Mildred and All Saints, Canterbury. Latterly he resided at Egham in Surrey, where he kept a respectable seminary for education. At the close of his useful life he succeeded in establishing the Refuge for the Destitute. He died in 1818, aged 68. His works are—1. On the Prophecies relating to the Restoration of the Jews, 8vo. 2. Dialogues on the Trinity. 3. A letter to the Jews. 4. Sermons on Education. 5. A general and connected View of the Prophecies. 6. Family Sermons, 3 vols. 7. Commentary on the Revelation. 8. The Manual of Prophecy. 9. An Abridgment of Universal History, 2 vols. 4to. &c.—W. B.

WHITREAD, Samuel, a politician, was the son of the eminent porter-brewer in Chiswell-street, London, and born there in 1758. He was educated at Eton, and afterwards at St. John's college, Cambridge, where he took his bachelor's degree, and then went on the continent, accompanied by the present archdeacon Coxé. Soon after his return, he married the daughter of the late sir Charles, and sister to the present earl Grey. In 1790 he was returned to the House of Commons for Steyning, where he instantly joined Mr. Fox, and continued that attachment through life. In subsequent parliaments he sat for Bedford: and was distinguished as a vigorous assailant of Mr. Pitt. He also conducted the impeachment of lord Melville; and, with the exception of the short-lived administration of the talents, was uniformly in opposition to the government. In a fit of insanity, supposed to be occasioned by his connexion with Drury-lane theatre, he destroyed himself, July 6, 1815.—W. B.

WHITE, Daniel, D.D. a native of Rushden, Northamptonshire, educated at Trinity college, Oxford, of which he became fellow 1664. He was afterwards chaplain to Seth Ward, bishop of Salisbury, and under his patronage became chanter of the cathedral, rector of St. Edmund's, Salisbury, and prebendary of Taunton, Regis. He died 24th March, 1726, aged 88. In his character he was easy, affable, devout, pious, and charitable, little acquainted with worldly affairs, and more attentive to the business of religion, and to the pursuits of learning. His publications are more than 40 in number, and display good sense and learning. The best known of these are, the Protestant Reconciler, 1682, which gave great offence to the clergy, and was publicly burnt by the university of Oxford—five Points against Calvinism, 8vo.—Paraphrase and Commentary on the New Testament, 2 vols. folio, often re-edited.

WHITE, John, a bishop in the reign of Elizabeth, deposed for preaching a seditious sermon. He wrote some theological works in Latin, and died 1559.

WHITE, Richard, a miscellaneous writer. His works were in Latin, and chiefly on subjects of English history. He died at Douay, 1612.

WHITE, Francis, bishop of Ely under the first James, was author of some sermons and controversial tracts against Fishers. He died 1637.

WHITE, Thomas, lecturer of St. Andrew's, Holburn, and St. Anne's, Aldersgate-street, was author of the Art of Divine Revelation, a book of merit. After the restoration he preached to the prisoners in Ludgate, and was kindly noticed by bishop Sheldon.

WHITE, Thomas, or Albius, a Roman catholic priest, principal of a college at Lisbon, and sub-principal at Douay. He was an able scholar, and so warm an admirer of Aristotle's philosophy, that he applied his principles to explain some of the most mysterious parts of the Christian religion. Some of his pieces have been inserted in the Index Expurgatorius. He was intimate with Hobbes, though in their opinions they widely differed. He died 1676.

WHITE, Thomas, a native of Bristol, who studied at Magdalen college, Oxford, and obtained the livings of St. Gregory, and St. Dunstan in the West, London. He afterwards became prebendary of St. Paul's, canon of Windsor, and Christ church, and treasurer of Salisbury. He was author of some sermons, and founded an almshouse in his native town, besides a lectureship at Oxford, and liberal donations to Sion college in London. He died 1623.

WHITE, Jeremy, fellow of Trinity college, Cambridge, and chaplain to Cromwell, is known for his humour and vivacity. He showed particular attention to one of the protector's daughters, and being once surprised by the father on his knees before the lady, he averted the indignation of Cromwell by saying, that he was entreating her interference with her maid, to whom he had long paid his addresses without hopes of success. Cromwell, who knew the artifice of the lover, upbraided the maid for her supposed unkindness, and immediately ordered a clergyman to perform the ceremony of marriage between her and the astonished chaplain. He wrote a book on the Restoration of all Things, published after his death, in which he maintained that all mankind are doomed to inherit salvation. He died 1707, aged 78.

WHITE, Robert, an engraver of eminence, who was pupil to Loggan. His likenesses were strikingly correct and expressive, and his attention to business was so intense, that it is said he engraved mere portraits and other works than any other artist. He died 1704.

WHITE, Nathanael, pastor of the dissenting congregation at the Old Jewry, was born in Pall-Mall, and educated under Doddridge and Caleb Ashworth. He published some funeral sermons, &c. and died March 3d, 1783.

WHITE, Joseph, a learned divine, was the son of a weaver at Gloucester, and born there in 1746. He was educated at the school of Gloucester, and next at Wadham college, Oxford, where he applied to the study of oriental literature. In 1775, being then master of arts, and fellow of his college, he was appointed professor of Arabic. In 1778 he published "Sacrorum Evangeliorum Versio Syriaca, Philoxeniana, ex Cod. MSS. Ridleianis, in Bibl. Coll. Nov. Oxon. cum Interpretationes et Annotationat," 2 vols. 4to. The same year he preached a sermon before the university, which was printed with this title; "A Revisal of the English Translation of the Old Testament recommended." In 1779 he took the degree of bachelor in divinity, and published "A Letter to the Bishop of London, suggesting a Plan for a new Edition of the Septuagint." In 1780 he printed "A Specimen of the civil and military Institutes of Timour or Tamerlane," which was followed by an English edition of the whole work by Major Davy, with the notes of Mr. White. In 1783 he preached the Bampton Lecture, on a comparison between the characters of Mahomet and Christ. These lectures were published in 1784, with an additional sermon on the duty of propagating Christianity in India. For this work Lord Thurlow gave the preacher a prebend in the cathedral of Gloucester, on which he took his doctor's degree. But in 1788 an attempt was made to deprive him of the honour of writing these discourses, and it appeared, indeed, that he was largely indebted to Mr. Badoock in the composition of them. Upon this Dr. White published "A Statement of his literary Obligations to the Rev. Samuel Badoock and the Rev. Dr. Parr." In 1790 he vacated his fellowship by marriage, and was presented to the rectory of Melton in Suffolk. In 1800 he published his "Diataessaron," or a Harmony of the Gospels, in Latin, which was followed the year after by his "Ægyptiaca; or Observations on certain Antiquities of Egypt." His next publication was an edition of Griesbach's "New Testament in Greek," 2 vols.; as a sequel to which he printed a Synopsis of the Criticisms of Griesbach. He died at Oxford, May 22d, 1814.—W. B.

WHITE, Henry Kirke, an ingenious youth, was the son of a butcher at Nottingham, and born there March 21st, 1785. He received an ordinary education, and at the age of fourteen was placed with a stocking weaver, from which business he was soon taken, and entered in an attorney's office, where at his leisure hours he studied Latin and Greek. He now wished to enjoy the benefit of a university education, to facilitate which object he published a volume of poems, but the sale did not answer his expectations. At length he procured admission as sizar in St. John's college, Cambridge, where incessant study threw him into a consumption, of which he died Oct. 19th, 1806. His poems and other pieces were published, with a biographical memoir, by Mr. Southey, under the title of "The Remains of Henry Kirke White."—W. B.

WHITE, Peregrine, the first Englishman, whose birth was in New-England, was born at Plymouth in November, 1620, and died at Marshfield, July 22d, 1704, in his eighty-fourth year.  L.

WHITE, Anthony Walton, a distinguished officer in the American revolutionary war, assumed the command of the cavalry after the defeat at Monk's corner, in April, 1780. He died at Brunswick, Pennsylvania, in 1803.  L.

WHITEFIELD, George, one of the founders of the sect of the Methodists, was born at Gloucester, where his mother kept the Bell inn, 1714. From the Crypt school of his native town, he entered as servitor at Pembroke college, Oxford, and was ordained at the proper age by Benson, bishop of Gloucester. Enthusiasm and the love of singularity now influenced his conduct, and in his eagerness to obtain popularity, he preached not only in prisons, but in the open fields, and by strong persuasive eloquence, he prevailed upon multitudes to regard him as a man of superior sanctity. In 1738 he went to America, to increase the number of his converts; but after labouring for some time as the friend and the associate of the Wesleys, he at last was engaged with them in a serious dispute, which produced a separation. While he zealously asserted the doctrine of absolute election and final perseverance, agreeable to the notions of Calvin, his opponents regarded his opinion as unsupported by Scripture, and therefore inadmissible, and in consequence of this arose the two sects of the Calvinistic and the Arminian Methodists. Secure in the good opinion of a great number of adherents, and in the patronage of lady Huntingdon, to whom he was chaplain, he continued his labours, and built two Tabernacles in the city and in Tottenham-court road for the commodious reception of his followers. He died while on a visit to his churches in New-England, America, 1770, and had the satisfaction to know that his adherents were numerous on both continents. His sermons, letters, and controversial tracts, have been published together in 7 vols. 8vo. and an account of his life has appeared by Gillies.

WHITFIELD, Henry, B. D. first minister of Guilford, Connecticut, was the only son of an opulent lawyer, and born in England in 1597. His father intending him for the law, gave him an education at one of the universities, and the inns of court, but the son preferring the ministry entered into orders, and obtained the rich living of Oakly in Surrey. Here he entertained the puritan divines in the Laudean persecution, and in 1639, emigrating to America, he became the founder of Guilford in connexion with Mr. Leete, Samuel Desborough, and John Hoadly. Leete was governor successively of the colonies of New-Haven and Connecticut, Desborough was related to Cromwell, and returning to England, became lord chancellor of Scotland. Hoadly also returned to England, and was chaplain to the castle of Edinburgh. Whitfield returned in 1650, and died in the ministry at the city of Winchester. He was a good scholar, a distinguished divine, and an excellent preacher. He published an account of the progress of the gospel among the Indians in 1651.  L.

WHITEHEAD, Paul, an English poet, born in London, on St. Paul's day, from which circumstance he derived his Christian name. Though originally intended for business, and apprenticed to a mercer, he despised the drudgery of the counter, and entered at the temple to study the law. By unfortunately joining with Fleetwood the player, in a bond of 3000*l.* he brought misery upon himself, and languished for some years in the Fleet prison. He afterwards maintained himself by his writings, and at last, through the friendship of lord le Despenser, he obtained a patent place of 800*l.* for life. He published the State Dunces—Manners—Honour—Satires— the Gymnasiad, a mock-heroic poem, to ridicule the brutish business of boxing, addressed to Broughton, the then famous champion of the order. He wrote also an Epistle to Dr. Thompson, besides some songs and epigrams. He died 30th Dec. 1774, aged 64, and was buried with great pomp at Wycombe, by the directions of his friend lord le Despenser.

WHITEHEAD, William, an English poet, born at the beginning of 1715, at Cambridge, where his father was a baker. By the kindness of Mr. Bromley, afterwards lord Montfort, who generously exerted himself in favour of his family, he obtained, at the age of fourteen, a nomination to Winchester college, and he had there the honour of obtaining a prize for a poem which Pope set to the scholars of the college when he visited the school in company with his friend lord Peterborough. Though very respectable in the school for abilities and learning, he lost the election to New college for want of friends, and in consequence entered at Clare hall, Cambridge, where, as the son of a baker, he had a claim to a scholarship. In 1742 he became fellow of the college, and soon after engaged in the family of lord Jersey, as tutor to his son, and to his friend, afterwards general Stevens. The leisure which he enjoyed amidst the comforts and the independence of his situation, directed his thoughts to dramatic composition, and he produced his Roman Father and his Creusa, which were received with great applause. In 1754 he accompanied his noble pupil and lord Nuneham on the continent, and after visiting the German courts, he passed to Italy, and returned through Switzerland, Germany, and Holland to England 1756. The views of Rome, and the monuments of her departed greatness, were not lost on the imagination of a man of genius and of taste, and on his return the poet presented to the public his elegy written at Hautvilliers—his ode on the Campagna of Rome—and five eclogues. By the interest of lady Jersey, he was appointed secretary, and register to the order of the Bath, and two years after he succeeded Cibber in the honourable office of poet laureat. Thus deservedly raised to comfortable independence, he continued the friend and the associate of the two noblemen over whose education he had so usefully presided, and the many days which he passed, in honourable hospitality, and in cheerful conversation, at Nuneham, and Middleton parks, were proofs of the goodness of his heart, as much as of the virtues, and the grateful generosity of his pupils. In the midst of these pleasing assiduities of friendship, he devoted much of his time to the muses, and besides the occasional odes which loyalty, and official duty claimed from his pen, he wrote the School for Lovers, a comedy acted at Drury-lane, 1762, and Charge to the Poets, a satirical poem. The Trip to Scotland, a farce, appeared about 1771, and in 1775, the poet collected together, and published his poems. As he grew older, Whitehead felt more sensibly a palpitation of the heart, and a difficulty of breathing, with which for nearly forty years, he had been occasionally afflicted, and these disorders at last proved fatal. He died suddenly, after a short confinement, in consequence of a cold at his lodgings, Charles-street, Grosvenor square, 14th April, 1785, and was buried by the direction of his friend general Stevens, in South Audley-street chapel. Besides the above-mentioned pieces, Whitehead wrote Variety—the Goat's beard—Venus attiring the Graces, &c. and though he may not claim a distinguished seat among the first bards of Britain, he must hold a respectable rank in the temple of fame, as an elegant poet and a nervous writer. As a private man, his virtues were many, and deservedly recommended him to the friendship and patronage of the great. An account of his life has been published by his friend Mason.

WHITEHEAD, John, a Methodist preacher. He was well educated, and with a mind panting after distinction, he quitted the trade of linen-draper at Bristol, and then kept a school at Wandsworth, where he was patronised by the Quakers, whose principles he had adopted, after abandoning the society of the Methodists. He next travelled on the continent, as tutor to one of his pupils, and at Leyden he applied himself to anatomy and physic, and took his medical degrees. On his return to London he became physician to the London dispensary. He preached the funeral sermon of John Wesley, and published an account of his life, in 2 vols. 8vo.—but the work gave great offence to the Methodists, and occasioned a quarrel. Dr. Whitehead died in London, 1804.

WHITEHURST, John, an eminent writer, born in 1713, at Congleton, Cheshire. He was brought up to the business of his father, a clock and watch maker, and after visiting Dublin, to see a curious clock, set up for himself at Derby. There he made the clock for the Town-hall, and also the clock and the chimes for All Saints' church; in 1775 he removed to London, where he became stamper of the money weights, by the patronage of the duke of Newcastle. Distinguished by his great mechanical knowledge, his house was the resort of the ingenious, and the scientific, and in reward for his valuable inquiries into the original state and formation of the earth, which he improved in 1787, in 1 vol. 4to. he was in 1779 elected member of the Royal Society. He published besides, an attempt towards obtaining invariable measures of length, capacity, and weight, from the mensuration of time, and contributed to the philosophical transactions three valuable papers, on thermometrical observations, at Derby, on a machine for raising water, and on an experiment on ignited substances. He prepared also a treatise on Chimneys, Ventilation, &c. which appeared after his death, by Dr. William. This ingenious and amiable man, died at his house in Bolt-court, Fleet-street, 1788, aged 75.

WHITELOCK, Sir James, an able lawyer, born in London, and educated at Merchant Tailors', and St. John's college, Oxford, from which he removed in 1594, to the Middle Temple. He was chosen member for Woodstock, in 1620, and soon after made chief justice of Chester, and knighted. He was afterwards raised to the office of judge of the common pleas, and at last became chief justice of the king's bench, and died 1632, aged 62. He wrote Lectures or Readings in the Middle Temple hall—Speeches in Parliament, &c. He was well acquainted with Hebrew, and Greek, and so fluent a Latin speaker, that at the assizes at Oxford, he explained from the bench, to some dignified foreigners who were present, the charge which he had delivered to the jury, in good and elegant Latin.

WHITELOCK, Bulstrode, son of the above, was born 6th Aug. 1605, in Fleet-street, London. He was educated at Merchant Tailors', and at St. John's, Oxford, which he left without a degree, to enter at the Middle Temple. Under the direction of his father, he acquired great knowledge of the law, and in the long parliament he was elected member for Marlow. Though he was one of the most active managers in the accusation against Strafford, he honourably declined to engage in the prosecution of Laud, from whom he had, when at Oxford, received many marks of kindness and hospitality. His influence was such in parliament, that he was one of the commissioners appointed to treat about peace with the king, and he also sat as a lay member in the Westminster assembly of divines. He afterwards gained the confidence of Cromwell, by informing him secretly of the intentions of lord Essex, to criminate him, but though one of the commissioners of the great seal, he refused to be concerned in the trial of the unfortunate Charles, and retired into the country. In 1648, he was elected high steward of Oxford, and he deserved the thanks of the university for the interference of his authority to preserve their library, and to protect their immunities. In 1653 he went ambassador to Sweden, and on his return, the next year, became commissioner of the Exchequer, and in 1656, he was chosen speaker of the commons, and the following year called up to the other house as one of Cromwell's lords. In 1659 he was appointed president of the council of state, and keeper of the great seal, but on the approach of the restoration he withdrew to the country, and led the rest of his life in retirement at Chilton, Wiltshire, where he died 28th Jan. 1676. He wrote memorials of the English affairs, or account of what passed during the reign of Charles I. till the restoration, &c. published 1682, and again edited 1732—Memorials of the English affairs, from the time of Brutus, to the end of the first James's reign, published fol. 1709.—Monarchy asserted to be the best, most ancient, and legal form of government, 8vo.—Speeches in Rushworth's collection, &c. Though a confidential friend of Cromwell, he is deservedly commended by lord Clarendon, for his eminent parts, great learning, and the openness of his character.

WHITGIFT, John, a learned prelate, born 1530, at Great Grimsby, Lincolnshire, from a family anciently settled at Whitgift in Yorkshire. He was educated at St. Anthony's school, London, and there he miraculously escaped the plague, and in 1548 he entered at Queen's college, Cambridge, from which he soon after removed to Pembroke hall. In 1555 he was chosen fellow of Peter-house, and when in orders he obtained from bishop Coxe, to whom he was chaplain, the rectory of Feversham in Cambridgeshire. He was in 1563 appointed Margaret professor of divinity, and two years after made chaplain to the queen. In 1567 he was made master of Pembroke-hall, and three months after placed at the head of Trinity college, and made regius professor of divinity. He was in 1573 made dean of Lincoln, and in 1576, raised to the see of Worcester, by Elizabeth, who highly esteemed him, and in 1583, he was translated on the death of Grindal to Canterbury. In this elevated situation he acted with great vigour against the puritans and papists, but though ridiculed by his enemies, he maintained his dignity and the moderation of his conduct, so that he is deservedly called by Fuller the worthiest man that ever the English hierarchy did enjoy. He died 29th Feb. 1604, at Croyden, where he had founded an hospital, and was buried in the parish church there, where a monument is erected to his memory. In his thesis for his doctor's degree, he maintained that the pope was antichrist. He wrote an answer to an admonition to the parliament 1572, which produced a long controversy between him and the puritans.

WHITTINGHAM, William, a native of Chester, educated at Brazen-nose college, Oxford. He was afterwards fellow of All-Souls, and then student of Christ church, but he quitted England during Mary's bloody reign. Under Elizabeth he was made dean of Durham, though he entertained scruples against the liturgy and the church ceremonies established by parliament. He gave great offence to the Durham clergy by violating the stone coffins, and removing some of the ancient ornaments of his cathedral. He translated the Geneva Bible into English, and also turned into metre some of the psalms of David, which appear in the old versions with the initials of his name. He died 1579.

WHITTINGTON, Robert, a native of Lichfield, who obtained a degree at Oxford by petitioning the congregation of regents, and declaring that he had spent 14 years in the study of rhetoric, and 12 years in teaching boys. He edited Lily's grammar, and published some school books of great utility. He was in his character an ill-natured restless man, of whom it might be said that his hand was against every man, and every man's hand against him. He died about 1560.

WHITTINGTON, sir Richard, a mercer and citizen of London in the times of Richard II. and his two successors. He was a man of great influence, and very rich, and among other charitable labours he founded an alms-house for 13 poor men, he built Newgate, the best part of Bartholomew's hospital, the library in Gray-friars, now called Christ's hospital, and part of Guildhall, with a chapel and library for the preservation of city records. He was sheriff for the city 1393, and was knighted, and afterwards served the office of lord mayor three times, the last time in 1419. The various stories which are reported of him are calculated for the amusement of children, but have no foundation in truth.

WICKAM, William. Vid. WYKEHAM.

WICKLIFFE, John de, a celebrated doctor, professor of divinity at Oxford, and deservedly considered as the forerunner of Luther in the reformation. He was born at Wickliffe in Yorkshire, about 1324, and educated at Queen's college, and afterwards at Merton, and in 1361 raised to the mastership of Baliol college. In 1365 he was made, by the scholars, head of Canterbury hall, just founded at Oxford by archbishop Islip, but his elevation was opposed by the monks, and Langham the next primate, and the pope, to whom the dispute was referred, displaced him, and his secular associates. Thus disgraced by violence he retired to his living at Lutterworth in Leicestershire, meditating revenge against the authors of his unjust privation. In the works of Marsilius of Padua, and other bold writers, he found ample room to indulge his opposition, and well aware of the popularity of attacking a foreign power, which overawed the throne, and submitted the industry and the revenues of the kingdom to its own avaricious views, he loudly inveighed against the errors and the encroachments of the Romish church. His writings alarmed the clergy, and a council was assembled at Lambeth, by archbishop Sudbury, 1377, and Wickliffe summoned to give an account of his doctrines. He appeared before it, accompanied by the duke of Lancaster, then in power, and he made so able a defence, that he was dismissed without condemnation. His acquittal, however, displeased the pope, Gregory XI. who directed his emissaries to seize the offending heretic, or if he were protected by the great and powerful of the kingdom, to cite him to Rome, to answer in person before the sovereign pontiff. In consequence of this a second council assembled at Lambeth, and the 19 propositions which the pope had declared heretical, were so ably vindicated by the eloquence of the undaunted reformer, that his judges, afraid of offending the nobles, or of exciting a commotion among the people, who loudly supported the cause of their champion, permitted him to depart in safety, and enjoined him silence in matters of religion and of controversy. Undismayed by the power of his enemies, Wickliffe continued to preach his doctrines, which were now more universally spread, and a third council, therefore, assembled under Courtenay the primate, 1382, and 24 propositions of the reformer were condemned as heretical, and 14 as croneous. The severity of the church was, at the suggestion of the pope, and the concurrence of the weak Richard II. directed with effect against the supporters of the new heresy; but whilst some of his followers suffered punishment for their adherence to his principles, Wickliffe unhappily died at Lutterworth, 1384, at a time when nothing was wanting to emancipate the English nation from the tyranny of Rome, but the boldness, perseverance, and eloquence of a popular leader. Of the several works which he wrote, his Triologus is almost the only one which has been printed. The noble struggle which Wickliffe had made against the gigantic power of Rome was almost forgotten after his death, till Martin Luther arose to follow his steps, and to establish his doctrines on a foundation which will last till Christianity is no more. The memory of Wickliffe was branded with ignominy by the impotent papists, and by the order of the council of Constance, whose cruelties towards John of Huss, and Jerome of Prague are so well known, the illustrious reformer was declared to have died an obstinate heretic, and his bones were therefore dug up from holy ground, and contemptuously thrown on a dunghill. The English translation of the New Testament, by the pen of Wickliffe, was published in folio by Lewis, and his life has been written among others by Gilpin.

WICQUEFORT, Abraham, a native of Amsterdam, who early settled in France, where he acquired great political knowledge. He became known to the elector of Brandenburg, who appointed him, in 1626, his ambassador at the court of France, where he continued his honourable services for 32 years. The jealousy of Mazarine at last produced his disgrace, and, upon an accusation of sending private intelligence of the state secrets of France to the Dutch government, he was sent to the bastille, and after some months confinement, was conducted out of the kingdom. From Calais he passed over to England, and afterwards to Holland, where he was honourably received by De Witt, and appointed historiographer to the states. He was accused, in 1675, of holding secret correspondence with the enemies of the state, and in consequence of this he was condemned to perpetual imprisonment; but four years after he escaped, by the assistance of one of his daughters, who, at the peril of her life, exchanged clothes with him. He retired to Zell, which he quitted in disgust in 1681, because the duke refused to interest himself in procuring the reversion of his sentence at the Hague, and he died the next year. He wrote the History of the United Provinces from their establishment to the peace of Munster, fol.—the Ambassador and his Functions, 2 vols. 4to.—Memoirs on Ambassadors and public Ministers, &c.

WIDA, Herman de, a German divine, who joined his labours with those of Luther, Melancthon, and Bucer in effecting the reformation. He was made archbishop of Cologne in 1515; but was obliged to resign 1547, and died 1552. His opinions of church government were the nearest, of all the German reformers, to the doctrines of the church of England.

WIGGLESWORTH, Edmund, D.D. first Hollis professor of divinity in Harvard college, was a native of Malden, Massachusetts, and graduated at Harvard in 1710. He soon became conspicuous in the ministry by his talents, learning, and piety; and on the institution of the Hollis professorship of theology in 1721, was elected to fill it. He continued in that station with the highest reputation for more than forty years. He was distinguished for force and comprehension of mind, keenness in reasoning, and delicacy of fancy; erudition, candour, and modesty. He was chosen rector of Yale college, but declined on account of deafness, with which he was afflicted.

He died January 19th, 1765, in his seventy-third year. ¶ L.

WIGGLESWORTH, Edward, D.D. son of the first Hollis professor in Harvard college, was graduated at that institution in 1749. He succeeded his father in the professorship in 1765, and retained it till 1791, when he resigned on account of ill health. He was also conspicuous for his learning, and was one of the original members of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences. He died in 1794. ¶ L.

WIELAND, Christopher Martin, a German poet, was born at Biberach, in 1733. After residing some years in Switzerland, he returned to his native place, where he became director of the chancery. The elector of Mentz appointed him professor of philosophy and belles-lettres at Erfurt; and the duke of Saxe-Weimar made him aulic counsellor. In 1803, Buonaparte sent him the cross of the legion of honour. He died at Weimar, in 1813. His works make 42 vols. 4to. One of his poems, entitled "Oberon," has been translated by Mr. Sotheby.—*W. WILD, Henry, a tailor, born at Norwich. Though well educated, the poverty of his parents obliged him to seek for maintenance in a tailor's shop, and after working there 14 years, he at last emerged from obscurity, and by astonishing application not only regained his classical knowledge, but formed an intimate acquaintance with the Hebrew, and other oriental languages. He was by accident noticed by Dr. Prideaux, who liberally patronised him, and obtained for him permission of admittance into the Bodleian library at Oxford. At the university he maintained himself by teaching the oriental languages to private pupils, and in 1720 he removed to London, where he was admitted to the patronage and friendship of Dr. Mead. He died about 1733, respected as a sober, modest, diffident, and inoffensive man. After his death appeared his translation of Mahomet's Journey to Heaven, from the Arabic.

WILD, Robert, D.D. author of the tragedy of Christopher Love—Iter Boreale, a poem on the imprisonment of Calamy in Newgate—other poems, sermons, &c. was rector of Aynho, Northamptonshire, from which he was ejected at the restoration for nonconformity. He died at Oundle, 1697.

WILDBORE, Charles, an eminent mathematician, who obtained the living of Broughton Sulney, Nottinghamshire, where he died 1803. His knowledge of mathematics, and of the classics, was extensive, and all acquired by his own industry, and without the assistance of others. In 1759 he began his ingenious contributions to the Gentleman's Diary, and became the editor of it in 1780. He also contributed to the Ladies'

Diary, and to Martin's Miscellaneous Correspondence, and he engaged, in 1773, in a controversy in Hutton's Miscellanea Mathematica, and also with Dawson of Sedbryk, about the velocity with which water issues from a vessel in motion.

WILDE, William, an English lawyer of eminence. He was recorder of London, created a baronet 1660, made king's serjeant, and one of the judges of the Common Pleas, and four years after, 1672, promoted to the King's Bench. He published Yelverton's Reports, and died Nov. 23d, 1679.

WILDMAN, John, an able writer in the service of Oliver Cromwell. He was major in the army, and like the fanatics of the day, he spent much time in hypocritical prayers, and all the assumed sanctity of religion. He was imprisoned by Cromwell; but when his execution was expected, he was set at liberty, and afterwards served the usurper with great zeal, and by his pen, as well as his negotiations, contributed much to the popularity of his government.

WILKES, Thomas, an Augustine monk, of Osney abbey, near Oxford, author of an History of England from William I. to the end of the first Edward's reign. He wrote also some Latin tracts, &c.

WILKES, John, alderman and chamberlain of London, was born 23th of Oct. 1727, in St. John's-street, Clerkenwell, the son of a distiller. He received his education at Hertford school, and under a private tutor, and then went to Leyden, and on his return to England, he married, about 1750, Miss Mead, of the Meads of Buckinghamshire. In 1754 he stood an unsuccessful candidate for Berwick, but three years after was elected for Aylesbury. He first drew upon himself the severity of the government in 1763 by the publication of the 45th number of the North Briton, and in consequence of this offensive paper he was sent to the Tower. Though the warrant by which he had been arrested was declared illegal, he was dismissed from the office of colonel of the Buckinghamshire militia, and his opposition to government marked him as a dangerous innovator, and as an object of persecution. The republication of the North Briton was followed by his Essay on Woman, an indelicate and licentious performance, for which he was properly arraigned in the court of King's Bench, and upon conviction expelled from the house of Commons and outlawed. He afterwards obtained a verdict against Mr. Wood, the under secretary of state, with 1000*l.* damages, and soon after retired from his persecutors to Paris. On his return to England in 1768, he sent a letter of submission to the king, and at the general election offered himself a candidate for London, but though unsuccessful, he was soon after chosen for Middlesex. His election was declared void by the house of Commons: but his constituents persisted in their choice, and after he had been thus arbitrarily expelled the house three times, Mr. Luttrell his antagonist, who had but few votes, was declared the successful candidate. In 1769 he was elected alderman of Farringdon Without, and the same year he obtained a verdict against Lord Halifax, the secretary of state, for seizing his papers, with 4000*l.* damages. In 1771 he served the office of sheriff, and in 1774 was elected lord mayor, and was permitted quietly to take his seat in the House of Commons for Middlesex. In 1779 he obtained the lucrative office of chamberlain to the city of London, and then gave himself up to the duties of his appointment, regardless of the political struggles in which he had so long been engaged. In his retirement at his seat in the isle of Wight, he devoted much of his time to literary pursuits, and convivial society. He died 26th Dec. 1797, aged 70, and was buried in a vault in Grosvenor chapel, South Audley-street. Besides the works already mentioned, he published several political pamphlets and speeches, occasioned by the occurrences of the times, and he also gave to the world splendid editions of Theophrastus and of Catullus, and prepared an elegant translation of Anacreon. Though for a number of years the idol of the people, and the champion of opposition, Wilkes sunk into obscurity in the latter part of life; and he, who once compared himself to Brutus, and sought for public favour, and for popularity in opposing the measures of government, and in abusing the monarchy, was at last seen a bending courtier at the levees at St. James's, and the associate of those political dependents with whom to have familiarly conversed some years before he would have considered as the highest of disgrace. In his private character he was licentious; his conversation was easy and full of wit, his manners were pleasing and elegant, though his physiognomy was in the highest degree forbidding; and his memory was so strongly retentive, that his company was a perpetual treat of facetiousness and of amusement to the chosen few whom he selected for his intimate friends. He was a man of great personal courage; he fought several duels in support of his political character; and the firmness with which he exerted himself during the dreadful riots of 1780, was so conspicuous, so spirited, and so salutary to the bank and to the city, that he received for his extraordinary services, the thanks of the privy council.

WILKIE, William, D.D. a native of West Lothian, educated at Edinburgh. He became professor of natural philosophy at St. Andrews, where he died 1772. He was distinguished not only as an able divine, but as an ingenious poet, author of the Epigoniad, and some fables, &c.

WILKINS, John, an ingenious prelate, son of a citizen of Oxford, was born 1614 at Fawley, near Daventry, Northamptonshire, at the house of his mother's father, Mr. Dod, a well-known dissenter. He was educated at a private school in Oxford, and then entered in 1627 at New Inn hall, from which he soon removed to Magdalen hall, where he took his degrees. He became chaplain to lord Say, and then to Charles, count palatine of the Rhine, and on the breaking out of the civil wars, he joined the parliament, and took the solemn league and covenant. He was next appointed warden of Wadham college, and one of the reformers of the university, and in 1656 he married Robina, the w.dow of Peter French, canon of Christ-church, sister to Oliver Cromwell, and by means of this alliance he obtained a dispensation to keep the headship of his college against the statutes which required celibacy. In 1659 he was made master of Trinity college, Cambridge, by Richard Cromwell, but he was ejected at the restoration, and then became preacher to the Gray's inn society, and rector of St. Lawrence, Jewry, London. He was afterward member of the Royal Society, and one of their most active council, and he next was made dean of Rippon, and in 1668 promoted, by the interest of Villiers, to the see of Chester. He did not long enjoy his preferment, but died of the stone, 19th Nov. 1672, at the house of Dr. Tillotson, his son-in-law, in Chancery-lane, London. He was buried in the chancel of St. Lawrence, Jewry, and his funeral sermon was preached by Dr. Lloyd, dean of Bangor. Though much abused by party for his connexion with the family of the usurper, he was a man of great abilities, an able theologian, an acute mathematician, and an active promoter of experimental philosophy. To his intimacy with Cromwell, Oxford was indebted, if not for many favours, at least for that deliverance from pillage and violence which the puritans at that time exercised against every place eminent for learning or loyalty. The writings of Dr. Wilkins are curious, learned, and interesting. In 1638 he published the Discovery of a New World, or a Discourse to prove that the Moon is Habitable, with a Discourse on the Possibility of a Passage to it. His Discourse concerning a New Planet, to prove that our Earth is a New Planet, appeared in 1640—his Mercury 1641—Mathematical Magic, or the Wonders that may be performed by Mechanical Geometry, 1648—all which were republished in 1708 in 8vo. He wrote besides, Ecclesiastes, or Discourse on the Gift of Preaching—Discourses on the Gift of Prayer—sermons—of the Principles and Duties of Natural Religion, &c.

WILKINS, David, D.D. F.A.S. keeper of the archbishop's library at Lambeth, was rewarded by Wake the primate, for the curious catalogue which he made of all the books and MSS. of that valuable collection 1718, with several benefices, a prebend in Canterbury church, and the archdeaconry of Suffolk. He published the New Testament in Coptic—the Saxon Laws, &c.—an edition of Seldon's works, 3 vols. fol.—Pentateuch Coptic, &c. and died 6th Aug. 1740, aged 62.

WILKINSON, Henry, of the assembly of Westminster divines, rector of St. Dunstan's in the East, canon of Christ church, and Margaret professor of divinity at Oxford, was ejected from his ecclesiastical honours at the restoration for nonconformity, and died 1675. He was author of some sermons, &c.

WILKINSON, Henry, a native of Yorkshire, educated at Magdalen hall, Oxford, of which he became principal. During the civil wars he espoused the popular cause, and was appointed professor of moral philosophy, from which he was ejected at the restoration. He published some English sermons, the doctrine of contentment, &c. several Latin tracts, &c. His Prælectiones Morales, remain in MSS. in the library of his college. He died at Great Connard near Sudbury, Suffolk, 13th May, 1690, aged 74.

WILKINSON, Jemima, a religious impostor, was born in Cumberland, Rhode Island, about the year 1753. She was educated a quaker, was zealous, shrewd, and bold, and her fanaticism-imposing person, and artful manner, gave her some distinction among the sect. Recovering suddenly from an apparent suspension of life, which she experienced during a fit of sickness, about the year 1773, she gave out that she had been raised from the dead, and claimed to be invested with divine attributes and authority to instruct mankind in religion. She made a few proselytes with whom she removed to New-York, and settled on the tract called Jerusalem, near Crooked Lake, where she resided till her death in 1819. She professed to be able to work miracles, and offered to demonstrate it by walking on the neighbouring lake. Accordingly her followers and many others assembled at a time appointed to witness the prodigy; after reconnoitering the beach for some time, she demanded of her disciples if they truly believed her to possess the extraordinary power she pretended, to which they zealously replied in the affirmative. She answered that the object of the miracle was to convince them of her miraculous power, and as they were already satisfied of that, the miracle would be superfluous, she therefore declined performing it.

WILLAN, Robert, a physician, was born in 1757 at Hill, near Sedburgh, in Yorkshire. His father was a physician and a quaker, in which profession the son was also educated, though some years afterwards he quitted the society. He graduated at Edinburgh in 1780, and the year following settled at Darlington, where he published a tract entitled "Observations on the Sulphur Water at Croft." Soon after this he removed to London, and became physician to the dispensary in Carey-street. In 1791 he was admitted a member of the Society of Antiquaries. He died of a dropsy at Madeira, in 1812. His other works are—1. The Life of Christ harmonized from the Gospels, 8vo. 2. Reports on the Diseases of London, 12mo. 3. A Treatise on cutaneous Diseases, 4to. 4. Another on Vaccination, 4to.; and papers in the Medical Journal.—W. B.

WILLARD, Samuel, minister in Boston, Massachusetts, and vice president of Harvard college, was a native of Massachusetts, and educated at Harvard, where he was graduated in 1659. He settled in the ministry at Groton, but was driven with his people from that place by the Indians in 1676. He settled in the Old South church, Boston, in 1678, and became the most distinguished among his cotemporaries in the ministry. He possessed a powerful mind, rapid and clear in its perceptions, glowing in its imagery, and profound and demonstrative in argument. He was an erudite scholar, and an eloquent writer and speaker. During the persecution for witchcraft, he displayed his good sense by vigorously opposing the infatuation of the people. In 1701 he was called to the superintendence of Harvard college as vice president, and discharged the duties of the station till his death in 1707. His publications, which were numerous, were chiefly sermons. The most important was a folio volume of divinity published in 1726, and the first of that size issued from an American press.  L.

WILLARD, Josiah, secretary of Massachusetts, and son of the preceding, was born in Boston, and graduated at Harvard in 1698. After spending some time as a tutor in that seminary, and in travelling in Europe, he was in 1717 appointed secretary of the colony, and held the office 39 years till his death. He was also judge of probate, and a member of the council. He was singularly conspicuous for his piety and amiableness. He died in 1756, in his seventy-sixth year.  L.

WILLARD, Joseph, D.D. LL. D. president of Harvard college, was born at Biddeford, Massachusetts, December 29th, 1738, and was educated at Harvard, where he received the degree of bachelor of arts in 1765. He was the next year chosen a tutor of that seminary, and held the office till 1772, when he was ordained colleague pastor of the first church in Beverley, where he continued highly popular till his election in 1781 to the office of president of Harvard college. He remained in that station till his death, in September, 1804. He was distinguished for his acquaintance with science and literature, and discharged the duties of his station in the college with great ability and dignity.  L.

WILLEMET, Remi Peter Frances, a physician, born at Nancy, 2d April, 1762. He studied medicine under his father, and then went to the East Indies, and became first physician to Tippoo Saib, and died at Seringapatam 1790. He wrote some Latin dissertations on physiology, &c. and his Herbarium Mauritianum, was published at Leipsic in 1796, 8vo.

WILLIAM I. king of England, surnamed the Conqueror, was natural son of Robert I. duke of Normandy, by Arlotta, daughter of a furrier of Falaise, where he was born 1024. He was put in possession of the dukedom of Normandy by his father, and on the death of Edward the Confessor, king of England, he laid claim to the sovereignty of that kingdom, to which he pretended to be entitled under the will of the late monarch. He landed on the English shores Sept. 1066, and burning his fleet, encouraged his soldiers by pointing to the land and exclaiming, behold your country! He was quickly met by Harold, whom the people had fixed on the throne, but the battle of Hastings soon decided the fate of the kingdom, and the fall of Harold and of his two brothers with 50,000 English, left him master of the country. William advanced to London, where he was crowned on Christmas day, 1066, and deservedly obtained the surname of Conqueror; but while he expected submission and peace, he found insurrection and hostility on all sides. By dividing the lands of the nobility among his followers, he created himself thousands of enemies, and the people whom he oppressed by the severity of his laws, answered the rigour of his government by discontent and rebellion. To silence their clamours and prevent their seditious meetings, he ordered a bell or Curfew to be rung every evening at eight o'clock, to warn the people to put out their light, and this severe regulation, though common on the continent, was regarded by the English as the height of wanton tyranny. As if determined to change the manners of his subjects, he ordered that all pleadings should be made in his courts in the French language, but though this was observed as far as the reign of the third Edward, the national idiom prevailed, and the English, though conquered, still retained their language, their manners, and their prejudices. Notwithstanding these arbitrary steps, William showed himself attentive to the interests and prosperity of his people, and an accurate survey was made by his order of all the lands and property of the kingdom, and registered in Domesday book, which is still preserved. Various castles were also raised in convenient places, the Tower of London was finished, 1078, and at last security and protection were ensured to the subject, by the firmness of the government, and the prompt administration of the laws. Instead of a conqueror, William at last was regarded as the friend of his people, and he crossed over to the continent with an army of English, to reduce to obedience his revolted dukedom of Normandy. The king of France had excited the sons of the English prince to disobedience, and William hastened to punish his insidious designs, as well as the severe jests with which he had ridiculed his great cupulency. His expedition proved fatal to himself, he fell from his horse in leaping a ditch near Mantes, and died in consequence of it, a few days after, at Rouen, 10th September, 1087, aged 63. He was buried in the church which he had built at Caen. William as a monarch was a respectable character, and if he had endeavoured with greater assiduity to conciliate the affections of the people whom he had conquered, he might have been a great prince, and in more firmly securing his own tranquillity in the government, contributed most essentially to the happiness and prosperity of England. By Matilda, daughter of the count of Flanders, he left three sons, Robert duke of Normandy, and William and Henry, who both succeeded to the English crown.

WILLIAM II. king of England, surnamed Rufus from the colour of his hair, succeeded his father William in the absence of his elder brother, and was crowned 27th Sept. 1087. Though he made the fairest promises for the protection of the clergy, and for the happiness of the people, he became a capricious persecutor of the one, and a cruel oppressor of the other. He banished Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury, who reprehended him for his conduct, and he obtained the dukedom of Normandy through the imprudence of his brother. He also invaded Wales, and conquered the Scotch, and used the power which success in war and negotiations ensured in gratifying his avarice and in oppressing his people. He was shot accidentally as he was hunting in the New Forest in Hampshire, by a dart from the hand of Walter Tyrrell, one of his courtiers, and he died a few hours after, 2d August, 1100, aged 44.

WILLIAM III. of Nassau, prince of Orange, and king of England, was born at the Hague, 14th Nov. 1650, of William prince of Orange, and Henrietta Maria, daughter of Charles I. He was elected Stadtholder in 1672, and named general of the Dutch forces against Lewis XIV. and he carried to the war a soul ambitious of glory, the most determined courage, and a phlegmatic indifference to pleasure and to luxury, which exhibited him unshaken in adversity, and heroic in the midst of his greatest successes. Though brave and vigilant, he was defeated in 1674 at Senef, by the prince of Condé, and in 1677 he was obliged to raise the siege of Charleroi, but the peace of Nimeguen the next year put an end to the quarrels of the continent. The unpopular measures of his father-in-law James II. of England, excited in 1688 his highest ambition, and yielding to the wishes of the British nation, he landed with a small force at Brixam, 4th Nov. the same year, and after a few skirmishes, soon dispossessed the monarch of his throne. Thus in conjunction with his wife Mary, he was acknowledged king of England, and was crowned 11th April, 1689, but though hailed as a deliverer and a friend by the English, Ireland still remained attached to the fortunes of the fugitive James. William with his usual activity crossed to Ireland, and there met with his father-in-law, who had landed from France, supported by a French force. The battle of the Boyne proved fatal to the affairs of James, who retired in dismay to France, and left his rival in peaceful possession of the throne. The war which had raged in Ireland was removed to the continent, and by his powerful alliances William determined to punish the duplicity of the French king, who had excited distrust and rebellion in his kingdom. Though checked at Steinkerque and Nerwinde, William headed the allied forces to victory, Namur was taken, and greater conquests were promised to the English nation when the peace of Ryswick was signed, and the right of William to the British throne was acknowledged by Lewis. Always active, and jealously hostile against the power of France, William was making new preparations to curb the ambition of his rival, and to arm the powers of the continent in favour of his plans, when death stopped his career. He fell from his horse while riding near Hampton-court, and broke his collar bone, and though the accident in a more robust constitution might have been deemed trivial, it proved fatal to William, and a slow fever carried him off, 16th March, 1702, in his 53d year. William left behind him the character of a great politician, though he had never been popular, and of a formidable general, though he was seldom victorious. In his manners he was cold and reserved, sullen and phlegmatic, and showed little animation, except in the moment of battle. He despised flattery, yet was ambitious of power. Greater as the general of Holland, than as the king of England, he was to the one a father, and to the other a suspicious friend. Disgusted with the jealous politics of England, he at one time resolved to abandon the government, when obliged by the parliament to dismiss his Dutch guards, and while he regarded the leaders of opposition as factious demagogues, he did not hesitate to ensure the success of his measures by the mean and dangerous engines of bribery and of corruption. While in his retirement in Holland, far from the cabals of English politics, he devoted himself to increase the enemies of Louis XIV. he did not scruple to render the power and the resources of England subservient to the ambitious schemes of the Stadtholder of Holland, and in guiding the interested plans of a league against France, he laid the foundation of that system of continental alliances which, if it has yielded to the kingdom barren glory, has entailed upon it poverty, discontent, and wretchedness.

WILLIAM, son of Florent IV. count of Holland, and Matilda of Brabant, was crowned king of the Romans, after the death of Henry of Thuringia, 1247. Though opposed by powerful factions, he showed himself active and vigilant, and at last was assassinated by some peasants, whilst in a marsh, from which his horse was unable to extricate him, 1255.

WILLIAM, St. son of count of Thierry, and duke of Aquitaine, after distinguishing himself by his valour against the Saracens, in the service of Charlemagne, bade adieu to the world, and retired to a monastery. He died there, 28th May, 812.

WILLIAM LONGSWORD, son and successor of Rollo, first duke of Normandy, was an able and active general. He defeated the Bretons, and increased his dominions, by the addition of Avranches and Cotentin. He was basely murdered in 942, at Pequiny-sur-Somme, where he had been invited to hold a conference by a neighbouring chief.

WILLIAM DE NANGIUS, a monkish historian of St. Denys. He was author of two Chronicles, one from the Creation to his own time, 1301, continued by two monks of his abbey to 1368, and the other of the kings of France, &c.

WILLIAMS, Charles Hanbury, second son of I. Hanbury, a south-sea director, was member for Monmouth, in several parliaments, and 1744 was installed knight of the bath, and two years sent as minister to the Prussian court. He was afterwards ambassador to Russia, and died, 2d Nov. 1759. He was author of some poems remarkable for their ease and vivacity, rather than for their moral tendency or elegance of composition. They have appeared in Dodsley's collection, and other periodical works.

WILLIAMS, John, an eminent prelate, born 25th March, 1582, at Aber-conway, Caernarvonshire. From Ruthin school, he removed, at the age of 16, to St. John's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. His application to literature was unusually great, and as he required only three hours of sleep in the 24, to recruit his constitution, his improvement in divinity, in philosophy, and in every branch of literature was rapid, and lasting. He obtained in 1611, the rectory of Grafton Regis, in Northamptonshire, and the next year that of Grafton Underwood, in the same county, to which were soon after added prebends in Lincoln, Hereford, St. David's, and Peterborough cathedrals. On the death of Egerton, the chancellor, to whom he was chaplain, he obtained as a legacy, all his MS. papers, and thus derived important information, which afterwards guided his conduct in parliament, and in chancery. His abilities recommended him to the king, who made him his chaplain, and in 1619, gave him the deanery of Salisbury, and the next year that of Westminster. On the removal of Bacon, from the office of chancellor in 1621, Williams was intrusted with the seals, and a few days after appointed bishop of Lincoln. He attended the king in his last illness, and preached his funeral sermon, in which he compared him for wisdom and intelligence to Solomon. The influence of Buckingham, however, proved too great for him, and he was not only removed from the seals, but accused in the star-chamber, and by the contrivance of Laud fined 10,000*l.* and stripped of all his ecclesiastical dignities, and imprisoned in the tower. After a confinement of nearly four years, he was set at liberty, by the interference of the house of lords, and was reconciled to the king. In the impeachment of Strafford, he, according to Clarendon, asserted the impropriety of the bishops voting in a case of blood, and afterwards when consulted by the king, he advised him to sacrifice that unfortunate nobleman to the fury of his enemies, if perhaps he thus might produce a reconciliation between himself and the people. In 1641, he was raised to the see of York, and ably opposed the bill for depriving the bishops of their seats in the house of lords. When, however, he protested with the other prelates on the irregularity of the peers proceeding in the public business, whilst the bishops were absent, in consequence of the threats of the mob, he was sent to the Tower as guilty of high treason. During the civil war, he yielded to the storm, and retired to his native town, where he fortified, and for some time ably defended Conway castle. The death of the king overwhelmed him with sorrow, and he felt the blow with such poignancy of grief, that he constantly rose every night, at midnight.

and passed a quarter of an hour in deep and solemn prayer. He died soon after, 25th March, 1650, and was buried in Laudogay church, where a monument was erected to his memory by his nephew, sir Griffith Williams. He was author of some sermons—of the Holy Table, &c.—against Laud's Innovations, a book commended by lord Clarendon. Though accused by some of pride and ambition, archbishop Williams possessed great virtues, he was charitable and humane, the friend of learning and of merit, and in his conduct hospitable and courteous. His life has been written by Hacket his chaplain.

WILLIAMS, Anna, a lady of literary character, daughter of a surgeon in Wales. Her father, with more warmth than prudence, persuaded himself that he had discovered the longitude by magnetism, and with this idea, full of golden dreams, he hastened to London in 1730, but saw all his hopes vanish in disappointment, and in the midst of his distress he was fortunate enough to obtain the place of a pensioner in the Charter-house. His daughter, who accompanied him, contributed all the powers of her mind to support his indigence, but in 1740 she was afflicted with a cataract, which totally deprived her of sight. In this distressful situation, she still engaged herself in the exercise of her needle for the maintenance of her indigent father, who had quitted the Charter-house, and in 1746 she added a little to her scanty income by publishing the life of the emperor Julian, from the French of la Bleterie. The distresses of the father, and the virtuous industry of the daughter, soon after became known to Dr. Johnson and his wife, and commiseration at last ended in the closest intimacy. Miss Williams was admitted into the house of the great moralist, and after the death of his wife, whose bed of sickness she soothed with all the kind offices of friendship, she still continued under the protection of her excellent host. An operation was performed upon her eyes, by Mr. Sharp, but it proved unsuccessful; yet in the midst of her sufferings, she found comfort, not only in the treatment of Dr. Johnson, but in the kindness of Garrick, who in 1755 granted her a benefit, which produced for her the clear sum of 200*l.* The latter part of her life was rendered still more comfortable by the publication of her Miscellanies in prose and verse, 1765, which added more than 100*l.* to her little fortune, and thus tended to spread cheerfulness and independence around the infirmities of declining age and of melancholy blindness. She died 6th Sept. 1783, aged 77, in the house of her friend Dr. Johnson, in Bolt-court, Fleet-street, and left her little property for the charitable education of poor deserted girls.

WILLIAMS, John, an able divine, born in Northamptonshire. He entered at Magdalen-hall, Oxford, 1651, where he took his degrees, and afterwards obtained the rectory of St. Mildred in the Poultry, and Rugmere prebend in St. Paul's cathedral. After the revolution he became chaplain to the king, prebendary of Canterbury, and in 1696 he was raised to the see of Chichester. He was author of several controversial tracts against the papists and dissenters—and of the Characters of Divine Revelation, in sermons preached at Boyle's Lectures. He died 1709.

WILLIAMS, Daniel, a native of Wrexham in Denbighshire. When in orders he settled in Ireland as chaplain to lady Meath, and was for 20 years an active minister in Dublin; but on the breaking out of the troubles in 1687 he came to London, and succeeded Mr. Baxter at the merchant's lecture, Pinner's hall. He was created D.D. in 1709, by the universities of Glasgow and Edinburgh, and died 26th Jan. 1716, aged 72. His Practical Discourses appeared in 2 vols. 1738, with his life prefixed. He founded a library in Redcross-street for the use of dissenting ministers.

WILLIAMS, Francis, was sent over by Mason and Gorges in 1634, as governor of the settlement which had been commenced by them in New-Hampshire, and resided at Portsmouth. He was a gentleman of good sense and discretion, and so very acceptable to the people, that when they combined in a body politic, they continued him at their head by annual suffrage, and he was continued in the magistracy when the government was assumed by Massachusetts, in 1641.

WILLIAMS, Roger, one of the principal founders of Rhode Island, was born in Wales in 1599, and educated at Oxford. He preached some time as a minister of the established church, but at length dissented, and came to New-England in 1631, to enjoy religious liberty. He preached at Salem and Plymouth until 1636, when he was banished from the colony on account of some religious opinions which were deemed dangerous to the community. Some of them were indeed sufficiently ridiculous, and fraught with an injurious tendency, but his views of religious freedom were essentially just, and entitle him to everlasting commendation. In January, 1636, he, with several others, removed to Rhode Island, and laid the foundation of Providence. He purchased the lands of the Indians, with whom he always lived in peace. He soon collected a company of settlers, and they instituted a society, the first in the modern world to their immortal honour, in which perfect liberty of conscience was enjoyed. In 1643 he went to England and procured a charter, confirming the plan of government the colony had formed. In 1654 he was chosen president of the colony, and held the office till 1657. He conducted the affairs of the colony with ability and exemplary uprightness. He possessed a mind of unusual vigour, and of great boldness and eccentricity; his learning was respectable, and he exhibited himself in his religious controversy with the ministers and magistrates of Massachusetts, an able disputant. He continued to preach occasionally after his removal to Rhode Island. He died in April, 1683, in his 85th year. L.

WILLIAMS, John, first minister of Deerfield, Massachusetts, was born in Roxbury, December 10th, 1664, and graduated at Harvard college in 1683. He was ordained in 1686, minister of Deerfield, then a frontier town, and exposed to the Indians. On the night of the 20th of February, 1704, about 300 Frenchmen and Indians attacked the town, and captured Mr. Williams and his family, with many others, and putting two of his children and a servant to death, retreated with the others towards Canada. On the second day, his wife becoming exhausted with fatigue, was murdered, and about twenty others who were unable to endure the journey. At length, after traversing a wilderness of 300 miles, they arrived in Canada. There attempts were made to convert him to the Roman Catholic faith, and threats of death employed for the purpose, but he resisted their solicitations, and in 1706 was redeemed with 57 others, and returned. One of his daughters, who had become a catholic, and married an Indian, he left behind him. He settled again at Deerfield, and continued there till his death in 1729. He published in 1707, a history of his captivity. L.

WILLIAMS, Elisha, president of Yale college, was born at Hatfield, Massachusetts, and graduated at Harvard college in 1711. He settled in the ministry at Newington, in Wethersfield, Connecticut, where he remained till chosen president of Yale college in 1726. He retained that station, discharging its duties with great ability and dignity till 1739, when ill health induced him to resign. He returned to Wethersfield and became a justice of the superior court, acted as chaplain in the expedition against Cape Breton, and the next year was appointed colonel in the expedition against Canada. He afterwards visited England as an agent of the colony, and became acquainted with Dr. Doddridge, who represents him as possessing "solid learning, consummate prudence, great candour, and sweetness of temper, an ardent sense of religion, and a certain nobleness of soul, capable of contriving and acting the greatest things without seeming to be conscious of having done them." He was a man of those great and various talents, which enabled him to excel in whatever he attempted. He died at Wethersfield in 1750. L.

WILLIAMS, Ephraim, founder of Williams college, Massachusetts, was a native of Newtown in that state. He possessed fine talents for a military officer, and in the French war from 1740 to 1748, commanded the line of forts on the west side of Connecticut river. In 1755 he received the command of a regiment, and joined general Johnson at the north of Albany. He was sent out on the morning of the 8th of September, at the head of 1200 men to skirmish with the enemy, and falling into an ambuscade, was killed. His party retreated to the main body, and in another battle during the day, repulsed the enemy. He was brave, facetious, polite, and popular. He gave his property for the establishment of a free-school in the town now called Williamstown, on condition it should bear that name. A school was opened in 1791, and in 1793, it was incorporated a college. L.

WILLIAMS, Otho Holland, brigadier general in the army of the American revolution, was born in the county of Prince George, Maryland, in 1748. He was bred in the clerk's office in that county, and for a short time before the commencement of the war of the revolution, had the chief direction of that office in Baltimore. On the opening of that contest he was appointed a lieutenant in captain Price's company of riflemen, and joined the army at Boston. In 1776 he was appointed major of the rifle regiment, and was with it in the garrison of fort Washington when it was surrendered to the British. After the surrender of Burgoyne's army, he was exchanged, and was appointed to the colonelcy of the sixth Maryland regiment. He marched to South Carolina, and on the arrival of general Gates, became adjutant general, and fought in the disastrous battle of the 16th of August. During the important campaign which followed, he had command of the light corps, and acted a most conspicuous part, and rendered the most important services in covering the retreat of the army, and harassing the enemy. He fought with intrepidity in the battles of Guilford, Hobkirk's Hill, and the Eutaws. Before the disbandment of the army, he was advanced to the rank of brigadier general. After the war he was appointed collector of Baltimore. He died in July, 1794, in the 45th year of his age. He was greatly respected for his courage and skill in the field, his patriotism, and the refinement of his manners. L.

ence, was a delegate from Connecticut. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1751. In 1773 he was a member of the committee of correspondence of Connecticut, and in 1775, speaker of the house of representatives. He was several years in congress, and afterwards a member of the state council. In 1802 he declined a reelection, and in an address to the people, admonished them to appoint for his successor "one who fears God, is a friend to the constitution, and to the administration of the venerable Washington." He died at Lebanon, August 2d, 1811, aged 80.

WILLIAMS, Samuel, LL.D. professor in Harvard college, was born at Waltham, Massachusetts, and graduated at Harvard college in 1761. He was ordained minister of Bradford, November 20th, 1765, where he continued until his appointment as professor of mathematics and natural philosophy. After holding that office from 1780 to 1788, he resigned, and removed to Rutland, Vermont, where he resided during the remainder of his life. For some time he was the editor and proprietor of the "Rutland Herald," published at that place. He was a fellow of the American Academy, of the American Philosophical Society, and of the Meteorological Society of Manchester, and published several astronomical and other papers in the scientific journals. His principal work was the Natural and Civil History of Vermont, originally published in 1 vol. 8vo. 1794, and afterwards continued and published in 2 vols. It was esteemed the best historical work which had appeared in the country at the time of its publication, and received high encomiums from some of the philosophers of Europe. He died January, 1817.

WILLIAMS, David, a literary character, was born in Cardiganshire in 1738. He became a dissenting minister, first at Frome in Somersetshire, next at Exeter, and afterwards at Highgate. But in 1776, he opened a chapel near Cavendish-square, on the avowed principle of deism. In a short time, however, this temple of infidelity was deserted; and the preacher had recourse to private teaching and literary speculations. One of these was a splendid edition of Hume's History; but in consequence of the part taken by him in the French revolution, he was dismissed from this concern. Mr. Williams will be longest remembered as the founder of the "Literary Fund." He was himself supported by that excellent institution at the close of life, which terminated June 29, 1816. He published Lectures on Education, 3 vols.—Lectures on Political Principles—a History of Monmouthshire, 2 vols. 4to.—and other works.

WILLIS, Thomas, an eminent physician, born at Great Bedwin, Wiltshire, 1621. He was educated at a private school at Oxford, and then entered at Christ church, where he took his degrees in arts and medicine. When Oxford was garrisoned by the king, he took up arms in the royal cause, and after the surrender, he returned to the studies and practice of his profession. In 1660 he was appointed Sedleian professor of natural philosophy, and increased his reputation and his fortune by an extensive and respectable practice. He was one of the first members of the Royal Society, and became fellow of the college of physicians. In 1666 he removed to London, and soon rose to the height of his profession in the city. He died at his house in St. Martin's-lane, 11th Nov. 1675, and was buried in Westminster abbey. He wrote several works on the different branches of his profession, often reprinted, especially at Geneva, 2 vols. 4to. 1676, and Amsterdam, 1682. Though accused by some of framing a body of physic, chiefly on hypotheses of his own, without having recourse to experiment and observation, he is regarded by others as a sagacious anatomist, an able philosopher, and a most learned and skilful physician, respectable for veracity, information, and integrity.

WILLIS, Browne, LL. D. son of Thomas Willis, of Bletchey, Bucks, and grandson of the preceding, was born at Blandford, Dorsetshire, 14th Sept. 1682. From Béchampton school he passed to Westminster, and at the age of 17 he was removed as gentleman commoner to Christ-church, Oxford, where he took his degrees. He afterwards retired to Fenny-Stratford, and, in 1705, was elected member of parliament for Buckingham. In 1717 he became one of the members of the society of antiquaries just revived, and he showed such emulation in the pursuit of antiquities, that he visited all the cathedrals of England and Wales, except Carlisle. Though he had a large family, he was a liberal contributor to the repairing of the church of Stony Stratford, which had suffered by fire, and he gave, in 1741, to the university, his valuable cabinet of English coins, the laborious collection of upwards of 40 years. He liberally made other contributions to charitable purposes, and died at Whaddon hall, 5th Feb. 1760, and was buried at Fenny-Stratford. An account of his publications, with some interesting particulars, is inserted in the anecdotes of Bowyer by Nichols. The best known of his works are the Survey of the Cathedrals, 2 vols. 4to.—an Account of Mitred Abbays, 2 vols. 8vo.

WILLOUGHBY, Francis, an eminent naturalist, born 1635. To the high advantages of birth, rank, and fortune, he added the more solid merit of application, and a strong attachment to literature. He di-ected the powers of his cultivated mind chiefly to the history of animals; and after reading every book which could elucidate the subject, he travelled over his native country, and afterwards visited France, Spain, Italy, Germany, and the Low Countries, accompanied by his intelligent friend Ray. The observations, made in these journeys, on animals and on nature, were carefully preserved; but before they could be submitted to the public eye, the learned author died, universally and deservedly respected, 3d July, 1672, aged only 37. He left Mr. Ray the guardian of his children, and was buried with his ancestors in Middleton church, Warwickshire. His works were afterwards published by his friend Ray, and were Ornithologiæ Libri tres, &c. with cuts, folio, translated into English by the editor—Historiæ Piscium Libri quatuor, &c. with cuts, folio—Letters, with Observations on Wasps called Ichneumonæ, &c.—Letters, &c. inserted in the Philosophical Transactions, &c. He was an active member of the Royal Society.

WILMOT, John Eardley, was born at Derby, in 1748. He was educated at Westminster school, and next at University college, Oxford, from whence he removed to a fellowship in All-Souls. He was designed for the church, but on the advancement of his father to the bench he applied to the law, and in 1783 became a master in chancery. At the close of the American war he was appointed commissioner for settling the claims of the loyalists. In 1790 he opened a subscription for the relief of the suffering French clergy, and other emigrants, with the management of which fund he was intrusted. He died at Tottenham in 1815. Mr. Wilmot published—1. A Short Defence of the Opposition, 1779. 2. A Treatise on the Laws and Customs of England. 3. Memoirs of his Father. 4. Life and Letters of Bishop Hough, 4to. 5. History of the Commission of American Claims, 8vo.—*W. WILSON, Arthur, a native of Yarmouth, Norfolk. He was some time clerk in the exchequer office, under sir Henry Spillar, and in 1614 entered into the service of Robert, earl of Essex, whom he attended into the Palatine, in Holland, and at the siege of Cadiz. In 1630 he was dismissed from the confidence of Essex by the intrigues of lady Essex, who had conceived an aversion against him, and the next year he entered as gentleman commoner at Trinity college, Oxford. He afterwards was in the retinue of lord Warwick, and died at Felsted in Essex, 1652, aged 56. He wrote some comedies, according to Wood, who speaks of him with some degree of commendation, and also the Life and Reign of king James I. printed 1653, folio. This work is censured by most historians as written not without prejudice and rancour, and in language harsh and obscure.

WILSON, Thomas, a learned prelate, born at Burton Wirral, Cheshire, Dec. 1663. From a private school at Chester he removed to Trinity college, Dublin, where he studied medicine, which he soon abandoned for divinity. He was ordained in 1686, and soon after became curate of New church in the parish of Winwick, Lancashire, where he formed an acquaintance with lord Derby, who appointed him his chaplain, and tutor to his son, lord Strange. He refused the rectory of Baddeswork in Yorkshire, because he was incapable of residence upon it, and when offered by the kindness of his patron the bishopric of Sodor and Man, which had been already vacant for three years, he declined the honour, but at last in compliance with the repeated requests of his friends, he accepted it in 1696. He was created LL. D. by archbishop Tenison, and consecrated by his primate Sharp, in the Savoy church, and in 1698 he first visited his diocese. Though his revenues were only 300*l.* a-year, they were sufficient to support him with dignity, and to contribute to the comforts of the poor and the helpless. With the most laudable zeal he built a new chapel at Castleton, and he founded parochial libraries through the island, and, in 1703, obtained the act of settlement, and the passing into a law, of his ecclesiastical constitutions, which were so highly applauded by lord Chancellor King, that he declared if the ancient discipline of the church were lost in England, it could be recovered in all its purity in the isle of Man. In respect to his virtues and his services, he was, in 1707, created D. D. at both the universities of Oxford and Cambridge. In 1721 he was unfortunately engaged in a quarrel with the governor of the Island in consequence of his forbidding the introduction of the Independent Whig, an obnoxious book, into his diocese, and this dispute was more seriously increased the following year. The bishop suspended one of his clergy for administering the sacrament to a person whom he had banished for ill conduct from the holy table, and the governor enlisting on the side of the offended party, fined the prelate, and committed him to prison, where he refused to discharge the fine. The tumults which consequently were excited among the people, were appeased by the mild exhortations of the bishop from the walls of his prison, and after a confinement of nine weeks, he was set at liberty by the direction of the privy council, who reversed all the proceedings of the governor against him. So high an insult called aloud for punishment, but the benevolent prelate checked the importunities of his friends who wished him to prosecute the governor. This venerable man was so attached to his situation that he refused an English bishopric, and gradually sunk under the infirmities of age. He expired gently, 7th March, 1755, in the 93d year of his age, and the 58th of his consecration. By his wife, Mary Patten, of Warrington, whom he married at Winwick, 1698, and who died 1705, he had two sons and two daughters, all of whom died young except Thomas the youngest. In 1699 he published the Principles and Duties of Christianity, for the use of the island, in Manks, the first book ever printed in that language. His works were two vols. fol. consisting of religious tracts and sermons, with a short history of the isle of Man. He also formed the plan for translating the Bible into the Manks language, which proceeded under him to the end of the Gospels, but was finished by his successor, Hiddesley. His sermons have since his death appeared in 4 vols. 8vo. and his Bible, with valuable notes, in 3 vols. 4to.

WILSON, Thomas, son of the preceding, was born 24th Aug. 1703, and educated at Christ-church, Oxford, where he took his degree of D. D. 1739. He became prebendary of Westminster, minister of St. Margaret's there, and rector of St. Stephen's, Walbrook, for 46 years. He opposed the building of a new square at Westminster, because his interest in the prebendal house was undervalued; and he rendered himself ridiculous by erecting to Mrs. Macauley Graham a statue in his own church, under the character of Liberty. His fondness for the lady disappeared when she married against his consent, and the monument of his weakness was removed. Besides the Ornaments of churches considered, &c. a View of the Projected Improvements in Westminster, &c.—and Distilled Liquors the Bane of the Nation, a popular pamphlet, which procured him the friendship of sir Joseph Jekyll, he published his father's works. He died at Bath, 15th April, 1784, and was buried in Walbrook church.

WILSON, Florence, a native of Murray, in Scotland, educated at King's college, Aberdeen. He travelled abroad, and resided for some time at Basil, where he had Erasmus among the number of his friends. He afterwards taught philosophy in the college of Navarre at Paris, where he was universally respected for his learning and abilities. He returned to Scotland in 1554, and died at Elgin, in retirement, 1557, aged 57. He wrote de Tranquillitate Animæ, published by Freebairn, 1706, and Rudiman, 1750.

WILSON, John, a native of Kendal, Westmoreland. Though engaged in knitting stockings, he emerged from his humble occupation, and indulging his fondness for botanical pursuits, he became a popular lecturer in that science, and had numerous and applauding audiences at Kendal and Newcastle. He published a Synopsis of British Plants, in the manner of Ray, 1744, 8vo. and died about 1750.

WILSON, Richard, a native of Pinages, in Montgomeryshire, educated under the care of his father, who was the rector of the parish. He pursued his partiality for painting under a London artist, and in 1749 he visited Italy, where he was employed in landscape painting by Mr. Locke. He returned to England in 1755, and became member of the Royal Academy, and was appointed its librarian in 1779. From the superior execution of his landscapes he has been called the English Claude. He died 1782, aged 68.

WILSON, John, first minister of Boston, Massachusetts, was born at Windham, England, in 1588, and educated at King's college, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. After studying law for several years, he devoted his attention to theology, and served as a chaplain in several families. He at length settled at Sudbury; but in 1630 came to New-England with governor Winthrop, and was installed teacher of the church at Charlestown on the 27th of August. When the church soon after removed to Boston, he accompanied them, and continued to labour till his death in 1667. He possessed great excellence of character; and was distinguished by an extraordinary talent at rhyming and making anagrams, which he continually exercised to the amusement of his acquaintance.

WILSON, Matthew, D.D. was a native of Chester county, Pennsylvania, and born in 1731. He received his academical education under the direction of the Rev. Dr. Francis Allison, and the Rev. Dr. Alexander McDowell, and was considered as one of the most accurate and mature scholars of his day. He was ordained to the work of the ministry, and installed as pastor of the united presbyterian churches of Lewes and Cool-Spring, in the state of Delaware, in the year 1755. Here he continued to reside, greatly beloved, and extensively useful, until his death, which took place March 30th, 1790. In 1786 he received the degree of doctor of divinity from the university of Pennsylvania. He was an eminent physician as well as divine; and although his publications were few, and of small size, yet his active services to mankind were very important. He was a great lover of peace; a warm friend of civil and religious liberty; ingenious, learned, pious, patriotic, and benevolent in an eminent degree; so that the place of his residence, and his neighbourhood, while he lived, became a centre of literary and evangelical influence, honourable at

WILSON, Alexander, distinguished for his knowledge of ornithology, was born at Paisley, Scotland, and came to Delaware in 1794. He soon after went to Philadelphia, and was led, by an acquaintance with Mr. Bartram, to devote himself to the study of natural history, for which he had a strong propensity. He bestowed his chief attention on American ornithology, and after a course of the most laborious and faithful preparation, commenced, in 1808, the publication, in 7 volumes, quarto, of a description of the birds of North America. The last volume was completed only a few days before his death, in August, 1813. The work is splendidly executed, and is far more accurate and comprehensive than any other on the subject. He was distinguished for integrity, enterprise, industry, and perseverance. Beside his knowledge of natural history, he cultivated a considerable acquaintance with general literature, and published several poems.  L.

WILSON, James, LL.D. one of the signers of the declaration of American independence, was a lawyer of Pennsylvania. He took an early and active part in the controversy between Great Britain and the colonies, and wrote and published his sentiments with a freedom which was then thought by many to be too daring. He was chosen a member of the first convention of Pennsylvania, and by the convention recommended to the assembly to be appointed one of the delegates in the first congress, but through the influence of Mr. Galloway the recommendation was not regarded. He was, however, elected a delegate to the second convention in 1775. On hearing of the battle of Lexington, he was one of the first in arms, and in the beginning of May was elected captain of a company of volunteers. He was soon after appointed a delegate to congress, and continued in that body from May, 1775, to September, 1777. In 1782 he was again a member of congress, and was a steady promoter of the most vigorous measures for carrying on the war until its final termination. He was a member of the convention which framed the constitution of Pennsylvania and the United States, and of the convention of Pennsylvania by which the latter was ratified, and a strenuous advocate for its adoption. In 1789 he was appointed one of the judges of the supreme court of the United States. In 1797 he was appointed professor of law in the university of Pennsylvania. He was the first who held that office, and delivered a course of lectures which are contained in his works, published in 3 volumes, 8vo. Philadelphia, 1804. He married, in 1771, Miss Rachel Bird, of Pennsylvania, and died at Wilmington, Delaware, September, 1798.  L.

WIMPINA, Conrad, a native of Buchan, professor of divinity at Frankfort, who warmly engaged in defence of the papal power against Luther, and the other reformers. His works appeared at Frankfort, 1528, fol. and he died, 1531.

WINCHELSEA, Anne, countess of, daughter of sir Richard Kingsmill, of Hampshire, was maid of honour to the second wife of James II. and married Heneage, afterwards earl of Winchelsea. She possessed great genius, and wrote a poem on the Spleen, printed in Gilden's miscellany, 1701—Aristomenes, a tragedy never acted, &c. Her poetical works, which are elegantly written, were published in 1713, 8vo. She died, 5th Aug. 1720, without issue.

WINCHESTER, Thomas, D.D. a native of Farrington, Berkshire. He was educated at Magdalen college, Oxford, where he took his degree of D.D. 1749, and in 1761 he obtained from the society the living of Appleton, Berks, where he died, 1780. He was author of a tract on the 17th article of the church of England, reprinted for the use of divinity students in 1803, by the judicious care of Mr. Churton of Brazenose, who has prefixed an account of the writer. He wrote, besides, a tract against the Confessional, sermons, &c.

WINCHESTER, Elkanah, an American divine in the last century, author of a popular work in defence of the doctrine of universal salvation.

WINKELMANN, John, a native of Homberg in Hesse, author of some polemical works, of Commentaries on the gospels of St. Mark and St. Luke, and on the minor prophets, &c. He died 1626.

WINKELMANN, Abbe John, a native of Stendall, in Brandenburg, born, 1718. Though but the son of a shoemaker, and for some time engaged in the same employment, he burst from his obscurity, and became, for seven years, professor of belles lettres at Sechhausen. He afterwards went to Saxony, where he continued for seven more years librarian to count Bunau, at Nothenitz, and in 1754 went to Dresden, where he formed an acquaintance with the ablest artists. About this time he renounced the protestant faith for the Roman catholic tenets, and the next year went to Italy to visit the valuable contents of the Vatican, and the precious relics of Herculaneum. His celebrity here recommended him to the notice of the great and powerful, and as a most judicious antiquarian, and an enlightened connoisseur of the works of arts, he was universally courted at Rome. He became president of the antiquaries in the Vatican, member of the Royal and Antiquarian societies of London, and of other learned societies in Europe. He was honourably invited to Dresden and to Berlin; but the liberality of the Pope detained him at Rome, where, in the midst of the monuments collected from the treasures of ancient and modern times, he indulged his fondness for the productions of genius and of art. In 1768 he made a journey to Vienna, and was received with great kindness by the emperor; but on his return to Italy, while he stopped at Trieste, he was basely assassinated by Arcangeli, a man to whom he had imprudently shown at the inn the medals and the various presents with which he had been honoured. This unfortunate catastrophe happened 8th June, 1768, and the murderer, who hoped to escape with the plunder, was seized, and executed on the wheel, opposite the inn where the crime had been perpetrated. The works of Winckelman were, the History of Art among the Ancients, in German, translated into French, Italian, and English, 3 vols. 4to.—Reflections on the Imitation of the works of the Greeks—Allegory for Artists—Explanations of difficult Parts of Mythology—Remarks on the Architecture of the Ancients—Familiar Letters, &c. He planned, besides, various other works for the elucidation of the arts, of which his melancholy death prevented the completion. In his character he was impetuous and enthusiastic, ardent and authoritative in his decisions, and in his conversation so free and open, that he spoke his sentiments with boldness and without reserve. He was the friend and the correspondent of the most learned men of his times, and he deserved their confidence by the sincerity of his conduct, and the generosity of his heart. His life has been published by Heyne.

WINDHAM, Joseph, an eminent antiquary, was born at Twickenham in 1739, and educated at Eton, from whence he went to Christ's college, Cambridge. He next travelled to Rome, and while there took drawings of the monuments of antiquity. He also composed the principal part of the letter-press of the "Ionian Antiquities," published by the Dilettanti society, and assisted Stuart in his Athens. In the Archæologia are his "Observations on a passage in Pliny relative to the Temple of Diana at Ephesus." He died at Earsham house, Norfolk, in 1810.—W. B.

WINDHAM, William, a statesman, was the son of colonel Windham of Felbrigg in Norfolk, and born in 1750. He was educated first at Eton, next at Glasgow, and lastly at University college, Oxford. In 1773 he set out with lord Mulgrave on his voyage to the North pole, but, being taken ill, was obliged to land in Norway. After this he travelled, and on his return was elected into parliament. In 1782 he went to Ireland as secretary to the lord lieutenant, but quitted that kingdom in a few months. Till the French revolution he acted with the opposition; but in 1794 he joined Mr. Pitt, and was appointed secretary at war, which office he held till 1801, when he vigorously opposed the peace. On the death of Mr. Pitt, Mr. Windham became secretary of state for the war department, but went out of place again the following year. His death, which happened June 4, 1810, was occasioned by a contusion of the hip in a fall, while exerting himself to save the library of Mr. North during a fire in Conduit-street. His speeches in parliament have been published, with his life prefixed, in 3 vols. 8vo.—W. B.

WINDER, William H. general in the army of the United States, was born in the county of Somerset, Maryland, in the year 1775. He was educated for the bar, and about the year 1798 established himself in the profession at Baltimore, where he pursued it with great success. On the declaration of war with Great Britain in 1812, he received a colonel's commission, and was afterwards promoted to the rank of brigadier-general, and served during the war with reputation. He commanded the troops at the battle of Bladensburg. On the return of peace he resumed his profession, and continued in it till his death in April, 1824. He was generous, benevolent, and public spirited.

 L.

WINDER, Levin, governor of Maryland, was elected to succeed Mr. Bowie in 1812, and was at the head of the administration during the war which ended in 1815. He entered the army of the revolution as a soldier, and served until the close of the war. He was speaker of the house of delegates before his election as governor, and in 1816 was chosen a member of the senate of Maryland. He was also a general of the state militia. He died July 1st, 1819, aged 63.

 L.

WING, Vincent, author of the Celestial Harmony of the Visible World, 1667, fol.—of an Ephemeris for 30 years—of Computatio Catholica—and of Astronomia Britannica, a work of merit, was well skilled in astrology, and died 20th Sept. 1661. A sheet almanac is still published under his name. An account of his life was published by Gadbury.

WINGATE, Edmund, author of the Use of the Rule of Proportion, or Gunter's Scale—of Natural and Artificial Arithmetic, 8vo. often reprinted—of Ludus Mathematicus—of the Exact Surveyor—of Tables of Logarithms, and other mathematical works, was a native of Bedfordshire, educated at Queen's college, Oxford, and at Gray's Inn, London. He was for some time employed in the royal household, as English teacher to the first Charles's queen; but he forgot the favours of his sovereign during the civil wars, and taking the covenant, he became the friend of Cromwell, and served in his parliament. He died 1656, aged 63.

WINGFIELD, Edmund Maria, first president of the colony of Virginia under the patent granted to Bartholomew Gosnold and others, April 10th, 1606. On the return of captain Newport to England in June, 1607, the colony consisted of one hundred and four persons. The hardships they endured created discontent and jealousy, which were heightened by the imprudence and selfishness of Wingfield, who was in consequence deposed, and John Radcliffe elected president. Wingfield afterwards conspired with other malcontents to run away with the vessel belonging to the company, but the design was discovered and defeated by captain Smith, who in 1608 sent him home to England. ¶ L.

WINSCHOMB, John, better known by the name of Jack of Newbury, was the most opulent, and the largest clothier in the reign of Henry VIII. He built part of Newbury church, and was so loyal, that he armed, at his own expense, 100 men, whom he led in person against the Scots at the battle of Floddenfield, under the earl of Surrey. He kept in his house 100 looms, and his memory has been so affectionately respected by his fellow-townsmen, that an inn at Newbury still bears his name.

WINSEMIUS, Peter, a native of Leeward, who, after travelling over Germany, Sweden, and France, became historiographer to the states of Holland, and professor of history and eloquence at Franeker, where he died, 1644, aged 59. He wrote the History of Friesland, in Flemish, fol.—Vita Mauritii Principis Auriaci, &c. His brother Menelaus was professor of medicine at Franeker, and died there, 15th May, 1639. He wrote Compendium Anatomia, 4to.

WINSLOW, James Benignus, an eminent Danish anatomist, born at Odinsey, Denmark, 2d April, 1669. He was the grand nephew of the celebrated Steno. He went to Paris, where he studied under du Verney, and was converted to the catholic faith by Bossuet. He became physician of the faculty of Paris, demonstrator in the royal gardens, and member of the Paris academy of sciences. He wrote a tract on the Uncertainty of the Signs of Death, 2 vols. 12mo.—Anatomy with improvements, 4to.—on the Diseases of the Bones, and other anatomical works. He died 3d April, 1760, aged 91.

WINSLOW, Edward, governor of Plymouth colony, Massachusetts, was born in 1594 in Worcestershire. He came to America with the first colonists in 1620, and was one of the most active and useful of their number. He repeatedly visited the neighbouring Indians, and obtained food for the colonists, when suffering from famine, and went several times as an agent to England, and proposed there the formation of the society for propagating the gospel among the Indians. During one of his visits there he was imprisoned several months by Laud, for speaking in a religious meeting in Plymouth, and being married by a magistrate. In 1633 he was elected governor, and again in 1636 and 1644. In 1643 he was appointed a commissioner of the united colonies, and in 1655 a commissioner to superintend the expedition against the Spaniards in the West Indies, and died near Jamaica on the 8th of May of that year. He was a great and good man. He was the first man married in New-England, and married Mrs. White, the mother of the first English child born there.

WINSLOW, Josiah, governor of Plymouth, Massachusetts, and son of the preceding, after having been a magistrate for several years was elected governor in 1673, and held the office till 1680. He was greatly respected, like his father, for his excellent sense and great worth. He was a brave and skilful military officer, as well as an able magistrate. In 1656 he, at the head of a small number, captured Alexander, the eldest son of Massasoit, and defeated his plots against the colony; and in 1675 commanded a party which defeated the Indians under Philip with great slaughter. He died at Marshfield, December 18th, 1680, in his fifty-second year. He was the first governor born in New-England. ¶ L.

WINSLOW, John, major-general, and a grandson of the preceding, served as a captain in the expedition against Cuba in 1740, and afterwards rose to the rank of major-general in the British service. He commanded several expeditions to Kennebeck, Nova Scotia, and Crown Point, in the French war, and distinguished himself by ability and courage. In 1762 he was appointed chief judge of the court of common pleas for Plymouth county. He died at Hingham in April, 1774, in his seventy-second year.

WINSTANLEY, William, author of the Lives of the Poets—of Select Lives of England's Worthies—of Historical Rarities—of the Loyal Martyrology—and some single lives, &c. all in 8vo. was originally a barber. His style is incorrect and vulgar, yet his compositions are valuable for noticing some facts which other writers have passed over in silence. He lived in the reigns of Charles II. and James II.

WINSTON, Thomas, an English physician, who studied at Clare-hall, Cambridge, and afterwards travelled over the continent. He passed some time in the academics of Basil, and also of Padua, where he took his medical degrees. On his return to England he took his degree of M.D. at Cambridge, and settled in London 1607, and became fellow of the college of physicians, and professor of physic at Gresham college. During the civil wars he retired to France, and after an absence of ten years came back, and died in London 24th Oct. 1655, aged 80. After his death his anatomical lectures appeared, Svo. 1659, and 1664.

WINTER, George Simon, a German writer in the 17th century. He paid great attention to the veterinary art, and published Tractatio Nova de Re Equaria, in Latin, French, and German, 1672, fol.—Eques Peritus et Hippiator Expertus.

WINTHROP, John, first governor of Massachusetts, was born at Groton, in Suffolk, England, June 12th, 1587. He arrived with the first colonists of Massachusetts at Salem, June 12th, 1630, having a commission as their governor. They soon after removed to Boston. He was re-elected to the office of governor annually, with the exception of 6 or 7 years, till his death, in 1649, and rendered the most important services to the colony by his judicious administration, his prudent examples as a private man, and his wealth, which was very large, and liberally devoted to the good of the public. He was eminent for uprightness, prudence, piety, and public spirit. He kept a minute journal of the events of the colony down to 1644, which has been published, and is of great use to the historian. It seems from his picture that he wore a long beard.

WINTHROP, John, F.R.S. governor of Connecticut, and son of the preceding, was born in England in 1605, and educated at Cambridge. He possessed a noble genius, and his education, improved after he left the university by extensive travel and intercourse with the most distinguished scholars, was of the first order. He came to Massachusetts in 1633, and settling at Ipswich became a magistrate of the colony. He went to England in 1635, but returned in the autumn of that year with authority to establish a colony at Saybrook, Connecticut, and immediately despatched persons to erect a fort there. In 1651 he became a magistrate of that colony, and afterwards deputy-governor. In 1657 he was chosen governor, and with the exception of the next year, from that time till his death. In 1662 he was sent an agent to the court of Charles II. and obtained a charter for the colony. He died while on a visit at Boston, April 5th, 1676, in the seventy-first year of his age. He was distinguished for his knowledge of natural philosophy, and was intimately familiar with Boyle, Wilkins, and other learned men of his time. He was one of the founders of the Royal Society of London, its correspondent in America, and sent to it many specimens of the productions of the country. He was equally eminent as a gentleman, a Christian, and a magistrate.

WINTHROP, Fitz John, F.R.S. governor of Connecticut, was the son of the preceding, and born at Ipswich in 1638. He became a magistrate of Connecticut in 1689, and the following year was appointed major-general of the land army designed to act against Canada; and conducted with great prudence in the expedition. He was sent as agent of the colony to Great Britain in 1694, and discharged the duties of the appointment so much to the satisfaction of the colony, that the legislature made him a bequest of 500 pounds. He was distinguished, like his father, for his knowledge of philosophy, his skill in politics, and his piety; and was honoured by the learned in England by being elected a member of the Royal Society. He was chosen to the office of chief magistrate in 1698, and held it till his death, which took place at Boston, November 27th, 1707.

WINTHROP, John, F.R.S. son of the preceding governor Winthrop, graduated at Harvard college in 1700, and was for some time a magistrate of Connecticut, but at length went to England to obtain a reversal of some decisions in the courts of the colony respecting the property of his ancestors; and continued to reside there. He made such representations of the laws of the colony respecting inheritances, at the British court, that they were repealed, and great alarm excited in the colony for a time. He was conspicuous, like his father and grandfather, for the superiority of his genius, and his accurate knowledge of natural philosophy, particularly chymistry. He was a member of the Royal Society, contributed largely to its repository, and was honoured by the dedication to him of the 40th volume of its transactions. He died in 1747.

WINTHROP, John, LL.D. F.R.S. Hollis professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in Harvard college, Massachusetts, was a native of that state, and graduated at Harvard college in 1732. He was appointed to the professorship in 1738, and discharged the duties of the station with great ability and popularity for more than forty years. In 1761 he went to Newfoundland, and observed a transit of Venus, another at Cambridge in 1769, an account of which he gave to the public. His observations on the transit of Mercury in 1740, were inserted in the transactions of the Royal Society, and he was elected a member of that society, and received a diploma of LL.D. from Edinburgh. He was chosen a member of the council in 1733, and distinguished himself by defending the rights of the colony. He was again chosen a councillor after the British authority ceased in Massachusetts. He was endowed with talents of a very superior order, and profoundly versed not only in his profession, but in the classics, in general literature, in biblical criticism, controversial theology, and politics. He was also eminently pious. He died the 3d of May, 1779, in his sixty-fifth year.

WINTHROP, James, LL.D. son of the preceding, was born at Cambridge, Massachusetts, April 8th, 1752, and graduated at Harvard in 1769, with a high reputation for talents and acquirements. He was in 1771 appointed librarian of that institution, and retained the office twenty years. He devoted a great part of his life to literary pursuits, and became distinguished for the extent of his knowledge, particularly of ancient and modern languages, the exact sciences, and biblical and polite learning. He was a member of the principal literary societies of Massachusetts, and contributed to their publications and other periodical works many valuable papers. He held for many years several respectable civil offices, and was distinguished in public and private life by uprightness, liberality, and public spirit. At his death, which took place Sept. 26, 1821, he left his library as a bequest to the college at Meadville, Pennsylvania.

WINTLE, Thomas, a learned divine, was born at Gloucester in 1737. He was educated at Pembroke college, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship, and took the degree of bachelor in divinity. Archbishop Secker made him his chaplain, and gave him the rectory of Wittisham in Kent, with which he held the living of St. Peter, Wallingford, but relinquished both on being presented to the rectory of Brightwell in Berkshire, where he died in 1814. His works are, 1. An improved version of Daniel, with notes. 2. A dissertation on the vision in Zachariah. 3. Sermons at the Bampton Lecture. 4. Christian Ethics, or Discourses on the Beatitudes. 5. A letter to bishop Hurd, occasioned by his strictures on archbishop Secker and bishop Lowth.—W. B.

WINTOWN, or WYNTOWN, Andrew, canon of St. Andrews, and prior of St. Serfinch in Loch Leven, was author of a Chronicle of Scotland, undertaken at the request of one of the ancestors of the earl of Wemyss. The work has lately been edited; it is written in rhyme, but though curious, contains much tradition and fable mixed with truth. He died about 1400.

WINTRINGHAM, Sir Clifton, a native of York, educated at Cambridge. He became physician to the late duke of York, and settled in London, where he acquired celebrity in his profession, and was raised to the honours of the baronetage. He published Mead's Medical Precepts improved, 8vo. and died in London, 1794, aged 84.

WINWOOD, Sir Ralph, a native of Aynho, Northamptonshire, educated at St. John's college, Oxford, from which he removed in 1582 as probationer fellow to Magdalen. He was proctor of the the university, 1592, and afterwards travelled over Europe, and in 1599 went as secretary in sir H. Neville's embassy to France. He was in 1602 sent envoy to Holland, and in 1607 received the honour of knighthood. He again represented his sovereign in Holland twice, and in 1614 was appointed secretary of state. He was well versed in political affairs, and especially in matters of trade and war. He died 1617, aged 52. His Memorials of Affairs of State under Elizabeth and James I. &c. were published in 3 vols. fol. 1715, by Edmund Sawyer.

WIRLEY, William, Rouge croix pursuivant, was a native of Leicestershire, and became known for his great skill in the knowledge of heraldry. He died at the Heralds' college, Feb. 1618, and was buried in St. Benet's church, Paul's wharf. He published 1592, the True Use of Armoury showed by History, and plainly proved by Example, 4to. He made some valuable collections of ancient records, &c. preserved in the Herald's college.

WIRSUNGUS, John George, a native of Bavaria, Professor of Anatomy at Padua, where, in 1642, he discovered and explained the pancreatic duct. He was meanly assassinated by some rivals, who were jealous of his professional celebrity.

WISCHART, William, D.D. a native of Dalkeith. He was educated at Utrecht, and on his return to Scotland was arrested as if concerned in the rye-house plot. At the revolution he returned from Holland; where he had taken refuge, and became one of the ministers of Leith, and in 1716 was appointed principal of Edinburgh university, and one of the city ministers. His Theologia, consisting of 120 sermons, is a valuable system of Calvinistical divinity. He died at Edinburgh, 1727, aged 70.

WISCHEART, George, D.D. a native of Yester in East Lothian, educated at Edinburgh university, where he took his degrees. On the breaking out of the civil wars, he followed the fortunes of the illustrious Montrose, to whom he was chaplain, and on his defeat by Lesley in 1645, he was among the prisoners. He with difficulty escaped the death which his unhappy fellow-prisoners suffered, and after some years of confinement he withdrew to the continent, and at the restoration returned, and became bishop of Edinburgh. In this high situation he showed great benevolence of heart and forgiveness of injuries, and with all his power assisted some of his most virulent persecutors, and procured their pardon from government. This enlightened prelate wrote an Account of the Wars in Scotland, and the history of his early patron, the marquis of Montrose, 8vo. and died at Edinburgh, 1669, aged 60.

WISCHER, Cornelius, a Dutch engraver, in the 17th century. His works from the most famous Flemish painters are much admired. His brother John, and his relations Lambert and Nicholas, were also eminent artists.

WISE, Francis, an English divine, born 3d Oct. 1695, and educated at New college school. He was admitted to Trinity college, Oxford, 1711, and became fellow of the society, and assistant to Dr. Hudson in the Bodleian library. He obtained Ellesfield vicarage, Oxfordshire, from his pupil, lord Guildford, and the rectory of Rotherfield Grays from his college. He was also keeper of the archives of the university, and Radcliffe librarian, and died at Ellesfield, 6th Oct. 1767, aged 62, universally beloved. He published Annales Alfredi Magni, 8vo.—Letter to Dr. Mead on some Antiquities in Berkshire—on the White Horse, Berks—the Red Horse, Warwickshire, &c.—Catalogus Numerorum Antiq. in Bodleian. &c.—Inquiries on the first Inhabitants, Languages, &c. of Europe, 4to.—on the Chronology of Fabulous Ages, 4to. &c.

WISSING, William, a portrait painter, born at Amsterdam, 1656, and brought up under Dodaens at the Hague. He visited England, where he obtained celebrity as the friend and happy imitator of sir Peter Lely. He painted Charles II. and all the royal family, and in his reputation was the rival of Kneller. He died at Burleigh-house, Northamptonshire, 10th Sept. 1687, aged only 31, and was buried in St. Martin's church, Stamford, where a marble tablet was erected to his memory by lord Exeter.

WISSOWATIUS, Andrew, a native of Philliporia in Lithuania, grandson of Faustus Socinus. After spreading the tenets of his grandfather in Holland, France, and England, he returned to Poland, where he acquired popularity at the head of the Socinians, till by religious persecution, he was obliged to fly for safety to Amsterdam. He assisted in the Bibliothèque de Freres Polonois, 9 vols. folio, and published besides, Religio Rationalis, &c. and other works. He died in Holland, 1668.

WISTAR, Caspar, M.D. professor in the university of Pennsylvania, was born in the year 1760. His father was a German of the the society of Friends, and settled in New-Jersey. Dr. Wistar was educated at the Friends' grammar-school, in Philadelphia, studied medicine with Dr. Redman of that city, and attended the lectures at the university of Pennsylvania. In 1783 he went to Europe to complete his education, and in 1786, was graduated at Edinburgh, with high reputation. He returned to Philadelphia in 1787, and was immediately appointed professor of chymistry and physiology in the college in that city. He also commenced the practice of medicine, and was chosen one of the attending physicians to the dispensary and hospital. He afterwards became adjunct professor to Dr. Shippen in the departments of anatomy and surgery, and on the death of Dr. Shippen succeeded to his chair; and his superior talents, his thorough acquaintance with his profession, and his popular manners raised him to the highest reputation. It was mainly owing to him, and his distinguished coadjutors, Drs. Rush and Barton, that the medical school of Philadelphia rose to its high standing. He was in 1815 elected honorary member of the literary and philosophical society of New-York, and in 1816 president of the American philosophical society. His acquisitions in the various departments of natural science were unusually extensive; he held a correspondence with several of the most eminent naturalists in Europe, and was a zealous promoter of every species of useful learning. His numerous professional avocations permitted him but seldom to appear as an author. His chief work is a System of Anatomy, in two volumes. He belonged to the society of Friends. His dispositions were peculiarly amiable, his manners mild, his method of lecturing eminently happy and popular; and his extensive learning, his public spirit, his assiduous attention to his professional duties, and his philanthropy elevated him to a high place in the respect and esteem of all. He died January 22d, 1818, in his fifty-seventh year.

WITASSE, Charles, a French ecclesiastic, born at Chauny, 11th Nov. 1660. He became professor of theology at Paris, but incurred the displeasure of the court by refusing to receive the pope's bull, called Unigenitus. He died of an apoplexy at Paris, 10th April, 1716, aged 56. He wrote Letters on Easter—Examination of Hardouin's Councils—treatises on Theological Subjects, &c.

WITHERS, George, an English poet, born 11th June, 1588. His satirical verses on the court and government exposed him to persecution, and for his "Abuses Whipt and Stript," he was sent to prison. He took up arms in favour of the parliament, and when taken by the king's troops, was with difficulty saved from hanging by sir John Denham. He was afterwards one of Cromwell's major-generals appointed to overawe and oppress the country. At the restoration he was stripped of his fortune and power, and was for some time imprisoned in Newgate, and in the Tower. He died 1667. His poetical pieces are very numerous, and some of them possess merit.

WITHERSPOON, John, D.D. LL.D. president of the college at Princeton New-Jersey, was born in Yester, Scotland, February 5th, 1722, and educated at Edinburgh. He was settled in the ministry, first at Beith, and afterwards at Paisley, and became one of the most distinguished of the Scottish clergy, for talents and influence. He published while there his "Characteristics," and became the leader of the orthodox part of the clergy. He was invited to remove to several distinguished cities in Europe, but at length accepted an appointment to the presidency of the college at Princeton, New-Jersey, and came to that state with his family in 1768. The war of the revolution dispersed the students, and left him at leisure to engage in civil employments, to which he was almost immediately called. He was elected a member of the convention which formed the constitution of New-Jersey, and in 1776 was appointed a member of congress, and retained a seat in that body till the conclusion of peace. His name is affixed to the declaration of independence, and the articles of confederation. After the war the college was reopened, and he returned to his duties there. During the last two years of his life he suffered the loss of his sight. He died November 15th, 1794, in the seventy-third year of his age. He possessed a mind of great vigour and activity, of uncommon shrewdness and humour, his learning was very various and extensive, and his discernment of character singularly keen. His preaching was characterized by perspicuity and energy; he was an able politician, and a zealous friend of liberty, and a highly amiable, amusing, and instructive companion. His works have been published in 4 vols. Svo.

WITSIUS, Herman, a learned divine, born at Enckhuysen, in North Holland, 1626. He so distinguished himself, that he was appointed professor of divinity at Franeker, afterwards at Utrecht, and then at Leyden, where he died 1708. He published several important works, which display great learning, judgment, and piety. The best known of these are Ægyptiaca et Decaphylon, 4to.—the Economy and the Covenants between God and Man, a valuable work, translated into English, 3 vols. Svo.—Historia Hierosolymitana—Miscellanea Sacrorum—Maletem. Leydens. &c.

WITT, John de. Vid. DE WITT.

WITT, Emanuel de, a native of Alkmaer, eminent as a painter. His pieces in which he introduces architecture, are particularly valuable. He died 1692, aged 85.

WITTICHIUS, Christopher, a native of Brieg in Silesia, professor of mathematics at Herborn, afterwards at Duisburg, and then theological professor at Nimeguen, and lastly at Leyden, where he died 1687, aged 62—He wrote Theologia Pacifica, 4to.—Anti-Spinosa.—de Deo et Attributis, 4to.—Consensus Veritatis.

WODHULL, Michael, an ingenious writer, was born at Thenford in Northamptonshire, in 1740. He was educated at Winchester school, and next at Brazenose college, Oxford, which he left without a degree to settle upon his paternal estate, where he died in 1816. Mr. Wodhull wrote several poems, but is best known by his translation of Euripides, first printed in 4 vols. in 1782.—W. B.

WOFFINGTON, Margaret, an English actress, born at Dublin, 1718. She first appeared in London at Covent-garden, in 1738, in sir Harry Wildair, and acquired great celebrity, though she failed in her attempts to rival Mrs. Pritchard and Mrs. Cibber. She afterwards acted Cordelia and Ophelia with great success under Garrick, with whom she continued at Drury-lane till she made a new engagement with Rich. She was afterwards on the Dublin stage with Mr. Sheridan, and died in London of a gradual decay, 1760.

WOJDE, Dr. a native of Poland, who found friends and protection in England, by his learning and his assiduities. He was minister of the German chapel in the Savoy, and of the Dutch chapel at St. James's, and assistant librarian at the British Museum. He published the Coptic Lexicon of la Croze, which had remained in manuscript since 1720, and edited besides the Alexandrian MS. of the New Testament, preserved in the British Museum, and also Scholtz's Egyptian Grammar. He was engaged in the compilation of an Egyptian Lexicon, but died before its completion, 1790, after a residence of 25 years in England.

WOLCOT, John, a satirist, was born at Dodbrook in Devonshire, in 1738. He was educated first at Kingsbridge, in his native county, and next at Bodmin in Cornwall, after which he was brought up under his uncle, an apothecary at Fowey, who left him the principal part of his estate. In 1767, he obtained a doctor's degree in Scotland, and the same year went with sir William Trelawney to Jamaica, but on the death of his patron he returned to England and settled as a physician in Cornwall, where he became the instructor of Opie the painter, with whom he visited London in 1780. He now quitted physic, and began, under the name of Peter Pindar, some severe attacks on the royal academicians, in a series of odes, criticising their annual exhibitions. After this he took higher aim, and published a satirical poem, called "The Lousiad;" in which he ridiculed the king, with more wit than truth or manners. After this he brought out a number of ludicrous pieces which went through numerous editions, both separately and in a collected state. The author became blind some years before his death, which happened in Somerstown, Jan. 14, 1819.—W.B.

WOLCOTT, Roger, governor of Connecticut, was born at Windsor, January 4th, 1679, and rose to distinction without the advantages of a classical or even a common school education, presenting a remarkable instance of the triumph of talents over all obstacles to conspicuity and usefulness. He was bred a mechanic. His first public employment was in 1711, when he served as commissary to the troops of Connecticut in the expedition against Canada. In 1745 he held the office of major general at the capture of Louisburg. He successively held a seat in the assembly and council, was appointed judge of the county court, deputy governor, chief judge of the superior court, and at length in 1751 chief magistrate, to which station he was elected the three succeeding years. He acquired a respectable share of knowledge, and was highly affable and amusing in conversation. He had some poetical talent, and wrote several pieces, the chief of which is preserved in the historical collections of Massachusetts. He was eminently pious. He died in May, 1767, in his eighty-ninth year.  L.

WOLCOTT, Erastus, a judge of the superior court of Connecticut, was a son of the preceding, and born about 1723. He was not liberally educated, but well furnished with useful knowledge. He commanded a regiment at the investment of Boston in 1776, and the next year served as brigadier general in the expedition to Peckskill. He served for some time as judge of the superior court, and was repeatedly a member of congress. He died in 1793 in the seventy-first year of his age. He was upright, patriotic, and religious.  L.

WOLCOTT, Oliver, LL.D. governor of Connecticut, was also a son of governor Roger Wolcott, and born about the year 1727. He was educated at Yale college, and graduated in 1747. He served as a captain in the French war, and afterwards studied medicine, but was prevented from practising by being appointed sheriff of Litchfield county, which office he held for fourteen years. He was elected to a seat in the illustrious congress of 1776, and signed the declaration of independence; and the articles of confederation in 1778. He held a seat in that body till 1785, and distinguished himself during the struggle of the colonies by his great firmness and zeal in the cause of liberty. He was elected deputy governor in 1785, and annually after till 1796, when he was advanced to the chair of the chief magistrate, but died on the 1st of December, 1797, in his seventy-second year. He was an accomplished scholar and gentleman, and his life was adorned with uprightness, patriotism, and piety.  L.

WOLFE, James, a celebrated English general, born at Westerham, Kent, Jan. 1726, son of lieutenant-general Edward Wolfe. He early embraced the military profession, and distinguished himself at the battle of la Feldt, and was present afterwards at every engagement during the war, and every where gathered fresh laurels by his valour, coolness, and judgment. At the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, instead of resigning himself to indolence and pleasure, he devoted himself more assiduously to military labours, and when lieutenant-colonel of Kingsley's regiment he introduced such order and discipline in the corps, that the gallant conduct of the soldiers in the plains of Minden is proverbial to this day. These great talents did not long remain in obscurity; when Mr. Pitt was placed at the head of affairs, the genius of Wolfe was called forth to execute his gigantic plans. Though the meditated attack on Rochefort was abandoned, the fall of Louisburgh displayed to the admiration of the nation, the abilities of their favourite general, who was immediately after selected, 1759, for the command of the expedition against Quebec. In this bold enterprise, the many difficulties from situation and from superior numbers, were quickly surmounted by perseverance and by military stratagem, and the English troops, permitted to face their enemy, triumphed over all opposition; but in the moment of victory, the conqueror received a ball through his wrist; yet, disregarding the wound, he animated his men to the battle. A second ball, a few minutes after, shot him through the body, and rendered it necessary to carry him off to the rear of the troops. In the last agonies his attention was roused by the cry of "they run!" and eagerly inquiring who ran, he no sooner heard the reply, "the defeated French," than he exclaimed, "then I thank God, and I die contented," and instantly expired, 13th Sept. 1759. His remains were brought to England, and buried with becoming pomp in Westminster abbey, where a splendid monument was erected by the nation to his honour. His glorious death forms the subject of a beautiful painting by West, which has been engraved in a masterly manner by Woollet. To the great abilities of the general, to steadiness, strength, and activity of mind, Wolfe united the milder virtues of life, sincerity and candour, a quick sense of honour, of justice, and public liberty. While he bore the meed of superiority in constitutional courage, in penetration, in cool judgment, and in unshaken presence of mind, he was equally admired and respected for beneficence and charity, and the estimation of the great was accompanied by the love of the soldiery and the gratitude of the poor.

WOLFF, Christian, a celebrated writer, born at Breslau, 24th Jan. 1679. From his native town he went in 1699 to Jena university, where he made a most extraordinary progress, and in 1702 he repaired to Leipsic, where the following year he opened his lectures by a famous dissertation, called Philosophia Practica Universalis Methodo Mathematica Conscripta. His publications and the number of his pupils increased his reputation, and he was liberally invited by the universities of Gies-sen and of Halle to accept the professorial chair of mathematics. He accordingly went to Halle 1707, and to his academical honours was soon after added the title of counsellor to the king of Prussia. These flattering prospects were, however, soon obscured; in his Latin oration on the morality of the Chinese, in 1721, he spoke with such applause of their philosophy and of their virtues, that the university was offended, and not only his tenets were reprobated, but he was by the representation of the body of divines, ordered on pain of the severest punishment to leave the country in 24 hours. From this ungrateful society he retired to Cassel, and became professor of mathematics and philosophy at Marburg, and counsellor to the landgrave. The favourable opinion of the learned and the great continued to atone for the persecution of the Halle university, he was declared honorary professor of the Petersburg academy of sciences, and admitted member of that of Paris, and honoured with the title of counsellor of regency by the king of Sweden. The prejudices of his enemies at last passed away, and in 1741 with some reluctance he obeyed the commands of the king of Prussia, and assumed the office of privy counsellor, of vice-chancellor, and of professor of the law of nature and of nations in the university of Halle. He afterwards was raised on the death of Ludwig to the dignity of chancellor of the university, and created a baron of the Roman empire. This great man, whose whole life was devoted to advance the interests of science and of virtue, died at Halle, of the gout in his stomach, 9th April, 1754, aged 76. His works in Latin and German are more than 60 in number, the best known of which are, a Course of Mathematics, 2 vols. 4to.—Philosophia Rationalis, sive Logica, 4to.—A System of Metaphysics, 4to.—Jus Naturæ, 8 vols. 4to.—Jus Gentium, 4to.—Horæ Subsecivæ Magdeburg—Dictionary on the Mathematics—Specimen Physicæ ad Theologum Natural. Applicatæ, 8vo. &c. Though precise and correct as a mathematician, his style as writer is rough and unpolished, his diction is barbarous, and his phrases inelegant. His German works are said to be superior in execution to his Latin.

WOLFF, Jerome, a native of the Grisons, who studied at Tubingen, and became, by application, librarian and principal of the college of Augsburg, where he died of the stone 1581, aged 64. He wrote translations of Demosthenes and Isocrates—de Vero et Licito Astrologiæ Usu—de Expedi-tâ Utriusque Linguae, &c.

WOLLASTON, William, an able divine, born of an ancient family at Coton Clamford, Staffordshire, 26th March, 1659. He was of Sidney college, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree, but not being able to obtain a fellowship he became in 1682 assistant to the master of Birmingham school, and was four years after appointed under-master, but the death of a rich relation in 1688 left him in possession of an ample estate, and at liberty to quit his laborious employment. From Birmingham he came to reside in London, where he soon after married. In his retirement, which he loved above the tumults of public life, and which he refused to quit for high preferment in the church, he zealously devoted himself to literature, and in his opinions and conduct showed the liberal-minded man. The best known of his writings is his Religion of Nature Delineated, a popular work, of which more than 10,000 copies were sold in a few years. In his old age he had the misfortune to break his arm, and this increasing the disorders of a weak constitution, hastened his death, which happened 29th Oct. 1724, at his house in Charter-house square. He was buried at Great Finborough, where he had an estate, near his wife, who died in 1720, and who brought him 11 children, of whom only seven survived him. His Religion of Nature exposed him to the censures of some divines, because he makes no mention of revealed religion, and attempts to explain the truth of religion on mathematical principles, and on the obligations of truth, reason, and virtue. Lord Bolingbroke, in calling the work a strange theism, as dogmatical and absurd as artificial theology, does not deny the author to be a man of parts and of learning, a philosopher and a geometri-cian. The work must be, however, considered as a composition of great merit, and one of the best written in the English language. It has appeared in 4to. and in 8vo.

WOLLEBIUS, John, a divine of Basil, author of Compendium Theologiae, a work of merit, translated into various languages. He died 1629.

WOLMAR, Melchior, a native of Rotweil in Switzerland, known as the instructor of Calvin and of Beza in the Greek language. He was patronised by Ulric duke of Wirtemberg, and became professor of law at Tubingen. He died of an apoplexy at Eisenach 1561, aged 64. He wrote Commentaries on the two first Books of the Iliad.

WOLSELEY, Robert, son of Sir Charles W. of Staffordshire, who espoused the cause of the parliament against the king, and was one of Cromwell's lords, was in favour with king William, and was his envoy to Brussels, 1693. He wrote a curious preface to Rochester's Valentinian—a translation of Virgil's Æneas meeting Dido, &c.

WOLSEY, Thomas, a celebrated favourite at the court of Henry VIII. He was born at Ipswich in Suffolk, 1471, not the son of a butcher as generally reported, but descended from a poor but respectable family, and he entered so early at Oxford that he was bachelor of arts at the age of 14, and consequently called the boy bachelor. He became fellow of Magdalen college, and when master of arts he exchanged the care of Magdalen school for the tuition of the sons of Thomas Grey, marquis of Dorset. By the favour of his patron he obtained the rectory of Lymington in Somersetshire, but here he behaved with such irregularity that he was set in the stocks for being drunk of a Sunday, by sir Amias Paulet, a punishment which was severely visited on the upright magistrate, by a long imprisonment of six years, when the offending clergyman was raised to the height of power. After the death of Dorset he recommended himself to the notice of Dean, archbishop of Canterbury, and at last became chaplain to the king, to whom he rendered himself so agreeable, that he was intrusted with the negotiation of his intended marriage with Margaret dutchess of Savoy. He used such despatch in this business that he was rewarded with the deanery of Lincoln, and on the accession of Henry VIII. he maintained his influence at court, and saw new honours soon heaped upon him. He was made rector of Torrington, canon of Windsor, registrar of the garter, and prebendary and dean of York. In the expedition to France 1513, he attended the king to direct the supplies and the provisions for the wants of the army, and on the taking of Tournay he was appointed by the conqueror bishop of that city. In 1514 he was advanced to the see of Lincoln, and eight months after removed to York, the next year he was made cardinal of St. Cicily, and a few months after lord chancellor of England. To these high favours were added the confidence of the king, and consequently the disposal of all places of trust, of honour, and power in the kingdom. Thus placed at the head of affairs, he governed the nation at his pleasure, and that he might confirm more strongly his ascendancy over the king, he withdrew his attention from all public affairs, and by the most artful policy he fanned his pleasures, and administered most liberally to the gratification of his most licentious desires. Absolute at home, where his expenses exceeded the revenues of the crown, he was courted and flattered by foreign princes, and according to his caprice, or the demands of his avarice, the support of England was promised to favour the ambitious views either of France, or of Germany, or of the pope. His disappointment in his application for the popedom after the death of Leo. X. in which he was deceived by the emperor, was soon after followed by the displeasure of his capricious master, who in the matter of his divorce expected from his favourite an obsequious and submissive assistant. The cardinal, equally afraid of the pope and of the king, wished to stand neuter, but Henry, indignant at his conduct, stripped him of his honours 1529, and caused him to be impeached in parliament by a charge of 44 articles. Though the reasonable charges were repelled in the house of commons by the influence and exertions of his friend Cromwell, he was desired to retire to York, where he was soon after arrested by the earl of Northumberland, on a fresh charge of high treason. Wolsey, struck with the greatness of his disgrace, fell sick, and as he proceeded by slow journeys to London he stopped at Leicester, where he is said to have taken poison to put an end to his wretched existence. He expired 29th Nov. 1530, and a few hours before his death he exclaimed in accents of agony: "Had I served my God with the same zeal that I have served the king, he would not have forsaken me in my old age." His remains were buried in the abbey of St. Mary de Pratis, at Leicester. The history of Wolsey exhibits in the most striking degree the vicissitudes of fortune and the inconstancy of human affairs. His private character was so depraved, that he deserved little of the favours of his master, but with a capricious tyrant the most profligate and vicious are generally the most useful and convenient ministers. It has been truly observed, that few ever fell from so high a station without less crimes objected against them. It must indeed be acknowledged that he was a man of great abilities, well acquainted with the learning of the times, sagacious as a politician, and well versed in the intrigues of courts. Notwithstanding, however, his vices and his ambition, his schemes for the promotion of literature in the nation were noble and well imagined. He not only founded seven lectures in the university where he had been educated, but Christ-church owes its greatness to his munificence and liberality. He also founded a school at Ipswich. Besides the honours already enumerated, he possessed the commission of pope's legate, a latere, he was abbot of St. Alban's, bishop of Winchester and Durham, and he held in farm the dioceses of Bath, Worcester, and Hereford, and had in his retinue 800 servants, among whom were ten lords, 15 knights, and 40 esquires.

WOLTERS, Henrietta, a lady of Amsterdam, eminent as a miniature painter. She died 1741, aged 49.

WOLZOGEN, Lewis de, a native of Amersford, who studied at Paris and Geneva, and became a zealous partizan of the Socinians. He settled at Amsterdam as professor of ecclesiastical history, and died there 13th Nov. 1690, aged 58. He wrote Orator Sacer, sive de Ratione Concionandi, 8vo. — Dissertatio Critico-Theologica, &c.

WOMACK, Lawrence, D.D. author of the examination of Tilenus before the Friars, 12mo. against the puritans—the Calvinistic Cabinet Disclosed, 12mo.—the Result of False Principles, or Error convinced by its own Evidence, and other tracts against the Calvinists, was a divine of Cambridge, who became archdeacon of Suffolk, 1660, and was made bishop of St. David's 1683. He died 1685.

WOOD, Anthony, an able antiquary, born at Oxford, 17th Dec. 1632. He was educated at New college school, and at Thame school, and in 1647 entered at Merton college. He took his master's degree in 1655, and earnestly devoted himself to the study of the antiquities of the colleges and churches of Oxford. His labours were so highly esteemed that after they were prepared for the press in English, Dr. Fell dean of Christ church procured them, and employed Peers, one of the students of his college, to translate the work into Latin. The work thus left to the mercy of an obstinate and perverse translator, and of a capricious editor, appeared in 1674, in 2 vols. fol. under the title of Historia et Antiquitates Universitatis Oxoniensis, but much altered and disfigured by several errors. He published another work in 1691, of which a second edition under the care of bishop Tanner appeared in 1721, under the title of Athenæ Oxoniensis, containing an account of the great men who flourished in the university from 1500 to 1695, to which were added the Fasti, in two vols. fol. Though Wood in these works claimed the merit of being free from prejudice and party, he yet reflected with such asperity on the character of lord Clarendon, the chancellor of the university, that he was indicted for defamation in the court of the university, and his expulsion, for greater notoriety, was inserted in the Gazette 1693. Though an indefatigable collector, and a diligent antiquary, Wood deserves to be censured for his narrowness of mind and his violent prejudices, totally unworthy the dignity of the Historian. He died at Oxford 29th Nov. 1695, of a retention of urine. His papers and books were deposited agreeably to his will in the Ashmolean museum. Wood vindicated his work in an 8vo. volume, against the attacks of bishop Burnet.

WOOD, Robert, an English writer. He travelled with his friends Bouverie and Dawkins into the East, and visited the plains of Troas, and the remains of Balbec and Palmyra. He became under secretary of state in 1764, under lord Granville, and in the midst of his political engagements prepared the account of his observations for the press, which he published under the title of Essay on the Original Genius of Homer, a work of great merit. He died 1771.

WOOD, Isaac, a painter in oil, and in black lead on vellum, was patronised by Wriotesley, duke of Bedford. He was in his conversation very facetious, and particularly happy in his application of the ludicrous passages of Hudibras. He died 24th Feb. 1752, aged 63.

WOOD, James, professor of divinity, and provost of St. Salvador's college, St. Andrews, was author of a book against the independents, and died 1664.

WOOD, James, governor of Virginia, in 1798 and 1799, had been previously lieutenant-governor. He sustained a high reputation as a general officer in the revolutionary army. Although opposed to the prevailing political opinions of Virginia, during the administration of president Adams, he enjoyed a share of the confidence of the people as to be placed at the head of the government. Colonel Munroe succeeded him in 1800. He died in June, 1813.

WOODALL, John, an English surgeon, who went, in 1589, with the troops sent by Elizabeth to assist Henry IV. After travelling over Europe he settled in London, and became member of the corporation of surgeons, and practised as a physician. He was also surgeon to St. Bartholomew's hospital, and surgeon general to the East India company. He wrote Surgeon's Mate, 1617, and a supplement to it called Viaticum. He died 1638, aged 69.

WOODCOCK, Robert, was so attached to music that, to indulge his favourite pursuits, he quitted a lucrative place which he held under government. He was eminent as a composer, and as a player on the haut-boy. Several of his compositions have been published. He died 10th April, 1728, aged 36. He also excelled as a painter of sea pieces.

WOODFORD, Samuel, an English divine, born in the parish of All-Hallows on the Wall, London, 15th April, 1636. He was of Wadham college, Oxford, and after taking his first degree in arts, he entered at the Inner Temple. At the restoration he was ordained by bishop Morley, and obtained the rectory of Hartley-Maudet, Hants, to which were afterwards added a prebend of Chichester, and in 1680, a prebend of Winchester. He was member of the Royal society, and was, in 1677, created D.D. by archbishop Sancroft, and he died 1700. He wrote poems of considerable merit—Paraphrase on the Psalms, five books—Paraphrase on the Canticles—The Legend of Love, three cantos—to the Muse, a pindaric ode—Paraphrase of some of the Hymns of the Old and New Testament—occasional compositions in English rhymes, &c.

WOODHEAD, Abraham, a native of Maltham, Yorkshire, bred up at University college, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. The restoration replaced him in his fellowship, which he had lost by the civil war; but his conversion to the Roman catholic faith proved injurious to his future advancement in the church. He lived in retirement at Hoxton, and was considered the best writer of his time in favour of the tenets which he had adopted. He wrote the Guide to Controversy, &c. The best part of his numerous pamphlets are anonymous: they were ably answered by Dr. Stillingfleet. He died 1678.

WOODHOUSE, James, professor of Chymistry in the university of Pennsylvania, was eminent for his knowledge of that branch of science, and published a number of pieces on chymical subjects of value. He died June 4th, 1809, aged 38.  L.

WOODVILLE, Elizabeth, widow of sir John Grey, who lost his life in the battle of Bernard's Heath, captivated the heart of Edward IV. when she appeared before him to solicit the restitution of her husband's property. In consequence of this interview the frail monarch married her, and from this union was born the princess Elizabeth, whose marriage with Henry VII. cemented a reconciliation between the violent partisans of the houses of York and Lancaster. The conduct of Edward, and his partiality for his concubines, were not calculated to ensure domestic happiness to Elizabeth, yet, after his death, she ventured to take for her third husband, lord Stanley.

She died in a monastery, where her son-in-law, Henry VII. had confined her.

WOODVILLE, William, a native of Cumberland, who studied medicine at Edinburgh, where he took his degree of M.D. in 1775. He went to settle at Denbigh, and in 1782 removed to London, where he became physician to the Middlesex dispensary, and soon after, to the small-pox hospital. He wrote a dissertation De Irritabilitate, medical botany, 4to. an useful work, and some tracts on the small-pox and the cow-pox. He was an able practitioner, and died at the small-pox hospital, Pancras, 26th April, 1805, aged 58.

WOODWARD, John, a natural philosopher, born in Derbyshire, 1st May, 1665. He was well educated at a private school, and then bound apprentice to a linen-drafter in London; but literature and philosophy had more charms for him than the business of the counter. His studies were assisted by the kindness of Dr. Barwick, and on the vacancy of the medical professorship at Gresham college, 1692, he was honourably elected to the chair. In 1693 he was chosen fellow of the Royal Society, and two years after he was honoured by Dr. Tenison, the primate, with the degree of M.D. He published, in 1695, his Essay towards a Natural History of the Earth, &c. with an account of the Universal Deluge, and of its effects, 8vo. This book, as containing some curious facts and bold conjectures, had many admirers, and more enemies, and it passed in 1702, to a second edition, and in 1723, to a third; but it was not followed by a larger work, as the author had promised. He was in 1702, chosen fellow of the college of physicians, and he published some intelligent papers in the philosophical transactions. In 1718 he published the State of Physic, and of Diseases, with an inquiry into the causes of their increase, &c. and of the small-pox, which produced a bitter controversy with Dr. Mead. He died at his house, Gresham college, 25th April, 1723, and was buried in Westminster abbey. He founded a professorship at Cambridge, with a salary of 150*l.* for a lecture to elucidate the Natural History of the Earth, &c. and the first professor appointed was Dr. Conyers Middleton, 1731, who resigned two years after.

WOODWARD, Henry a comedian of eminence, born in London 1717, and educated at Merchant Tailors' school. From the business of a tallow-chandler he became, under the care of Mr. Rich, a popular harlequin on the London stage. With the 6000*l.* which he had amassed by his profession, he commenced manager of Dublin theatre, and imprudently lost the whole, and returned again for support to Covent garden. He died 17th April 1777, in consequence of a fall, as he was jumping on a table, on the stage, in the character of Scrub. He was author of Marplot in Lisbon, a farce, and the Man's the Master, a comedy, 1775.

WOODWARD, Bezaleel, professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in Dartmouth College, was a native of Lebanon, Connecticut, and graduated at Yale college in 1764. He was an instructor in Dartmouth college from the time of its establishment in 1769 until his death, and a very useful officer. He married a daughter of the first president Wheelock, and died at Hanover, August 25th, 1804, aged 59.

WOOLLETT, William, a native of Maidstone, who became a pupil of Timney, and acquired celebrity by his engravings, especially that of the death of general Wolfe. He was engraver to the king, and died 1783, aged 48.

WOOLSTON, Thomas, an English divine, born 1669 at Northampton, where his father was a tradesman. He was educated at Sidney college, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship, and took his degree of B.D. He published in 1705, the Old Apology of the Truth for the Christian religion, against the Jews and Gentiles, revived, 8vo. a singular work, which though abounding in new opinions, did not, however, excite the censures of the learned against him. He afterwards published a Latin dissertation on the authenticity of the letter said to have been written by Pilate to Tiberius, describing our Saviour, &c. 1720, and the next year two letters on the character, &c. of the Quakers—and in defence of the Apostles, and primitive Fathers, &c. His Four Free Gifts to the Clergy appeared in 1723 and 4, and soon after his Moderator between an Infidel and Impostor, &c. which excited a persecution against him, which, however, was stopped by the interference of Mr. Whiston. His six discourses on the Miracles of Christ, and his two defences of them, dedicated to six bishops, appeared in 1727, and the three next years, and by their merriment, and humour, their profaneness, and blasphemy, excited emotions of mirth, of indignation, and of horror. In these books he regards the miracles of our Saviour, as related in the gospel not as real events, and historical facts, but allegorical fables, and while he attempts to disprove them, he treats of them in the most ludicrous, offensive, and indecent language. Thus at war with the good sense, the opinions, and the religion of his country, he soon felt not only the attacks of literary champions, but the prosecution of the law. He was tried for the offence at Guildhall, before lord chief justice Raymond, and sentenced to one year's imprisonment, and to a fine of 100*l.* As he was unable to pay the fine, he continued to the end of his life within the rules of the king's bench, and died there 27th Jan. 1733, of an epidemic disorder, after an illness of four days, while Dr. Clarke was engaged in soliciting his liberty. In the agonies of death he exclaimed "this is a struggle which all men must go through, which I bear not only patiently, but with willingness." His remains were deposited in St. George's churchyard, Southwark.

WOOSTER, David, major general in the army of the American revolution, was born at Stratford, Connecticut, in 1711, and graduated at Yale college in 1738. He was appointed to the chief command of the troops of Connecticut at the commencement of the war of the revolution, and afterwards a brigadier general in the continental service. He soon resigned that office, and was appointed, in 1776, the first major general of the militia of Connecticut, and while opposing the British detachment sent to destroy the public stores at Danbury, was mortally wounded at Ridgfield, April 27th, 1777, and died on the 2d of May following.

WOOTON, John, an eminent landscape painter, was particularly distinguished for his paintings of dogs, and horses, for which he regularly received 40 guineas, and 20 when less than life. He quitted business in 1761, and his collection of drawings and prints was sold by public auction. He died 1765.

WORCESTER, Samuel, D.D. congregational minister of Salem, was born at Hollis, New-Hampshire, and graduated at Dartmouth college in 1795. Having qualified himself for the ministry, he was ordained pastor of the church at Fitchburg, Sept. 27, 1797. He was dismissed in 1802, and in April, 1803, was installed pastor of the Tabernacle church at Salem, Massachusetts, where he continued till his death. His talents and learning were highly respectable, he was eminently amiable, most exemplarily pious, and distinguished for his practical wisdom. He was one of the earliest and most zealous promoters of the missions from New-England for communicating the gospel to the heathen, was the secretary to the board of commissioners for foreign missions, for that purpose, and devoted most of his attention to the business of the society from the time of its organization. In 1820 he took a journey to the south, for the joint purpose of improving his health, and visiting the missionary stations among the Aborigines, and died at Brainerd, in the country of the Cherokees, January 7th, 1821. His chief publications were "Letters on the Trinity," addressed to the Rev. Mr. Channing, and "Two Discourses on the Abrahamic Covenant," connected with a volume of letters addressed to the Rev. Dr. Baldwin of Boston.

⚔ I.

WOBLIDGE, Thomas, an engraver, and portrait painter, who published a book of gems from the antique. Some of his etchings, from Rembrandt, were particularly admired. He died 1766.

WORMIUS, Olaus, a native of Arhusen, in Jutland, who studied at Lunenburg, Emmeric, and Marburg, and in 1607 came to Strasburg, where he applied himself to physic. He visited Italy, and on account of his great learning was honourably received by the universities of Padua, Siena, and Montpellier, and after travelling over France, Holland, and England, he took his doctor's degree at Basil, and at last settled at Copenhagen, where he obtained the chair of professor of belles lettres. In 1615, he was advanced to the chair of Greek, and in 1624, to that of medicine, and acquired both reputation and opulence, as the physician of the court. He obtained a canonry of Lunden, from Christian IV. for his services, and died 1634, aged 66. He was three times married, and the father of 16 children. He wrote Fasti Danici, 1626—a History of Norway, 4to.—Literatura Danica Antiquissima, Vulgo Gothica Dicta, et de Priscâ Danorum Poesi, 5to.—Monument, Danic. Libri Sex. fol.—Lexicon Runicum, and appendix ad Monumenta Danica, fol.—Series Regum Daniæ, &c.—Talshoi, or Monument. Stroense in Scania, 4to.

WORMIUS, William, eldest son of the preceding, was born at Copenhagen, and applied himself to medical pursuits. He became professor of medicine, historiography to the king, counsellor of state, &c. and died 1724, aged 71. He wrote Musæum Wormianum, fol. containing an account of the curiosities preserved in his father's collection. His eldest son Olaus, was professor of eloquence, history, and physic, at Copenhagen, and author of treatises de Glossopetris—de Viribus Medicamentorum Specificis, &c. He died 1708. Another brother was bishop of Copenhagen, and author of some theological tracts. He died 1737, much respected.

WORSDALE, James, a painter, the pupil of sir Godfrey Kneller, whose niece he privately married. In consequence of this union he was discarded by his master, but found patrons and friends in the public, and gained some reputation as a singer, and as a facetious mimic. He was author of songs, of five dramatic pieces, in one of which he acted a part, &c. He died 13th June, 1767, and was buried at St. Paul's, Covent-garden.

WORSLEY, sir Richard, a native of the Isle of Wight, who succeeded to the title on the death of his father, sir Thomas, 1768, and in 1775 married a daughter of sir John Fleming, bart. from whom he was divorced in 1782. He was comptroller of the royal household, governor of the isle of Wight, and member for Newport. In the younger part of his life he travelled through Europe, and made a fine collection of marbles, statues, and other antiques, engraved and published 2 vols. fol. under the title of Musæum Worsleianum. He published also a History of the Isle of Wight, 1781, 4to. with indifferent plates by Godfrey. He died of an apoplexy, at his seat of Appledurcombe, 8th Aug. 1805, aged 54.

WORTHINGTON, John, D. D. a native of Wales, who was elected to the headship of Jesus college, Cambridge, which he resigned after the restoration. He obtained the cure of St. Benet Fink, in London, and soon after the fire of London was presented to the living of Ingoldsbys, near Grantham, Lincolnshire, and to a prebend of Lincoln cathedral. He died at Hackney, where he had resided as lecturer to the church, and was buried there, at the latter end of 1671. His funeral sermon was preached by Tilotson. He published a Form of Sound Words, or a Scripture Catechism, 8vo.—the Great Duty of Self-Resignation, 8vo.—the Doctrine of the Resurrection Considered, 8vo. &c.

WORTHINGTON, William, D. D. a native of Merionethshire, educated at Oswestry school, and Jesus college, Oxford, where he took his doctor's degree, 1758. He was liberally patronised by bishop Harc, who gave him a living in Shropshire, and afterwards another in Denbighshire, and a stall in the cathedral of St. Asaph. He afterwards obtained a stall in York cathedral from archbishop Drummond. He died at his living of Llanrhayader, in Denbighshire, much lamented, 6th Oct. 1778, aged 75. He sent to the press various publications, the best known of which are, an Essay on the Scheme and Conduct, &c. of Man's Redemption, &c. 8vo.—Historical Sense of the Mosaic Account of the Fall proved, &c.—The Evidences of Christianity, deduced from facts, &c. preached at Boyle's Lectures, 1766-8, 2 vols. 8vo.—the Scripture Theory of the Earth, &c. 8vo.—Sermons, &c.

WOTTON, sir Henry, an eminent writer, born 30th March, 1568, at Bocton-hall, Kent, of respectable parents. From Winchester school he entered at New college, Oxford, and soon after removed to Queen's college, where he became distinguished for wit and learning. After leaving Oxford, where it is uncertain whether he took his master's degree, he went to France, Germany, and Italy, and there increased his knowledge of literature, and of the fine arts, during a residence of nine years. On his return to England, he recommended himself, by his abilities and politeness, to Essex, and became his secretary; but on the fall of that unhappy favourite, he had the good fortune to escape to the continent. At Florence he ingratiated himself with the grand duke, and was confidentially commissioned to go to Scotland to inform James VI. of a conspiracy formed against his life. Under the assumed name of Octavio Baldi, he passed to Norway, and then to Scotland, where he was received with kindness, and treated with distinction by the king. He had no sooner returned to Florence than he was informed of the death of Elizabeth, and of the accession of James to the English throne, and he therefore hastened back to his native country, and was greeted with regard and confidence by the king. He was knighted and sent ambassador to Venice, and afterwards to the United Provinces, and to several of the German courts, where he represented his sovereign with becoming dignity, and truly British independence. For his services to the state he was rewarded with the provostship of Eton, 1623, and he took deacon's orders, as he regarded his ecclesiastical situation incompatible with the character of a layman. He died 1639, deservedly respected in his private as well as his public character. He was buried in the chapel of his college, and, as an enemy to controversy, he caused these words to be engraved on his tomb: Hic jacet hujus sententiæ primus auctor, disputandi pruritus ecclesiæ scabies. Nomen alias quære. He wrote the Elements of Architecture—Parallels between Essex and Buckingham—Characters of some of the Kings of England—Essays on Education—Poems, printed in the Reliquæ Wottoniæ, which appeared after his death, Svo. After he was settled at Eaton, he began the Life of Martin Luther, with the history of the reformation, but abandoned it at the request of Charles I. to devote himself more laboriously to the History of England, which he, however, never completed.

WOTTON, William, an able divine, born 13th Aug. 1666, at Wrentham, Suffolk, where his father was rector. He was endowed with astonishing powers of mind, and when four years and three months old, he could read with the greatest ease the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin. He was admitted of Catherine-hall, Cambridge, before he was 10 years old, and there he maintained his reputation by his astonishing skill in the Hebrew, Chaldee, Arabic, and Syriac, as well as in arts and sciences. He took his first degree in 1679, and was soon after noticed by Lloyd, bishop of St. Asaph, who patronised him, and afterwards gave him the sinecure of Llandrillo, in Denbighshire. He had before obtained a fellowship at St. John's college, and in 1693 lord Nottingham gave him the living of Middleton Keynes, in Buckinghamshire. In 1694 he published Reflections upon An- cient and Modern Learning, a work of merit, and as he had been abused by the satirical pen of Swift, he wrote Observations on the Tale of a Tub, which he called an irreligious book, and a most profane piece of ribaldry. In 1701 he published the History of Rome from the death of Antoninus Pius to the death of Severus Alexander, Svo. under the direction of Dr. Burnet, a work of great merit. In 1707 Tenison conferred on him the degree of D. D. and he was presented by Burnet to a stall in Salisbury cathedral. Though in possession of a moderate income, he was so regardless of economy, that pecuniary difficulties crowded upon him, and obliged him in 1714 to retire to South Wales, where he wrote several books. He died 13th Feb. 1726, leaving only one daughter, the wife of Mr. W. Clarke, canon residentiary of Chichester. His other works are, Discourse concerning the Confusion of Tongues at Babel—Advice to a Young Student—Memoirs of the Cathedrals of St. David's and Llandaff—some sermons—five political anonymous pamphlets, &c. In his character he was a most extraordinary man, as he never forgot any thing which he had read, and what is remarkable, as has been observed, his learning was all in ready cash, which he was able to produce at sight, and with which he could enliven and embellish the most uninteresting subjects.

WOTTON, Edward, a native of Oxford, educated at Magdalen school. He became demy of Magdalen college, and then removed to Corpus Christi, of which he was appointed Greek lecturer. He afterwards travelled into Italy, and took the degree of M. D. at Padua, and after his return to England, practised with great success at Oxford, and then at London, where he was made member of the college of physicians, and physician to Henry VIII. He died 5th Oct. 1555, and was buried in St. Alban's church, London. He published de Differentiis Animalium Libri decem, 1552, a work of merit, and he was the first who paid particular attention to natural history. He began, but did not finish, a History of Insects.

WOUTERS, Francis, a Dutch painter. His landscapes with naked cupids are admired. He was the pupil of Rubens, and lived for some time in England, in the suite of the imperial ambassador. He died 1659.

WOUVERMANS, Philip, a native of Haerlem, who studied painting under John Wynants, and without visiting the schools of Italy, acquired great celebrity. For high finishing, for correctness, and for pleasing composition, he was excelled by few; but his merits were viewed without encouragement, and his labours were unaccompanied with the honourable rewards due to superior talents. He lived poor.

and the cares of a numerous family, added to the small recompense which he received for his valuable pieces, contributed to increase the miseries of life. Displeased with the ingratitude of the world, he refused to bring up any of his children to his own profession, and in his last moments he destroyed a box full of designs, &c. He died at Haerlem, 1688, aged 68. His landscapes were particularly happy, and diversified with encampments, with huntings, balts, &c. As he chiefly excelled in the painting of horses, he studied those subjects in which these animals could be introduced to the best advantage. Two of his brothers, Peter and John, were also eminent artists.

WOWER, John, a native of Hamburgh, distinguished as a politician, and as a literary character. He died at Gottorp, where he was governor, 1612, aged 38. He wrote Polymathia, 4to.—Notes on Firmicus, Apuleius, Sidonius, &c.—Letters, &c.

WRAGG, William, was a native of South Carolina, and a descendant of one of the French Huguenots who fled from France on the revocation of the edict of Nantes. He was born in 1714, and was sent to England for his education, first to Westminster school, and afterwards to the university of Oxford. He studied and entered on the practice of the law in England, and there also formed a matrimonial connexion. Not long afterwards he returned to his native country, and was for a considerable number of years in succession, elected a member of the provincial house of assembly of South Carolina. In 1753, he was advanced to the rank of one of the king's council for the province, and in 1769, the office of chief justice of the province was offered him, but he declined to accept it. When the revolution commenced he felt constrained by his official oaths, and by his views of the best interests of the country to oppose the declaration and prosecution of independence. This turned the tide of popular feeling so completely against him, that he embarked for England, and in the course of his voyage was wrecked and lost in a violent storm on the coast of Holland, in September, 1777. A monument in Westminster abbey perpetuates the memory of his life, and of the melancholy shipwreck in which he met his death. He was a man of fine talents, of powerful eloquence, and of great probity and honour.  L.

WRANGEL, Charles Gustavus, marshal and constable of Sweden, was distinguished for his valour. He burnt the Danish fleet in 1644, beat the Imperialists at Augsburg, 1648, and defeated the Dutch fleet in the passage of the Sound, 1658. He died about 1676.

WRAY, Daniel, a native of London, educated at the Charter-house, and at Queen's college, Cambridge, and distinguished for his learning, his taste, and his acquaintance with the fine arts. He was member of the Royal and Antiquarian societies, and trustee of the British museum, &c. He died 29th Dec. 1783, aged 82, and universally lamented. He contributed to the Archæologia, Notes on the Walls of Ancient Rome, and Extracts of Letters from Rome on the discovery of a statue of Venus, &c.

WREN, Matthew, an English prelate. He was of Pembroke hall, Cambridge, and afterwards became master of Peter-house, chaplain to Charles I. prebendary of Winchester and Westminster, dean of Windsor, and in 1634, was made bishop of Hereford. He was afterwards translated to Norwich, and in 1638 to Ely. During the civil wars his property was seized, and his person imprisoned in the Tower, where he continued 18 years without being brought to trial. At the restoration he was reinstated in his bishopric, and died at Ely-house, London, 1667, aged 81. He was a man of abilities, and wrote some controversial tracts against the Socinians—Epistolæ Variæ, &c.—the Abandoning of the Scots Government—two sermons, &c.

WREN, Matthew, son of the preceding, was educated at Cambridge, and became member of parliament for St. Michael, in Cornwall, and was secretary to James, duke of York. He died June, 1672, aged 42. He wrote Considerations on Harrington's Oceana—Monarchy Asserted, &c. Lord Clarendon was anxious that he should undertake a confutation of Hobbes' Leviathan, but it does not appear that he engaged in the work.

WREN, Sir Christopher, a celebrated English architect and mathematician, nephew to bishop Wren, was born at Knoyle, Wilts, 20th Oct. 1632. At the age of 14 he entered as gentleman commoner at Wadham college, Oxford, where he made astonishing progress in mathematics. He was, about the time of taking his master's degree, elected fellow of All-Souls, and in 1657 he was chosen professor of astronomy in Gresham college, where his lectures on the different phases of Saturn were attended by numerous audiences. In 1661 he succeeded Seth Ward as Savilian professor at Oxford, and in consequence resigned the Gresham professorship, and took the degree of LL.D. His acquaintance with architecture was so great that he was sent for by Charles II. to assist sir John Denham, the surveyor-general, and in 1663 he was chosen fellow of the Royal Society, to whose memoirs he contributed some valuable papers on subjects of astronomy, natural philosophy, and other sciences. In 1665 he went to France, and visited the most curious edifices, and the most remarkable inventions in mechanics in the capital.

and on his return home he was appointed architect, and one of the commissioners for the reparation of St. Paul's cathedral. The dreadful conflagration of the city which quickly followed, called for the exertion of the powers of the ingenious architect, and the model for a new capital which he made, though approved by the king and the privy council, was not adopted. His avocations were now so numerous as an architect, and as the successor of sir J. Denham, in the office of surveyor-general of his majesty's works, that he resigned his Savilian professorship in 1673, and the following year received the honour of knighthood. By his advice Greenwich was selected as the best place for the erection of an observatory, and his friend Flamstead was appointed the first professor. In the improving and beautifying London, his genius was particularly displayed, and the churches which he erected are lasting monuments of the vast powers of his mind. Besides St. Paul, the noblest edifice which he raised, he built 53 churches in London, among which St. Stephen Walbrook is particularly celebrated. The monument was also erected by him, and likewise the custom-house, Greenwich hospital, Emanuel college chapel, Trinity college library, Cambridge, the theatre at Oxford, &c. This ingenious man, whose architectural labours deserve and receive so much admiration, died 25th Feb. 1723, aged 91, and he was buried with great solemnity in the vault of his favourite cathedral, where, on the side of a pillar, these few words record the greatness of his genius, "Lector, si monumentum requiris, circumspice." Sir Christopher sat twice in parliament, for Plympton in Devonshire, 1685, and for Melcombe Regis in 1700. He married the daughter of sir Thomas Coghill of Blechington, Oxon, by whom he had a son, and after her death he took, for his second wife, a daughter of baron Liford, of Ireland, by whom he had a son and a daughter. He was in 1680 elected president of the Royal Society, and in 1684 made comptroller of the works in Windsor castle. Though he never published any thing himself, several of his works have appeared in the philosophical transactions and in the publications of Dr. Wallis and others. His son of the same name, published, 1708, a learned work, called Numismatum Antiquorum Sylloge, 4to. and died 1747, aged 72.

WRIGHT, Nathan, a learned lawyer, born at Barwell, Leicestershire. He was made lord keeper of the great seal on the removal of lord Somers; but though abused by Burnet as a strong Tory, devoted to party and fond of money, he adds, that he never was charged with bribery in his court. He was removed in 1705, and passed the rest of life in peaceful retirement at his seat at Caldecot hall, Warwickshire, where he died much respected, 4th Aug. 1721.

WRIGHT, Samuel, a dissenting minister, born Jan. 30th, 1683, at Retford, Notts. He settled in London, where he acquired some reputation as an eloquent and fluent preacher. He published about 40 single sermons, but his best known work is his Treatise on the New Birth, or the being born again, without which it is impossible to enter the kingdom of God. He died 3d April, 1746, at his house, Newington Green.

WRIGHT, Edward, a mathematician of Cambridge, who attended the earl of Cumberland in his expedition to the Azores in 1589. He wrote the Errors of Navigation corrected, 1599, a work of merit—Treatises on the Sphere—on Dialling—Haven-finding Art, and he also constructed a table of Meridional Parts, and tables of the Sun's Declination. He died about 1620.

WRIGHT, Edward, an English writer, who attended lord Macclesfield in his travels in 1720-2, of which he wrote an account called Observations, &c. 2 vols. 4to. an interesting work, though written in inelegant language.

WRIGHT, Abraham, a native of London, educated at Oxford, where he was public orator. During the civil wars he lived as tutor in several respectable families, and died rector of Oakham church, 1690. He wrote Deliciae Deliciarum—Commentary on the Psalms—on the Pentateuch—sermons—a collection of poems, or Parnassus Biceps, &c.

WRIGHT, Joseph, a native of Derby, eminent as a painter. He was the pupil of Hudson, and in 1773, visited Italy to improve himself. Two years after he returned to England and died in his native town, 1797, aged 63. His landscapes and historical pieces are highly valued.

WRIGHT, Paul, an English divine, educated at Pembroke hall, Cambridge. He obtained Oakley vicarage, and Burden chapel, Essex, and Snoreham rectory, 1739, on the presentation of the governors of Bridewell, St. Thomas, and the other city hospitals. He republished, in 1774, Heylyn's Help to English History, 8vo.; but his Chauncey's History of St. Alban's, for which he had printed proposals, and received subscriptions, never appeared. A Family Bible with notes was published under his name. He died 1785.

WRIGHT, sir James, governor of Georgia, was the last who held that office under the royal government. He had been agent for South Carolina in England, and in 1760 was appointed chief justice of that province and lieutenant-governor of Georgia. In 1764 he was appointed governor, and in 1772 created a baronet. His long administration was distinguished by wisdom and prudence, and the colony flourished under it in an unprecedented degree. He was, however, avaricious, and devoted to the wishes of the king. At the commencement of the revolution, a contest for the supreme authority was kept up by him and the popular leaders, until January, 1776, when he was taken prisoner. He soon after found means to escape on board the Scarborough, a British ship. He returned in July, 1779, and resumed the government, but it was for a short time. Independence was established, the royal authority ceased, and the large estates acquired by him in Georgia were confiscated.

WURMSER, Dagobert Sigismund, count, field-marshal in the service of Austria, was a native of Alsace. After being five years in the French armies, he enlisted in the service of the emperor, and by his merit and valour, rose to the highest ranks. He was, in 1793, commissioned to cover the siege of Mentz, and he soon after attacked the Weissemburg lines, while the duke of Brunswick fell on the left of the French army, and prince Waldeck on the right. Victorious in his attack, he pushed his conquest into Alsace, and took Hagenau, Drusenheim, &c. These advantages were counterbalanced by the fatal battle of Trischweiler, in which he was defeated; but the following year he repaired his losses by the taking of Manheim. In 1796 he hastened to the relief of Mantua, and for two successive days defeated the French on the borders of the lake of Guarda. The fortune of Bonaparte, however, prevailed against him at Castiglione, Montechiaro, and Lodano, and afterwards at Roveredo, and at the Brenta, and after the severest losses, he penetrated through the enemy, and threw himself into Mantua. After the most determined resistance, Mantua, reduced by famine and by sickness, surrendered, 2d Feb. 1797, to the conqueror on the most honourable terms. The aged commander retired to Vienna, where he was received with the honour which his services and his years deserved, and he was appointed governor of Hungary, where he died Aug. 1797, aged above 80.

WYAT, sir Thomas, a learned courtier in the service of Henry VIII. He was born of a respectable family in Kent, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, which he afterwards quitted for Oxford. He was knighted by Henry, and his abilities usefully employed in various embassies on the continent. He was author of several poems, printed in 1565, with those of his friend the earl of Surrey. He was the first who turned into English metre, David's Psalms. He died 1541, aged 38.

On the 22d of March, 1622, the Indians commenced the execution of a plot to exterminate the English, and on that day three hundred and forty-nine persons* were destroyed at the various plantations, six of whom were members of the council. Jamestown was preserved, in consequence of the friendship of a young Indian who communicated the design to his master. This sanguinary event was followed by a retaliatory war, which was carried on with great ferocity, and which created a deadly hostility in the minds of the savages towards the colonists. On the death of his father he returned to Ireland in 1625, and was succeeded by Yearley. Under the administration of Wyatt, the first courts were established, and a general assembly convened, by which the first laws were passed which are to be found in the records of the colony. In 1639 he was again governor. He succeeded sir John Harvey, and continued in office until the arrival of sir William Berkeley.

WYATT, James, an architect was born at Burton in Staffordshire about 1743. He went to Rome, and there studied the principles of architecture and painting under Visentini. On his return to England he was employed to build the Pantheon in Oxford-street, which fixed his reputation, and when sir William Chambers died he was appointed surveyor-general to the Board of Works. He also became a member of the Royal Academy, and sat as president of that institution for some time. He died in consequence of the overturning of a carriage, Sept. 5, 1813.—W. B.

WYCHERLEY, William, an eminent comic writer, born at Cleve, in Shropshire, 1640. At the age of 15 he went to France, where he embraced the Roman catholic tenets, and on his return home, in 1660, he resided at Oxford, though he was not admitted member of the university. He afterward returned to the protestant faith, and entered at the Middle Temple, but soon preferred the labours of literature to the dry studies of the law. In the course of 10 years he produced four comedies; Love in a Wood—the Gentleman Dancing Master—Plain Dealer—and Country Wife, printed together in 1712, and the popularity of these pieces recommended him to the notice of the great, the witty and the fair. He was noticed not only by Villiers, duke of Buckingham, and by the dutchess of Cleveland, who admitted him to the last degree of intimacy, but by Charles II. who visited him when ill, at his private apartments, and enabled him to remove to the south of France for the recovery of his health. On his return Wycherly was offered by the king, the place of governor to his son, with an ample salary; but his marriage with the widowed countess of Drogheda, soon after offended his royal patron, and involved him in difficulties. Though the countess, who was jealously fond of him to a ridiculous degree, bestowed on him all her property, yet at her death, which happened soon after, his right to the succession was disputed, and in consequence of law-suits, he was thrown into prison by his unfeeling creditors. Here he languished for seven long years, till James II. going to see the Plain Dealer, was so pleased with the play, that he offered to pay the debts of the unfortunate author, and settled an annuity of 200*l.* on him. Wycherley, however, from false delicacy, was ashamed to give an account of his debts, and thus still continued involved in distress. Though averse to the troubles of a married life, he wished, as one of his biographers has informed us, to die married, and with this singular passion, in his old age, he took for his second wife a young lady worth 1500*l.* and died eleven days after, 1st Jan. 1715. He was buried in a vault of Covent-garden church. Besides his comedies he wrote some poems, a folio volume of which appeared 1704, and his posthumous works, in prose and verse, were published in 1728, by L. Theobald, 8vo.

WYCKE, Thomas, a native of Haerlem, eminent as a painter. His sea-ports, and his marine views which he drew in Italy, were highly admired. He died 1686, aged 70. His son John was an able artist. He resided for some years in London, where he assisted sir Godfrey Kneller. His paintings of battles, and especially of horses, displayed superior excellence. He died in London 1702, aged 62.

WYKEHAM, William of, a celebrated prelate, born at Wykeham in Hampshire, 1324. Though his parents were respectable, yet they were poor; but domestic difficulties were forgotten in the liberal patronage of Nicolas Uvedale, lord of the manor of Wykeham, and governor of Winchester, who provided for his education and made him his secretary. By degrees he rose in the estimation of his friend, and was recommended to the notice of Edward III., who appointed him surveyor of his works in the castle and park of Windsor. By his advice this commanding situation was adorned with new buildings, and the present magnificent structure erected; but the inscription of "this made Wykeham," placed on the palace, threatened ruin to the favourite. While, however, his enemies interpreted the ambiguous sentence to his discredit by reading it backward, Wykeham assured his master, that, instead of arrogating to himself the glory of the edifice, he wished posterity to know that the favour of the king, and the care of the building, had raised him from a low situation to an exalted fortune. Thus reconciled to Edward, he rose in consequence, and when in orders he obtained the rectory of Pulham, Norfolk, and after other preferments, he was advanced, in 1366, to the see of Winchester. He was besides, chief warden and surveyor of the king's castles, warden of the forests, keeper of the privy seal, and afterwards secretary to the king. In 1367 he was appointed chancellor of England, and continued in the high office till 1371, when he was deprived of it by the representation of the parliament, who inveighed against the too extensive power of the ecclesiastics. Though much engaged in affairs of state, he paid particular attention to the business of his diocese; abuses were redressed, improvements in the regulation and discipline of the church introduced, and the houses and palaces belonging to the see repaired. With the most munificent intentions also for the encouragement of learning and piety, the bishop determined to appropriate the large possessions which he had acquired by the favour of his sovereign, in the endowment of two colleges. In 1373 a school was established at Winchester; but his noble designs were interrupted by the jealousy or persecution of the duke of Lancaster, who accused him before the king as guilty of various misdemeanors, till the attachment of the people, and the interference of the clergy, restored him to the favour of the monarch, and to the possession of his see. Under the weak reign of Richard II. he laboured assiduously to effect his noble purpose, and under the king's patent, New college, Oxford, was begun in 1380, and finished 1386, and Winchester begun the following year, and completed in 1393. The virtuous prelate enjoyed the gratification of seeing, before his death, his two noble foundations flourish, and his example was followed soon after by his scholar Chicheley, who founded All-Souls, and by Henry VI., who, on the same plan, founded the colleges of Eton, and of King, Cambridge. Wykeham died at South Waltham, 17th Sept. 1404, and was buried in his own oratory in Winchester cathedral. Little is known of the private character of this great founder; but if he had any failings, they were obscured in that spirit of beneficence and of charity which, in his two noble establishments, has so largely contributed to the advancement of literature, and of happiness through the nation. His life has been written by Lowth, who thus has paid a becoming tribute of praise and gratitude to the memory of the illustrious prelate, by whose munificence his education had been formed at Winchester and at Oxford.

WYLLYS, George, descended from Richard Wyllys, of Knapton in Warwickshire, England, who lived in the reign of Henry

IV., migrated in 1638 from that country to America, and established his residence at Hartford, Connecticut. At the first election under the constitution adopted by all the free planters of the colony, on the 14th of January, 1639, he was chosen one of the six persons called magistrates, who, with the governor, were to exercise the principal functions of government, legislative, judicial, and executive. In 1641 he was chosen deputy governor, and in 1642, governor, of the colony. He died in March 1644. He was distinguished for the fervour of his piety, the purity of his life, and the simplicity of his manners; his love of civil and religious liberty, and his exactness in the discharge of social and public duties. ☞ L.

WYLLS, Samuel, son of the preceding, born in England in 1632, was educated at Harvard college, where he graduated in 1653. In 1654 he was elected one of the magistrates under the constitution. In this office and the corresponding one of assistant, under the charter of Charles II. he was continued, by annual elections, for about thirty years. Eminent in piety, prudence, and wisdom, he died May 30th, 1709. It was during his life, that the charter was concealed in the body of a large oak-tree, then hollow, on his estate in front of his house, to secure it from Sir Edmund Andross. This tree has since been called the charter oak; and after adding nearly a century and a half to its age, it remains, in 1824, undecayed, and with even renovated vigour. ☞ L.

WYLLS, Hezekiah, son of the preceding, being bred a merchant in Boston, established himself in mercantile business in Hartford, which, however, he soon relinquished for public employment. In 1712 he was elected secretary of the colony, and continued in that office until his death in 1734. ☞ L.

WYLLS, George, son of the preceding, born October 6th, 1710, educated at Yale college, where he graduated in 1729, was appointed by the general assembly, to perform the functions of secretary during the illness of his father, in the years 1730, 1731, 1732, 1733, and 1734; and in 1735, was elected secretary by the people. In this office he was continued by annual popular elections until his death, on the 24th of April 1796. Rarely has there been in any age, a more remarkable instance of a sound mind united to a sound body. During a period extending through more than two entire generations of men, he attended every session of the legislature, and performed his official duties. Discernment and wisdom were the characteristics of his mind. But his whole character, rather than any particular traits, caused him to be universally esteemed as a great and good man. ☞ L.

WYLLS, Samuel, son of the preceding, was born January 15th, 1739, and educated at Yale college, where he graduated in 1758. In 1775 the legislature of Connecticut appointed him lieutenant colonel of general Spencer's regiment; and in January, 1776, congress appointed him colonel of a regiment in the Connecticut line, on the continental establishment, in which capacity he served with reputation, through the war of the revolution. After the peace, he was employed, by his native town, in several civil offices, and as a representative in the general assembly. He was also appointed brigadier, and afterwards major general, in the militia of the state. In May, 1796, he succeeded his father as secretary of the state, and continued in that office until the year 1809, when he was induced, by a paralytic affection, to resign it. He died June 9th, 1823. He, with his father, and grandfather, held the office of secretary ninety-eight successive years; a fact probably without a parallel in the history of republics. ☞ L.

WYNANTZ, John, a native of Haerlem, eminent as a painter. He was the master of Wouvermans and Vander Velde, and in the use of his pencil he acquired celebrity and independence. His landscapes were much admired. He died 1670, aged 70.

WYNDHAM, sir William, an eminent statesman, born about 1637. From Eton school he went to Christ-church, and afterwards travelled over the continent for improvement and information. On his return he was chosen member of parliament for Somersetshire, and continued to represent that county till his death. His abilities were so highly respectable, that in the change of ministry in 1710, he was appointed master of the queen's hounds, and afterwards made secretary of state, and in 1713 chancellor of the exchequer. Under George I. he was removed from his offices, and soon after appeared in the ranks of opposition, and ably vindicated the conduct of the duke of Ormond, and of lords Oxford and Strafford. On the breaking out of the rebellion, in 1715, he fell under the suspicion of government, but though he escaped from his pursuers, he at last surrendered himself, and was sent a prisoner to the tower. As he never was brought to trial, it is natural to infer, that no guilt could attach to his conduct, and that the violence of the times, and not a participation in disloyal acts, produced his temporary disgrace. He died at Wells, after a few days' illness, 17th June, 1740. Pope has well painted the great powers of his eloquence in these lines:
*Wyndham, just to freedom and the throne,
The master of our passions, and his own.*

WYNDHAM, Henry Penruddock, an ingenious gentleman, was born in Wiltshire in 1736, and educated at Wadham college, Oxford, where he took the degree of master of arts in 1759. He became knight of the shire for his native county; and was a member of the Royal and Antiquarian societies. He died at Salisbury in 1819. His publications are—1. A tour through Monmouthshire and Wales, 4to. 2. The Diary of George Bubb Doddington, baron of Melcombe Regis, 8vo. 3. Wiltshire, extracted from the Domesday Book, 4to. 4. A picture of the Isle of Wight, 8vo.—W. B.

WYTHE, George, chancellor of Virginia, was born in the county of Elizabeth city, in 1726. His mother possessed uncommon strength of mind and knowledge, and taught him the Latin language. His education in other respects was defective. At the age of thirty he abandoned a course of dissipation to which he had addicted himself, and devoted his attention to the acquisition of knowledge. After accomplishing himself in the languages and sciences, he studied law, and commenced its practice. At the opening of the revolution, he, with Pendleton, Henry, Mason, and the Lees, espoused the cause of liberty, and was one of the ablest of the distinguished men who were the leaders in Virginia during that struggle. He was for some time speaker of the house of burgesses, and in 1775 elected a member of congress, and signed the declaration of independence. In 1776 he was appointed one of the committee to revise the laws of Virginia, and had a principal share in preparing the code which with some alterations was adopted in 1779. He was soon after appointed one of the three judges of the high court of chancery, and afterwards sole chancellor, in which station he continued till his death. He was a member of the convention of Virginia which considered the constitution of the United States, and exerted his influence to obtain its adoption; and he was twice one of the electors of president and vice-president of the United States. He died in 1806, on the 8th of June; it was supposed by poison. Chancellor Wythe was one of the most eminent of the great statesmen and jurists among his cotemporaries. His mind was uncommonly vigorous and rapid in its perceptions, his knowledge of law profound, his uprightness and impartiality pre-eminent, and his patriotism ardent. He was unambitious of wealth, plain and frugal in his method of life, and condescending and amiable in his manners.

WYTMAN, Matthew, a native of Goreum, eminent as a painter of landscapes, animals, and conversations. He died 1689, aged 49.

WYVIL, Robert, a bishop of Salisbury, who is known in history for defending his right to Salisbury castle, by producing a champion to fight in single combat against the champion of his opponent William Montacute, earl of Salisbury. The king interfered, and the dispute was at last amicably settled. The bishop presided over his see 46 years, and died 1375.

XAN

XACCA, an Indian philosopher, born at Sica. He was the legislator of the Japanese, and flourished, it is said, a thousand years before the Christian era. His memory is regarded with particular honour in China, where he is placed in the number of the gods.

XACCA, Erasmus, a Sicilian of the 17th century, who wrote an account, in Italian, of the eruption of Mount Etna in 1669—besides a didactic poem, in Latin, on Fevers—Brevis Expositio in Psalmos et Cantica Cantica.—Tasso's Jerusalem translated into Latin verse.

XANTIPPE, wife of Socrates, was remarkable for her moroseness and violence of temper. It is said that the philosopher was acquainted with her character before he married her, and that he took her for his wife more severely to exercise his patience.

XANTIPPUS, a Lacedæmonian, sent to the assistance of the Carthaginians against Regulus and the Romans. Though he defeated the enemy, he was ordered to be thrown into the sea on his return home by the cruel ingratitude of the Carthaginians.

XEN

XAUPI, Joseph, a native of Perpignan, author of a Funeral Oration on Louis XIV.—Historical Researches on the Citizens of Perpignan—two Dissertations, &c. He was an ecclesiastic, and died at Paris universally respected, 7th Dec. 1778, aged 90.

XAVIER, Jerome, a Jesuit, who was missionary in the East Indies, and died at Goa 1617. He wrote History of Jesus Christ, and of Peter, in Portuguese, &c.

XENOCRATES, a philosopher of Chalcedon, the disciple of Plato. He was so illustrious for wisdom and integrity, that the judges dispensed with his oath in a court of justice. He died B. C. 314.

XENOPHANES, a Greek philosopher in the age of Socrates. He was of opinion that the moon was an inhabited globe, &c.

XENOPHON, a celebrated Greek historian, born at Athens. He was the pupil and the friend of Socrates, and he distinguished himself in war as the follower of Cyrus, and the active guide of the Greeks in their return from the battle of Cunaxa. His History of Cyrus the Great, and of the expedition of the younger Cyrus, and other works, are well known. He died at Corinth, B. C. 360.

XENOPHON, a writer of Ephesus in the beginning of the 4th century. He is author of the Loves of Abrocomas and Anthia, a romance of some merit.

XERXES, king of Persia, son of Darius Hystaspes, is celebrated for his expedition against Greece. Though accompanied by about five million of souls, he was defeated by the valour of the Greeks, and the battles of Thermopylæ and Salamis convinced him that the conquest of the country was impossible. He retired in disgrace to Persia, and was slain by Artabanus, B. C. 465. His weeping at the sight of his numerous armies, because not one man of them would survive a 100 years, is mentioned by historians as a proof of the goodness and benevolence of his heart.

XIMENES, Roderick, a native of Navarre, archbishop of Toledo. He laid claim to the primacy in preference to the see of Compostella, at the council of Lyons, 1247, before Innocent IX. and his rights were confirmed. He wrote a Spanish history of little merit.

XIMENES, Francis, a celebrated ecclesiastic, born at Torrelaguna in Old Castile, 1437. He was educated at Alcalá and at Salamanca, and afterwards went to Rome, where he could obtain no patronage. He became grand vicar to Gonzales de Mendoza, bishop of Siquenza, and afterwards his wisdom, his learning, and his knowledge of oriental literature, and of theology, procured him friends, and recommended him to the notice of queen Isabella, who named him archbishop of Toledo, 1495. Thus placed at the head of the Spanish church, he bent his thoughts to the reformation of his clergy, and to the more pure and impartial administration of temporal and ecclesiastical affairs through his diocess. He was raised to the purple by Julius II. 1507, and he was intrusted by Ferdinand with the affairs of the government, as prime minister. Not satisfied with the power which he exercised over the state, he was ambitious of military glory, and at his own expense he prepared an expedition against Oran in Africa, which he took from the Moors after displaying great marks of bravery and heroic presence of mind. Ferdinand, who was afraid of his power, appointed him, on his death-bed, regent of the kingdom, during the minority of Charles V. and Ximenes exercised this authority not only with wisdom but with severity, and thus raised the complaints of the nobles against his administration. He despised, however, their clamours, satisfied in the good opinion of his sovereign, and in the support of the people to whom he granted great and important privileges. While thus labouring for the glory of his country, this virtuous minister was poisoned in eating trout, and died two months after, 8th Nov. 1517, aged 81. He was buried in the college of St. Ildefonse at Alcalá, of which he was the munificent founder, and these remarkable lines are engraved on his tomb:

Contideram musis Franciscus grande Lycæum,

Condor in exiguo nunc ego sarcophago.

Prætextam junxi sacco, galeamque galero.

Frater, dux, præsul, cardineusque pater.

In his character Ximenes was noble and patriotic, the friend of virtue and of merit, the protector of innocence, and the active and generous promoter of industry. He was himself learned, and by his munificence he caused the famous Complutensian Polyglott Bible to be published in his newly erected university of Alcalá. This national work, which was begun in 1514, was completed in 1517, in 6 vols. fol. and in four languages. The work is now very scarce. He also caused to be published the Missal, and the Breviary Mosarabe, under the care of Ortiz. An account of his life has been published by Alvaro Gomez in Spanish, and by Flechier in French.

XIMENES, Joseph Albert, a Spanish ecclesiastic, prior general of the Carmelites. He died 1774, aged 55. He published the two last volumes of the Bulls of his order.

XYLANDER, William, a native of Augsburg, who though born of poor parents, rose to distinction by his abilities. He was educated in the university of Augsburg, and afterwards at Tubingen and Basil, by the friendship of Relinger, a senator of Augsburg, and in 1558 he was invited to fill a Greek professor's chair at Heidelberg. He was in 1566 appointed secretary to the assembly of divines, who held a conference on the eucharist, and he a second time filled the same honourable office in 1581. His great application hastened his death, which happened Feb. 1576, in his 43d year. He was the translator of Dion Cassius, of Marcus Antoninus, of Plutarch, and of Strabo, into Latin, but as he wrote for bread, the execution of these laborious works is occasionally careless and faulty.

XYPHILIN, John, called of Trebizond, from the place of his birth, was made patriarch of Constantinople 1064, and died 1075. He wrote a sermon preserved in the Bibliothecque of the fathers. His nephew of the same name wrote an abridgment of the history of Dion Cassius in Greek 1592, folio, which begins at the 32d book, and is written with little elegance. The work containing the history of the emperors to the time of Alexander, son of Mammaea, is generally printed with Dion Cassius.

YALDEN, Thomas, an English poet, born at Exeter 1671. He was educated at Magdalen college school, and after being commoner of Magdalen hall, he obtained a scholarship at Magdalen college, where he had for his fellow-students Addison and Sacheverell. He published an Ode on the taking of Namur, and a poem on the death of the duke of Gloucester, and in 1710, obtained a fellowship in his college, and the following year was presented to a small living in Warwickshire. In 1706, he was received into the duke of Beaufort's family, and the next year he took his degree of D.D. and resigned his fellowship. He afterwards obtained the contiguous livings of Chalton, and Cleanville, in Hertfordshire, and the sinecures of Deans, Hains, and Pendles, in Devonshire, and lived in peaceful retirement till the nation was alarmed by the pretended plot of bishop Atterbury. As Dr. Yalden had been intimate with Kelly, the prelate's secretary, he was regarded as an accomplice, and arrested, but as no direct charge could be made against him, except a treasonable explanation of the words "thorough paced doctrines" discovered in his pocket-book, he was set at liberty. He died 16th July, 1736. He wrote besides, Hymn to Light—Hymn to Darkness, his best poem, &c. His works, says his biographer, deserve perusal, though they are not always polished. His faults are rather omissions of idleness, than the negligence of enthusiasm.

YALE, Elihu, the principal benefactor of Yale college, was born in New-Haven, Connecticut, in 1648. He went to England while young, and about the year 1678 to the East-Indies, where he acquired a large fortune, both by his industry, and by marriage to an Indian lady of wealth, and became governor of fort St. George. On his return to England he was chosen governor of the East-India company. He presented donations to the college then recently established in New-Haven, in 1714, 1718, and 1721, amounting in all to about 400 pounds sterling; in commemoration of which, the college bears his name. He died in Wales, July 8th, 1721. ☞ L.

YART, Anthony, an ecclesiastic, born at Rouen, 1709. He is author of the Idea of English poetry, in 8 vols. 12mo. 1756, a work of merit, which has made known to the French nation, the labours of several English poets. He wrote besides some poems, and was happy in his epigrams.

YEAMANS, Sir John, governor of South Carolina, was the son of an alderman of Bristol, who was executed for attempting to deliver the city to the king's forces during the civil war; and was created a baronet from respect to his father's loyalty.

Sir John was himself a cavalier, but his poverty induced him to seek his fortune in Barbadoes. In 1665 he joined a company of emigrants from that island who purchased and formed a settlement on a tract of land in Carolina, named Clarendon county. He was elected governor of the colony, and on the death of governor Sayle of Carteret county, he claimed the same office there as vice-palatine, under the constitution of 1669. The council resisted his claims, and appointed Joseph West. In August, 1671, Yeamans received from the proprietors the appointment of governor of the southern county. From this time there were but two governments in Carolina. Sir John had ruled a small colony with prudence and moderation, but became violent, unjust, and tyrannical, when he governed people by whom he had not been chosen, and was removed from office, but continued to reside in the colony until his death. He first introduced slaves into Carolina from Barbadoes, previous to which, there were no labourers in the colony but Europeans. ☞ L.

YEARDLY, Sir George, was left at the head of the administration of Virginia, on the return of Sir Thomas Dale to England in 1616. He indulged the people in the cultivation of tobacco, in preference to corn, which he compelled the natives to furnish by way of tribute. He was succeeded by Argal in 1617, who, having incurred the displeasure of the people and the proprietors, was superseded, and Yeardly appointed governor-general in 1619. In that year the first general assembly met in Virginia: many important improvements were made during his administration, and the power, population, and respectability of the colony much increased. He was prudent, humane, and faithful; and under many embarrassments conducted so as to secure the favour of his employers, and the esteem of the people. His commission expired in Nov. 1621, when he was succeeded by Wyatt; but still continued to reside in the country, and was afterwards a member of the council. When Wyatt returned to England in 1625, the administration again devolved on Yeardly. He died the following year, and was succeeded by Sir John Harvey. ☞ L.

YORKE, Philip. Vid. HARDWICKE.

YOUNG, Patrick, a Scotchman, educated at St. Andrew's, and incorporated to the degree of M.A. at Oxford, 1605. He was well skilled in Greek literature, and was employed as librarian to the king, at St. James's palace. He published St. Clement's Epistle to the Romans, in Greek and Latin, 1637, and he also undertook, but did not finish, the printing of the Septuagint from the Alexandrian MS. presented to the first Charles, by Cyril Lucar. He died 1652.

YOUNG, Robert, a native of Edinburgh, who succeeded the well-known Andrew Hart, in the business of printer. When the troubles broke out in Scotland, he was banished for the violence of his conduct, and his printing-presses destroyed. He afterwards returned to Scotland, but was again banished for publishing some papers in favour of the parliament, and died abroad 1655, aged 62.

YOUNG, Edward, an English poet, born June 1681, at Upham near Winchester, the residence of his father of the same name, who was chaplain to William and Mary, and dean of Sarum, and who died 1705, aged 62, author of two vols. of sermons. He was educated at Winchester school, and in 1703, though superannuated, removed to New college, Oxford, which he left five years after on being chosen fellow of All Souls. He took his degree of LL.D. 1719. He first appeared before the public 1712, as author of an epistle to lord Lansdowne, in consequence of the unpopular creation of 10 peers, in one day by Queen Anne, and the next year he prefixed a recommendatory copy of verses to the Cato of Addison. Though distinguished in literary fame, he was prevailed upon by the duke of Wharton, his father's friend, to abandon the prospect of two livings, from his college, worth 600*l.* a year, and to engage in the tumult of a contested election, as a candidate at Cirencester, an event of which he was afterwards ashamed to the latest period of life. He took orders 1727, and soon after was appointed chaplain to the king, and he paid such respect to the decorum of his new profession, that he withdrew from the stage, his tragedy of the Two Brothers, which was already in rehearsal. He afterwards was presented by his college, to the living of Welwyn, Herts, and in 1739, he married lady Elizabeth Lee, daughter of the earl of Litchfield, and widow of colonel Lee, whom he had the misfortune to lose on the following year. To relieve himself from the heavy melancholy which this event brought upon him, he began his Night Thoughts, but though in this work he seemed to bid adieu to the world, he afterwards engaged in politics, by the publication of Reflections on the Public Situation of the Kingdom, and at the age of 80 he solicited further patronage from archbishop Secker, and was appointed clerk of the closet to the princess dowager. He died April, 1765. Besides his great work the Night Thoughts, he published a poem on the Last Day—Bu-siris, and the Revenge, tragedies—the Centaur not fabulous, a moral satire—Estimate of Human Life, a sermon—Conjectures on Original Composition—the Love of Fame, the universal passion—some papers in the Spectator, &c. As a poet, Young is highly respectable, his Night Thoughts abound with many sublime passages, and they are written in a strain of true genuine morality, though occasionally obscure. As a clergyman he was particularly exemplary, full of benevolence, goodness, and piety. He was buried by the side of his wife in his church, where a beautiful monument has been erected to his memory. His son survived him.

YOUNG, sir William, baronet, was born at Charlton-house, near Canterbury, Nov. 30, 1750. His father, sir William Young, who had been governor of St. Vincent's, died in 1788; and his mother was the daughter of Dr. Brook Taylor. He was educated at Eton, from whence he removed to Clare-hall, Cambridge; but after a short stay there, he went to University college, Oxford, under the tuition of Dr. now Sir William Scott. Having studied there three years, he went on his travels through France, Italy, and Sicily. Of part of this tour, he printed an account for the gratification of his friends, but it was never published. In 1774, he returned to England; and during the American war served in the militia. In 1783, he was returned to parliament for St. Mawes; and in 1786, he was elected a member of the Royal Society. He succeeded his father in 1783; and in 1807 was appointed governor of Tobago, where he died in 1815. Sir William published—1. The Spirit of Athens, 8vo.; this he afterwards enlarged and reprinted, under the title of the "History of Athens," 4to. 2. A tract on the Poor Laws. 3. The Rights of Englishmen. 4. A Letter to Mr. Pitt, on the Poor and Workhouses. 5. The West-India Commonplace-Book, 4to. 6. Contemplatio Philosophica; a posthumous piece of Dr. Brook Taylor's, with a memoir of the author. He was twice married, and left issue, four sons and two daughters.—W. B.

YOUNG, Arthur, an agriculturist, was the son of the preceding, and born in 1741. He served his apprenticeship to a wine-merchant; but on entering into the possession of his paternal estate, he became a farmer; and impoverished himself by experiments. After this he set up as a teacher of others; and in 1770 published a volume called "The Farmer's Calendar;" which was followed by a periodical work, entitled "The Annals of Agriculture," in which he had the honour of having his late majesty for a correspondent. Mr. Young also made excursions through the British islands and on the continent, to collect information on subjects of rural economy. At length a board of agriculture was established, of which he was appointed secretary, with a salary of six hundred a year:

but what other benefits this institution may have produced, the world has yet to learn. Mr. Young became blind some years before his death, which happened Feb. 20th, 1820. His works are numerous, and his Travels amusing.—W. B.

YRIARTE, Don John d', a native of Teneriffe, who studied at Paris and Rouen, and afterwards became librarian to the king of Spain, at Madrid. He was also, in consequence of his extensive learning, made member of the royal Spanish academy, and interpreter to the Spanish secretary of state. He was author of a Greek Palæographia, 4to.—Miscellaneous Works in Spanish, 2 vols. 4to.—a catalogue of Greek MSS. in the Spanish king's library—Catalogue of Arabic MSS. in the Escorial, 2 vols. fol. &c. He died 1771, aged 69, much and deservedly regretted.

YSE, Alexander de, protestant professor of theology, at Die, in Dauphiné, in the age of Lewis XIV. was deprived of his ecclesiastical honours on suspicion of favouring the Romish church, and died in retirement in Piedmont. He wrote some theological works.

YVON, Peter, a native of Montauban, in Languedoc, known as the follower of Labadie. He accompanied this enthusiast of Holland, and Middleburg, and acquired some celebrity, as a preacher among the Labadists, and as a writer, on mystical subjects.

ZAC

ZABARELLA, Francis, better known by the name of cardinal de Florence, was a native of Padua. He studied the law at Bologna, and then became professor in that science at Padua, and when the city was besieged by the Venetians in 1406, he was deputed as ambassador to implore the assistance of France. Unable to succeed in his application, he retired to Florence, and afterwards was invited to Rome by pope John XXIII. who not only appointed him archbishop of Florence, but raised him to the rank of cardinal, and sent him in 1413 as his ambassador to the emperor Sigismund, at the council of Constance. He died there 26th Sept. 1417, aged 78, and in respect to his learning and virtues, his funeral was attended by the emperor and all the members of the council. He was author of Commentaries on the Decretals, &c. 6 vols. folio—harangues—letters—Acta in Conciliis, &c.

ZABARELLA, Bartholomew, nephew of the preceding, was professor of law at Padua, and afterwards became archbishop of Florence. He died 1442, aged 46, respected for his learning and piety.

ZABARELLA, James, son of the preceding, was born at Padua 1553, and died there 1589. He was well acquainted with the philosophy of Aristotle, and became philosophical professor at Padua, where he published Commentaries on Aristotle's works, folio. He wrote besides, a treatise de Inventione Æterni Motoris, 4to. &c.

ZACAGNI, Lawrence Alexander, a native of Rome, who devoted himself laboriously to literature. He was employed in the care of the Vatican, and published Collectanea Monumentorum Veterum Ecclesiæ Græcæ et Latinæ, 1698. He died about 1720.

ZAL

ZACHIAS, Paul, a native of Rome, who studied medicine, belles lettres, music, and painting, and was patronised by pope Innocent X. to whom he was physician. He published Quæstiones Medico-Legales, 3 vols. folio, 1726, Lyons—and some Italian tracts. He died 1659, aged 75.

ZATCH LEEVEN, Herman, a native of Rotterdam, who died at Utrecht, 1685, aged 77. He was eminent as a painter, and his landscapes, in which he introduces distant objects to great advantage, are much admired.

ZACUTUS or LUSITANUS, a Jewish physician, born at Lisbon. He studied at Salamanca and Coimbra, and took his medical degrees at Morvedra, and practised at Lisbon, which he quitted 1624, in consequence of the edict of Philip IV. against the Jews. He retired to Holland, and died at Amsterdam, 1641, aged 66. His medical works in Latin, were printed at Lyons, 2 vols. folio, 1649. His grandfather was a native of Salamanca, who became famous in Portugal for his great knowledge of chronology and history, on which he wrote Juchasin, a work of Jewish chronology from the creation to the 1500th year of the vulgar era.

ZALEUCUS, a legislator of Locris in Italy, B.C. 500. He was so strict in the execution of the laws, that when his son was guilty of adultery, a crime which was punished by the loss of both eyes, he caused one of his own eyes, and one of his offending son's, to be put out.

ZALUSKI, Andrew Chrysostom, a native of Poland, who, after visiting the Low Countries, France, and Italy, took orders, and became bishop of Warmia, and grand chancellor of Poland. He was for some time ambassador in Spain and Portugal, and died 1711, aged 61. He was author of some Latin letters, which are valuable for the information which they contain concerning Poland, and the rest of Europe.

ZAMOSKI, John, son of Stanislaus Castellan, of Chelme, a town of Red Russia, studied at Paris and Padua. He made such progress in literature, that he was elected rector of Padua, and he afterwards returned to Poland, where he rose to honourable offices, and was employed as ambassador to France. On the election of Stephen Battori to the Polish throne, he married the new monarch's niece, and became chancellor of the kingdom, and general of the Polish armies. In these high offices Zamoski behaved with judgment and valour; he repressed the attacks of Basilides, czar of Muscovy, and delivered from his yoke the provinces of Polesia, Volesia, and Livonia. On the death of Battori, 1586, his services strongly recommended him to the Polish nobles, but he refused the crown, and placed it on the head of Sigismund of Sweden. This illustrious chief, who deserved the appellation of defender of his country, and of protector of science, died 1605. He was a munificent patron of letters, and in the town which he built and which bears his name, he founded a university. He wrote while at Padua, two treatises on the Roman Senate—and on the Perfect Senator.

ZAMPINI, Matthew, a native of Recanati, who came to France with Catharine de Medicis, and there supported by his writings the cause of the league. He wrote de Origine et Atavis H. Capeti, &c. 1581, &c.

ZANCHIUS, Jerome, a native of Alzano, who entered in the congregation of the Lateran canons. He embraced the tenets of the protestants by the conversation of Peter the Martyr, who was of the same establishment, and afraid of persecution, he retired, 1553, to Strasburg, where he taught divinity and the philosophy of Aristotle. He quitted Strasburg in 1563, for Chiavene, and in 1568 removed to Heidelberg, where he was appointed professor of theology, and where he died 19th Nov. 1590. He was author of Commentaries on St. Paul's Epistles, and other works, published together at Geneva, in 8 vols. folio, 1613. In his character he was a man of moderation, learned, benevolent, and pious.

ZANNICHELLI, John Jerome, a native of Modena, who became distinguished as a physician. He died 11th Jan. 1729, at the age of 67, at Venice, where he had settled, and practised with great celebrity. He wrote Catalogus Plantarum Terrestrium, Marinarum, &c. 1711—Promptuarium Re- mediorum Chymicorum, Svo.—de Myriophyllo Pelagico—Lithographia duorum Montium Veronensium, &c.—de Rusco ejusque Preparatione, Svo.—Opuscula Botanica, 4to.—History of Plants near Venice, folio. His labours in botanical researches were improved by his son John James, who also was a man of erudition.

ZANNONI, James, a physician of Bologna, who acquired great celebrity as a botanist. He added several curious plants to the catalogue of botany, and published Historia Botanica, fol. 1675—Rariorum Stirpium Historia, folio. He died about 1682.

ZANOTTI, John Peter, a native of Paris, known as an eminent painter. He studied at Bologna, where his picture of St. Thomas is much admired. He wrote the life of his master Pasinelli.

ZANOTTI, Francis Maria Garazzoni, a native of Bologna, educated among the Jesuits. After studying the law for some time, he applied himself to mathematics under Beccari, and became mathematical professor at Bologna, and secretary to the senate. He introduced the study of the Newtonian philosophy in the university instead of the system of Des Cartes, and acquired such respectability as a professor, that he was in 1766 made president of the institution, of which he had been for some years librarian. Besides two catalogues of the library of the institute, he published some poetical and philosophical works, and died 1777, aged 85.

ZANZALUS, James, an obscure monk of the sixth century, became founder of the sect of the Jacobites, who consider the perfection of the Gospel to be the strict observance of fasts. They circumcise children, and acknowledge one nature and person only, in our Saviour, and reject the union of the divine and human nature in his body.

ZAPOLSKI, John de, Vaivode of Transylvania, was in consequence of his valour and services, elected king of Hungary 1526, after the death of Lewis II. He was opposed by Ferdinand of Austria, and supported by Solyman II. and at last he divided the kingdom with his rival 1536, and died four years after.

ZAPPI, John Baptist Felix, a native of Imola, who cultivated the profession of the law with success at Rome. He became acquainted with Carlo Maratti, whose daughter he married, and from his fondness for literature he became one of those who established the academy degli Arcadi at Rome. He died at Rome 1719, aged 52. Some of his verses have been published.

ZARATE, Augustin de, a Spaniard sent to Peru, 1543, as treasurer-general of the Indies. He afterwards was employed in the Low Countries, and in the Mint. He published History of the Discovery and Conquest of Peru, a work of merit, best edited at Antwerp, 8vo. 1555, and translated into French, 2 vols. 8vo. 1700, Paris, and Amsterdam.

ZARLINO, Joseph, of Chioggia, in the Venetian territory, wrote with great skill and judgment on music. His works have appeared in 4 vols. fol. 1589, and 1602, at Venice, where he died, 1599.

ZAZIUS, Hulric, a native of Constance, known for his abilities as professor of law. He died at Friburg, 1539, aged 74. He wrote Epitome in Usus Fcudales—Intellectus Legum Singulares, &c.

ZECARIAH, one of the minor prophets, was son of Barachias, the son of Addo, and prophesied in the reign of Darius Hystaspes. He encouraged his countrymen in the rebuilding of the temple, and he speaks in such plain terms of the Messiah, that his language appears more the language of a historian, than of a prophet.

ZEGEDIN, Stephen, a native of Zegedin, in Lower Hungary, was one of the first disciples of Luther. He was taken prisoner by the Turks, who treated him with great inhumanity, and on his liberation he became minister of Buda. He died at Keven 1572, aged 67. He wrote Speculum Romanorum Pontific. Historicum, 8vo.—Tabulæ Analyticæ in Prophetas, &c. fol.—Assertio de Trinitate, 8vo.

ZEILLER, Martin, a native of Styria, who became inspector of the schools in Germany, and died at Ulm, 1661, aged 73. He was author of Itinerary of Germany—Topography of Bavaria—of Suabia—of Alsace, &c.

ZELL, Ulric, a native of Hanau, eminent as a printer at Cologne. His treatise of St. Augustin de Vitâ Christ. et de Singularit. Christ. appeared 1477.

ZELOTTI, John Baptist, a painter of Verona, the pupil of Titian. He distinguished himself by the beauty of his colouring, the accuracy of his figures, and the elegant simplicity of his designs. He died 1592, aged 60.

ZENO, the founder of the stoic philosophy, was a native of Citium, in Cyprus. His school was one of the porticoes of Athens, whence the name of his sect. He defended suicide, and the principle of fatal necessity. He died B.C. 264.

ZENO, the Isaurian, emperor of the East, married Ariadne, the daughter of Leo I., and died 491, detested for his cruelty, avarice, and debauchery.

ZENO, Apostolo, a native of Venice, of illustrious birth. He early applied himself to literary pursuits, and in 1696 established the academy of Animosi, in his native country, and in 1710, began to publish that well-known work called the Giornale de

Literati, which he continued in thirty vols. to 1719. He afterwards went to reside at Vienna, at the invitation of the emperor Charles VI. to whom he was appointed poet and historiographer. After a residence of 10 years, during which he wrote several plays, for the entertainment of the imperial family, he quitted Vienna to return to Venice, and was succeeded in his appointments by Metastasio. This learned man, who was respected not only by his own countrymen, but by the literati of the age, died at Venice 11th Nov. 1750, aged 81. His works have been printed in 10 vols. 8vo. in Italian, 1744, and contain 63 poems, either tragedies, comedies, or pastoral. He wrote besides some tracts on antiquarian subjects—Dissertations on Vossius, 3 vols. 8vo.—Letters—Dissertation on Italian Historians, 2 vols. 4to. &c. Though a popular poet among the Italians, his pieces exhibit much confusion of plot, and unnecessary episodes, but his invention is striking, his delineations strong, and his dialogues spirited and interesting. He is compared by the French to Corneille, and his successor, Metastasio, to Racine.

ZENOBIA, queen of Palmyra, wife of Odenatus, was honoured by the Romans with the imperial title of Augusta. She derives not a little glory from her patronage of Longinus the celebrated critic. She was attacked by Aurelian the Roman emperor, who was jealous of her power, and she fell into the hands of her conqueror, and died in privacy near Rome.

ZEPHANIAH, one of the twelve minor prophets in the reign of king Josiah, 624 B.C. He foretold the destruction of Nineveh, and exhorted his countrymen to repentance.

ZERUBBABEL, son of Salathiel, was permitted by Cyrus, whose good opinion he had obtained, to rebuild the temple of Jerusalem. He adorned the new edifice with the vessels which had been plundered from the former temple and carried to Babylon, and the dedication took place 515 B.C.

ZEUXIS, a celebrated painter of Heraclea. His best piece was said to be a picture of Helen. His dispute about pre-eminence with Parrhasius is well known. He flourished about 350 B.C.

ZIANI, Sebastian, doge of Venice, is celebrated for his munificent labours, in embellishing his native city with the most splendid edifices, and adorning them with the best productions of arts. He flourished at the end of the 12th century.

ZIEGLER, James, professor of theology and mathematics at Vienna, was born at Lindau in Swabia, and died 1549. He was author of Notes on some Passages of Scripture, fol.—Description of the Holy Land, fol. 1536—de Constructione Solidæ Spheræ, 4to. a Commentary on Pliny's second Book

ZIEGLER, Gaspar, a native of Leipsic, professor of law at Wittemberg, where he died 1690, aged 69. He wrote de Militæ Episcopo—de Diaconis, &c.—de Clero—de Episcopis—Critical Notes on Grotius de Belli et Pacis Jure, &c.

ZIEGLER, Bernard, a native of Misnia, professor of theology at Leipsic. He was much esteemed by Luther and Melancthon, whose doctrines he ably supported. He died 1556, aged 60. He wrote some theological works now little read.

ZIETEN, John Joachim Van, a native of Worstrau, in the circle of Rupin, distinguished as an officer in the Prussian service. He lost his first commission for challenging his superior officer, but his merits recommended him to the king, and as captain of Hussars he rendered his company the best disciplined in the army. In the campaign of 1745, his valour was particularly displayed, and though disgraced for a while by the intrigues of general Von Winterfeldt, he rose to the rank of lieutenant-general, and commanded the admiration of the king, and of the Prussian army, at the siege of Prague, the battle of Lignitz, and the storming of Torgau. He died in retirement, universally regretted, 1786, aged 87. He was of small stature, but the powers of the mind, and the goodness of the heart, atoned for the deficiencies of nature.

ZIMMERMANN, Matthias, a native of Eperies, who became protestant minister at Meissen, and died 1689, aged 64. He published a Dissertation on a Passage in Tertullian—Florilegium Philologico-Historicum, 4to.—Amœnitates Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ, 4to.

ZIMMERMANN, John George, an eminent physician, born at Brug in the canton of Berne, 8th Dec. 1728. He studied medicine at Gottingen under Haller, in Holland under Gaubius, and at Paris under Senac, and acquired distinction by his profession, and more by his writings. He was noticed by the king of Prussia, and appointed, by the regency of Hanover, physician to the king of England. In the latter part of life he gave way to melancholy, and his infirmities were increased by the insanity of his son, and the death of a beloved daughter who expired in his arms. He died 7th Oct. 1795, aged 66. He wrote a poem on the Destruction of Lisbon by the Earthquake, 1755—and Physiological Dissertation on Irritability—An Essay on Solitude, 1756, translated into French and English—An Essay on National Pride, 1758. His life was written by his friend Tissot.

ZIMMERMANN, Eberhard Augustus William Von, a learned German, was born in 1743 at Uelzen, where his father was superintendent. He received his education first at Gottingen, and next at Leyden; after which he became professor of natural philosophy in the Caroline college at Brunswick. His first work was a treatise on the analysis of Curves, and in 1777 he published "Specimen Zoologiæ," the outline of his "Geographical History of Man and Quadrupeds," 3 vols. He visited England three times, and printed here in 1787 his "Political Survey of the present State of Europe." The French revolution made a strong impression upon the mind of Zimmermann, and he warned his countrymen of the evils which they would suffer from it. For this he was ennobled by the emperor Leopold. After this he published several geographical works, but one of his best was a "General Survey of France and of the United States of America," 2 vols. In 1806 Zimmermann left Brunswick, and went to Hamburgh, but afterwards he returned to the former city, and died there July 4, 1815.—W. B.

ZINER, Christian Frederic, a native of Dresden, who studied painting in England under Boil, 1706. He chiefly excelled in enamel painting, and his portraits of the royal family of England possessed great merit. He died 1767, aged 83.

ZINGHA, queen of Angola, was sister to Gola Bendi the king of the country, who sacrificed all his family to his fears or cruelty. Zingha escaping from the persecution of her brother, ascended the throne at his death, but was soon after dispossessed by the Portuguese. She afterwards retired among a savage nation in the interior of Africa, where she obtained the sovereignty, and in her old age expressed a wish to be converted to Christianity. She died Dec. 1664, aged 82.

ZINZENDORF, Nicholas Lewis, count, of an ancient family originally from Austria, was son of the chamberlain of the king of Poland. He is celebrated as the founder of the sect called Hernhuters, or Moravians, which first began at Bartelsdorf in Upper Lusatia, 1722. The place where these visionaries, who called themselves the brethren, met together, was a forest, which soon grew into a large village, and received the name of Hernhuth, and their doctrines were rapidly spread through Bohemia and Moravia. Some of them came to England, and by the patronage of general Oglethorpe and others, they obtained an act of parliament for the protection of their sect. Their government is patriarchal; they consider the purest precepts of the gospel as the best guides of their conduct; their morals are irreprouchable; and in their mutual support of each other, display the noblest virtues of the Christian doctrine. They have, however, been accused by some, according to Cœvenna, of impure conduct, and they are charged with the gross crime of having a community of wives. Zinzendorf died at Hernhuth, 1660, aged 60, and was succeeded in the government of the sect by count de Dohna. His life has been written in German by Augustus Spangenberg, 8 vols. Svo. 1777, and is full of curious and interesting particulars.

ZINZERLING, Justus, a learned antiquarian of Holland in the 17th century. He published Criticorum Juveniliū Promulsiō — Jodici Sinceri Itinerarium Galliæ cum Appendice de Burdegalâ, a curious and interesting work, &c.

ZISKA or ZISCA, John de Troeznou, a native of Bohemia. He early embraced the military profession and lost one of his eyes in a battle, in consequence of which he was called Ziska. He placed himself at the head of the Hussites who wished to avenge the death of their leader John Huss; and on the decease of Wenceslaus king of Bohemia in 1414, he opposed the claims of the emperor Sigismund to the throne. Though he lost his other eye by an arrow at the siege of Rabi, he continued the war, and he defeated his enemies at the battle of Aussig on the Elbe, and became master of Bohemia, which he laid waste with fire and sword. Alarmed by the astonishing success of this vigorous leader, Sigismund sent ambassadors to him to offer him the government of Bohemia on the most honourable conditions; but during the negotiations, he fell a victim to the plague, which began to ravage the country. This happened in 1424, and an honourable epitaph, describing his virtues and services, was placed on his tomb, which, however, was disgracefully erased by the soldiers of Ferdinand II. 1619. The report that he ordered his skin to be tanned, and to be used as a drum to animate his soldiers, is false.

ZIZIM, or ZEM, son of Mahomet II. and brother of Bajazet, was made governor of Lycaonia. On the death of his father, he disputed the throne of the Ottomans with his brother Bajazet, but being defeated, he fled to Egypt, and afterwards passed through Cilicia and Rhodes to France, where he claimed the protection of Charles VIII. He was afterwards delivered into the hands of the pope by the French king; but though demanded on the most flattering conditions by Bajazet, who wished to put him to death, he was kept a prisoner at Rome, where he died 1497, as it is said by poison.

ZOE, fourth wife of the emperor Leo VI. was mother of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, during whose minority, 912, she governed with great wisdom and firmness. She crushed the rebellion of Constantine Ducas, and after making peace with the Saracens, she obliged the Bulgarians to return to their country. Though thus entitled to the gratitude of her son, and the admiration of the people, she was overpowered by the intrigues of the courtiers, and retired to a private station, and died in exile.

ZOE, daughter of Constantine XI. was born 978. She married Argyrus, who ascended the throne after her father; but disgusted, from the most licentious motives, with her husband, she caused him to be strangled, and placed on the throne Michael the Paphlagonian, a goldsmith, whom she married. She was afterwards confined in a monastery, and after Michael's death, she took for her third husband, in her 64th year, Constantine Monomachus. This cruel and debauched princess died eight years after, 1050.—Another, daughter of Stylian, married the emperor Leo, surnamed the Philosopher, and died 21 months after, 893.

ZOILUS, a rhetorician of Amphipolis in Thrace, who criticised so severely the poems of Homer, that he was called Homeromastix, and his name is reproachfully applied to all illiberal critics. He flourished B.C. 270.

ZOLLIKOFER, George Joachim, a native of Switzerland, educated at Bremen and Utrecht. He settled in the Pays de Vaud, and afterwards went to Monstein in the Grisons, and then to Isenberg, and to Leipzig, where he was distinguished as an able divine among the protestants. He died 1758, aged 28, author of a book of devotions—two volumes of sermons, translated into English, &c.

ZONARAS, John, a Greek historian. He held offices of distinction at the court of Constantinople; but at last, tired with the world, he assumed the habit of a monk, and died in a monastery in the beginning of the 12th century. He wrote Annals from the Creation of the World to the year 1118, a work of little merit, as the compilation of an ignorant and credulous monk. He closely copies Dio Cassius, though in the affairs of his own times, he mentions facts nowhere else to be found. He wrote also Commentaries on the Apostolic Canons.

ZONEA, Victor, an Italian mathematician in the 17th century. His inventions and improvements in mechanics were many and valuable, and of them he published an account called Novo Teatro di Machine ed Edificii, Padua, 1621, folio.

ZOPPO, Mark, a native of Bologna, the disciple and imitator of Andrew Mantagne, in historical and portrait painting. He died 1517, aged 66.

ZOPYRUS, a Persian noble, one of the seven who destroyed the usurper Smerdis. To obtain possession of Babylon for Darius he mangled his body, and thus gained the confidence of the Babylonians, after which he betrayed the town to his countrymen.

ZOROASTER, an ancient philosopher, the founder or the reformer of the religion of the Magi. Some call him king of the Bactrians, and others place him in the age of Abraham. As the head of a religious sect among the Persians, he taught his followers the practice of benevolence, as he declared that nothing could be more acceptable to heaven than mutual affection and the display of philanthropy. The book which contains his religious tenets, and which is divided into 100 articles, has been made known to Europeans by the researches of M. Anquetil, who has published a translation of it in 2 vols. 4to.

ZOSIMUS, St. a Greek, who became pope after Innocent I. 417, and died the following year. Sixteen of his letters are preserved.

ZOSIMUS, author of a Greek history of the Roman emperors to his own times, flourished in the fifth century. Of his works, only the five first books, and part of the sixth, are extant; best edited at Oxford, 1679, 8vo. and by Cellarius, 1696. His work is written with elegance, but not always with fidelity, and he is very severe against the Christians.

ZOUCH, Richard, a native of Anley, Wiltshire, educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford. He studied the law, and afterwards became an advocate in Doctors' Commons, chancellor of Oxford diocese, principal of Alban hall, and judge of the admiralty court. He wrote Cases and Questions resolved in the Civil Law, 8vo. 1652—Vindication of the Jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England against sir Edward Coke, a work of merit, and other tracts on jurisprudence, and died 1660.

ZOUCH, Thomas, a learned divine, was born in 1737, at Sandal, near Wakefield, in Yorkshire, and educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, where he was chosen fellow in 1763. In 1770 he was presented to the rectory of Wycliffe, in his native county; in 1793 instituted to that of Scrayingham, and in 1805 collated to a prebend in the cathedral of Durham, on which occasion he took his doctor's degree. In 1808 he was offered the bishopric of Carlisle, which he declined on account of his age. He died in 1816. His works are, 1. The Crucifixion, a Seaton prize poem. 2. An Inquiry into the prophetic character of the Romans, as described by Daniel. 3. The good Schoolmaster, exemplified in the character of the Rev. John Clarke. 4. Memoir of Sir Philip Sidney, 4to. 5. Memoir of John Sudbury, dean of Durham, 4to. 6. An edition of Izaak Walton's "Love and Truth." 7. Another of that writer's Lives of Donne, Wotton, Hooker, Herbert, and Sanderson. Dr. Zouch also left a manuscript memoir of sir George Wheler, which is now in the press.—W.B.

ZOUST, Gerard, a German, particularly distinguished as a portrait painter. He lived for some years in London, where Riley was his pupil, and died 1681. He was happy in his male figures, but he was too faithful a copier of nature, says Granger, to be much in vogue among the ladies. His highest price was 3*l.* a head.

ZUBLY, John Joachim, D.D. was a native of Switzerland. He came to America, and took charge of the presbyterian church in Savannah, Georgia, about the year 1760. He not only preached in that church in the English language, but also in one neighbouring congregation in German, and in another in French. He was a member of the provincial congress of Georgia in 1775, but as he took the side of opposition to American independence, he incurred the frowns of a majority of his fellow-citizens, and became, for the remainder of his life, less happy and less useful. He was a man of strong mind, of great learning, and of eminent piety. His evangelical labours were zealous, disinterested, unwearied, and at one period extensively useful. The few and small publications which he made, do honour to his memory. He died in Savannah in 1781, at an advanced age. The degree of doctor of divinity was conferred upon him by the college at Princeton, in the year 1774.

ZUCCHERO, Taddeo, a painter, born 1529 at San-Aguolo-Invado, in the dutchy of Urbino. He was noticed by cardinal Farnese, who granted him a pension, but his independence produced dissipated habits, and hastened his end. He died 1566. His pieces are much admired, though his figures exhibit little variety in the features, and deserve censure for the stiffness observable in the hands and feet.

ZUCCHERO, Frederic, brother to the preceding, was born in the dutchy of Urbino, and died at Ancona 1609, aged 63. He studied under his brother, and afterwards settled at Rome, where he was patronised by pope Gregory XIII. In consequence of a dispute with some of the officers of the pope's household, he drew a picture of calumny, in which he represented the features of his enemies with ass's ears, and in such a correct manner that they could not be mistaken, and this so highly offended the sovereign pontiff that he was obliged to fly from Rome. After visiting France, Holland, England, and Spain, he returned to Italy, and was honoured with the title of knight by the Venetian republic, and afterwards invited to Rome, and placed at the head of an academy of painting, with the title of prince. His pieces are much admired, though there appears a stiffness in his figures, and though his draperies are not executed with taste and judgment. He was also eminent as a good architect and sculptor.

ZUINGLIUS, Ulricus, a zealous reformer, born at Wildehausen in Switzerland 1457.

He studied the learned languages at Basil and Berne, and applied himself to philosophy at Vienna, and took his degree of D.D. at Basil 1505. For ten years he acquired popularity as public preacher, at Glaris, and in 1516 he was invited to Zurich to undertake the office of minister. The tenets of Luther, which were now propagated in Germany, encouraged the Swiss preacher to oppose the sale of indulgencies, and to regard them as impositions from the court of Rome upon the superstitious credulity of the people. Undaunted in the publication of his opinions, he continued to increase the number of his adherents, and in 1523 he assembled the senate and the clergy of Zurich, and presented before them in 67 propositions the minute articles of his faith. Though opposed by the bishop of Constance, his doctrines were adopted by the full senate, and he was exhorted to preach the word of God, whilst all pastors were forbidden to teach any thing but what could be proved by the Gospel. Another synod still more powerfully favoured the cause of Zuinglius and of truth, images and reliques were removed from churches, processions were forbidden, and the greater part of the outward worship and ceremonies of the church of Rome was abolished. While, however, successful in the establishment of his doctrines in the canton of Zurich, Zuinglius met with violent opposition in the other members of the Swiss confederacy, and after the fruitless conferences of Baden between Œcolampadius on the part of Zurich, and of Eckius on the part of the catholics, both sides had recourse to arms. In one of the first encounters the great champion of the reformation was slain, 11th Oct. 1531. As a leader Zuinglius displayed great firmness, deep learning, and astonishing presence of mind. Though he opposed the doctrines of the Romish church, he greatly differed from the German reformer, and each unhappily paid little respect to the opinions of the other. His followers continued to increase, and in bearing his name they maintained doctrines on original sin, and on grace, which were rejected by the other seceders from the jurisdiction of Rome. According to Zuinglius, salvation was extended not only to infants, who died before baptism, but to heathens of a virtuous and moral life. Some alterations were afterwards introduced by Calvin, by Beza, and others, but whilst the proselytes to these new opinions acquired the name of Calvinists in France, and in other parts of Europe, the Zuinglians who firmly adhered to the tenets of their founder assumed the appellation of Saeramentarians. The works of Zuinglius, as a controversialist were respectable, chiefly written in German, and were comprehended in 4 vols. fol.

ZUMBO, Gaston John, a sculptor, born at Syracuse 1656. He resided for some time at Rome, and then at Florence, where he was much noticed by the grand duke of Tuscany. He afterwards went to Genoa, and then passed to Paris, where he died 1701. The best of his pieces are a nativity, and a descent from the cross.

ZUR-LAUBEN, Beat de, a native of Valais, known as an able negotiator, from the canton of Zug, at the court of Lewis XIII. He was highly honoured for his services by his countrymen, and called the father of his country, and the pillar of religion. He died 1663, aged 66. He wrote an account of his negotiations. His eldest son of the same name, was engaged in the military affairs of his country, and distinguished himself at the battle of Vilmergen, against the Bernese. He died at Zug 1690, aged 74. A nephew of the preceding, of the same name, displayed his knowledge of war at the head of the French armies, and contributed much to the victory of Nerwinde. He died at Ulm, 21st Sept. 1704, aged 48, in consequence of seven wounds, which he had received at the battle of Hochstet.

ZUSTRUS, Lambert, a painter of merit, the pupil of Schwartz, and of Titian. The best of his pieces is the rape of Proserpine preserved at Paris.

ZWICKER, Daniel, a Socinian, who attempted to reconcile the discordant sects among the protestants by the publication of his Irenicon Irenicorum, a work which created him many enemies. He defended himself in two subsequent publications, and died about the 17th century.

ZWINGER, Theodore, a learned physician, born at Bichoffstzel in the Turgau. He became professor of moral philosophy and medicine, and died 1588, aged 54. He wrote the Theatre of Human Life, a ponderous work published in 8 vols. fol. Lyons 1656, and afterwards improved and enlarged by his son James, who died 1610.

ZWINGER, Theodore, son of James, and grandson of Theodore, studied medicine which he afterwards abandoned for divinity. During the plague which raged at Basil in 1629, he displayed great humanity, both as a pastor and as a physician. He was author of several controversial tracts, and died 1651, aged 54. His son John became professor of Greek, and public librarian at Basil, and distinguished himself by his learning. He died 1696.

ZWINGER, Theodore, son of John just mentioned, was professor of eloquence and medicine at Basil, where he died 1724. He published Theatrum Botanicum, in German, fol.—Fasciculus Dissertationum, 4to.

—Triga Dissertationum—a Latin and German Dictionary—some medical works, &c. His brother John Rodolphus was professor of divinity at Basil, and died there 1708, aged 48. He wrote sermons—tracts—and the Hope of Israel, in German.

ZYLIVS, Otho, a Jesuit, born at Utrecht. He wrote the Lives of Saints—Cambracum Obsidione Liberatum, a poem, &c. and died at Malines 15th Aug. 1656, aged 88.

ZYPÆUS, or VANDEN ZYPE, Francis, a native of Malines. His great knowledge of jurisprudence was admired, and rewarded by le Mire, bishop of Antwerp, who appointed him his secretary, and gave him the place of a canon, and of an archdeacon of his church. He is author of some works of merit on the law, especially Analytica Enarratio Juris Pontificii Novi—Consultationes Canonicae—Notitiæ Juris Belgici—De Jurisdictione Ecclesiastica, et Civili, &c. collected together in 2 vols. fol. This learned man, equally respectable in private life, died at Antwerp 1650, aged 71. His brother Henry was an ecclesiastic, and became abbot of St. Andrew near Bruges. He died 1659, aged 85. He was author of several works, the best known of which is Sanctus Gregorius Magnus, &c. 1611, 8vo. in which, with more learning than wisdom, he proves that Gregory, who was a Roman pontiff, was of the order of the Benedictines.

BRADBURY, Theophilus, judge of the superior court of Massachusetts, was graduated at Harvard college in 1757. He devoted himself to the profession of the law, and after enjoying a course of successful practice, was appointed to a seat on the bench of the superior court, and discharged the duties of the station with intelligence and fidelity. His death took place, Sept. 6, 1803, in his 64th year.

BRAXTON, Carter, one of the signers of the declaration of American independence, was from Virginia.

BROWN, John, born in Providence, Rhode Island, in 1736, and a wealthy and enterprising merchant of that town; was a leader of the party which, in 1772, destroyed the British sloop of war Gasper, in Narraganset bay. He was the first in Rhode Island who traded with the East Indies and China; a member of congress; a great projector of works of public utility, and a munificent patron of literature. He laid the corner stone of the spacious and oldest edifice, of the institution now called Brown university, in honour of his nephew the Hon. Nicholas Brown. He died in 1803.

BROWN, Joseph, born at Providence, Rhode-Island, December 3d, 1733, and a merchant and manufacturer, was distinguished for his genius for mechanics, and the extent of his mathematical and philosophical acquirements. He was for some time professor of natural philosophy in Brown university, and was a member of the American academy of arts and sciences. He died Dec. 3, 1785, aged 52.

BUCKMINSTER, Joseph Stevens, was born in Portsmouth, N. H. May 26, 1784. His male ancestors, both by his father's and mother's side, for several generations, were clergymen, and several of them of considerable eminence. He entered as a student of Harvard in 1797, nearly a year in advance, and was graduated in August, 1800; and his oration delivered on that occasion, "on the literary character of different nations," produced a deep impression. After leaving college he spent four years in the study of theology. He first preached in the church in Brattle-street, Boston, Oct. 1804, and was ordained over that church in January, 1805. During a great portion of his life he was subject to attacks of epilepsy, which in an instant prostrated his powers. With the view of improving his constitution, he went to Europe in the spring of 1806. He returned in the autumn of 1807, and resumed the exercise of his profession. In 1811 he was appointed the first lecturer on biblical criticism on the Dexter foundation at Cambridge university, and immediately began a course of laborious and extensive preparation for the delivery of lectures, but was soon interrupted by a violent attack of his old disease, which caused an instant and irrecoverable wreck of his intellect. After lingering a few days he died, June 9th, 1812, having just completed his 28th year. "No man of his age and sphere of life was ever more ardently beloved, or more highly estimated, both by his friends, and by that portion of the public which came within his scope of action. His high reputation as a preacher was suddenly acquired, but was sustained, extended, and increased, to the close of his life. His love of sacred literature was ardent, and he did much to excite attention to biblical criticism. His sermons were searching and practical: they contained the essence of learning without its ostentation. Their most interesting attribute was the "philosophical imagination" with which he beautifully and powerfully enforced his views and illustrated his arguments. Several of his occasional orations and discourses have been published. He also contributed many articles to the periodical works of the day. He will, however, be best known by the volume of posthumous sermons published by some of his friends shortly after his death, to which an interesting memoir of his life, drawn up by his friend, the late Rev. Samuel Thacher, was prefixed.

BULL, Henry, of Newport, R. I. one of the original purchasers of the island of Aquidneck, now Rhode-Island, was born in South Wales in the year 1609. He came to Massachusetts colony, and resided there a short time; but in consequence of the unhappy differences in ecclesiastical matters, joined himself with seventeen others, who purchased and settled at Newport in 1638. He was governor of the new colony in 1635, and again in the memorable year 1689, when sir Edmund Andros, governor of all New-England for James the second, was imprisoned in Boston. The freemen of the colony then resolving to restore the former system of government, the governor elect, with a number of the inferior magistrates, refused to serve. Mr. Bull died in 1693, at the age of 84.

BURRILL, James, an eminent lawyer and statesman, was born at Providence, Rhode Island, April 25, 1772, and educated at Brown university, where he graduated in 1788, with a high reputation for genius and acquirements. He studied law in the offices of T. Foster, and judge Howell, and was admitted to practice in September, 1791, and his superior talents soon placed him in the first rank at the bar. He was, in 1797, appointed attorney-general of the state, and continued to hold the office for fifteen years, discharging its duties with uncommon ability and popularity. The decline of his health led him, in May, 1813, to retire from the bar. He was immediately elected to a seat in the state legislature, and the following year was chosen speaker of the house of representatives. In May, 1816, he was appointed chief justice of the supreme court of the state, and in February, 1817, elected to a seat in the senate of the United States, for which the dignity of his character, the force of his eloquence, and his superior knowledge of politics and law most happily fitted him. He immediately became conspicuous in that body, and took a distinguished part in the most important of its transactions during the three following years, when he was suddenly called from life, December 25, 1820, while at the seat of government. He was eminent for the extent of his miscellaneous as well as professional knowledge, the strength of his argumentative powers, and the soundness of his judgment, and was characterized in his public and private life by uprightness, urbanity, and benevolence.

BYRON, George Gordon, the most eminent poet of the age, was born in 1788. He was the grandson of the Hon. John Byron, well known as a naval commander under lord Anson, and succeeded to the title and estates of William, the fifth lord Byron, in 1798. He was that year sent to Harrow school, and at the age of 16 became a student at Trinity college, Cambridge. About four years after he commenced his travels in Portugal, Spain, and Greece, and on his return, after an absence of nearly three years, published the two first cantos of "Childe Harold," and not long after the "Giaour," "Bride of Abydos," and "Corsair." He left England again in 1816, and travelling through Switzerland to Italy, resided several years at Venice, Rome, and Genoa, and there completed his "Childe Harold," and composed several other poems. In 1823, he proceeded to Greece to take part in the struggles of that country for freedom, and after having rendered the most important services by his wealth and counsels, and acquired a distinguished reputation and influence among the Greeks, died suddenly at Missolonghi, April 19th, 1824. His last and largest work is Don Juan. His works have recently been republished in this country in 8 vols.

CHASE, Samuel, one of the signers of the declaration of American independence, was bred a lawyer, and was one of the most eminent at the bar in Maryland for several years previous to the commencement of the revolutionary war. At the beginning of that struggle, he took a bold and active part in the cause of liberty, and was appointed one of the committee of correspondence, and elected to a seat in congress in 1774, and was long a distinguished member of that body. In 1776, he was appointed with Franklin and Carroll to form a plan of union between the colonies and Canada. He was one of the most bold and vigorous advocates for the declaration of independence, and is said to have been the means of inducing the Maryland delegation, contrary to their instructions, to unite in the measure. In 1782, he resigned his seat in congress. In 1783, he was a member of the convention of Maryland which ratified the constitution of the United States. In 1791, he was appointed chief justice of the general court of Maryland, and afterwards associate judge of the supreme court of the United States. Warmly attached to the principles and measures of the administrations of Washington and Adams, he incurred, in the discharge of his official duties, the violent resentment of the opposition; and after the change in the administration, and the displacement of his political friends, was impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors. The measure was principally instigated by John Randolph, one of the managers on the part of government. The trial, which was long, and conducted with great ability, and which excited the highest interest in the public mind, terminated in the complete vindication of Mr. Chase. An account of it, in 2 vols. was published in 1806. He died June 17, 1811.

COKE, Thomas, LL.D. a distinguished minister of the Methodist church, was born at Brecon, in South Wales, September 9, 1747, and educated at Oxford. He took orders, and obtained the curacy of Pether-ton, in Somersetshire; but in 1777, joined Mr. Wesley, and was appointed to labour in London. In 1780, he began to visit the societies in different parts of the kingdom, and spent the remainder of his life in itinerating. In 1784, he was appointed by Mr. Wesley superintendent of the Methodist churches in the United States, to which he immediately repaired. He afterwards repeatedly visited them and the West Indies, and contributed greatly to the progress of the society. He embarked in 1814 for India, for the purpose of establishing a mission at Ceylon, but died on the 3d of May, before the termination of the voyage. He published a Commentary on the Scriptures—a History of the West Indies—and several smaller works. He was distinguished for his zeal and disinterestedness, and the extent and successfulness of his labours.

CUSHING, John, D.D. son of the Rev. Job Cushing, was born in Shrewsbury, Massachusetts, Aug. 22, 1744, and graduated at Harvard university in 1764. He was ordained to the pastoral care of the church in Ashburnham, Massachusetts, Nov. 2, 1768; received a diploma as doctor of divinity from Harvard university in 1822; and died April 27, 1823, in the 79th year of his age, and the 55th year of his ministry. He was remarkable for purity of mind and soundness and discrimination of judgment, and his attainments were extensive, particularly in geography, biography, chronology, and history, both sacred and profane. As a pastor, he was zealous and indefatigable in promoting the welfare of his flock, and the reverence and affection of his people increased with his years. In his religious tenets he was Calvinistic, and was singularly liberal towards all other sects of Christians. Endowed by nature with a retentive memory, and having conversed much with men, as well as with books, he had acquired a vast store of general information, which, combined with great frankness of manners and a communicative disposition, caused his society to be courted and valued by those who knew him. He wrote about sixteen hundred discourses, of which several occasional sermons were published. A Discourse, delivered on the completion of the 50th year of his ministry, soon passed through two editions.

FITCH, Thomas, was chief justice of Connecticut from 1750 to 1754, and governor of the colony from 1754 to 1766. He was a man of distinguished talents, a profound lawyer, and a sagacious statesman; and was eminently useful in his public, and estimable in his private life. He died at Norwalk, July 18th, 1774, aged 75.

GRAHAM, Mrs. Isabella, was the daughter of John Marshall, of the shire of Lanark, Scotland, and born July 29th, 1742. She received an excellent education, and early became pious. In 1765, she married Dr. John Graham, and accompanied him with his regiment, first to Fort Niagara, and afterwards to Antigua, where he died in 1774. She returned to Scotland, but in 1789, came to New-York and established a school for the instruction of young ladies, which she continued for many years with success. She distinguished herself during the last years of her life by her charity to the poor, and her laudable exertions and example contributed greatly to their instruction and the relief of their wants, by encouraging the formation of charitable societies, and the establishment of benevolent institutions. The most important of them was the Widows' Society—the Orphan Asylum Society—and the Society for the Promotion of Industry. Her death took place July 27th, 1814.

HARRISON, Benjamin, one of the signers of the declaration of American Independence, was from Virginia.

HAWLEY, Joseph, a distinguished statesman and patriot, was born at Northampton, Massachusetts, in 1724, and graduated at Yale college in 1742. He devoted himself to the practice of law, and soon rose to eminence in the profession. At the commencement of the contest between Great Britain and the colonies, he engaged with great zeal in the cause of liberty, and became by his distinguished talents, superior knowledge of the principles of government, bold and manly eloquence, and eminent excellence of character, one of the ablest and most successful advocates and promoters of the struggle which terminated in independence. He rendered his chief services in the state legislature, of which he was the most distinguished member from his first election, in 1764, till 1776, when the decline of his health induced him to retire from public employments. His death took place, March 10th, 1788, in his 64th year.

HEYWOOD, Thomas, junior, one of the signers of the declaration of American Independence, was from South Carolina.

HOWELL, David, judge of the United States district court, was a native of New-Jersey, and educated at Princeton. He removed in early life to Rhode-Island, and was appointed professor of mathematics and philosophy, and afterward of law, in Brown university. Providence. He there established himself in the practice of the law, and rose to eminence in the profession. He was for some time attorney-general of the state and judge of the supreme court. His distinguished talents and patriotism procured his election to a seat in the old continental congress, and after the reorganization of the general government he was appointed a commissioner for settling the eastern boundary of the United States, and subsequently district attorney, and in 1812 district judge for Rhode-Island, in which station he continued till his death, July 29, 1824, in his 78th year. He was a man of great wit, learning, and eloquence.

JARVIS, Abraham, D.D. bishop of the Episcopal church in Connecticut, was born in Norwalk, in that state, May 5th, 1739, and graduated at Yale college in 1761. In 1764 he visited England, and was ordained by the bishop of Carlisle. On his return, he was settled as rector of the church at Middletown, Connecticut, and continued there, greatly respected by his people, till 1799. He was appointed the successor of bishop Seabury in June, 1797, and consecrated on the 18th of October, in that year. He resigned the rectorship of the church at Middletown in 1799, and removed first to Cheshire, and in 1803 to New-Haven, where he continued to reside till his death, May 3, 1813, in his 74th year. He possessed a vigorous mind, and a correct taste, and was distinguished for courteousness, affability, integrity, and devotedness to the interests of the church. He published a Sermon on the Death of Bishop Seabury—a Charge to the Clergy—and a Sermon on the Witness of the Spirit.

JONES, David, judge of the supreme court of New-York, was a native of Oysterbay, Long-Island, and born in September, 1699. He enjoyed an excellent private education, and studied law, though he never devoted himself to the profession. He was chosen a member of the colonial assembly in 1737, and continued to occupy a seat in it until 1758. He was thirteen years of the period speaker of that body, and discharged the duties of his station with distinguished intelligence and fidelity to the liberties of the people. In 1758 he was appointed a judge of the supreme court, and through the long period during which he held the office, rendered himself the object of universal confidence and respect by his capacity, uprightness, and zealous defence of the rights of the people against the encroachments of the king. He resigned the station in 1773, and died October 11th, 1775.

JONES, William, governor of Rhode-Island, was born in Newport in that state in 1754. He was during the revolutionary war a captain of marines, and was taken a prisoner at the siege of Charleston, South Carolina. He was several years speaker of the house of representatives of Rhode-Island, and was in 1810 elected governor, and held the office till 1817. His death took place at Providence in 1822.

LEWIS, Francis, one of the signers of the declaration of American Independence, was from New-York.

LIVINGSTON, John, D.D. professor of theology in the reformed Dutch church, was born at Poughkeepsie, New-York, in 1746, and educated at Yale college, where he was graduated in 1762. He studied theology at the university of Utrecht, Holland, from which he received the degree of Doctor of Theology in 1770, and soon after returned, and became pastor of the reformed Dutch church in the city of New-York. In the following year, at his suggestion, the colonial church separated from the parent church in Holland, became independent, and laid the foundation for a theological professorship, which he was, in 1784, appointed to fill. He continued to discharge the duties of those offices with success and reputation, till 1810, when on the removal of the theological school to Queen's college, New-Brunswick, New-Jersey, he was appointed to take charge of that institution, and remained there until his death, which took place January 29th, 1825, in the 80th year of his age. He was eminent for piety, learning, and usefulness, and enjoyed in a distinguished degree the affection of his people, the confidence and respect of his associates in the ministry, and the veneration of his pupils.

LYNCH, Thomas, jun. one of the signers of the declaration of American independence, was born in Prince-George's parish, South Carolina, August 5th, 1749, and was educated at Cambridge, England. He afterwards entered at the Temple, but before completing his course, returned in 1772 to America. On the raising of the first troops in South Carolina, in 1775, he received the commission of a captain, but in consequence of the illness of his father, toward the close of that year, was elected to fill his seat in congress, for which he was eminently qualified, by his superior intellect, extensive knowledge, and persuasive eloquence. The decline of his health obliged him in the autumn of 1776 to retire from public employment. After lingering till near the close of 1779, he embarked for St. Eustatia, with the intention of visiting Europe; and by some unknown accident, perished with all the ship's company at sea.

PARSONS, Moses, congregational minister of Byfield, Massachusetts, was born June 20, 1716, and educated at Harvard college, where he was graduated in 1736. He was ordained in 1744, and after a useful ministry of 40 years, died, December 14, 1784. He was distinguished for talents, learning, and piety, as a preacher, and for dignity of manners, affability, wit, benevolence, and every social virtue in private life. He was the father of Theophilus Parsons, chief justice of Massachusetts. His only publication was an Election Sermon, in 1772.

PENN, John, one of the signers of the declaration of American independence, was born North Carolina.

RODNEY, Cæsar, one of the signers of the declaration of American Independence, was from Pennsylvania.

ROGERS, William, D.D. professor of English and oratory in the university of Pennsylvania, was born at Newport, Rhode-Island, July 22, 1751, and was graduated at Brown university in 1769. He received his license to preach in 1771, and in May of the following year was ordained pastor of the first Baptist church in Philadelphia, where he continued till the commencement of the revolutionary war in 1775, when he was appointed chaplain of the Pennsylvania forces, and not long afterwards of a brigade of the continental army, and remained in the service till 1781. In 1789 he was elected professor of English and oratory in the college of Philadelphia, and afterwards was appointed to the same office in the university of Pennsylvania, and held it till 1812, when he resigned. His death took place, April 7, 1824, in his 74th year. He held a highly respectable rank in talents and learning, and was greatly esteemed for his ability and faithfulness as a preacher, and his excellence as a man.

ROMEYN, Rev. John B. D.D. was the only son of the Rev. Theodorus Romeyn, D.D. of Schenectady. He was born in the year 1778, graduated at Columbia college in New-York, at the age of 18, studied theology under the guidance of his father, and afterwards of the late Dr. Livingston; and was licensed to preach the gospel by the classis of Albany, in 1795. The next year he was ordained and installed pastor of the Reformed Dutch Church at Rhinebeck, where he remained until the year 1803, when he was transferred to the Presbyterian church in the city of Schenectady, as successor to the Rev. Dr. Clarkson. The next year he removed to the first Presbyterian church in Albany, and succeeded the Rev. Dr. Nott; where he continued about four years, and in 1808 was removed to the Presbyterian church in Cedar-street, New-York, of which he was the first pastor, and remained in that station till his death, which took place the 22d Feb. 1825. A collection of his sermons in 2 vols. 8vo. was published in 1816.

SCHAIK, Gonzen Van, a brigadier general in the American army, who in 1779 distinguished himself by destroying the Onondaga Indian settlements. He died at Albany in 1789, aged 53.

SCOTT, Thomas, D.D. was born at Braytolt, Lincolnshire, Feb. 4, 1746. He was sent, at the age of 10, to the school at Scorton, where he learned the languages. In 1772 he obtained orationation, and entered on a curacy at Stoke and Weston Underwood. In 1781 he succeeded Mr. Newton at Olney, but in 1785 became chaplain to the Lock Hospital, London, and continued there till his appointment, in 1803, to the rectory of Aston Sandford, Bucks. His death took place April 22d, 1821, in his 76th year. He was distinguished for piety and usefulness. He is chiefly known by his Commentary on the Bible, which has had a most extensive circulation. His other works are 6 vols. on theological subjects.

SEWALL, Joseph, D.D. a congregational minister, was the son of Samuel Sewall, chief justice of Massachusetts, and born August 26, 1688. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1707, and in 1713, was ordained colleague pastor of the old South church, Boston, where he laboured with great acceptance and success till his death, June 21st, 1769, in his 81st year. He held a respectable rank in talents and learning, and was eminent for piety and faithfulness in the discharge of his official duties. He was in 1724 elected president of Harvard college, but declined the appointment. He published a large number of Sermons.

THACHER, Peter, D.D. congregational minister in Boston, was born at Milton, Massachusetts, March 21, 1752, and graduated at Harvard college, in 1769. He was settled at Malden in 1770, and early became distinguished for his intelligence, piety, and eloquence. He was in 1780 a member of the convention which framed the constitution of Massachusetts. He was in 1785 installed pastor of the Brattle-street church in Boston, and continued in that station till his death, December 16, 1802. He published a great number of Sermons.

VAN NESS, William W. for many years a judge of the supreme court of the state of New-York, was born of Dutch parents at Claverack, in that state, in the year 1775. He married early, and came to the bar at the age of 21, and settled in his native town. He continued to practise the law there and in the adjoining city of Hudson, with continually increasing reputation and success, until he was appointed to a seat on the bench of the supreme court in 1807, and at the age of 32. He was distinguished for his great sagacity and quick perception of sound legal principles. He had a persuasive and argumentative style of eloquence, and no judge ever surpassed, and rarely equalled him, in his talents for the despatch of business at Nisi Prius, and in his ascendancy over the understanding and control of the feelings of the jury, by the simplicity and urbanity of his manners, the clearness of his perception, and the justice and integrity of his conduct. The period in which he presided on the bench was remarkable for great political excitement, and being warm and zealous in what he deemed the true interest and policy of his country, he rendered himself peculiarly obnoxious to the jealousy and hatred of his political opponents, who felt the force of his character and weight of his counsels. In 1820, the house of assembly of New-York, in consequence of incessant and virulent newspaper attacks on his character, instituted a laborious and piercing investigation into his official conduct, which terminated in his complete vindication. He continued on the bench until his resignation on the 1st May, 1822, when he resumed the practice of his profession in the city of New-York. He, however, soon after lost his health, and in January, 1823, made a hopeless experiment of a sea voyage, and died at Charleston, South Carolina, on the 28th February following, deeply regretted by his numerous friends, and the profession, of which he was one of the brightest ornaments.

WHELPLEY, Samuel, minister and author, was born in Berkshire county, Massachusetts, in 1766. A considerable portion of his life after he had completed his education, was passed in New-Jersey, chiefly at Morristown, where he had charge of an academy, and employed himself in teaching. About the year 1812 he returned to the city of New-York where he continued till his death, July 15, 1817. He possessed an original and highly gifted mind, and displayed uncommon powers as a writer. He was author of the essays entitled the Triangle, published in New-York in 1816, in defence of the doctrines of the New-England churches. Also of "Letters on Capital Punishment, and War," addressed to governor Strong, and published in New-York in 1816. Of his other works, the principal were, a "Compend of Ancient and Modern History," and "Lectures on Ancient History."

WORTHINGTON, John, LL.D. an eminent lawyer, who received his education at Yale college, where he was graduated in 1740. He was afterwards a tutor in that institution. He was a member of the legislature of Massachusetts in 1774, and opposed himself to the measures which were adopted by the friends of liberty. He was the same year appointed one of the mandamus counsellors, but declined the office. His death took place at Springfield, in April, 1800.

YATES, Robert, chief justice of New-York, was born at Schenectady, January, 1738. He received a classical education, studied law, and established himself in practice in Albany. He early rose to eminence in the profession, as well by incorruptible integrity as superior talents and legal knowledge. During the revolution, he was one of the most prompt, judicious, and influential friends of the popular cause in the state, and rendered important services in a variety of responsible stations. He was chairman of the committee of military operations in 1776 and 1777; was a member of the convention in the latter year which formed the constitution of New-York; and on the organization of the government under it, was appointed a judge of the supreme court, and distinguished himself by the moderation and impartiality with which he discharged the duties of the station, particularly in the prosecutions against loyalists. He was a member of the convention which formed the federal constitution, and of that also by which it was ratified in his native state, and opposed its adoption. He became chief justice in 1790, and held the office till 1798. He died Sept. 9, 1801. He possessed a fine genius, was an accomplished scholar, and thoroughly versed in law. He was intimately acquainted with the history of the state, conversed in Dutch and several Indian languages, and was greatly distinguished and beloved for his amiable temper, benevolence, public spirit, uprightness, and wisdom.
